

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

IN presenting a SECOND EDITION of this work to the Public, the Author can have no occasion to expatiate on the Interesting Nature of its Subjects, or on the Utility of his Plan. A BIOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL LIBRARY, in the form of a Dictionary, and in the compass of a single volume, challenges the respect of every Lover of Literature. It is designed to answer the purpose of an easy and satisfactory reference on all points of enquiry, connected with BIOGRAPHY, CHRONOLOGY, AND HISTORY.

In drawing up the various articles, considerable pains have been taken to introduce every prominent and characteristic event and circumstance. The works of eminent Writers have been carefully enumerated, and their best editions specified; the distinctive merits of Artists have been pointed out, and their principal productions mentioned; and the most remarkable events in the lives of more active characters, as in those of Sovereign Princes, Warriors, and Statesmen, have been perspicuously narrated, and the dates affixed and determined with scrupulous exactness; and studied plainness of style has been adopted, as suitable to the nature of the work: and it may be safely affirmed, that in no single article has any attempt been made to give a deceitful or partial colouring to the character delineated. To THIS SECOND EDITION the Author has annexed a reference to the Authority of each article; an addition, the value of which will be felt by every Man of Letters, and by the Public at Large.

The Author has endeavoured to render his work COMPLETE, by inserting every interesting name and event likely to be sought for in a collection of this kind; and although he cannot presume that there are not many defects and omissions, yet it will be obvious on comparison, that this work now contains from two to three thousand articles more than are to be found in any similar work in the English, or perhaps in any other language.

Observing, with regret, the great number of distinguished names which have been passed over by preceding Biographers, he has diligently employed himself in rescuing a considerable number of those names from neglect and oblivion. He has not contented himself with barely gleaning from all other Dictionaries, but has sought in every respectable quarter for memoirs of departed excellence. Many single memoirs and fugitive pieces, and many scarce tracts and voluminous periodical publications, have in the preparation of the NEW EDITION been sedulously examined.

London, October, 1805.

THE BIOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL DICTIONARY.

A A R

AA (Peter Vander), a bookseller at Leyden, who published at the beginning of the 18th century, an Atlas, with a collection of prints, representing the towns, inhabitants, and productions, of different parts of the world, 66 vols. fol. He also continued Graviius's Thesaurus, or an account of modern Italian writers.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

AAGARD (Nicholas and Christian) brothers, born at Wieburg, in Denmark, the beginning of the last century. The first was a philosophical writer, and the latter a poet. Nicholas died in 1657, and Christian in 1664.—Moreri.

AALST (Everard), a Dutch painter, born at Delft, 1602. He was eminent in fruit pieces, and died in 1658.—Houbraken.

AALST (William), nephew of the above, but more celebrated; born in 1620, died 1679.—Ibid.

AARON, the elder brother of Moses, was born about the year of the world 2494. He accompanied his brother in all his interviews with Pharaoh, and afterwards assisted him in the government of the Israelites. But he was guilty of a great error when his brother was on Mount Sinai, in complying with the idolatrous disposition of the people, and making them a golden calf, which they worshipped as the God that had delivered them out of Egypt. Notwithstanding this, the Almighty ordained that the priesthood should be confined to Aaron and his sons, which occasioned some discontent among the people. Aaron enjoyed the office of high priest till old age and infirmities compelled him to resign it to his son Eleazar. He soon afterwards died on Mount Hor.—SS.

AARON, a British saint, who suffered martyrdom with his brother Julius in Diocletian's persecution. Their bodies were interred at Caer-leon, the metropolis of Wales.—Big. Br.

AARON, a physical writer of the 7th century. He wrote in Syriac several treatises on medicine, entitled the Pandects, of which there are no remains. He was the first author who described the small-pox and measles.—Moreri.

AARON (Schafschon), a learned rabbi, who wrote the Law of Truth, Venice, 1631, folio.—Ibid.

AARON, the Carait, a Jewish physician at Constantinople, in 1294. He wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, printed at Jena, in folio, 1710. There was another of the same name who wrote a Hebrew grammar, printed at Constantinople, 1581.—Ibid.

AARON (Hacharon), i. e. Posterior, to distinguish him from the preceding, born in Nicomedia, in 1346. He wrote a book on the Jewish doctrines and customs, called the Garden of Eden.—Ibid.

AARON (Levite), of Barcelona, wrote 617 precepts on Moses, printed at Venice 1523; died 1292.—Moreri.

AARON (Ben Chaim), an African Jew, of Morocco, who wrote some treatises on the scriptures, which were printed at Venice, A.D. 1609.—Ibid.

AARON (Ben Aser), a learned rabbi, to whom some have attributed the invention of the Hebrew points and accents, in the 5th century. He is the author of a Hebrew grammar, printed 1515.—Ibid.

AARSSENS (Francis), lord of Someldyck, in Holland. He became early in life agent for the United States at Paris, in the reign of Henry IV, who raised him to the rank of nobility. But after fifteen years residence in France, that court conceived so great a dislike to him, that he was recalled, and employed as ambassador to several other powers. In 1620, he was sent to England; and again in 1641, to negotiate the marriage of the prince of Orange, with a daughter of Charles I. In 1624, he went again to France, and was much valued by cardinal Richlieu. He died very old, leaving a son immensely rich.—Bayle.

AARSSENS, or AERSSENS (Peter), a celebrated painter, born at Amsterdam, in 1519. He painted a fine altar-piece, repre-sending the crucifixion, at Antwerp, which was destroyed in an insurrection in 1566. He died in 1585, and left three sons, all eminent painters.—Houbraken.

AARTGEN, or AERTGEN, an eminent painter, born at Leyden, in 1498. He was at first a wool-comber, but turning his attention to painting, became so distinguished, that Francis Floris came to Leyden on purpose to see him, and finding him in a mean hut, presented him a handsome maintenance if he would settle at Antwerp, which he refused. He was drowned in a drunken frolic, in 1564.—Pilington.

ABA, or ALBON, crowned king of Hungary in 1042, after defeating Peter, surnamed the German. He involved his country in perpetual wars, and cruelly oppressed his subjects, who put him to death in 1044.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ABAKA-KHAN, eighth emperor of the moguls of the race of Zingis, succeeded his father Hulagu in 1264. He defeated the king of Bokharia and the Egyptians, who had invaded his dominions. He died in 1282.—D'Herbelot.

ABANO Peter de, see APONO.

ABARIS, a personage of antiquity, concerning whom there is more fable than truth. One author says, that the world being visited with the pestilence, the oracle required that the Athenians should offer prayers for all other nations, on which various countries sent ambassadors to Athens, among whom was Abaris, the Hyperborean. His learning and accomplishments are spoken of in the highest terms by several ancient writers. But from what country he came is an undecided question. Some say he was a Scythian, and a modern makes the Hyperborean countries to be the western islands of Scotland. The Greeks say that he rode on a sacred arrow, through the air; which he gave to Pythagoras, in return for the instructions he received from that philosopher.—Herodotus. Bayle.

ABAS (Schah), the Great 7th king of Persia, ascended the throne in 1585. With the assistance of the English, in 1622, he took Ormus from the Portuguese. He died in 1629. He was the first who made Ispahan the capital of Persia.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ABAS (Schah), great-grandson of the preceding, began to reign in 1642. He was a tolerant prince, being used to say, "that God alone was lord of men's consciences;" and that "it was his duty to watch over the government of his country, and to administer justice with impartiality to all his subjects of every persuasion." This great prince died 1666, aged 37.—Ibid.

ABASSON, an impostor, who pretended to be the grandson of Abas the Great, king of Persia. On visiting Constantinople, he was taken notice of by the grand seignior, but being soon discovered, was beheaded with three of his associates.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ABATE (Andrea), a painter of fruit and still life, was born at Naples, and employed by the king of Spain. He died in 1792.—Pilkinson.

ABAUZIT (Firmin), born at Uzez in 1679. His father dying when he was an infant, his mother sent him to Geneva, to prevent his being brought up in the Romish persuasion. For this she was confined in the castle of Somieres; and did not arrive at Geneva till two years after her son. This good woman gave him an excellent education, which he repaid by his improvement. Having finished his studies, he went to Holland and England, and in the latter country formed an intimacy with Sir Isaac Newton. King William wished him to settle here, but filial affection recalled him to Geneva, where he lost his mother in 1726, and the same year was admitted to the citizenship of that place, and appointed librarian of the city. In 1730, he published an improved edition of Spon's History of Geneva. He died greatly lamented in 1767. His writings in defence of christianity are very valuable.—Seanebler's Hist. of Geneva.

ABBADIE (James), an eminent divine; born at Nay, in Bearn, in 1658. He took the degree of D. D. at Sedan, and was afterwards made minister of the French church at Berlin, by the elector of Brandenburg. On the death of the elector, in 1668, he accompanied marshal Schomberg to England with the prince of Orange, and was with that great man when he fell at the battle of the Boyne. On his return to London, he was appointed minister of the French church in the Savoy; and not long after promoted to the deanry of Killaloe, in Ireland. He died in London, in 1727. Abbadie was a very elegant writer, particularly upon theological subjects. His chief work is a "Treatise of the Truth of the Christian Religion," 1684.—Biog. Brit.

ABBAS (Halli), or Magus, being one of the magi, a Persian physical author, who flourished in the 10th century. A treatise of his, entitled "The Royal Work," is still extant.—D'Herbelot.

ABBAS, son of Abdalmothleb, uncle of Mohammed, was at first an enemy to that impostor, but being taken prisoner by him, he altered his sentiments, and became a zealous Mussulman. He died in 653; and a century after his death, his grandson Abulabbas, surnamed Saffah, was chosen caliph, in whom began the dynasty of the Abbassides, who enjoyed that dignity 524 years.—D'Herbelot.

ABASSA, sister of the caliph Haroun al Raschid, by whom she was married to Giasfar, his vizier, on condition that they should never cohabit together; but having broken the contract, the caliph put Giasfar to death, and turned his wife out of the palace. There are extant some tender Arabic verses by her, on the subject of her love for Giasfar.—D'Herbelot.

was born at Milan, in 1640, and died in 1715.—Pilk.

ABSON, a Norman monk, who wrote an account of the siege of Paris by the Normans, at the end of the 9th century, in Latin verse.—Morri.

ABSON (de Fleury), a learned Frenchman of the 11th century. He became abbot of the monastery of Fleury, of which he had been a monk. King Robert sent him to Rome to avert the wrath of Gregory V, who had threatened to lay the kingdom under an interdict, and Abson obtained all that he asked. He was killed in a quarrel between the French and the Gascons, 1004. His letters were printed in 1687, folio.—Morri.

ASSOT (George), an English prelate, was born in 1562, at Guildford, in Surrey, where his father was a weaver. He was educated at the grammar-school of that place, from whence he was removed to Baliol college, Oxford, of which, in 1593, he became a fellow. In 1597, he commenced D.D. and was chosen master of University college. In 1599, he was made dean of Winchester, and the year following vice chancellor of Oxford, which office he again filled in 1603, and also in 1605. He was one of the divines employed in the present translation of the Bible. In 1609, he was made bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, from whence, in the same year, he was translated to London, and in 1610, he succeeded Dr. Bancroft, archbishop of Canterbury. He had the courage to oppose the court on some important occasions, particularly in the affair of the divorce of the lady Essex, and the book of sports, which he forbade being read at Croydon. A sad misfortune happened to him at the close of his life: for being at the seat of lord Zouch, and exercising himself in the park with a cross bow, he by accident shot the keeper instead of the deer. A commission was appointed to examine whether by this irregularity he was incapacitated for discharging the office of primate; and the determination being left with the king, he gave it in favour of the archbishop. He ever after kept a monthly fast on account of the misfortune, and settled 20l. a year on the widow of the keeper. He attended king James on his death-bed, and assisted at the coronation of Charles I. In 1627, an assize sermon of Dr. Sibthorpe, preached at Northampton, was sent to the archbishop, with an order from the king to license it; which he refused to do, as it contained exceptionable passages. For this he was banished to his house near Canterbury, and the archiepiscopal authority was put into commission; but when the parliament met, he was restored to his office by the king, but never fully recovered the royal favour. He died at Croydon in 1633, and was buried in the church of the Holy Trinity at Guildford. He endowed an hospital in his native town. The archbishop was a rigid Calvinist and a great favourer of the Puritans. His writings are mostly polemical, except a geographical description of the whole world.—Blug. Brit.

ASSOT (Robert), eldest brother of the archbishop, was born at Guildford, in 1560, and educated at the same school and college with him. King James appointed him one of his chaplains in ordinary, and was so pleased with his book "De Antichristo," that he ordered it to be reprinted with his own on the Revelations. In 1609, he was elected master of Baliol college, and the year following the king nominated him to a fellowship in his college at Chelsea, founded for the encouragement of polemical divinity. In 1612, he was made regius professor of divinity at Oxford, where he vindicated the supreme power of kings against Bellarmine and Suarez, for which he was advanced to the see of Salisbury in 1615. He died of the stone, in 1617. His remains were interred in Salisbury cathedral. The bishop was twice married, and left one son, and two daughters.—Ibid.

ASSOT (Maurice), brother of the above, was bred a merchant, and had a great share in directing the affairs of the East-India Company. He was appointed, in 1618 a commissioner in the treaty made with the Dutch East-India company concerning the trade to the Molucca Islands. In 1623, he was one of the farmers of the customs, and the next year one of the council for settling Virginia. He was the first person knighted by Charles I; and, in 1625, was chosen one of the representatives for the city of London, of which, in 1627, he was sheriff, and, in 1638, lord mayor. He erected a monument to his brother at Guildford, and died January 10, 1640.—Ibid.

ASSOT (George), son of sir Maurice, was born in 1600, elected probationer fellow of Merton college 1625, and admitted to the degree of LL.B. in 1630. He was the author of, 1. "The whole Book of Job paraphrased, 1640." 2. "Vindiciæ Sabbati, 1641." 3. "Brief Notes upon the whole Book of Psalms, 1651." He died in 1648.—Ibid.

ABST (Thomas), a German writer, was born at Ulm, in 1738. He translated Sallust into German, and wrote two treatises, one "Concerning Merit," and the other "Of dying for one's Country," both of which are excellent. He died at Buckeberg, in 1766.—Gen. Biog.

ABDALLA, father of Mohammed. He was only a slave and camel driver, but the Mussulmans boast that he was offered the finest women of his tribe, though he was fourscore years old; and that on his wedding night, a hundred girls died of grief, for having lost the honour of being his bride.—D'Herbelot.

ABDALLA-IBN-ALI, the uncle of the two first caliphs of the Abbassides, under whom he served as a general against the caliph Merwan, and having vanquished that prince, proclaimed his nephew. He was guilty of horrible cruelties on the family of the Om-miades. When his eldest nephew died, his brother Almanzor assumed the government, which so displeased Abdalla that he raised an army against him, but was defeated. He was put to death A. D. 754.—D'Herbelot.

ABDALLAH-EBN-ZOBEIR, an Arabian chief, who seized the caliphate, in 680, against the claim of Yezid, the son of Moaw-ijah, and enjoyed the dignity nine years. He fell, bravely fighting in the defence of Mecca, in the 72d year of his age.—Ibid.

ABDALMELEK, fifth caliph of the race of the Ommiades, commenced his reign A. D. 684. He extended his conquests into India and Spain, and conquered Mecca. He reigned twenty-one years, and was succeeded by his eldest son Valld. He was so generous as not to take a church from the Christians, which they had refused to grant him when he requested it.—Ibid.

ABDALRAHMAN, a Saracen general, and governor of Spain in the 8th century, who, after ravaging France with fire and sword, was attacked at Tours by Charles Martel, and slain, in 732.—Mod. U. H.

ABDALRAHMAN, surnamed the Just, of the family of the Ommiades, who, on the ruin of it, went to Spain in 756, where he commanded the Saracens against their king Joseph. Abdalrahman slew that prince, and was then acknowledged caliph throughout the West. He also assumed the title of King of Cordova, where he died in 790.—Ibid.

ABDAS, a Persian bishop in the time of the younger Theodosius, who indiscreetly brought upon the Christians a violent persecution, and was the first that fell in it. The clergy called in Theodosius to their aid, by whom the Persians were worsted; but the persecution raged forty years.—Bayle.

ABDOLONYMUS, king of Sidon. When Alexander conquered that country, he allowed Hephestion to dispose of the crown. Hephestion offered it to three brothers, who all refused it; and being requested to point out a proper person, they fixed on Abdolonymus, who was of the blood royal, though then only a gardener. Being brought to Alexander, the conqueror observing the dignity of his aspect, said to his courtiers, "I wish to know how he bore his poverty." Abdolonymus hearing this, said, "Would to heaven I may bear my prosperity as well!" This answer so pleased Alexander that he confirmed the appointment.—Diod. Sic. Plutarch.

ABDIAS, of Babylon, author of a legend, entitled Historia Certaminis Apostolici, printed at Basil in 1571. He pretended that he was one of the seventy-two disciples sent out by Jesus Christ, and that having been an attendant on Simon and Jude, he was made by them the first bishop of Babylon.—Bayle.

ABDOLMUMEN, or ABDALMOM, though the son of a potter, became a general, and at last a monarch, by the stile of Emir Al Mumenin (head of the true believers). He took Morocco, and destroyed the whole of the Almoravide family. After numerous conquests he died in 1156, and was succeeded by his son Joseph.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

ABEILLE (Gaspard), a native of Reiz, in Provence, who came to Paris when very young, where he was greatly admired for his wit, particularly by the marshal de Luxembourg, to whom he was secretary. He was a member of the French academy, and prior of a convent. His writings consist of odes, epistles, and some dramatic pieces. He died at Paris, 1718.—Moreri.

ABEILLE (Scipio), brother of the above, was surgeon-major in the army, and author of The Complete Army Surgeon, 1659, 12mo. and A History of the Bones, 12mo. 1685. He died in 1697.—Ibid.

ABEL, the second son of our first parents. He was murdered by his brother Cain out of envy, because his offering was accepted and Cain's rejected.—SS.

ABEL (Frederic Gottfried), a German physician and poet, was born at Halberstadt, in 1714. He was bred a divine, but not obtaining the preferment he expected, he turned his attention to physic, in which he took his doctor's degree at Konigsberg, in 1744. He practised at Halberstadt with great reputation till his death, which happened in 1794. He published a German translation of Juvenal in 1788.—Germ. Biog.

ABEL, king of Denmark, the son of Val-dimer II. He assassinated his eldest brother Eric in 1750, and took possession of his throne. He was conquered and put to death by the Frisians, who revolted against him on account of the heavy impositions which he had laid upon them.—Mod. U. H.

ABEL, (Charles Frederic), an eminent musician, whose compositions will be ever held in the highest estimation by the lovers of harmony. He died June 20, 1787. He excelled on the viol di gamba.—Burney.

ABELA (George Francis), commander of the order of Malta, and author of a work entitled Maltha Illustrata, 1647, folio, or a description of that island and its antiquities; printed at Malta, curious and scarce.—Moreri.

ABELARD (Peter), was born in 1079, at Palais, near Nantz, in Britany. He studied logic and metaphysics with such eagerness that he soon became a powerful disputant; and turning his talents against his old master Champeaux, a famous professor of philosophy at Paris, obliged him to quit his chair, and retire to a convent. Abelard then applied to the study of divinity, and in a short time became celebrated in that faculty. A wealthy canon, called Fulbert, took Abelard into his house as a boarder, on condition that he should teach his niece Heloise philosophy. Instead, however, of stude learning, he taught her love, and Abelard was so intoxicated with the passion that his lectures lost the charms which used to attract the admiration of crowded audiences, and every body saw the reason of it except Fulbert, who at last being convinced of the truth, turned Abelard out of doors. Heloise, on this, followed her lover, who conveyed her to his sister's house in Britany, where she was delivered of a son, named Astrolabius; and Abelard offered Fulbert to marry his niece, but it is astonishing, that though the uncle was pleased with the offer, the lady refused it. She afterwards, indeed, consented to a private marriage, but never would own it, and indeed sometimes would not scruple to swear that it was not true. This added greater fury to the canon's rage, and Abelard sent her, in consequence, to the monastery of Argenteuil, where she was put on the religious habit, but not the veil. The enraged Fulbert caused Abelard to be emasculated by some ruffians, who broke into his chamber by night; on which he turned monk in the abbey of St. Denis, which he soon left, and retired to Champagne, where he became lecturer, and with great success. This raised him numerous enemies, particularly the professors at Rheims, who charged him with heterodoxy on the subject of the Trinity, and got him censured at the council of Soissons, in 1191. He afterwards erected an oratory in the diocese of Troyes, called the Paraclete, but was soon driven from it by the machinations of his enemies. He next became abbot of Ruis, in the diocese of Vannes, and then gave Heloise and some other nuns the Paraclete. In 1140, his works were condemned as heretical by a council convened for that purpose, which decree was confirmed by the Pope, who ordered Abelard to be confined; but at the request of Peter, abbot of Clugny, this sentence was mitigated. After a life of extraordinary vicissitudes, Abelard died in the priory of St. Marcelus, in 1142, and the corpse being sent to Heloise, was deposited in the Paraclete. The names of these lovers are eternized by the epistles published by Pope and other poets. Heloise died in 1163, and was buried in the Paraclete; and in 1780, the abbess, madame de Roncey, ordered the bones of the lovers to be placed in a leaden coffin and deposited under the altar. She also caused a monument of black marble to be placed over the spot. The works of Abelard were published at Paris in one volume, quarto, 1616.—Berington's Hist. of Abelard and Heloise, 4to. Bayle. Moreri.

ABELL (John), an English musician, celebrated as a singer, and as a player on the lute. He belonged to the chapel royal, but being a papist, he was dismissed at the revolution, when he went abroad, and gained considerable sums as a public singer; but sometimes his extravagance brought him so low, that he was obliged to travel on foot with his lute at his back. When he was at Warsaw, the king of Poland sent for him to court, but Abell refused to go, on which peremptory orders were given to compel his attendance. On his arrival he was seated in a chair in a spacious hall, and drawn up to a great height, when the king and his train appeared in a gallery opposite to him. Several wild bears were then hurried into the hall, and the king told him to take his choice, either to sing or to be let down among the bears. Abell preferred the first, and used to say that he never sung so well in his life. In 1701, he published a collection of songs in several languages, but when he died is unknown. He is said to have had the art of preserving the natural tone of his voice to extreme old age.—Burney's Hist. Music.

ABELLI (Lewis), a French prelate, was born in 1603. He was made bishop of Rhodéz in 1664, but resigned three years afterwards, and retired to S. Lazare, where he died in 1691. He wrote Medulla Theologica, 2 vols. 12mo. and some other pieces.—Moreri.

ABENDANA (Jacob), a Spanish Jew, was prefect of a synagogue in London, and died in 1685, in which year a Hebrew commentary of his on several passages of scripture appeared at Amsterdam.—Gen. B. D.

ABENEZRA (Abraham), born at Toledo in 1099. He was skilled in various languages and sciences, and composed several works, the most valuable of which is his commentary on the Old Testament, printed in Buxtorf's Hebrew Bible. He died at Rhodes in 1174, aged about seventy-five.—Moreri.

ABENGEFIL, an Arabian physician of the 12th century, and author of a book, the translation of which, entitled De virtutibus Medicinarum et Ciborum, was printed at Venice in 1581, folio.—Friend's Hist. Phys.

ABEN-MELEK, a Jewish rabbi, author of a Hebrew commentary on the Bible, entitled "The Perfection of Beauty," Amsterdam, 1661, folio. This work has been translated into Latin.—Moreri.

ABERCROMBIE (Ralph), a brave British general, was descended from an ancient family in Scotland, and entered early into the army, as did also two of his brothers, one of whom was killed at the battle of Bunker's Hill, in America. The first commission which Sir Ralph had, was as cornet of the 3d dragoon guards, and in 1760 he obtained a lieutenantancy in the same regiment. In 1762 he became captain in the third regiment of horse, in which corps he rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1773. In 1787 he was made major-general, and in 1798 had the command of the 7th regiment of dragoons. Soon after the commencement of the late war he was employed on the continent, and commanded the advanced guard in the action on the heights of Ca-teau, when the duke of York, in his dispatches, made a commendatory representation of his conduct. He was wounded at Nimeguen, and in the winter of 1796, conducted the retreat of the British troops out of Holland. Next year he was appointed commander in chief of the forces in the West Indies, where he took possession of several French and Dutch settlements. On his return to Europe he was rewarded with the Order of the Bath, and made governor of the Isle of Wight, Fort George, and Fort Augustus. In 1797 he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general. Sir Ralph was next fixed on to take the chief command of the forces in Ireland, where he exerted himself with great ability in maintaining the discipline of the army, suppressing the rising rebellion, and in protecting the people from military oppression. He was afterwards employed under the duke of York in the great but unsuccessful enterprise against Holland, where it was confessed, even by the enemy, that his military talents were of the most brilliant rank. When it was resolved to send an army to dispossess the French of Egypt, sir Ralph was appointed to the command of the expedition. Here he landed the troops in military style March 8th, 1801, and defeated the French at Aboukir, after a bloody action. On the 21st of the same month was fought near Alexandria a memorable battle, in which the English were again the victors, but with the loss of their gallant general, who died the 28th, on board the ship which was conveying him to Malta, in the great church of which island he was buried with distinguished honours. In 1774, Sir Ralph represented the county of Kinross in Parliament, and continued in that capacity till the general election in 1780.—Monthly Mag. June 1801. Public Characters, Vol. III.

ABERCROMBY (Thomas), was born at Forfar, in the county of Angus, 1656, and educated at St. Andrews, from whence he went to Leyden, and took the degree of M.D. in 1685. On his return to Scotland, he professed the Romish religion, and was made physician to James II. He compiled "The Martial Achievements of Scotland," in 2 vols. folio; also a treatise on wit. He died at Edinburgh, in 1796.—Gen. B. D.

ABERNETHY (John), divine, was born in 1680, at Coleraine, in Ireland, where his father was a dissenting minister. He was educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of M.A. From thence he went to Edinburgh, and studied divinity. In 1708 he became pastor of a congregation at Antrim; not long after which a society of dissenting ministers was established at Belfast, whose object was to shake off subscription to the Westminster confession, in which Abernethy concurred with great zeal. In 1726, the general synod passed a resolution that the nonsubscribing ministers should not be of their body, in consequence of which many congregations became dissatisfied with their pastors. That of Abernethy dwindled away so much, that he accepted an invitation from the congregation of Woodstreet, Dublin, where he continued till his death, in 1740. Two volumes of his sermons were printed at London, in 1748, and are deservedly held in great estimation.—Biog. Br.

ABGARUS, king of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, and contemporary with our Saviour, to whom, it is said, he wrote a letter, and received an answer, both extant and well known. Many learned writers have vindicated their authority, while others reject them as forgeries.—Eusebius.

ABGILLU, surnamed Prester John, was son to a king of the Frisi, and attended Charlemagne to the Holy Land, but did not return with him to Europe. It is pretended that he gained mighty conquests in Abyssinia, which country was afterwards called from him the empire of Prester John. He is said to have written the history of Charlemagne's journey, and of his own to the East.—Moreri.

ABIJAH, king of Judah, was the son of Rehoboam, and began his reign in 958 B. C. In the second year of his reign he defeated Jeroboam, king of Israel.—SS.

ABIATHAR, a Jewish high priest, was the son of Abimelech, who was killed by Saul. He succeeded his father, and attached himself to David, but on his death attempting to put Adonijah on the throne, he was deposed and banished by Solomon, B. C. 1014.—SS.

ABLE, or ABEL (Thomas), was educated at Oxford, where he became M.A. in 1516, and, entering into orders, was made chaplain to Catharine, wife of Henry VIII. whom he taught the languages and music. His attachment to his royal mistress brought him into great trouble. He wrote a treatise against the divorce; and in 1534 was attainted for being concerned in the affair of the holy maid of Kent. In 1540, he suffered death for denying the king's supremacy.—Wood. Biog. Br.

ABNER, the uncle of Saul, whom he served with great loyalty against David. He was treacherously murdered by Joab, B. C. 1048.—SS.

ABOUGHEHEL, an Arabian idolater, and a bitter enemy to Mohammed, who is said to have passed upon him sentence of reprobation; but his son Acramas was converted to the Mussulman faith. The Mohammedans, by way of contempt, call colocintida the melon or cucumber of Aboughehel.—D'Herbelot.

ABOU-NANIFAN, was the son of Thabet, and born at Coufa, A. D. 699. He is esteemed among the Mussulmans for his expositions of their law, but was persecuted for denying the doctrine of predestination, and died in prison at Bagdad. 385 years after his death the reigning caliph built a mausoleum to his memory, and founded a college for his followers.—D'Hartel.

ABOU-JOSEPH, a mussulman doctor, who was the first person that had the title of kadhi al kodhat, or judge of the judges. He lived in the caliphate of Haroun-al-raschid.—Ibid.

ABOULAINA, a Mohammedan doctor, famous for his wit, of whom the following story is told. Moses, son of the caliph Abdalmalek, having put to death secretly one of Aboulaina's friends, gave it out that he had fled; the doctor, on being asked what was become of his friend, replied in the words of scripture, Moses smote him and he died. The prince being told of this, sent for Aboulaina, and threatened him with severe punishment; on which Aboulaina replied in the words of scripture, Wilt thou kill me to-day as thou didst the other yesterday? The prince was so pleased with his wit, that he dismissed him with presents.—Ibid.

ABOULOZA, the surname of Ahmed ben Soliman, an Arabian poet, who lost his sight by the small-pox, when only three years old. At the age of 45 he embraced the notions of the Brahmins respecting the metempsychosis, and lived the remainder of his life on vegetables. He died in 1057.—Ibid.

ABRABANEL (Isaac), a learned rabbi, born at Lisbon in 1437. He was admitted a member of the council of Alphonso, king of Portugal, but fell into disgrace on the death of that monarch, and fled to Castile, where he was protected and esteemed by king Ferdinand and his queen Isabella. In 1492, he was obliged to quit Spain in consequence of an edict against the Jews, and retired to Naples, where he recommended himself to the favour of king Ferdinand, and his successor Alphonso. When the latter was driven from Naples by Charles VIII. king of France, Abrabanel accompanied him to Sicily, and at his death retired to the island of Corfu, but in 1496 he returned to Italy, and not long after was employed at Venice to settle a dispute between the Portuguese and Venetians, respecting the spice trade. Here he finished his commentaries on the scriptures, and died in 1508.—Bayle.

ABRAHAM, the patriarch, was at first called Abram, which was altered by divine appointment. He was born A. M. 2004, at Ur, in Chaldee. His father Terah, in his old age, went to reside at Haran, in Canaan, where Abram received a promise that he should be the father of a great nation, on which he, with his wife Sarah, and his nephew Lot, left Haran, and dwelt at Sichem. A famine drove them from thence into Egypt, and on their return, a dispute arose between the servants of Abram and those of Lot, which induced the two kinsmen to part. When Lot was taken prisoner by the prince of Elam, Abram armed his servants, retook his nephew and all the spoil.

Having no prospect of a child by Sarah, he took Hagar, an Egyptian, as a concubine, by whom he had Ishmael; but, at the age of ninety he received a promise that Sarah should have a son, and, in consequence, his name was changed to Abraham, which signifies 'the father of a great multitude.' At this time circumcision was instituted. Going afterwards to Gerar, Sarah was delivered of a son named Isaac. When Isaac was grown to maturity, Abraham was commanded, as a trial of his faith, to offer him up as a sacrifice; but as he was about to fulfil the divine command, an angel stopped his hand, and provided a ram for a burnt-offering. After the death of Sarah, Abraham married Keturah, by whom he had six sons. He died about A. M. 2179.—SS.

ABRAHAM (Nicholas), a learned Jesuit, was born in Lorrain, in 1589. He was theological professor in the university of Poitiers-Moulon, where he died 1655. He wrote a commentary on some of Cicero's orations, and on Virgil.—Moreri.

ABRAHAM (Ben Chaila), a Spanish rabbi and astrologer, who predicted the birth of the Messiah to happen in 1358, but died in 1303, fifty-five years before the time. He wrote a treatise on the figure of the earth.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ABRAHAM USQUE, a Portuguese Jew, but thought by some to have been a Christian. He published, in conjunction with Tobias Athias, in 1553, a translation of the Bible into Spanish.—Moreri.

ABROSI (John), an Italian physician and astronomer, who lived in the beginning of the 16th century. His Dialogue on Astrology, 4to. Venice, 1494, is in the Index Expurgatorius.—Ibid.

ABSALOM, the Son of David, was a handsome, but vicious prince. He assassinated his brother-in-law Amnon for violating his sister Tamar, and raised a rebellion against his father, but his army being defeated, he was slain by Joab about 1030 years B. C.—SS.

ABSTEMIUS (Laurentius), an Italian writer, born in Ancona. He was librarian at the court of Urbino, where also he taught the belles lettres. He wrote some pieces of repute, but the best known are his fables, which have been frequently printed with those of Æsop, Phædrus, &c. He lived in the 15th century.—Bayle.

ABUSKEK, the successor of Mohammed, and the first who assumed the title of caliph. He acquired a great extent of territory, by conquering the Persians, Syrians, and Greeks. He died in 632, and was interred by the side of Mohammed, his son-in-law.—D'Herbelot.

ABUCARAS (Theodore), bishop of Caria in the 8th century, was a partizan of Photius, but recanted at the council of Constantinople, and was re-admitted to his seat. He wrote several controversial treatises, which were published at Ingoldstadt, in 4to. 1606. There was also published at Paris, in 1685, a work entitled "De Unione et Incarnatione," by this writer, from a MS. found in the Bodleian library.—Cave's Hist. Lit. Bayle.

ABUDHAHER, founder of the sect called Karmatians, and a deadly enemy to the Mussulmans. He plundered Mecca, slew the pilgrims, and carried away the black stone, which the Turks pretend came down from heaven. But the precious relic was returned when the Karmatians found it to be of no value. He died in 953.—D'Herbelot.

ABULFARAGIUS (Gregory), an Armenian physician, bishop, and historian, was born in 1226, at Malatia, near the source of the Euphrates. He wrote a universal history in Arabic, which Dr. Pococke published in 1663, with a Latin translation, and a supplement. He died in 1286.—Pococke's Pref. to Specimen Hist. Arab. Bayle.

ABULFEDA (Ismael), prince of Hamah, in Syria, who wrote a valuable piece, entitled "A Description of Chorasnia and Mawarannahre, or the Regions beyond the River Oxus, from the Tables of Abulfeda Ismael, prince of Hamah." This book was edited by John Greaves, who added to the original, which is in Arabic, a Latin translation. A new edition of it was published at Oxford, in 1712, by Hudson. Abulfeda also wrote the lives of Mohammed and Sadjadin. He died about the year 1332.—Bayle. Moreri.

ABULGASI-BAYATUR, khan of the Tartars, was born at Urgens, the capital of Kharasim, in 1605. After a reign of twenty years he resigned the crown to his son, and led a retired life, during which he wrote the history of the Tartars, which valuable work, having been brought into Europe, has been published in German and French. He died in 1663.—Moreri.

ABU MOSLEM, governor of Khorasan, who, in 747, changed the caliphate from the family of the Omniades to the Abassides, in producing which above 600,000 men lost their lives. After rendering the caliph Almanzor the most important services, that prince caused him to be assassinated.—D'Herbelot. Mod. U. H.

ABUNOWAS, an Arabian poet, born at Bara, in 762. He dwelt in the palace of Haroun al Raschid, with Masfat and Re-kâshi, two other poets. His works are still extant. He died A. D. 810.—D'Herbelot.

ABU-OBEIDAH, a companion of Mohammed, served first under Caled, in Syria; but at last he was invested with the supreme command, and Caled served as his second. After conquering Syria and a great part of Palestine, he was carried off by a pestilence, A. D. 639.—Mod. U. H.

ABUSAID KHAN, the last sultan of the race of Zingis Khan, ascended the throne in 1317, and died in 1336.—D'Herbelot.

ABUSAID MIRZA, served in the army of Uleg Beg, when he was at war with his son. He took advantage of this dissension and set up for himself in 1450. He greatly extended his dominions, but fell in an ambuscade, in 1468, aged 42.—Ibid.

ABUTEMAN, surnamed ALTAYI, reckoned the prince of Arabian poets, was born in 843, or 846, at Yafem, near Damascus.—Ibid.

ABYDENUS, author of the history of the Chaldeans and Abyssinians, the only remains of which are in the Preparatio Evangelica of Eusebius.—Fabricius Bib. Grec.

ACACIUS, surnamed MONOPHTHALMUS, from having lost an eye, was the disciple and successor of Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea. He was deposed by the council of Sardica for heresy; on which he, and some others, assembled at Philippolis, and anathematized Athanasius and the rest of their adversaries. Acacius was concerned in banishing pope Liberius, and settling Felix in the see of Rome. He was the founder of a sect called Acaciani, and died about the year 365. He wrote the Life of Eusebius, and other works.—Cave's Hist. Lit.

ACACIUS, bishop of Amida, on the Tigris, flourished about the year 420. He sold the plate belonging to his church, and with the money ransomed 7000 Persian slaves, and sent them to their king.—Gibbon's Hist. of Rome.

ACACIUS, patriarch of Constantinople. He was excommunicated by pope Felix III. and in his turn commanded the name of that prelate to be struck out of the list of bishops who were to be mentioned in the public prayers. He died in 487.—Mosheim's Eccles. Hist.

ACACIUS, bishop of Bercea, in Syria, was at the council of Constantinople, held in 381. He was the means of deposing St. Chrysostom, and also of Cyril, bishop of Alexandria. He died about the year 436, aged considerably above 100.—Cave. Dupin.

ACADEMUS, or ECADEMUS, an Athenian citizen, whose house being employed as a philosophical school in the time of Theseus, he had the honour of giving his name to a sect of philosophers, or rather three sects, called Academica. The old academy had Plato for its chief, the second Arcefilas, and the last Carneades. Cicero called his country-house, at Puzzolanum, Academy. No one was suffered to laugh in the academy at Athens, under the penalty of expulsion.—Ælian Var. Hist.

ACCA, bishop of Hexham, in Northumberland, in the eighth century. He greatly ornamented his cathedral, improved church music, and encouraged learning. He was banished for some time from his see, for what cause is unknown, but he was afterwards restored, and died at Hexham, in 740. He wrote a treatise on the sufferings of the saints, epistles, and other works.—Biog. Brit.

ACCA LAURENTIA, was the wife of Faustulus the shepherd, and nurse to Remus and Romulus. Some say she was a Lupa, and have, therefore, called her Lupa.

The Romans made her a goddess, and devoted a holiday to her service.—Moreri.

ACCARISI (Francis), native of Ancona, was professor of civil law at Sienna, and afterwards at Pisa. He died at Sienna, in 1622.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

ACCIAJUOLI (Donatus), a learned Florentine in the fifteenth century, was a disciple of Argyropylus, and published commentaries on his translation of Aristotle's Ethics. He also translated the Lives of Alcibiades and Demetrius from Plutarch, to which he added those of Hannibal and Scipio, and wrote the Life of Charlemagne, and some other works. He died at Milan, and his corpse was removed to his native city, and interred in the church of the Carthusians.—Bayle.

ACCIAJUOLI (Zenobio), of the same family with the above, was born in 1461, and entered into the order of St. Dominic. He became librarian to Pope Leo X. and died in 1520. He translated some of the fathers into Latin, and left several pieces of his own, some of which were published.—Ibid.

ACCIAJUOLI (Angelo), was also a native of Florence, of which he became archbishop, and died in 1407.—He was raised for his merit to the cardinalship.—Moreri.

ACCIAJOLI (Renatus), a Florentine, who conquered Athens, Corinth, and part of Boeotia, at the beginning of the fifteenth century. He bequeathed Athens to the Venetians; Corinth to Theodosius Paleologus, who married his eldest daughter; and Boeotia, with Thebes, to his natural son Anthony, who also got Athens; but this was retaken in 1455 by Mohammed II.—Ibid.

ACCIVS (Lucius), a Latin tragic poet, flourished about 170 years B. C. He wrote several tragedies on subjects taken from the Grecian history, and one, entitled Brutus, from the Roman. Two comedies, one named the Wedding, and the other the Merchant, are also ascribed to him. His style has been accounted harsh, but he is generally allowed to have been a great poet: none of his works are extant.—Quintilian. There was also, in the same age, an orator of the name of Accius, against whom Cicero defended Cluentius. He was a native of Pisaurum.

ACCOLTI (Benedict), secretary to the state of Florence. He wrote a history of the holy war, printed at Venice, in 1532, 4to. which was consulted by Tasso in the composition of his Jerusalem delivered. He likewise wrote a little book "Of the famous men of his time." He died in 1466, aged 51.—Moreri.

ACCOLTI (Francis), brother to Benedict, was called the prince of lawyers. He died, vastly rich, about 1470.—Ibid.

ACCOLTI (Peter), of the same family, was born at Florence in 1455. He was created a cardinal, and died at Florence in 1532. He wrote some historical pieces. His brother Benedict Accolti, duke of Nepi, wrote some dramatic pieces of merit.—Ibid.

ACCORDS (Stephen Tabouret, Seigneur de), advocate in the parliament of Dijon, and author of two trifling books, one entitled, "Les Bigarrures," and the other "Les Touches." He died in 1561, aged 46.—Novo. Dict. Moreri.

ACCORSO (Francis) professor of law at Bologna, was born at Florence in 1182. He reduced the code, digests, and institutes, into one system, printed at Lyons, in 6 vols. folio, 1627. He died in 1260, and was succeeded by his son Francis.—Bayle.

ACCORSO (Mariangelo), a learned Neapolitan of the sixteenth century, was very industrious in collecting ancient MSS. He published remarks on Aufonius, Solinus, and Ovid, in 1524, entitled "Diatribæ;" also an edition of Ammianus Marcellinus, at Augsburg, in 1533, and some other valuable works.—Bayle.

ACÆSIUS, bishop of Constantinople in the time of Constantine. He maintained that no communion was to be held with those who had once departed from the faith, even though they should afterwards repent. Constantine said to him, "Make a ladder for yourself, Acæsius, and go up to heaven alone."—Dupin. Lardner.

ACH, VAN, or ACHEN (John), was born at Cologne in 1566, and became eminent in historical and portrait painting. He died in 1621.—Pilkington.

ACHARDS (Eleazar), was born at Avignon in 1679, and became bishop of that see. When the plague raged there, he continued, at the hazard of his life, performing the offices of charity and religion. Clement XII. sent him to China to settle the disputes which prevailed among the missionaries. He died at Cochin, in 1741, without having accomplished the object of his voyage.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

ACHERI (Luc d'), a Benedictine monk, born at St. Quintin, in Picardy, in 1609. He published several books in ecclesiastical history, as the Lives of Saints, &c. He died at Paris in 1685.—Moreri.

ACHILLINI (Alexander), an eminent philosopher and physician, of Bologna, where he died in 1512, aged 40. He is said to have discovered the hammer and anvil, two small bones in the organ of hearing. His works were published in folio, at Venice, in 1568.—Tiraboschi. Haller's Biblioth. Anat.

ACHILLINI (John Philotheus), brother of the above, wrote a poem, entitled "Viridario," containing the eulogy of many learned men of his time. He died in 1538.—Moreri.

ACHILLINI (Claude), a relation of the preceding, was born at Bologna in 1574. He was a man of universal learning and genius, and was professor of jurisprudence for several years in different universities.

Cardinal Richelieu is said to have rewarded him with a gold chain valued at 1000 crowns, for a poem he wrote. He died in 1640. Inscriptions to his honour were placed upon the schools in which he taught.—Moreri.

ACHALEN, a sovereign of the northern Britons, who in the 6th century, on losing his territory, fled into Wales. He and his brother Arthanad are famous for a journey performed on one horse, up the hill of Maalwg, in Cardiganshire, to revenge the death of their father.—Owen's Cambrian Biog.

ACHMET I. emperor of the Turks, succeeded his father Mahomet III. in 1603, being then about 15 years old. He began his reign by combating a formidable rebellion which lasted two years. He was next engaged in a war with the Germans, in which he was assisted by the famous Bethlem Gabor. Peace was concluded in 1606; but his reign continued to be disturbed by insurrections, and his rest was troubled by a pretender to his throne. He indulged himself in sensual pleasures and in field sports; but, though proud and ambitious, he was less sanguinary than his predecessors. He died in 1617, at the age of 29.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ACHMET II. succeeded his brother Solyman in 1691. He was a good natured prince, but weak and irresolute. He died in 1695.—Ibid.

ACHMET III. was the son of Mahomet IV. and on the deposition of his brother Mustapha II. in 1703 ascended the imperial throne. He sheltered Charles XII. of Sweden, after the battle of Pultowa, and declared war against the Russians, but soon after concluded an advantageous peace. He likewise made war on the Venetians, and recovered from them the Morea: but in an attack on Hungary the Turkish army was defeated by prince Eugene in 1716, at the battle of Peterwaradin. Achmet was dethroned in 1730, and died suddenly in confinement in 1736.—Ibid.

ACHMET, an Arabian author, who wrote a book on the interpretation of dreams, which was published at Paris, in 1603. He lived about the fourth century.—Bayle.

ACOLUTHUS (Andrew), was born at Breslaw, of which place he became arch-deacon, and professor of the oriental languages. He wrote, 1. A Treatise de Aquismaria, 1682, 4to. 2. A Latin Translation of the Armenian Version of the Prophet Obadiah, 4to. Leipzig. He died 1704.—Id.

ACONTIUS (James), was born at Trent, in the sixteenth century. On turning Protestant, he went to England, where he met with a kind reception from queen Elizabeth, to whom he dedicated a work, entitled, "The Stratagems of Satan," printed at Basil, in 1565. The author died soon after. Another edition of this work appeared at Basil, in 1610, to which was added, a letter of Acontius, "De ratione edendorum librorum;" but his best work is a treatise "On Method," printed at Utrecht, in 1658.—Bayle. Tiraboschi, storia della Lett. Ital.

ACOSTA (Gabriel), canon, and professor of divinity at Coimbra, who wrote a commentary on part of the Old Testament, fol. 1641. He died in 1616.—Moreri.

ACOSTA (Joseph), a Spanish Jesuit, born at Medina del Campo, in 1547. He was a missionary in Peru, and became provincial of his order. He died at Salamanca, in 1600. His "History of the West-Indies," first printed in Spanish, in 1591, 8vo. is universally known and esteemed.—Moreri.

ACOSTA (Uriel), an extraordinary character, was born at Oporto, where his father was a Roman Catholic, though descended from Jewish ancestors. At the age of 25, he was made treasurer of a collegiate church, but having embraced Judaism, he resolved to quit Portugal, with his mother and brothers, whom he had converted to the same faith. The new converts went to Amsterdam, and were received into a synagogue. Not long after he became dissatisfied with the Jewish rites, and expressing his sentiments thereon with freedom, he was excommunicated. He then wrote a book in his own vindication, in which he denied the immortality of the soul; for which he was thrown into prison, from whence he was bailed in a few days, but all the copies of his book were seized, and a fine levied upon him of 300 florins. After lying under excommunication fifteen years, he was readmitted into the synagogue on making his submission, but was soon expelled again for not conforming to the laws of Moses, and for dissuading two Christians from turning Jews. In this state he remained seven years, abandoned by his friends, and reduced to a wretched condition. At the end of that time he made his submission, and underwent an extraordinary penance in the synagogue; where after making his recantation, he was publicly scourged, and then laying himself down on the threshold, all the people walked over him. He shot himself with a pistol, in 1640, or according to others in 1647.—Bayle.

ACQUAVIVA (Andrew Mathew), duke of Atri and prince of Teramo in the kingdom of Naples, was born in 1456. He was one of the greatest luminaries of his age, and seems to have been the first who conceived the idea of an Encyclopedia, or Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences. He actually published a work under that title in 2 vols. fol. which, though scanty and defective, was sufficient to give some hints for conducting a compilation of that kind. He died in 1528.—Tiraboschi.

ACRON, a Sicilian physician, flourished 439 B.C. He expelled the plague from Athens by burning perfumes.—Moreri.

ACRON, or ACRO, an ancient scholiast on Horace, who lived in the 7th century. His work is extant, in an edition of that poet, printed at Basil in 1527, 8vo.—Moreri.

ACROPOLITA (George), a writer on the Byzantine history, was born at Constantinople, in 1220. He disputed at the age of twenty-one with a physician, concerning solar eclipses, before the emperor John. He afterwards rose to the rank of chancellor of the empire, and died in 1282. His Chronicle of the Greek empire was printed at Paris in Greek and Latin in 1651, fol.—Pagi de Hyst. Græc. Fabricii Bibl. Græc.

ACROPOLITA (Constantine), son of the above, was called the Younger Metaphrastes, and was great chancellor of the empire. He flourished about 1270.—Ibid.

ACTUARIUS (John), a Greek physician of the Jewish faith, flourished in the 12th century at Constantinople, where Actuarius is a title still bestowed on physicians of the court. His books on Therapeutics, the Animal Spirits, on Urines, &c. have been printed together, and in parts.—Friend's Hist. of Physic.

ACUMA (Christopher), a Spanish jesuit, born at Burgos, in 1597, was many years a missionary in South America. He published, in 1641, "A description of the great river of the Amazons," which was afterwards translated into French, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1682.—Bayle. Moreri.

ADAIR (James), an English lawyer, was the son of an army agent, and being designed for the law, entered at Lincoln's-inn, and in due time was called to the bar. In 1774, he was called to the degree of serjeant at law, and on the death of serjeant Glyane, was chosen recorder of London. In the parliament of 1780, he was elected for Cockermouth, but afterwards he sat for Higham Ferrers. On being promoted to be one of his majesty's serjeants at law, he resigned the recordership in expectation of higher preferment, in which he was disappointed. He was employed to carry on the prosecution against one of the persons accused of high treason in 1794, on which occasion he outshone all the other crown lawyers. He wrote two tracts, one entitled, "Thoughts on the Dismissal of Officers for their Conduct in Parliament," and the other, "Observations on the Power of Alienations of the Crown, before the first of Queen Anne." He died in 1798.—Monthly Mag.

ADALARD, or ADELARD, born about A.D. 753, was cousin german of Charlemagne. He was divorced from his wife, which grieved him so much that he went into the abbey of Corbie, of which the emperor made him abbot. In 829, he founded the abbey of New Corbie, in Saxony, and died in 826. Some fragments of his writings are extant.—Moreri.

ADALBERON (Ascelinus), bishop of Laon in 977. He treacherously delivered up Arnoul, archbishop of Rheims, and Charles duke of Lorraine, who had put themselves under his protection, to Hugh Capet. He died in 1030. There is a poem of his extant, which contains some curious historical facts.—Dupin.

ADALBERT, archbishop of Magdeburgh, was employed by the emperor Otto I. in 961, to preach the gospel to the Russians, among whom he met with little success. He afterwards laboured to more advantage among the Slavonians.—Moreri.

ADALBERT, archbishop of Prague, in the tenth century, was a successful missionary in Hungary, Prussia, and Lithuania, where he was murdered by a pagan priest.—Messeim. Moreri.

ADAM, the father of mankind, was created out of the earth, and placed in the garden of Eden, from whence he was expelled for eating the forbidden fruit. The creation of Adam is generally placed in the year 4004 before Christ. After his exile he lived 930 years.—SS.

ADAM (Melchior), a German biographer, born in Silesia, and educated in the college of Brieg. He published 5 vols. of memoirs of eminent men, a work still esteemed. He died in 1692.—Bayle.

ADAM (Scotus), a monkish historian, in the twelfth century, born in Scotland, and educated in the monastery of Lindisfarne, now called Holy Island. From thence he went to Paris, and became a member of the Sorbonne. He afterwards returned to his native country, and was a monk, first at Melros, and lastly at Durham, where he wrote the life of St. Columbus, and that of David I. king of Scotland. His works were printed at Antwerp in 1659, fol.—Moreri.

ADAM (Lambert Sigibert), a French sculptor, born at Nanci in 1700. Various works of his are scattered over France, and are greatly admired. He died in 1759.—D'Argenville's Lives of Sculptors.

ADAM (Nicholas), brother of the above, was born at Nanci in 1705. He was also an eminent artist, and executed the mausoleum of the queen of Poland at Bonsecours, and some other fine pieces. He died in 1778, having lost his sight some years before.—Ibid.

ADAM (Francis Gaspard), younger brother of the foregoing, was born at Nanci in 1710, and followed the same occupation with his brothers. He went to Prussia, where he gained a great reputation. He died at Paris in 1759.—Ibid.

ADAM of Bremen, was canon of that city at the close of the eleventh century. His work entitled, "Historia Ecclesiastica Ecclesiæ Hamburgensis et Bremensis," was printed in 1670, 4to.—Dupin.

ADAM (Billaut or master), a French poet, was originally a joiner of Nevers, and patronized by cardinal Richelieu. His poems are now extremely scarce.—Moreri.

ADAM (Robert), architect, was born in 1728, at Kirkaldy, in Fifeshire, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. He went to Italy, and on his return in 1762, was made architect to the king, which office he resigned in 1768, on being chosen member of parliament for the county of Kinross. He gave a new turn to the architecture of this country, and procured an unrivalled fame by the number and elegance of his designs. He died March 3, 1792, while the new university of Edinburgh and other public works were erecting according to his plans. He was buried in Westminster abbey.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ADAM (Thomas), an English divine, was born at Leeds in Yorkshire in 1701, and after receiving the rudiments of his education in his native town, was sent to the school at Wakefield, from whence he was removed to Christ's college, Cambridge, but after two years stay there he went to Hart Hall, now Hertford college, Oxford, and took his degree of B.A. On entering into orders, he obtained the living of Winttingham in Lincolnshire, of which he continued rector 58 years, though he might have had considerable preferment, but being set against pluralities he steadily refused every offer of promotion. Mr. Adam was a most zealous and conscientious parish priest, residing continually with his people, and adorning his office by a suitable life and conversation. He died at Winttingham in 1784. In 1771 he published a paraphrase of the eleven first chapters of the Romans, 8vo. His other works are lectures on the church catechism, a volume of sermons, and a posthumous collection of Thoughts, to which his life is prefixed, from which this is taken.

ADAMS (Sir Thomas), lord mayor of London, was born at Wem, in Shropshire, educated at Cambridge, and afterwards brought up a draper in London. In 1609, he was chosen alderman of the city, and in 1645, served the office of lord mayor. His loyalty was so great, that the republicans searched his house, in hopes of finding the king, and though they were disappointed, yet they confined Mr. Adams in the tower. He sent Charles II. 10,000*l.* during his exile, and when the restoration was resolved on, he was appointed by the city to wait on the king, who knighted him at the Hague, and in 1651, created him a baronet. He died in 1667, aged 81; and after his death a stone was taken from him weighing twenty-five ounces, which is now in the laboratory at Cambridge. He founded a school at Wem, and an Arabic professorship at Cambridge, and was at the expence of printing the Gospels in Persian and sending them to the East.—Biog. Br.

ADAMS (Thomas), A.M. was a fellow of Brazen-nose college, Oxford, but was ejected in 1662, for non-conformity, on which he became chaplain to sir Samuel Jones, of Shropshire, and afterwards to lady Clare in Northamptonshire. He died in 1670. He wrote 'Protestant Union or Principles of Religion,' a very useful work.—Calamy's Account of ejected Ministers.

ADAMS (Richard), A.M. was also educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and afterwards had the living of St. Mildred, Bread-street, from whence he was ejected in 1662. He died in 1698. He was one of the editors of Charnock's works, and helped to finish Matthew Poole's annotations on the Bible.—Ibid.

ADAMSON (Patrick), a Scotch prelate, was born at Perth, in 1536, and educated at St. Andrews. In 1566, he travelled with a young gentleman, but writing a Latin poem on the birth of James VI. he was arrested at Paris, and confined for six months, but was released at the intercession of queen Mary. He then went to Bourges, and was there at the time of the massacre of Paris, and kept concealed for seven months at an inn, the master of which, was thrown from the top of the house by the enraged catholics for his charity to heretics. Here he translated the book of Job into Latin verse, and wrote the tragedy of Herod in the same tongue. He returned to his own country in 1573, and became minister of Paisley. In 1575, he sat as commissioner for settling the government of the church, and soon after became chaplain to earl Moreton, who raised him to the see of St. Andrews, on which he was violently persecuted by the presbyterians. In 1582, he fell dangerously ill, and was cured by taking a medicine from an old woman, who was burnt for it by the fanatics as a witch. In 1583, he was sent ambassador to queen Elizabeth. On his return to Scotland in 1584, he found the presbyterian party very strong and violent, and at a synod in 1596, they excommunicated him. The king also alienated the revenues of his see, and thereby reduced him and his family to a wretched condition. He died in 1591. His works have been collected and published in 4to. —Biog. Brit.

ADISON (Lancelot), divine, was born at Crosby Ravensworth in Westmorland, in 1632. From Appleby school he was sent to Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, 1654 and 1657. He was chosen one of the terræ filii at the act in 1658, but being satirical on the men in power in his oration, he was obliged to ask pardon on his knees. He soon after quitted Oxford and lived retired till the restoration, when he became chaplain to the garrison at Dunkirk; and in 1663, he went chaplain to the garrison at Tangier. He returned to England in 1670, and was made chaplain in ordinary to his majesty. Soon after he obtained the living of Milston, in Wiltshire, and a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury, on which he took his degree of D.D. In 1683, he was promoted to the dearly of Litchfield. He died in 1703, and was buried in the church-yard of Litchfield. His writings, the chief of which are, "An Account of the present State of the Jews," and a "Description of West Barbary," shew him to have been a man of learning and observation.—Biog. Br.

ADDISON (Joseph), son of the above, was born at Milston, in Wilts, May 1, 1672. After receiving the rudiments of education, he was sent to the Charterhouse, where he contracted an intimacy with sir Richard Steele. In 1687, he was admitted of Queen's college, Oxford, but afterwards was elected demy at Magdalen. In 1693, he took his degree of M.A. and became eminent for his Latin poetry. At the age of 22, he addressed some verses to Dryden in English, and not long after published a translation of part of Virgil's fourth Georgic. About this time he wrote the arguments prefixed to the several books of Dryden's Virgil, and composed the essay on the Georgics. In 1695, he addressed a poem to king William, which recommended him to lord Somers. In 1699, he obtained a pension of 300*l.* a year, to enable him to travel. He went leisurely through France and Italy, improving his mind to the best advantage, as appears from his "Letter to Lord Halifax," reckoned the most elegant of his poetical works, and his "Travels in Italy," which he dedicated at his return to lord Somers. He returned home in 1702, and found his old friends out of place. In 1704, he was introduced by lord Halifax to lord Godolphin as a fit person to celebrate the victory of Blenheim; on which occasion he produced the Campaign, for which he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of appeals. Next year, he went to Hanover with lord Halifax, and soon after was appointed under-secretary of state. The rage for Italian operas which then prevailed, induced him to write his "Rosamond," which did not succeed, probably because it was English. When the marquis of Wharton went to Ireland as lord lieutenant, Addison accompanied him as secretary, and was made keeper of the records there, with a salary of 300*l.* a year. While he was in Ireland, Steele commenced the Tatler, to which Addison liberally contributed. This was followed by the Spectator, which was enriched by the contributions of Addison, whose papers are distinguished by one of the letters of the word CLIO. In 1713, his tragedy of Cato was brought upon the stage, amidst the plaudits of both whigs and tories. Cato was praised by most of the contemporary poets, criticised by Dennis, attacked as a party play at Oxford, and vindicated by Dr. Sewel. It was translated into Italian, and performed at Florence, and into Latin at the college of St. Omers. At this time the Guardian appeared, to which Addison largely contributed, whose papers are marked by a hand. But the violence of politics soon put a stop to this paper, and Addison himself engaged in the party warfare, but his political pieces being on temporary topics, soon sunk into neglect. An attempt was made to revive the Spectator, but after the publication of eighty numbers, which compose the eighth volume, the work was relinquished. Addison's quota amounts to about a fourth part. In 1715, he began the Freeholder, and continued it till the middle of the next year, in defence of the government. In 1716, he married the countess dowager of Warwick, after a long courtship. He had been tutor to her son, but the marriage did not prove happy. In 1717, he became secretary of state, which place he soon resigned on a pension of 1500*l.* a year. In his retirement he planned a tragedy on the death of Socrates, which he abandoned for a work of a more exalted kind, "A Defence of the Christian Religion," part of which appeared after his death, and makes us regret that he did not live to perfect it. He also laid the plan of an English dictionary in the manner since so happily executed by Dr. Johnson. In 1719, he engaged in a political dispute with Steele, on the "peerage bill," then brought in to restrain the king from creating any new peers, except in case of the extinction of an old family. Steele's pamphlet was entitled, "The Plebeian," and was calculated to alarm the people on the occasion; and Addison replied to it in another called "The Old Whig," in which he contemptuously styled his opponent, "Little Dicky." That year terminated his life, and he ended it in a manner suitable to his character. He sent for lord Warwick, and affectionately pressing his hand softly said, "See in what peace a christian can die!" After giving directions to Mr. Tickell respecting the publication of his works, which he himself dedicated on his death-bed to Mr. Craggs, he breathed his last, June 17, 1719, at Holland-house, leaving only one daughter, who died unmarried, in 1797. Dr. Johnson, after drawing his character in a forcible and elegant manner, says, "whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison."—Biog. Brit. Addisoniana, 2 vols. 1803.

ADELARD, a monk of Bath in the twelfth century. He travelled into Egypt and Arabia, and translated Euclid's elements out of Arabic into Latin, before any Greek copies were discovered. He also translated and wrote several other treatises on mathematical and medical subjects, which remain in MS. in the libraries of Corpus Christi and Trinity colleges, Oxford.—Hutton's Math. Dict.

ADELBOLD, bishop of Utrecht, died in 1027. He wrote the life of the emperor, Henry II. which is still extant.—Moreri.

ADLER (Curtius), also named Servisen, was born in Norway in 1622.—After serving in the Dutch navy, he went to Venice, where he was raised to the rank of admiral, and performed many gallant exploits against the Turks, for which he was made knight of St. Mark; and had a pension for himself and his heirs. On leaving the Venetian service, he went to Amsterdam, where he married a lady of rank. He ended his days at Copenhagen in honour and tranquillity, being made admiral-in-chief, and created a noble. He died in 1675.—Moreri.

ADELGREIFF (John Albrecht), a German fanatic, was put to death at Königsberg, in 1636, for blasphemy, magic, and sedition.—Ibid.

ADELMAN, bishop of Brescia, in the 11th century. He wrote a letter on the eucharist, which is in a collection printed at Louvain, in 1561, in 8vo. He died about 1062.—Moreri.

ADELPHUS, a platonic philosopher, who composed a strange doctrine from Plato, the Gnostics, and others, which was greatly followed in the third century. He was opposed by Plotinus.—Moreri.

ADEODATUS, or "God's-gift," a pope, was born at Rome. He obtained the tiara in 672, and died in 676. He was a pious and charitable pontiff.—Bower's Lives of the Popes. Platina.

ADER (William), a physician of Toulouse, at the beginning of the 17th century, who wrote a book in 1621, entitled, "De Ægrotis et Morbis Evangelicis;" in which he proves, that the diseases healed by our Saviour were incurable by medicine.—Mor.

ADHAD-EDDOULAT, emperor of Persia, succeeded his uncle Amad-Eddoulat, and by his conquests greatly enlarged his territories. In 977, he became master of Bagdad, which he adorned with hospitals, mosques, and other public works. He was also a great encourager of poets and men of learning. He died in 982, aged 47.—D'Hérbelot.

ADHELME was the son of Kenred, and nephew to Ina, king of the west Saxons. He became abbot of Malmesbury, and was the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, the first who brought poetry into this country, and the first bishop of Sherborne. He died in 709, and was canonized. His writings are in the Bibl. Pat.—Bale. Pitf.

ADHEMAR (William), a native of Provence, and celebrated for his poetry. He died about 1190.—Moreri.

ADIMANTUS, of the sect of the Manichees, flourished about the end of the third century. He denied the authority of the Old Testament, in a book which was answered by St. Augustine.—Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel Hist.

ADIMARI (Raphael), was born at Rimini, of which country he wrote the history, 2 vols. 4to. 1616.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ADIMARI (Alexander), born at Florence in 1579. He gained great reputation by his poems, and died in 1649.—Ibid.

ADLERBITTER (John), a German historian. He was chancellor of Bavaria in the 17th century, and wrote the annals of Bavaria in Latin, printed at Leipzig, in 1710, folio.—Moreri.

ADLERFELDT (Gustavus), was born near Stockholm, and became gentleman of the bed-chamber to Charles XII. whose history he has written with great fidelity; of which a French translation was published by his son, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1740. He was killed at the battle of Pultowa, in 1709.—Gen. B. D.

ADO, archbishop of Vienne, in Dauphiny, died in 875, aged seventy-five. He wrote, 1. A universal Chronicle, printed at Paris, 1522, folio, and at Rome in 1745, folio. 2. A Martyrology, published in 1613.—Dupin.

ADOLPHUS, emperor of Germany, was the count of Nassau, and elected to the imperial dignity in 1292. His rapacity and tyrannical conduct caused a confederation against him, at the head of which was Albert duke of Austria. Adolphus fell in battle, July 2, 1298.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ADOLPHUS-FREDERIC II. of Holstein Gottorp, king of Sweden, born in 1710, and succeeded his father in 1751. He reformed the laws, and encouraged learning and the arts of peace. He also instituted an academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, at Torneo in Lapland, and died in 1771.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ADORNE (Francis), a Genoese jesuit, wrote a treatise on ecclesiastical discipline. He died January 13, 1586, aged 56.

ADRETS (François de Beaumont, baron des), a man of a turbulent spirit, sided with the Huguenots, in 1562, and signalized himself by many daring exploits, but more by his cruelties. At some places he obliged his prisoners to throw themselves from the battlements, upon the pikes of his soldiers. Reproaching one of them for retracting twice from the fatal leap, "sir, (replied the man), I defy you with all your bravery to take it in three." This witticism saved the soldier's life. After the peace he turned Catholic, and died universally hated, in 1587. A son of his was concerned in the massacre of Paris.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ADRIAN (Publius Ælius), emperor of Rome, was born there A.D. 76. He entered early into the army, and became tribune of a legion. He married Sabina, the heiress of Trajan, whom he accompanied in his expeditions, and became successively prætor, governor of Pannonia, and consul. On the death of Trajan, in 117, he assumed the government, made peace with the Persians, and remitted the debts of the Roman people. No monarch travelled more than Adrian. In 120, he visited Gaul, from whence he went to Britain, where he built a wall, from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway-frith, eighty-miles in length, to secure the Roman province from the incursions of the Caledonians. On leaving Britain, he went into Africa and Asia, and was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens, in 125. In his reign the Christians suffered a dreadful persecution. He built a temple to Jupiter on Mount Calvary, and placed a statue of Adonis in the manger of Bethlem; he also had the images of swine engraved on the gates of Jerusalem. He died at Baie in the 63d year of his age, having reigned twenty-one years. On his death-bed he composed some Latin verses, addressed to his soul, which betray his uncertainty with regard to a future state. He had great virtues, which were, however, blended with as great vices. He adopted Titus Antoninus, on condition that he should adopt Marcus Annus Verus, and the son of Lucius Verus. —Dis Cassus.

ADRIAN, a writer of the 5th century, wrote an introduction to the scriptures, in Greek, printed at Augsburg, in 1602, 4to. and in Latin, in 1650, folio. —Moreri.

ADRIAN, a Carthusian monk, is known by a treatise, entitled De Remediis Utriusque Fortunæ, printed at Cologne, in 1471, folio. —Ibid.

ADRIAN I. (Pope), was elected in 772. He was of a patrician family at Rome. He sanctioned the worship of images, which had been allowed in a council held at Nice in 787; but was opposed by the kings of France and England. He died in 795. —Bower. Platina.

ADRIAN II. (Pope), was born at Rome, and succeeded to the papal chair in 867. He contended with the patriarch of Constantinople for the superiority; and attempted to extend his authority over the crowned heads of the west, but without success in both cases. He died in 872. —Ibid.

ADRIAN III. (Pope), was also a native of Rome; and obtained the tiara in 884, but died the next year, on his journey to a diet at Worms. —Ibid.

ADRIAN IV. (Pope), the only Englishman who ever had that dignity, was born at Langley, near St. Alban's. His name was Nicholas Brekepsere; and he was some time in the monastery of St. Alban's in a low condition. Being refused the habit in that house, he went to France, and became a clerk in the monastery of St. Rufus, in Provence, of which he was afterwards chosen abbot; Eugenius III. made him a cardinal in 1146, and in 1148, sent him legate to Denmark and Norway, which nations he converted to the christian faith. In 1154, he was chosen pope, on which, Henry II. king of England, sent the abbot of St. Alban's, with three bishops, to congratulate him. The pope, disregarding the slight formerly put upon him, granted considerable privileges to the monastery of St. Alban's, and a bull to Henry for the conquest of Ireland. In 1155, he excommunicated the king of Sicily; and about the same time, the emperor Frederic meeting the pope near Sutrin, held his stirrup while he mounted on horseback; after which his holiness conducted him to Rome, and consecrated him king of the Romans in St. Peter's church. The next year, the king of Sicily submitted, and was absolved. Adrian, by his active conduct, left the papal territory in a better state than he found it; and died, not without suspicion of poison, in 1159. There are some letters and homilies of his extant. —Biog. Br.

ADRIAN V. (Pope), was a native of Genoa; and ascended the papal throne in 1276. He was legate in England in 1254, and again in 1265, to settle the disputes between the king and his barons. He died thirty-eight days after his election. —Bower. Platina.

ADRIAN VI. (Pope), was born at Utrecht, and educated on charity at Louvain. He was made bishop of Tortosa by Ferdinand, king of Spain; and his successor Charles, during his minority, chose him to be regent. When that prince became emperor, by the title of Charles V. he placed an unlimited confidence in Adrian; who, on the death of Leo X. in 1521, was elected pope. He died in 1523. —Rycaut. Bower.

ADRIAN (de Castello), was born at Cornetto, in Tuscany; and acquired several employments at Rome. He came to England in the reign of Henry VII. who made him his agent at Rome; and gave him first the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards that of Bath and Wells. Adrian farmed out his bishopric to Wolfsey, living himself at Rome, where he built a superb palace, which he left to the king of England and his successors. Alexander VI. created him cardinal in 1503; soon after which, he narrowly escaped being poisoned with others of his order, at a feast given by the pope and his son Cesar Borgia. Engaging in a plot against pope Leo X. to which he was led by the prediction of a fortuneteller that Leo should die a violent death, and be succeeded by one Adrian, he was fined 12,500 ducats, and restricted from leaving Rome. However, in 1518, he fled from that city, and was excommunicated. At this time he was at Venice; and what became of him afterwards is unknown. Polydore Virgil says, he ended his days at Riva, in the diocese of Trent; and gives him a high character for erudition. —Biog. Br.

ADRIANI (Joanni Battista), was born at Florence in 1511. He wrote the history of his own times in Italian. He died at Florence in 1579. —Moreri.

ADRIENOMIA (Cornelia), a nun of the order of St. Augustine, and of a noble family in Holland. She wrote a poetical version of the Psalms in the sixteenth century. —Bayle.

ADRIENOMIUS (Christian), born at Delft, in Holland, in 1593. He wrote a description of the holy land, and a chronicle of the Old and New Testaments, 1698, fol. He died at Collogne, in 1585.—Bayle.

ADSON, abbot of Luxeuil in 984. He was the author of a book on the miracles of St. Wandalbert, and of another concerning antichrist.—Moreri.

ARDESIVS, a Platonic philosopher of the fourth century, succeeded Jamblichus, as teacher of philosophy at Cappadocia. He pretended to hold communion with the deities.—Brucker's Hist. Phil.

AREGRATES (John), a Nestorian monk, who lived about the year 485. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, and a treatise against the council of Chalcedon.—Moreri.

ARGIDIUS (Petrus Albiensis), a great traveller in Asia and Africa, who died in 1555, aged 65. He wrote a description of Thrace, Constantinople, and other works, &c. &c.—Ibid.

ARGYRIUS (Atheniensis), a Greek ecclesiastic and physician in the eighth century; who wrote several books, the chief of which are, De Pulsibus et de Venenis.—Friend.

ARGYRUS (de Columna), general of the Augustines in the 13th century. He taught divinity at Paris with great reputation, and was called according to the humour of the times Doctor Fundatissimus, but his works have long since sunk into contempt. One of his books, however, as an early specimen of typography, is still sought for. He died in 1316.—Dupin.

ÆGINETA (Paulus), a native of the island Ægina, flourished about the year 620. He first noticed the cathartic quality of rhubarb. His works were published at Paris, in 1532, fol.—Friend.

ÆGINHARD, secretary to Charlemagne, whose daughter Imma is said to have carried him through the snow from her chamber, to prevent his being traced by his footsteps; and being seen by her father, he consented to their union.—Æginhard was a German, and wrote the life of Charlemagne, also his annals from 741 to 889. The first edition is that at Paris, in 1576, 2 vols. fol.—Moreri.

ÆLIAN (Claudius), historian and rhetorician, was born in Italy about the year 80 of the christian era. Though he never left his native country he became so perfect a master of the Greek language, as to write it with the greatest purity. He taught rhetoric at Rome, under the emperor Antoninus. His Various History is a curious collection of anecdotes, the best editions of which are, those of Perizonius, in 1701, and Gronovius, 1791. His history of Animals is also valuable. His works were collected and published by Gesner at Zurich, in 1556.—Voss. de Græc. Hist.

ÆLIANUS (Meccius), a physician mentioned with respect by Galen. He was the first who made use of treacle against the plague, and found it to succeed.—Moreri.

sixteenth century, was a Venetian of a noble family.—Mosheim

ÆMILIANUS (C. Julius), a Moor, who rose from the lowest station to the imperial dignity. He prevailed on the army to elect him emperor, and marched against Gallus, who was slain by his own soldiers, and thus Æmilianus easily obtained the throne; but he did not long enjoy that dignity, being killed by some of his own troops, who gave the crown to Valerian. This happened four months after his accession, in the 46th year of his age.—Univ. Hist.

ÆMILIUS (Paulus), a Roman general. He was born of a noble family about 228 B. C. Having passed through several civil offices with reputation, he obtained a military command, in which he acquired great glory. At the age of 46, he served the office of consul; and when he was 60, he accepted the command of the armies against Perseus, king of Macedon, whom he made prisoner, leading him in triumph through Italy, with the king of Illyria, his ally. On his arrival at Rome, he obtained a magnificent triumph, in which Perseus and his family led the way. He afterwards served the office of censor, and died universally lamented, in the 64th year of his age.—Plutarch.

ÆMILIUS (Paulus), born at Verona. He was employed thirty years in writing the history of the kings of France, which he left unfinished at his death in 1529. It was first printed in 1536, and continued afterwards by Arnold Feron, in 2 vols. folio, 1576. He had a canonry in the cathedral at Paris, and was interred in that church.—Moreri.

ÆNEAS (Gazeus), a Platonic philosopher, who became a convert to christianity in the fifth century. He wrote a dialogue on the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body, printed in Greek and Latin, at Basil, 1560, and at Leipzig in 1655.—Fabricii Bibl. Græc.

ÆNEAS (Sylvius), see Pius II.

ÆNEAS (Tacticus), a Greek author on the art of war, who lived about 336 B. C. His work was prefixed, by Casaubon, to his edition of Polybius, Paris, 1609; and reprinted in 12mo, at Leyden, in 1633.—Fabricius.

ÆRIUS, a presbyter of Sebastia, in Pontus, lived about 385. He started the notion that there is no distinction between bishops and presbyters; to which he added arianism, and procured many followers.—Mosheim.

ÆSCHINES, a disciple of Socrates, was the son of a sausage maker. He went to the court of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily; and afterwards kept a school at Athens for his support. His dialogues are so much in the manner of Socrates, that Menedemus charges him with having stolen them from that philosopher. Only three of them are now extant; of which Mr. Le Clerc published a Latin translation, with notes, in 1711, 8vo.—Diogenes Laertius. Fabricius.

ÆSCHINES, an ancient orator, born at Athen. B. C. 397, was the cotemporary and rival of Demosthenes; and being vanquished, he went and kept a school at Samos, where he died at the age of 75. There are only three of his orations extant, which are exquisitely beautiful. They were first published by the Aldi in 1613, folio, and several times since.—Plutarch in Vit. Demosth. Fabricius.

ÆSCHYLUS, the tragic poet, was born at Athens B. C. 460. He was in the sea fight at Salamis, in which his brother Aminias gallantly distinguished himself. Ælian relates, that Æschylus, being accused of blasphemy, was sentenced to be stoned to death; on which his brother exhibited his arm, which had lost a hand at Salamis, and thereby made such an impression on the judges, that they immediately pardoned Æschylus. This behaviour of his countrymen, added to the resentment which he felt on the preference shewn to the pieces of Sophocles, induced him to retire to Sicily. It is said that he died of a fracture of his skull, occasioned by an eagle setting fall a tortoise from a great height on his head; this was in the 69th year of his age. The Sicilians interred him magnificently near the river Gela. Æschylus wrote many plays, of which only seven are extant. He has a noble boldness of expression and a lofty imagination, but is frequently bombastic, and so obscure as to be hardly understood. The best edition is that of Stanley, printed first at London in 1663, folio, and since by Paaw, at the Hague, 9 tom. 4to. 1745. Mr. Potter published an elegant translation of Æschylus, in English verse, in 1777.—Vossius. Bayle.

ÆSOP, the fabulist, was a Phrygian by birth, and lived in the time of Solon, about 600 years B. C. The life of him, by Plautus, an eastern monk, is confessedly fabulous, and indeed his whole history is extremely obscure, not excepting the account of him by Plutarch. All that seems worthy of credit in the different writers who have treated of him is, that he was first bought as a slave by an Athenian, from whom he learned the Greek language, and then passed successively into the service of Xanthus and Idmon, both of the isle of Samos. The latter gave him his freedom, on which he was retained by Cresus. He is said to have been put to death by the Delphians for some remarks he passed on their licentiousness. Great respect was paid to his memory, and his fables have been universally held in esteem; but it must be confessed that a great part of the fables which pass under his name have an eastern origin; and, indeed, there are so many striking coincidences between what is related of Æsop and of Lokman, as to induce a strong suspicion that they were one and the same person. Æsop's fables were first published at Milan in 1476, folio, which edition now bears an exorbitant price. But the first Greek edition is reckoned that of 1480, 4to.—Hærodotus. Plutarch. Fabric. Bayle.

ÆSOR, the author of a romantic history of Alexander the Great, in Greek, which has been translated into Latin and German. The age in which he lived is unknown.—Plutarch.

ÆSORUS (Clodius), a famous actor, who lived about the 670th year of Rome. He had the honour of instructing Cicero in oratory. Æsop was a great epicure, and at an entertainment is said to have had a dish of singing birds which cost above 800l. His son was also noticed for his luxuriousness; and Horace says, that he swallowed a pearl of great value, dissolved in vinegar. He died, notwithstanding his epicurism, worth above 160,000l.—Horace. Val. Max.

ÆTHERIUS, an architect of the sixth century. He is supposed to have built the wall which runs from the sea to Selimbria, to keep out the Bulgarians and Scythians.—Gen. B. D.

ÆTION, a Grecian painter, who having shewn his picture of the nuptials of Alexander and Roxana at the Olympic games, unknown as he was, the president gave the painter his daughter in marriage.—Plin. Nat. Hist.

ÆTIUS, a famous general in the reign of Valentinian III. He was brought up in the emperor's guards, and after the battle of Pollentia, in 403, was delivered as a hostage to Alaric, and next to the Huns. On the death of Honorius he sided with the usurper John, for whose service he engaged an army of Huns. He was, however, afterwards taken into favour by Valentinian, who gave him the title of count. Being jealous of the power of Boniface, governor of Africa, he secretly advised his recall, and at the same time counselled him not to obey the mandate. This brought on a revolt, which was the occasion of the irruption of the Vandals into that province. The treachery of Ætius being discovered, a war ensued between him and Boniface, in which the latter was slain. Ætius retired among the Huns, and returning with a large army, so alarmed Placidia, mother of Valentinian, that she put herself into his power. He defended the declining empire with great skill and bravery, and compelled Attila to retire beyond the Rhine. But Valentinian being suspicious that he had a design upon the throne, stabbed him with his own hand in 454.—Univ. Hist.

ÆRTIUS, bishop of Anioch in the fourth century, refuted upon the heresy of his master Arius. Before his entering into orders he was a physician, and remarkable for a contentious and sceptical spirit. He contended for a dissimilarity between the Father and Son, for which he was banished by Constantius, but recalled by Julian. He died in 766.—Fabric. Harf. Gibbon.

ARTUS, a physician of Mesopotamia, who wrote on the diseases of women, and other works, which are extant in Greek. He is supposed to have been a Christian, and lived in the sixth century.—Friend.

ARAX (Domitius), an ancient orator, was a native of Nismes, and obtained the praetorship of Rome; but being disappointed of further promotion, he turned informer against Claudia Pulchra, cousin of Agrippa, and gained the cause, which procured him the favour of Tiberius. Quintilian mentions two books of his on witnesses. He brought himself into a dilemma by an inscription which he put upon a statue of Caligula, mentioning that he had been a second time consul at the age of twenty-two. This was meant for an encomium, but the emperor resented it as a sarcasm, and made a violent speech in the senate against the author. After, instead of replying, supplicated pardon, saying, that he feared less the emperor's power than his eloquence, which piece of flattery disarmed Caligula's resentment, and he not only forgave him, but raised him to the consular dignity. He died of a surfeit, A. D. 59.—Quintilian. Bayle.

AFRANIUS, a comic poet, lived about 100 years B. C. He wrote some Latin comedies, of which only a few fragments remain.—Moreri. Vossius de Poet. Lat.

AFRICANUS (Julius), the author of a chronicle, of which a fragment is extant in Eusebius. He also wrote a letter to Origen, exposing the story of Susannah as a forgery; and another, in which he reconciles St. Matthew and St. Luke's genealogies of our Saviour.—Dupin. Fabric. Bib. Græc.

AGAPETUS I. (Pope), was born at Rome, and raised to the papal throne in 535. He opposed the attempts of Justinian to invade the rights of the church; but died within twelve months after his election.—Bower, Platina.

AGAPETUS II. (Pope), was a native of Rome, and obtained the tiara in 946, and died in 956, having the reputation of being a very holy man.—Ibid.

AGAPETUS, deacon of Constantinople in the 6th century. He wrote a letter to Justinian, on the duties of a Christian prince.—Moreri.

AGAPUS, a Greek monk of the 17th century, who wrote a treatise on the salvation of a sinner, printed at Venice, in the modern Greek, 1641.—Ibid.

AGARD (Arthur), an English antiquary, was born at Foston, in Derbyshire, 1540; and held the office of deputy chamberlain in the exchequer forty-five years. In conjunction with sir Robert Cotton and other eminent men he formed a society of antiquaries. He wrote a treatise to explain the Domesday-book, which was deposited in the Cotton library. Various other MSS. of his are still preserved. Some tracts of his on antiquarian subjects were published by Hearne. He died in 1615, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster abbey.—Wood. Biog. Br.

AGATHARCIDES, a native of Cnidus, who flourished about 180 B. C. He wrote in Greek a history of the successes of Alexander.—Vossius Hist. Gr.

AGATHARCUS, a native of Samos, who was employed by Æschylus to paint scenes for his stage.—Plutarch.

AGATHEMER (Orthonis), the author of a "Compendium of Geography," in Greek, which was published by Hudson, at Oxford, in 1703.—Fabricius.

AGATHIAS, a Greek historian of the 6th century, is supposed by some to have been a christian. He wrote a history of the reign of Justinian, which was printed in Greek and Latin, at Leyden, in 1594, and at Paris in 1658.—Ibid.

AGATHON, a tragic poet, who gained the prize at the Olympic games, B. C. 419. His works are lost.—Bayle. Vossius.

AGATHO (Pope) was born at Palermo, and elected in 679. In his time a council was called at Constantinople to condemn the Eutychians, or Monothelites, to which this pontiff sent legates. He died in 682.—Platina. Bower.

AGATHOCLES, the Sicilian tyrant, was the son of a potter; and became, in succession, a thief, a common soldier, centurion, general, and pirate.—Having defeated the Carthaginians, he became king of Syracuse, and at length of all Sicily. His soldiers, on account of arrears, obliged him to fly from his camp, and then murdered his children, whom he had left behind. Returning afterwards with a strong force, he put to death the mutineers, with their wives and children. He died of poison, at the age of seventy-two, B. C. 289, having reigned twenty-eight years.—Diod. Sic. Plutarch. Polyb.

AGELIUS (Anthony), bishop of Acerno, in the kingdom of Naples, who died in 1608. He wrote commentaries on some parts of the Old Testament.—Moreri.

AGELNOTH, archbishop of Canterbury in 1020, was a favourite of king Canute; on the death of whom he refused to crown his son Harold, pretending that the deceased king had commanded him to crown none but the issue of queen Emma. It is uncertain whether Harold ever was crowned or not. This archbishop died in 1038. He wrote some religious pieces.—Biog. Br.

AGESILAUS, king of Sparta, succeeded his brother Agis, and was appointed general of Greece in the Peloponnesian war, which was then raging. He acquired great renown by his exploits against the Persians. While he was pursuing the path of glory, intrigues were formed against him, and he was recalled. He was afterwards engaged against the Thebans and Athenians, but was defeated by Epaminondas, who lost his life at the instant of victory. He next went to assist Tachos in his attempt to obtain the throne of Egypt, but was bribed to go over to the side of Nectanabis, his antagonist. He died on his return, on the coast of Africa, B. C. 362.—Xenophon. Plutarch. Nepes.

AGGAS (Robert), or more commonly called August, a painter of landscape in the reign of Charles II. He died in London in 1679.—Vertue's Anecd. of Painters. Pilkington.

AGILULF, from being duke of Turin, was chosen king of the Lombards in 591. He renounced arianism, and embraced the catholic faith; but committed great ravages in the ecclesiastical state while engaged in a war with some of the Italian princes. He died in 619, and was succeeded by his son Adalwald.—Urv. Hist.

AGIS III. king of Sparta, was the grandson of Ageläus, and began to reign B. C. 346. He stirred up several of the Grecian states against Alexander, but was slain in a battle he fought with the Macedonians in the year 337 B. C.—Ibid.

AGIS IV. king of Sparta, was the son of Eudamidas. He endeavoured to reform the constitution and manners of Sparta, for which he was safely put to death by his countrymen B. C. 241.—Ibid.

AGLIONBY (John), an English divine, was born in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was made chaplain to Queen Elizabeth; and in 1601 was elected principal of Edmund-hall. He was concerned in the present translation of the New Testament; and died at Ipsip, of which he was rector, in 1610, aged 43.—There was another Dr. John Aglionby, who was dean of Canterbury, but died a few months after his nomination, in 1643. He appears to have been the son of the preceding.—Wood, A. O. Todd's Deans of Canterbury, 8vo.

AGNELUS, abbot of Ravenna in the ninth century; he wrote the lives of the bishops and archbishops of that city.—Moreri.

AGNESI (Maria Gaetana), an illustrious Italian lady for birth, learning, and virtues. She was born at Milan in 1718, and took the religious veil. Her application to mathematical learning was ardent, and her progress therein so distinguished, that before her adoption of the cloistered life, pope Benedict XIV. appointed her, in 1750, professor of mathematics in the university of Bologna. Her analytical institutions were published at Milan, in 2 vols. 4to: 1748. They were translated into French by M. Cousin, published at Paris in 1775. Lately they have appeared in English, in 2 vols. 4to. with her life, taken from Montucla, prefixed. She died about 1770.

AGOBARD, archbishop of Lyons in the ninth century, was deprived of his dignity for deposing Lewis the meek, in the assembly of Compeigne, but was afterwards restored, and died in 840. He opposed image worship, and wrote against the belief of witchcraft, and the practice of duelling. His works were printed in 1666, in 2 vols. 8vo.—Moreri.

AGOSTINO (Paolo, da Valerano), a celebrated musical composer, and master of the pope's chapel at Rome; died in 1627, aged 36. His chorusses are spoken of with admiration.—Burney's Hist. Mus.

AGOULT (Guillaume d'), a gentleman of Provence, who wrote ballads about the year 1198.—Moreri.

AGREDA (Marie d'), superior of the convent of the immaculate conception at Agreda, in Spain, was born in that city in 1602, took the veil in 1620, and died in 1665. She pretended to have received directions in a vision to write the life of the Virgin Mary, which she accordingly executed. It was not, however, published till after her death, and was then prohibited at Rome, and censured by the Sorbonne, at Paris, though highly esteemed in Spain.—Bayle. Moreri.

AGRESTI (Livio), an historical painter; was employed in the Vatican by Gregory XIII. He died in 1580.—Pilk.

AGRESTIS (Julius), a Roman captain, who, when Antenius revolted to Vespasian, and laid in ruins the city of Cremona, obtained leave of the emperor to survey the state of the enemy's forces. He returned with a faithful report, but not being believed he put an end to himself.—Tacitus.

AGRICOLA (Cnæus Julius), an eminent Roman commander, was born A. D. 40. His father, Julius Græcinus, was a great orator, and was put to death by Caligula for refusing to plead against Silanus. Agricola was carefully brought up by his mother, Julia Procilla. He served first in Britain, and on his return to Rome married a lady of rank. He was next made quæstor of Asia, and became tribune of the people, and prætor, under Nero. In the commotions of 69, his mother was murdered, and her estate in Liguria plundered by the fleet of Otho. On his journey thither, he received the news that Vespasian had assumed the government, and immediately exerted himself in his favour. The twentieth legion having mutinied in Britain, he was sent to reduce them to obedience, in which he succeeded. After staying in Britain a considerable time, he returned to Rome, where he was raised to the rank of patrician, and made governor of Aquitania, in Gaul. In 77 he was chosen consul with Domitian; and the same year married his daughter to Tacitus the historian. Next year he was appointed governor of Britain, where he restored tranquillity, and brought the natives to a love of the Roman language and manners. He extended his conquests into Scotland, and built a chain of forts from the Clyde to the Frith of Forth, to prevent the incursions of the inhabitants of the North. He defeated Gaius on the Grampian hills, and then made peace with the Caledonians. On the accession of Domitian, Agricola had a triumph decreed him, and was recalled. He then went into retirement, and died A. D. 93, leaving a widow and one daughter.—Tacitus.

AGRICOLA (George), an eminent metallurgist and physician, was born at Glauchen, in Misnia, in 1494. He wrote a number of books, chiefly on metals and subterraneous animals. He died in 1555.—Melch. Adami. Vit. Med. Germ.

AGRICOLA (John), a German divine, was born at Illeben, in 1492, and studied theology at Wittemberg, where he embraced the sentiments of Luther. He acquired considerable reputation as a preacher; but embroiled himself in a dispute with Melancthon, on the use of the law under the gospel dispensation. He then retired to Berlin, and engaged with the bishop of Nuremberg and others in endeavouring a reconciliation between the catholics and protestants, but in vain. He died at Berlin in 1566. He wrote commentaries on the gospel of St. Luke, and a collection of German proverbs.—Melch. Adami Vit. Germ. Moreri.

AGRICOLA (Rodolphus), a learned writer of the 15th century, was a native of Friesland, and discovered very early a love of literature. He was educated at Louvain, after which he settled at Ferrara, and taught Latin with great reputation. Here also he studied Greek, and attended the philosophical lectures of Theodore Gaza. In 1477 he returned to the Netherlands, and on visiting Deventer saw Erasmus, who, though only ten years old, he predicted would be a great man. In 1482, Agricola settled in the Palatinate, giving occasional lectures at Heidelberg and Worms. He died at the former place in 1484. Agricola was the first who introduced the Greek language into Germany. His works were printed at Louvain in 1516, and at Cologne in 1539, 4to.—Melch. Adami. Moreri AGRICOLA (Michael), a Lutheran minister at Abo, in Finland, was the first who translated the New Testament into the language of that country. He died in 1556.—Bayle.

AGRIFFA, an astronomer of the first century, was a native of Bithynia. He was a very accurate observer.—Moreri.

AGRIFFA (Henry Cornelius) was born at Cologne in 1486, of a noble family. He became secretary to Maximilian I. by whom he was knighted for his gallantry in the Italian wars. Afterwards he was created doctor both in law and physic. He travelled through various parts of Europe, and while in England wrote a commentary on St. Paul's epistles. In 1518 he settled at Mentz, as advocate counsellor of the city, which, however, he was obliged to quit at the instigation of the monks, whom he had provoked: from thence he went to Cologne, in 1520, and the year following to Geneva. Francis I. appointed him physician to his mother, which post he soon lost for not gratifying his mistress's curiosity by an astrological judgment. From France he went to Antwerp in 1528, and was taken into the service of Margaret of Austria, governess of the Low Countries. In 1530, he published his treatise of the Vanity of the Sciences, and soon after his Occult Philosophy. In 1535 he was at Lyons, where he was imprisoned for defaming the king's mother, his former mistress. He was discharged in a short time, and died the same year at Grenoble. He had been married twice; by his first wife he had one son, and by the last five children.—All his works were collected, and printed at Lyons in 1550, in 3 vols. 8vo.—Bayle. Melch. Adami.

AGRIFFA I. (Herod), was the grandson of Herod the great, and born A. M. 4024. He was made by his grandfather governor of Tiberia, where he lived so extravagantly as to incur Herod's displeasure. He then went to Rome, and attached himself to Caius, the son of Germanicus, who succeeding Tiberius, made Agrippa tetrarch of Batanaea and Trachonitis; to which Claudius added the whole kingdom of Judea, with that of Chalcis. He commenced a persecution against the Christians to please the Jews, and put St. James the great to death. Being soon after at Caesarea, he instituted games in honour of the emperor, at which the Tyrians waited on him to sue for peace. Agrippa made a dazzling appearance on his throne, and when he spoke, his flatterers exclaimed it was the voice of a god, which impious adulation he was weak enough to receive with pleasure. He was immediately smitten with a disorder in his bowels, of which he died in five days, A. D. 44.—Josephus. Acts Ap'ls.

AGRIFFA II. (Herod), son of the above, succeeded to the throne at the age of seventeen. St. Paul pleaded his cause before him with so much eloquence, that Agrippa acknowledged he had "almost persuaded him to be a Christian." He was greatly disliked by the Jews, and died at Rome about A. D. 94.—Ibid.

AGRIFFA (Marcus Vipfianus), the friend of Augustus; he accused Callius to the senate, and was concerned in the sea fight against Antony, by which Octavianus obtained the empire. He married first that emperor's niece and afterwards his daughter Julia, the widow of Marcellus. He acquired great fame by his military exploits, for which triumphs were decreed him, which he refused to accept. He died B. C. 12.—Sueton. Felicius Patere.

AGRIFFA (Menenius), was consul of Rome, B. C. 503. He is celebrated for having appeased a commotion among the Roman people, by the fable of the belly and the members.—Dion. Hal. Liv.

AGRIFFINA, the elder, was the wife of Germanicus Caesar, whom she accompanied in his military expeditions. He died at Antioch, A.D. 19, and his ashes were brought home by his disconsolate widow, accompanied by two of her children. She was banished by Tiberius to a barren isle, where she died A.D. 33.—Tacitus. Suetonius.

AGRIPPINA, the younger, was the daughter of the above. After losing two husbands, she was married to her uncle Claudius, the emperor, whom she poisoned, A.D. 54, to make way for her son Nero. That monster caused her to be assassinated, and exhibited to the senate a list of all the infamous crimes of which she had been guilty.—Ibid.

AGUESSEAU (Henry Francis de) was born at Limoges in 1668, of an ancient family. His father, who was intendant of Languedoc, was his first instructor. In 1691 he was admitted advocate general of Paris; and in 1700 was named procureur-general, in which he appeared to the greatest advantage, regulating those jurisdictions that were under the controul of parliament, preserving a strict discipline in the tribunals, improving the proceedings in criminal matters, and making several regulations that were sanctioned by decrees; but what he set himself most upon was the administration of the hospitals. After the death of Louis XIV. the regent, duke of Orleans, made d'Aguesseau chancellor; but in 1718 he was displaced. In 1720 he had the seals restored to him, of which he was again deprived two years afterwards. In 1737 he became once more chancellor, which office he held with the highest honour to himself, and benefit to the nation, till 1750, when infirmities obliged him to resign it. He died in 1751. His works have been published in nine volumes quarto, and are held in great estimation. D'Aguesseau never passed a day without reading some portion of Scripture, which he said was the balm of his life.—Newc. Dict. Hist.

AGUILLON (Francis), a Flemish mathematician, of the order of Jesus, died at Seville, in 1617, aged 51. He wrote a book on spheric projections, and another on optics.—Moreri. Nouv. Dict. Hist.

AGUIRRE (Joseph), a Spanish Benedictine monk, was made cardinal by Innocent XI. and died at Rome in 1699, aged 69. He compiled a collection of the councils of Spain, in six vols. folio, and wrote some theological pieces.—Boyle. Moreri.

AGYLEE, or AOYLEUS (Henry), was a native of Bois-le-duc, and died in 1595, aged 62. He translated the Nomocanon of Photius, and was a profound Greek scholar.—Moreri.

AHAB, king of Israel, was the son of Amri, whom he succeeded. He surpassed in impiety all his predecessors, being incited to acts of idolatry and cruelty by his wife Jezebel. He was slain by an arrow in a war with the Syrians, and his blood was licked by the dogs on the spot where he had caused Naboth to be murdered, about A.M. 3138.—1 Kings, xvi. &c.

AHAZ, king of Judah, succeeded his father Jotham B.C. 742. At the beginning of his reign, he defeated Rezin, king of Syria, according to the promise of Isaiah. Notwithstanding this, he abandoned the worship of God, and fell into idolatrous practices, for which his country was ravaged by the Syrians. He shut up the temple, and destroyed the holy vessels. His impiety was so great that his body was not permitted to be buried in the royal sepulchres.—2 Kings, xvi. 2 Chron. xxviii.

AHAZIAH, king of Israel. There are two kings of this name mentioned in Scripture; the first was son of Ahab, (1 Kings, xxii.) and the other king of Judah. This last was slain by Jehu, B.C. 859.—2 Kings, viii.

AHLWARDT (Peter), a learned German, was the son of a shoemaker, at Grickswalde, where he was born in 1710. After studying at different universities, he settled at his native place, as professor of logic and metaphysics. He wrote "On the Human Understanding," "The Immortality of the Soul," and "Thoughts on Thunder and Lightning." He died in 1791.—Schlichtegroll's German Necrol.

AHMED KHAN, son of Hulagu, and brother of Abaka Khan, whom he succeeded, and was the first of the Moguls who professed Mohammedanism, which gave great offence to his family. A conspiracy was formed against him by his courtiers in favour of Argoun, his nephew, and he was put to death A.D. 1284.—D'Herbelot.

AJALA (Martin Perez d'), a Spanish ecclesiastic, was born in the diocese of Carthage in 1504. He was sent by Charles V. to the council of Trent, and afterwards made archbishop of Valencia. He discharged the duties of his station in a most exemplary manner, and died in 1566. The principal of his works is entitled, "De Divinis Traditionibus."—There were two others of the same name, 1. Baltazar Ajala, of Antwerp, who wrote "De Jure et officiis Bellicis, ac Militari Disciplina."—2. Gabriel Ajala, physician of Louvain in the 16th century, and brother of the preceding. He wrote "Popularia Epigram," "De Lue Pestilenti," &c.—Moreri.

AIDAN, a British bishop in the seventh century, who was greatly successful in converting the people of the northern parts of England to christianity. He was bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in Northumberland, where he died in 651. He was a prelate of exemplary piety and charity.—Biog. Br.

AIKMAN (William), a Scottish painter, was the only son of William Aikman, esq. of Cairney, advocate, by Margaret, sister of sir John Clerk, of Pennycuik, bart. and born in 1682. He was designed for the bar, but abandoned that profession, and applied himself to painting. After studying three years in Italy, he went to Turkey, and taking Rome on his way came to England, where he was patronized by the duke of Argyle. He excelled chiefly in portraits, and died in 1731.—Gen. B. D.

AILEY (Peter d'), bishop of Cambray, was born at Compiègne in 1350. He was a zealous champion for popery, and presided at the council of Constance, where he condemned John Huss to the stake. Pope John XXIII. created him a cardinal. He wrote several books, and died in 1420.—Mor.

AILRED, ETHELRED, or EARLED, abbot of Ryeby, in Lincolnshire, was born in 1109. He wrote a "Genealogy of English Kings," "The Life of Edward the Confessor," and other pieces.—Biog. Br.

AIMON, a French benedictine, who wrote a history of France, to be found in the third volume of Duchesne's Collection. He lived about 840.—Moreri.

AINSWORTH (Henry), a biblical commentator at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Being a Brownist or Independent, he left England, and went to Amsterdam, where he gathered a congregation; but on account of some difference with his people, he left them, and went to Ireland, but returned again to Amsterdam when the violence of party zeal was a little cooled. He is said to have been poisoned by a Jew, who had lost a diamond of great value, which was found by Ainsworth, and when the Jew offered him any reward, he only requested to have a conference with some of the rabbins on the prophecies of the Old Testament, respecting the Messiah. This the Jew promised him, but being unable to obtain the conference, he contrived to put Ainsworth out of the way. This story, however, it must be confessed, wears little appearance of probability. Ainsworth was well versed in the Hebrew, and his commentary on the Pentateuch is abundantly curious and valuable. Dr. Lightfoot is supposed to have been considerably indebted to our author's researches into the writings of the rabbins.—Biog. Br.

AINSWORTH (Robert), a learned lexicographer, was born at Woodyate, in Lancashire, in 1660, and educated at Bolton, in the same county, where he afterwards kept a school. From thence he removed to London, and carried on the same occupation many years with great reputation. He died in 1745, and was buried at Poplar. He printed "A short Treatise of Grammatical Inflection;" but he is best known by his "Dictionary, Latin and English," 4to. and 8vo. in the compilation of which he spent twenty years. The first edition appeared in 1736, and it has been since revised and published by Drs. Patrick and Morell.—Ibid.

A RAULT (Peter), lieutenant-criminal of Angiers; and was born there 1536. He published, 1. The Declamations of Quintilian, with Notes. 2. A Treatise upon the Power of Fathers, &c. He died in 1601, leaving ten children.—Moreri. Bayle.

AIRAULT (René), eldest son of the above, was born at Paris in 1567. His father placed him under the Jesuits, on condition that he should not be persuaded to enter into the society. This, however, they broke, nor could he get him out of their hands, on which he wrote his book on the Power of Fathers. The son died at La Fleche in 1644.—Ibid.

AIRAY (Henry), an English divine, was born in Westmoreland in 1560. He was fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, of which, in 1600, he was elected provost; and in 1606 he served the office of vice chancellor. He was a rigid calvinist, and wrote a few theological pieces. He died in 1616.—Wood A. O.

AIRAY (Christopher), a divine related to the above, was fellow of Queen's college, Oxford, and had the living of Milford, in Hampshire. In 1642 he took the degree of B.D. and died in 1678, aged 69. He wrote a few pieces in Latin and English.—Ibid.

AISTULPH or ASTOLPHUS, king of the Lombards, succeeded his brother Rachis in 750. He commenced his reign by making an inroad on the territories of the Romans. Pepin, king of France, besieged him in Pavia, and compelled him to restore all the places he had taken. But afterwards the Lombard violated the treaty, and again beset Rome with his army. Pepin once more entered Italy to the succour of the pope, and Aistulph retired to Pavia, where he was forced to sue for peace. He was killed in hunting, in 756.—Univ. Hist.

AIRTON (William) was born in 1731, near Hamilton, in the county of Lanark, and being bred to gardening, came in 1754 to London to seek employment. At the recommendation of Philip Miller, in 1759, he became superintendent of the botanical garden at Kew, which he greatly improved. In 1783 he was appointed to manage also the pleasure and kitchen gardens there. In 1789 he published his "Hortus Kewensis." He died in 1793, and was buried in the churchyard at Kew. The king appointed his son to succeed him in both his places.—Genl. Mag. May 1793.

AITZEMA (Leo), was born at Dorkum, in Friesland, in 1600. He was appointed by the Hanse Towns to be their resident at the Hague, where he died in 1669. He wrote a history of the United Provinces, in Dutch, in sixteen vols. 4to. of which a continuation down to 1692 was afterwards published.—Boyle.

AKAKIA (Martin), professor of physic at Paris, was a native of Chalons, in Champagne. He translated into Latin Galen de Ratione Curandi, and Ars Medica. He died in 1551.—Moreri.

AKAKIA (Martin), son of the former, was physician to Henry III. He wrote a treatise

Ulc De Morbus Mulieribus et Confilia Medica, to be published after his death, which happened in 1583. There are several other persons of the same name and family, who acquired reputation in different professions. Byrd. Moreri.

AKBAR, sultan of the Moguls, succeeded his father Hemayun in 1556. He regained Delhi from the Patans, and quelled several rebellions. He also made an expedition into Bengal, and conquered all the country. Next he invaded and obtained possession of Kashmir by treachery; took the kingdom of Scindi, and was preparing for further conquests when the attempt of his son Selim to dethrone him diverted his attention. Selim made his submission and was pardoned. Akbar died of poison, which he had prepared for another, and took by accident in 1605.—Mot. Univ. Hist.

AKENSIDE (Mark), an English poet and physician, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1721. When young he was lamed by the falling of a cleaver on his foot in the shop of his father, who was a butcher. It is remarkable, that he was always ashamed of this origin, though the limp in his gait was sufficient to keep him in constant remembrance of it. His parents being dissenters intended him for the ministry in that line, and at the age of eighteen he was sent to Edinburgh; but instead of divinity he studied physic. In 1741, he went to Leyden, where, in 1744, he took his degree of M. D. The same year appeared his "Pleasures of Imagination," a poem. In this piece he offended Warburton, by asserting in a note, Shaftsbury's notion, that ridicule is the test of truth. Warburton attacked him in a preface, and Akenfide was as warmly defended by his friend Mr. Dyson. In an "Epistle to the Rev. Mr. Warburton." In the next edition Dr. Akenfide left out the obnoxious note. As a physician he began to practise at Northampton. but meeting with little success, he removed to Hampstead, and Mr. Dyson generously allowed him 200*l.* a year till he could fix himself in practice. Having been admitted to his doctor's degree at Cambridge, he was elected a fellow of the college of physicians, one of the physicians of St. Thomas's Hospital, and physician to the queen. In 1764 he printed a discourse in Latin on the dysentery, and was in a fair way of attaining considerable eminence in his profession, when he was taken off by a putrid fever, June 23, 1770. His remains were interred in the church of St James, Westminster. The poem on the "Pleasures of Imagination" was published in an elegant form, with a classical preface, by Mrs. Barbauld, in 1795.—Biog. Br.

AKISA, a Jewish rabbi, who was at first a shepherd, but at the age of forty devoted himself to learning, and became a preceptor, in the first century. He joined Barchobas, for which, with his son Pappus, he was flayed alive by the Romans, A. D. 136! He was one of the first compilers of the cabalistic traditions of the Jews.—Moreri.

ALABASTER (William), an English divine, was born at Hadleigh, in Suffolk, and educated in Trinity college, Cambridge. He accompanied the earl of Essex to Cadiz, where he turned papist; but on his return to England again embraced protestantism, and had some church preferment. He applied to the study of the Hebrew language, and became enthusiastically fond of the Cabala. On taking his doctor's degree, he preached a mystical sermon from 1 Chron. ch. i. ver. 1. Adam, Seth, Enosh. He was the author of a Latin tragedy called Roxana, acted at Cambridge by the students, on which occasion a remarkable accident happened: a lady hearing the words sequar, sequar, pronounced in a terrible manner, was so affected as to lose her senses. Alabaster was also the author of a Lexicon Pentaglotton, folio, 1637. He died in 1640.—Fuller's Worthies.

ALAIN (John), a Danish author, was born in 1569, and died in 1630. He wrote "On the Origin of the Cimbric," and other treatises.—Moreri.

ALAIN (De l'Isle), surnamed the universal doctor, was a divine of great renown in the university of Paris, in the thirteenth century; he died 1294; his works were printed in 1653, folio.—Ibid.

ALAIN (Nicholas), a French dramatic author at the beginning of the eighteenth century. His performances are only some trifling comedies.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ALAIN (Chartier), a French writer, flourished at the beginning of the fourteenth century. He wrote several pieces; the most esteemed of which is his "Chronicle of Charles VII." to whom he was secretary.—Ibid.

ALAMANNI (Lewis), born at Florence 1495, of a noble family. He conspired against Julius de Medici, on account of which he was obliged to quit Florence; but when Charles V. took Rome, and gave the Florentines opportunity of restoring their liberty, Alamanni returned to his own country, and was employed in public affairs, till the re establishment of the Medici family obliged him to leave Florence once more. He finally settled in France, and was in favour with Francis I. who in 1544 sent him ambassador to the Imperial court. He died at Amboise in 1556. He wrote many beautiful poems in the Italian language. His son Baptiste became almoner to queen Catherine of France, and successively bishop of Bazar and Maion. He died in 1581. A collection of his letters is extant, but in MS.—Moreri.

ALAMOS (Balthazar), was born at Medina del Campo, in Castile, and educated at Salamanca. He entered into the service of Anthony Perez, secretary of state to Philip II. and when that minister fell into disgrace Alamos was committed to prison, where he lay eleven years. On the accession of Philip II. he obtained his liberty, and was employed by the duke of Olivarez. After going through several important stations, he died in the eighty-eighth year of his age. He translated Tacitus into Spanish, and left other works.—Moreri. Bayes.

ALAN, ALLEN, or ALLEYN, (William), a Roman cardinal, was born at Rossal, in Lancashire, in 1532, and educated at Oriel college, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1550. In 1556 he was chosen principal of St. Mary-hall. In 1558 he became canon of York, but on the accession of queen Elizabeth he went to Lorraine, and was appointed head of the English college. Here he wrote several treatises in defence of the Romish church; and his reputation stood so high as a controversialist, that he obtained several valuable preferments, but in his own country he was considered as a traitor, and one man was hanged for bringing over some of his books. In 1586 he published a defence of the pope's bull for excommunicating queen Elizabeth, to which he added an exhortation to her subjects to revolt against her in favour of the Spaniards. For this he obtained the archbishopric of Mechlin, with the dignity of a cardinal. He died at Rome in 1594.—Bigg. Br.

ALAN (of Lynn), so called from the place of his nativity; he lived in the sixteenth century, and became famous for his theological writings.—Ibid.

ALAND (Sir John Fortescue), an English Judge, was born in 1670, of the ancient family of Fortescue, in Devonshire; he took the name of Aland, in compliment to his lady, who was the eldest daughter of Henry Aland, esq. of Waterford, in Ireland. He was educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar about 1690. In 1714 he was appointed solicitor-general to the prince of Wales, and afterwards to the king. In 1717 he was made a baron of the Exchequer, and next year one of the justices of the court of King's-bench. On the accession of George II. he was removed from that situation, but for what cause does not appear. In 1728 he was constituted one of the justices of the Common Pleas, which he held till 1746, when he resigned his seat, and was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of baron Fortescue of Creden, and died soon after. He was an able lawyer, an impartial judge, and deeply versed in the Northern and Saxon literature. He published, in 1714, 8vo. his illustrious ancestor sir John Fortescue's treatise on "absolute and limited Monarchy." Since his death have been printed his reports. This judge was remarkable for a small flat nose; a serjeant who had lost an arm was one day arguing a cause in an awkward manner, on which the judge told him, that "he appeared to handle the cause rather *lame*ly."

To which the other replied, "If your lordship will give me patience, I trust to be able to make the case as plain as the nose in your lordship's face."—Gen. B. D.

ALANKAVA, the wife of Doujou, king of the Mogols, after whose death she took the reins of government into her own hands. She is said to have conceived miraculously, and to have brought forth three children, which story is universally believed among the Mogols and Tartars.—D'Herbels.

ALARD, a Romish divine, born at Amsterdam, and died at Louvain in 1541; he wrote a great number of theological pieces, now little known or regarded.—Moreri.

ALARIC I. king of the Visigoths, was descended from an illustrious family, and served honourably in the wars between the Goths and Romans till the year 332, when his countrymen submitted to the emperor Theodosius. He afterwards served in the imperial army, but being refused a chief command, he headed an army against Arcadius, at the instigation, it is said, of Rufinus. After ravaging several countries, he entered Greece, which he desolated with fire and sword; but while he was in the Peloponnesus he was encountered by the famous general Stilicho, and compelled to retire to the mountain Pholoë, in Arcadia, where he was in imminent danger of perishing; but taking advantage of the security of his adversary, he broke the barrier, and penetrated into Epirus. About this time he was acknowledged king of the Visigoths. In 400 he entered Italy, and carried away a vast quantity of plunder and several captives. Two years afterwards he entered that country again, but was opposed by Stilicho, and after a hard and doubtful battle lost his wife and children, who were taken prisoners. He then entered into a treaty, and retired across the Po. We next find Alaric employed as general in the service of Honorius; but he soon entered the Roman territory again, demanding a large sum as arrears which were due to him; this being refused, he pushed on to Rome, to which he laid siege, and the Romans, being driven to the greatest necessity, were glad to make peace with Alaric on his own terms. He then withdrew to Tuscany, where he waited the arrival of his brother Ataulphus with his troops. The emperor, to prevent this junction, collected his forces, and sent them to attack Ataulphus, which Alaric regarding as a commencement of hostilities, marched against Rome, and the emperor was again obliged to make peace with him; this however was soon broken, and Alaric returned to Rome, which he plundered in 410. After this he ravaged Italy, and embarked for Sicily, but a tempest obliged him to re-land his troops; he then took the city of Cosaenza, where he died.—Un. Hist.

ALARIC II. king of the Visigoths, ascended the throne in 484; he was slain in a battle which he fought with Clovis, king of France, near Poitiers, in 507.—Univ. Hist. Gibb.

ALASCO (John), uncle to the king of Poland, was at first a Roman catholic bishop, but having embraced the protestant religion, he came to England in the reign of Edward VI. and became pastor to a Dutch church in London. On the accession of Mary, he returned to his own country, where he died in 1560. He was a learned, moderate, and pious man, and greatly esteemed by the leading men among the reformers; particularly by Erasmus, whose library he purchased.—Strype's Cranmer. Fox's Ab. & Mon.

ALAVA (Diego Esquifiel), bishop of Cordova, in Spain, in the sixteenth century.—He was at the council of Trent, and wrote a book on "General Councils," and died in 1562.—Moreri.

ALBAN (St.), the proto-martyr of Britain, was born at Verulam, now St. Alban's, in the third century. He served in the Roman army, and on his return to Verulam, he became a convert to Christianity through one Amphilabus, a monk. He suffered death for his religion in the persecution under Dioclesian, A. D. 303.—Beke Hist. Eccl. Eng. Br.

ALBANI (Francis), an Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1578. His first master was Denys Calvert, who left him to the instructions of his pupil Guido, whom he accompanied to the school of the Caracci. Having finished his studies at Bologna, Albani went to Rome. His second wife was a very beautiful woman. She brought him several fine boys, and Albani painted pieces in which his wife and children served as models for Venus and Cupids. He was fond of representing the fair sex, and his compositions on love subjects are held in high esteem. He died in 1660. His brother and disciple, John Baptist, was an eminent historical and landscape painter. He died in 1668.—De Piles, vies des Peintres.

ALBANI (John Jerome), a civilian and cardinal, was born at Bergamo. He wrote some books in vindication of the papal power, and died in 1591.—Moreri.

ALBATEGNI, an Arabian astronomer, who lived in Mesopotamia about A. D. 912.—A book of his, on the knowledge of the stars and the obliquity of the zodiac, was printed at Nuremberg in 1537, 4to. and at Bologna in 1545.—D'Hérbelot. Moreri.

ALBERGATI CAPACELLI (the marquis Francis), a senator of Bologna, and accounted the greatest comic writer in Italy next to Goldoni, was born about the year 1730: according to his own confession he spent his early youth in every kind of dissipation, and did not betake himself to his studies in earnest before he had attained his 34th year. It was therefore an uncommon felicity of circumstances for him, that at forty he proved not only to be a first-rate dramatist, but such an excellent performer, as to deserve from his learned friends the flattering title of the Garrick of the Italian nobility. His works are perhaps unrivalled for wit, humour, facetious sallies, and knowledge of the world. A complete edition of them was published at Venice in 1783, in 12 vols. 8vo. He died in 1802.

ALBERGOTTI (Francis), an Italian civilian in the 14th century. He was the disciple of Baldi, and after exercising his profession as an advocate at Arezzo, removed to Florence, where he received the honours of nobility. His character was so great that he was distinguished with the title of the teacher of solid truth. He wrote Commentaries on the Digest, and other works. He died in 1376.—Moreri.

ALBERIC, or ALBERT, a French historian. He was canon of Aix, and not being able to go on the first crusade, he wrote its history from the year 1095 to 1120. It was printed at Helmstadt in 1584.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ALBERIC DE ROSATE, of Bergamo, a lawyer of the 14th century, who wrote Commentaries on the Decretals.—Mor.

ALBERONI (Julius), a Roman cardinal, was a gardener's son at Piacenza, where he was born in 1664. Having entered into orders, he became curate of a village near Parma, where he happened to relieve the secretary of the duke of Vendome, who had been robbed. The duke, some time after, entering with his army into Italy, found that the peasants had hid the corn. The secretary recollecting his old host, the curate, near whose village they were, spoke of him in such terms to the duke, that he sent for him. Alberoni not only did the French army essential service, by discovering the hoards of grain, but recommended himself to the duke in such a manner, that he took him to Madrid, where he got into the favour of the princess of Ursins, the favourite of Philip V. At her recommendation he was appointed agent for the duke of Parma to the Spanish court, and did great service to his sovereign, in getting a princess of Parma for the second wife to the king of Spain. Alberoni was presently made privy counsellor, then prime minister, and next a cardinal. While he was engaged in great projects for the Spanish nation, he was, through foreign influence, deprived of his posts, and banished to Rome. He died at Piacenza in 1752. The "Testament Politique," under his name, is generally allowed to be spurious.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ALBERT I. emperor and duke of Austria, was crowned in 1298, after defeating and slaying his competitor Adolphus of Nassau. He was assassinated in 1308, by his nephew John, son of the duke of Suabia, whose paternal estates he had seized.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

ALBERT II. emperor and duke of Austria, was born in 1304, and having married the daughter of Sigismund, emperor and king of Hungary, that monarch left him his dominions of Hungary and Bohemia. He died in 1439.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ALBERT, king of Sweden, was elected to the throne in 1563, by the disaffected nobles, who had deposed Magnus II. That monarch, aided by Norway and Denmark, endeavoured to regain his kingdom, but was defeated and taken prisoner by Albert, who afterwards fell into the same errors as his predecessor. The exasperated nobles applied to Margaret, queen of Denmark and Norway, who marched into the country, and took Albert and his son prisoners after a bloody battle. This was in 1597.—Albert was kept in confinement till 1594, when he recovered his liberty on condition of ceding Stockholm to Margaret. He attempted again to recover his crown, but failing, spent the remainder of his life in Mecklenburg, where he died in 1612.—Ibid.

ALBERT, archduke of Austria, was the sixth son of the emperor Maximilian II. and was born in 1559. Having embraced the ecclesiastical state, he obtained a cardinal's hat and the archbishopric of Toledo.—In 1584 he was made viceroy of Portugal, and his conduct gave so much satisfaction to his uncle Philip II. king of Spain, that he sent him into the Low Countries, the seven united provinces of which were then in a state of insurrection. Here, however, he had little success. In 1598 he married the daughter of king Philip, on which he renounced the ecclesiastical character.—In 1600 he was defeated by prince Maurice at Nieupoort; but the year following he laid siege to Ostend, the capture of which took him three years. At length he was obliged to make a truce with the Dutch for twelve years. He died in 1621.—Tbuanii Hist. Grotius de Bell. Moreri.

ALBERT, margrave of Brandenburg, grand master of the Teutonic order, and the first duke of Prussia, was born in 1490. He was elected grand-master in 1511, and entered into a war with Sigismund, king of Poland, in defence of the independency of that order. A peace was concluded at Cra-cow in 1525, by which it was stipulated that the grand master should possess Prussia as a fief of Poland. Not long after this Albert avowed himself a protestant, and married a princess of Denmark. For this he fell under the ban of the empire. He died in 1568.—Mod. Un. Hist. Memoirs of Brandenburg by the king of Prussia.

ALBERT, margrave of Brandenburg, called the Alibiades of Germany, born in 1522, was the son of Casimir, margrave of Culmbach, who, dying when he was an infant, left him in the care of his uncle. In 1541 he took possession of his hereditary estates. He took an active part in the disturbances of Germany during the reign of Charles V. against whom he joined in the confederacy formed by Maurice, elector of Saxony, and other princes. He committed many excesses in this war, burning towns, and levying heavy contributions wherever he marched. He was, however, admitted into favour with the emperor; but refusing to yield up what he had taken from the ecclesiastical estates, a league was formed against him, at the head of which was his old ally the elector of Saxony. A bloody battle was fought between these two princes in 1553, in which Maurice was slain and Albert wounded. He was afterwards put under the ban of the empire, and deprived of his possessions. He died in 1568. Albert was bold and generous; but arrogant, cruel, and intemperate.—Moreri. Robertson's Charles V.

ALBERT (Charles d'), duke of Luynes, was born in 1578. He was a favourite with Henry IV. who made him page to his son the dauphin, afterwards Louis XIII. Under this last monarch he rose to the highest honours, and procured the destruction of the marshal d'Ancre. After this he ruled the kingdom as he pleased; so that even his master was jealous and afraid of his power. He fomented the war with the huguenots, and in 1621 laid siege to Montauban, where he was seized with a fever which carried him off.—Moreri.

ALBERT (Jane d'), daughter of Margaret queen of Navarre, was married at the age of eleven to the duke of Cleves, which marriage was afterwards set aside by the pope. In 1548 she espoused Antony de Bourbon, duke of Vendome. In 1558 she was delivered of a son, who was afterwards Henry IV. of France. A curious anecdote occurred on this occasion. The king, her father, promised to put into her hands his will, on condition that during the pangs of childbirth she sung a Bearnoise song. To this she acceded, and when her father entered the chamber, she sang a noted song in the language of Bearn. The king after her delivery gave her a gold box containing his will, and at the same time threw round her neck a chain of gold. "These are for you, my daughter," said he, "but this is mine!" then taking the infant in his arms, and covering it with his gown, he carried it to his chamber. On the death of her father in 1555, she became queen of Navarre. In 1562 she lost her husband, when she set herself zealously to establish the reformation in her kingdom; though opposed by the kings of France and Spain. Being invited to the French court to assist at the nuptials of her son with Margaret of Valois, she expired suddenly, not without suspicion of poison, in 1572, in the forty-fourth year of her age. She left several compositions both in prose and verse.—Bayle.

ALBERT (Erasmus), a German divine, educated under Luther, is known as the author of a book entitled the Koran of the Cordeiers, ridiculing the impiety of the Franciscans, who compare the actions of Francis with Jesus Christ. This was printed in German, with a preface by Luther, in 1531, and in Latin in 1542. The last edition of it is that of Amsterdam, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1734. He died in 1551.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ALBERT (Joseph d'), of Luynes, prince of Grimberghen, died in 1758, aged 87.—He was ambassador from the emperor of Germany to the French court, and wrote 1. "Tumandre instruit par son Genie." 2. "Le Songe d'Alcibiade," 1759, 8vo.—Ibid.

ALBERT (Krantz), professor of divinity at Hamburg. He wrote the "History of Saxony, and of the Vandals," "A Chronicle from Charlemagne to 1504," &c. He died in 1517.—Vefs. de Hist. Lat.

ALBERT, of Stade, a benedictine monk, who wrote a Chronicle from the creation to 1256. He lived in the thirteenth century.—Moreri.

ALBERT, of Straßburg, who compiled "A Chronicle from 1270 to 1378." He lived in the fourteenth century.—Ibid.

ALBERTI (Aristotle), was born at Bologna, and flourished in the 16th century.—He is said to have removed a steeple to the distance of 35 paces. He went to Hungary, where he built various works, and obtained the title of chevalier.—Gen. B. D.

ALBERTI (Andrew). He wrote, in Latin, a book on perspective, printed at Nuremberg, 1678, folio.—Ibid.

ALBERTI (John), a German-lawyer, who abridged the Koran, with notes, for which he was knighted: he published in 1556 the New Testament in Syriac, of which the emperor kept 500, and the rest were sent to the East: he also wrote a Syriac grammar.—Moreri.

ALBERTI (Leander), a native of Bologna, was provincial of the Dominicans, and died in 1552. He wrote, 1. A History of illustrious Dominicans, folio. 2. A Description of Italy, 4to. 3. Various biographical Memoirs. 4. The History of Bologna.—Vossius de Hist. Lat. Moreri.

ALBERTI (Leoni Baptista), an eminent architect, who was employed by pope Nicholas V.: he wrote upon painting, sculpture, and architecture, and also on morality and arithmetic. He died in 1485.—Tirab. sciti.

ALBERTI (Cherubino), an eminent historical painter and engraver of Italy; died in 1615, aged 63.—Pilk.

ALBERTI (Giovanni), brother of the above, was born near Florence in 1558, and died in 1601. He excelled in perspective and in historical subjects.—Ibid.

ALBERTI (Dominico), an Italian musician, was a native of Venice. He came to London with the Spanish ambassador, and afterwards went to Rome, where he attained great eminence as a singer and a performer.

He excelled on the harpsichord, and invented a new style of playing on that instrument. In 1737, he set to music Metastasio's "Endimione," and published some other fine pieces of his composition.—Burney's High Music.

ALBERTINUS (Francis), an Italian Jesuit, who died in 1619. He wrote a system of theology, 2 vols. folio; and a book, in which he maintained that brutes have their guardian angels.—Allegambe de Script. Sac. Jes.

ALBERTINUS (Maffatus), an Italian in the ninth century, who wrote the history of the emperor Henry VII. and several poetical pieces. He died in 829.—Gen. B. D.

ALBERTUS, archbishop of Mentz, was born in Lorraine. He entered into a conspiracy against the emperor Henry V. for which he was imprisoned a short time. He died in 1137.—Moreri.

ALBERTUS (Magnus), a learned dominican, was born in Suabia. He became successively vicar-general and provincial of his order, and pope Alexander IV. made him master of the sacred palace, and bishop of Ratibon, which he soon afterwards resigned, and retired to his cell to enjoy his studies. His knowledge of nature was so great, that he was accounted a magician, and several ridiculous tales are told of him. He died at Cologne in 1280. His works, in twenty-one vols. folio, were printed at Lyons in 1615.—Moreri.

ALBI (Henry), a learned jesuit, born at Bolene, in Venailin, and died in 1659. He wrote the History of illustrious Cardinals, 1653, 4to.—Moreri.

ALBICUS, archbishop of Prague, who shewed great favour to Huss, and the other reformers, for which the Roman catholic writers have poured abuse upon his memory. He wrote some medical pieces, which were printed at Leipzig in 1484.—Spondanus.

ALBINOVANUS, a Latin poet. was contemporary with Ovid, and honoured by him with the title of divine. There is nothing of his extant but two elegies; which were printed at Amsterdam in 1703, 8vo.—Vossius de Poet. Lat.

ALBINUS (Decimus Clodius), was born at Adrumetum. He obtained the command in Britain, and was consul in 194, with Severus, who having hired assassins to murder him, Albinus in revenge assumed the title of emperor. The two rivals met in Gaul, and after a bloody engagement, the army of Albinus was defeated, and himself slain, A. D. 197.—Dion. Cassius. Herodian.

ALBINUS (A. Polthumius), a Roman historian. He was consul in the year 151 B. C. and wrote a history of Rome in Greek, which Cicero hath commended.—Vossius.

ALBINUS (Bernard), whose real name was Weiss, i. e. White. He was born at Dessau, and studied physic at Leyden, where he became professor in that faculty in 1702, after having discharged the same office at other places with great reputation. He wrote several valuable treatises on medicine, and died in 1721.—Moreri.

ADRIANUS (Bernard Sigfred), son of the above, was born 1683. He became professor of medicine at Leyden. His anatomical plates in 3 vols. folio, 1744, 1749, and 1753, prove him to have been one of the greatest anatomists that ever lived. He died in 1771. His younger brother, Christian Bernard, distinguished himself as medical professor at Utrecht.—Haller's Bib. An.

ALBINUS (Eleazar). Of this writer nothing more is known than that he published a natural history of birds, a French translation of which appeared at the Hague in 1750, 2 vols. 4to.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ALBINUS (Peter), professor of poetry and mathematics at Wittemberg, and secretary to the elector at Dresden. He published the Chronicles of Misnia in 1580, and other pieces.—Moreri.

ALBIZI, or ALBIZIS (Bartholomew), or Bartholomew of Pisa, a Franciscan monk. He wrote several books, the most noted of which is, that on the conformity of St. Francis with Jesus Christ, in which he makes the saint equal, if not superior, to the Saviour. He died in 1401.—Moreri.

ALBOIN, king of Lombardy, was the son of Audoin. On ascending the throne, he demanded Rosamond, the daughter of Ciri-mund, in marriage, and being refused, he commenced hostilities, and having slain Ciri-mund, converted his skull into a drinking cup. Rosamond also fell into his hands, and Alboin made her his wife. In 567 he conquered Italy, and removed the seat of his government to Pavia. But he did not long enjoy his possessions, for having sent some wine to Rosamond in her father's skull, she caused him to be assassinated in 573.—Univ. Hist.

ALBON (James d'), marquis of Fronsac, and marshal of St. Andre, a celebrated French nobleman, was made gentleman of the bedchamber by Henry II. in 1547. In 1550 he was deputed to bear the collar of his order to Henry VIII. of England, by whom he was invested with that of the garter. On his return he commanded at Champagne with great reputation, but at the battle of St. Quintin he was taken prisoner. On the death of Henry II. he was chosen one of the regency. He was killed at the battle of Dreux in 1562. The huguenots were wont to call him "the harquebuseer of the west." His daughter, it is said, was poisoned by her own mother for the sake of her property.—Moreri.

ALBORNOs (Giles Alvarez Carillo), archbishop of Toledo, was born in New Castile. On being raised to the dignity of cardinal he resigned the archbishopric. He was of a very bold spirit, and taking up arms in favour of pope Urban, he brought all Italy into subjection, and then retired to Viterbo, where he died in 1367. He founded the grand college at Barcelona.—Moreri.

ALBRICIUS, a philosopher and physician, who flourished about A. D. 1217, was born in London, and educated at Oxford. He wrote, Virtutes antiquorum; Canones Speculativi; De Origine Deorum.—Piss. Bale.

ALBUCASA, or ALBUCASIS, an Arabian physician in the 11th century. He composed many excellent works, and excelled in surgery, and describes many instruments and operations. Friend's Hist. Physic.

ALBUMAZAR, an Arabian physician and astronomer of the ninth century. His work, entitled, "De Magnis conjunctionibus, Annorum Revolutionibus, ac eorum perfectionibus," was printed at Venice in 1526, 8vo; and his Introductio ad Astronomiam in 1489.—Vossius de Mathem.

ALBUQUERQUE (Alphonso), a Portuguese commander, was sent, in 1505, with a squadron to India, by king Emanuel, who the same year dispatched another under Francis Albuquerque. Francis arrived first, and having restored the king of Cochín to his capital was joined by his brother. Here they built a fort, and compelled the Zamorin to sue for peace. The two brothers soon after failed for Portugal, where Alphonso arrived in safety, but the other was never heard of. In 1508 Alphonso subdued the king of Ormuz; but he was soon obliged to quit that place and return to India. Here in a rash attack on Calicut he was wounded, and compelled to retreat. In 1510 he took Goa, but was obliged to embark on account of a mutiny on board his fleet. He afterwards took the strong city of Malacca, and projected other enterprises, when he was taken ill, and died at Goa, December 16, 1515, aged 63. His son was ennobled by Emanuel, king of Portugal, who ordered him to take the name of Alphonso. He wrote memoirs of his father's transactions. He died in 1590.—Moreri.

ALBUQUERQUE CORREIO (Edward d'), a noble Portuguese, who distinguished himself as a soldier, and wrote a History of the Wars of Brazil, printed at Madrid in 1654, 4to. He died in 1658.—Moreri.

ALBUTIUS SILUS (Caius), a Roman orator in the time of Augustus, was a native of Novara, which he left on account of some insult he had received, and went to Rome, but returned to his native place in his old age, and there starved himself to death.—Suetonius de Clar. Rhetor.

ALBUTIUS (Titus), a Roman philosopher, and pro-prætor of Sardinia, who for corruption was banished by the senate. On account of his attachment to the Grecian language and customs he is ridiculed by Cicero. He died at Athens.—Bayle.

ALCÆUS, an ancient lyric poet, was born in the island of Lesbos, and flourished B. C. 604. The invention of lyric poetry is attributed to him, but only a few fragments of his writings have come down to us.—

Voss & Pet. Græc.

ALCASA (Louis d'), a jesuit, was born at Seville, 1554. He wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse, and other works, and died in 1613.—Boyle.

ALCABITIVS, an Arabian astrologer of the 12th century; he wrote "On the Judgement of the Stars," "the Conjunction of the Planets," and "Optics," printed at Venice in 1491, and at Seville in 1521.—Boyle. Voss.

ALCIBIUS, an Arabian astrologer and physician, some of whose works are extant; one of which, upon the art of magic, is full of superstition and absurdity. He lived about the twelfth century.—Moreri.

ALCIAT (Andrew), a famous lawyer, was born at Milan in 1492; he was chosen professor of law at Anjou, and in 1529 he removed to Bourges, to discharge the same office, at the desire of Francis I. The duke of Milan at last prevailed upon him to return to his native country, where he was created a senator; he died at Pavia in 1550; his most esteemed work is his Emblems. He left his fortune to Francis Alciat, who succeeded him in the professorship at Pavia, and acquired great eminence in his profession; he was made cardinal, and died at Rome, in 1580.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ALCIBIADES, the son of Clinias, an Athenian captain, was the disciple of Socrates, who took great pains to form his mind to the love of virtue, and accompanied him afterwards on some of his military expeditions. The distinguished rank of his family gave him considerable advantages, and the vivacity of his temper rendered him acceptable in all companies. This led him into numerous extravagancies, and a love of pleasure prevailed over the charms of philosophy, though he never totally forgot the lessons of his admirable tutor. He early entered upon a military life, and won several prizes at the Olympic games. During the Peloponnesian war, he was appointed to command with Lymachus under Nicias, in an expedition against Syracuse; but while he was thus employed, a charge was preferred against him at home of impiety and sacrilege. One morning all the hermæ, or half statues of Mercury, which abounded at Athens, were found defaced, and on a reward being offered for the discovery of the offenders, some slaves gave information that it was done by Alcibiades and his drunken companions. For this he was ordered home; but fearful of the consequences, he withdrew to Sparta, and stirred up the Lacedæmonians to declare war against Athens. He afterwards went over to the king of Persia, by whose interest he obtained his pardon and recall. He then commanded with success against the Lacedæmonians, whom he compelled to sue for peace, and was received at Athens in triumph. But his popularity did not last long:

the defeat of the Athenian fleet by Lysander, the Spartan commander, was attributed to the bad conduct of Alcibiades, who was deprived of his command. On this he retired into Thrace, and afterwards placed himself under the protection of Pharnabazus, the Persian governor of Phrygia; but the tyrants of Athens, dreading his spirit and talents, prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder him. Accordingly, the cottage in which he resided was set fire to in the night, and in his attempt to escape, he was slain, in the 46th year of his age, B. C. 404. It is related of Alcibiades, that while a young man he entered a school, and asked the schoolmaster for Homer's Iliad, and finding that he had it not, he gave him a box on the ear, saying, that the man who had not Homer was not a proper person to instruct youth.—Plutarch & Nepos in Vit. Alcib. Tburcydides. Xenophon.

ALCIDAMAS, a Greek rhetorician, who was the disciple of Gorgias, B. C. 492. There are two orations extant under his name; the first printed by Aldus in his edition of the Greek orators, 1518, and the second in the same printer's edition of Isocrates, 1518. Cicero notices a discourse of his in praise of death.—Fabric. Bibl. Græc.

ALCIMUS, surnamed JACHIM, high priest of the Jews, B. C. 163; he obtained that office from Antiochus Eupator, king of Syria, but rendered himself odious to his countrymen by his avarice and cruelty. He died two years after his election.—Josephus.

ALCIMUS (Latinus Alcimius Alethius), born at Agen in the fourth century; he wrote the history of Julian and of Sallust, the consul under that emperor, both which are lost. An epigram by him is in Maittaire's Corpus Poetarum, 1714.—Moreri.

ALCINOUS, a platonic philosopher of the second century, who wrote an "Introduction to the Philosophy of Plato," which has been translated into English by Stanley.—Fabric. Bibl. Græc.

ALCIPHRON, a Grecian philosopher, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great. There was a sophist of the same name, whose epistles give a curious picture of Grecian manners. They were printed by Bergler, at Leipzig, in 1715; and an English translation was published in 1791. Lucian is supposed to have imitated him.—Ibid.

ALCMAN, of Lacedæmon or Sardinia, one of the oldest Grecian writers, who flourished about 672 B. C. Some fragments of his poems remain in different authors. He is said to have been the first writer of amorous poetry. There was another of the same name, and a lyric poet, who flourished about 612 B. C.—Moreri.

ALCMÆON, a philosopher of Crotona, and the disciple of Pythagoras: he was the first writer on natural philosophy; but he held strange notions, particularly that the stars were animated beings.—Clement Alexand. Plutarch.

Atcock (John), an English prelate, was born at Beverley, in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge. He became dean of Westminster, and master of the rolls, and in 1471 was preferred to the see of Rochester, from whence he was translated to Worcester, and finally to Ely. Henry VII. made him lord president of Wales and chancellor of England. He endowed a school at Kingston upon Hull, built the hall at the palace in Ely, and founded Jesus college, Cambridge. He died in 1500, and was buried in the chapel which he built at Kingston-upon-Hull.—Biog. Br.

ALCUINUS (Albinus Flaccus), an English divine, was born in Yorkshire, and educated first by the venerable Bede, and then by Edwin, archbishop of York, who made him his librarian; he afterwards became abbot of Canterbury, and in 793 went to France, at the request of Charlemagne, who gave him several rich abbeys; he attended that prince to the council of Frankfort. He died in 804; his works were published in one volume, folio, at Paris, in 1617.—Pitfeus. Bale. Biog. Br.

ALCVNIUS (Peter), an Italian writer, who was corrector of the press to Aldus Manutius, and afterwards professor at Florence. He quitted that place to seek his fortune at Rome, where he perished during the troubles excited by the Columnas about 1527. He wrote some ingenious pieces in Latin, and among the rest, a treatise on banishment, which he is said to have taken from a MS. on glory by Cicero, found by him in a monastery, and which, after copying the above, he burnt.—Bayle.

ALDEBERT, or ADALBERT, a French impostor in the eighth century, who pretended to be inspired, and exercised the episcopal function without authority; he was condemned by a council at Rome, and thrown into prison, where he died.—Burtonius.

ALDEGRAEF (Albert), an eminent historical painter and engraver, was a native of Zouft, in Westphalia, where he died poor, about the middle of the sixteenth century.—De Piles.

ALDERETTE (Bernard and Joseph), two brothers of the society of Jesus, and natives of Malaga, who lived at the beginning of the seventeenth century. They are the authors of two learned works, entitled, 1. Origines Linguae Castellanicæ, 1606, 4to. 2. The Antiquities of Spain, 1614, 4to. They were so perfectly alike in person and voice as to be frequently mistaken for each other.—Moreri.

ALDHelm, or ADELM (St.), bishop of Sherborne, was born at Malmibury, and consecrated bishop at Rome, by Sergius I.; he is said to have been the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and the first who introduced poetry into England. The people were at that time almost barbarians, and paid little regard to sermons, on which Ald-helm used to entertain them with ballads of his own composing, in which he blended religious subjects with those of a lighter kind, and thus effected a considerable reformation. He died in 709.—Biog. Br.

ALDHUN, the founder of the see of Durham. In 990 he became bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, which place he left on account of its being infested by the Danes. Taking with him the body of St. Cuthbert, he went to Durham, where he built a church, and died in 1018.—Ibid.

ALDINI (Tobias), of Cesena, physician to cardinal Farnese; he wrote Descriptio Plantarum Horti Farnesiani, Romæ, 1525, folio.—Gen. Biog. Dist.

ALDRED, abbot of Tavistock and bishop of Worcester, was sent ambassador to the emperor of Germany, and in 1058 he took a journey to Jerusalem. On his return he was made archbishop of York, with leave to hold his former see; but the pope refused him the pallium unless he resigned the bishopric. On the death of Edward, in 1066, Aldred crowned his son Harold, and afterwards performed the same ceremony to William the Conqueror. He died in 1069.—Biog. Brit.

ALDRIC (St.), bishop of Mans; he held a distinguished station in the court of Charlemagne, and of Louis the debonnaire, which he renounced for the ecclesiastical state, and in 832 was made bishop of Mans. Lothaire expelled him from his see, but he was restored by Charles II. He convoked an assembly of bishops for the reformation of abuses in the church, and died in 856; he compiled a body of canons.—Moreri.

ALDRICH (Robert), an English prelate, was born at Burnham, in Buckinghamshire, educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards appointed provost of Eton. In 1534 he was made canon of Windsor, and register of the order of the garter. In 1537 he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle, and died in 1555. He wrote a few pieces, which shew his learning.—Biog. Br.

ALDRICH (Henry), a divine, was born in Westminster, 1647. From Westminster school he went to Christ church, Oxford, where he was elected student, and in 1669 took the degree of M. A. In 1681 he was installed canon of Christ church, and in the same year took the degree of D. D. He wrote, in the reign of James II. two able tracts, "On the Adoration of our Saviour in the Eucharist." At the Revolution he was made dean of Christ church, in which station he behaved in the most exemplary manner, and every year published a Greek classic, or part of one, by way of present to the students of the college. He was one of the persons entrusted with the publication of lord Clarendon's history: he had a great knowledge of architecture and music, as appears by Peckwater-square, in Oxford, the chapel of Trinity college, and the church of

All sorts, designed by him; and the numerous church services and anthems which he composed. The dean was also the composer of two catches, viz. "Hark the bonny Christ Church Bells," and the other, "A smoking Catch." He held the rectory of Wem, in Shropshire, and in the convocation of 1702 he sat as prolocutor. He died at Christ church in 1710. Besides the above works he printed "Artis Logicæ Compendium," and the Elements of Architecture, in Latin. Bay. Brit.

ALCKINGER, general of the empire. He was of mean extraction in Luxembourg, and was a servant to some young students at Paris, where he profited by his situation, and acquired a respectable knowledge of the languages and sciences. He then went into Italy, and had a place under the cardinal Madracchi; but being deprived of it, he returned to Germany, and entered into the army as a common soldier. He quickly raised himself to the rank of captain; and passing through diverse gradations, was made a field marshal, and was also employed as ambassador. He distinguished himself on many occasions as a brave and skilful commander, but his avarice and cruelty were extreme. He was slain near Landshut in 1634.—Moreri.

ALDRUDE, countess of Bertinoro, in Romagna, is celebrated for her beauty and magnanimity. In conjunction with William degli Adelardi, a citizen of Ferrara, she compelled the Venetians and Imperialists to raise the siege of Ancona. The rising consequence of that port having excited the jealousy of the Venetians and the Emperor Frederic I. they united their forces and laid siege to it in 1172. The citizens made a brave resistance, but being closely pressed by land and sea, they were driven to extreme exigency for want of provisions. In this distress they applied to William degli Adelardi and the Countess Bertinoro, who assembled their vassals, and marched to the relief of the Anconians. Aldrude, by her presence and exhortations, inspired the troops with courage, and on their arrival, the besiegers fled in confusion. Aldrude on her return encountered several parties of the enemy, and came off victorious in every action. William, having disbanded his troops, went to Constantinople, where he was received by the emperor with distinguished honours.—Dict. Hist. des Femmes célèbres.

ALDUS, see MANUTIUS.

ALEXANDER (Jerome), a Roman cardinal, was born in 1480; he taught the belles lettres at Paris, and afterwards entered into the service of pope Leo X. who sent him nuncio to Germany in 1515, and next year appointed him librarian of the Vatican. In the diet of Worms he displayed great eloquence against Luther, and procured his books to be burnt, and his person proscribed. Clement VII. made him archbishop of Brindisi, and sent him nuncio to France.

He went again in the same capacity to Germany in 1531, where he endeavoured, but in vain to hinder Charles V. from making a truce with the protestants. In 1536 he was made a cardinal by Paul III. He died in 1542.—Bayle.

ALEXANDER (Jerome), nephew of the above, was born in the principality of Priuli; he was first secretary to cardinal Octavio Bandini, and lastly to cardinal Barberini. He died of excessive eating in 1631. He wrote some pieces on antiquarian subjects.—Ibid.

ALEGAMBE (Philip), a jesuit, was born at Brussels in 1592; he took the religious habit in Sicily, and afterwards became professor of philosophy and divinity at Gratz, in Austria. In 1639 he went to Rome, and was retained there by the general of his order as secretary for Germany, and president of spiritual affairs. He died in 1652. His works are but few, and relate to the history of his order.—Bayle.

ALEGRINUS (John), cardinal and patriarch of Constantinople, was born at Abbeville, in Picardy; he went as legate to Spain and Portugal, and died in 1240.

ALEMAN (Lewis), a Roman cardinal, was born in 1390. In 1422, being archbishop of Arles, he was sent legate to Siena by pope Martin V. to procure the removal of the council of Pavia to that city; and the same pontiff made him cardinal. He was afterwards president of the council of Basil, in which he opposed Eugenius IV. who excommunicated him. Nicholas V. restored him to his dignities, and sent him as legate into Germany. He died in 1450, and was afterwards canonized.—Moreri.

ALEMAN (Lewis Augustine), a lawyer of Grenoble, born in 1653; he published, in 1690, the posthumous remarks of Vaugelas, with a preface and notes of his own; he also wrote the Journal Historique de l'Europe, and some other works.—Ibid.

ALEMBERT (John Le Rond d'), a French philosopher, was born at Paris in 1717; he had the name of J. Le Rond, from the church near which he was exposed as a foundling, and being discovered by the overseer of the district he was put out to nurse. His father hearing of his situation was touched with parental feeling, and took care of his education and maintenance; he was placed in the college of Mazarin, where he composed a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which the Jansenists beheld with astonishment and delight. They then engaged him in the study of the mathematics, in which he made a surprising progress. On leaving the college he went to live with his nurse, with whom he resided forty years, contented with the little fortune which had been left him. His friends advised him to better his condition by studying the law, with which he complied, and took his degrees in that faculty, but soon abandoned this profession, and applied to the study of physic. This also he relinquished, and gave himself up entirely to mathematics. In 1741 he was elected into the academy of sciences, and two years afterwards published his treatise on dynamics. In 1746 he obtained the prize-medal from the academy at Berlin, for a discourse on the theory of winds. In 1749 he solved the problem of the precession of the equinoxes, ascertained its quantity, and explained the rotation of the terrestrial axis. In 1752 he published an essay on the resistance of fluids, and soon after obtained a pension from the king. He next engaged with Diderot in compiling the celebrated Encyclopédie, for which he wrote the preliminary discourse. While engaged on mathematical subjects his name was not much known, but now he became celebrated by works of an historical and miscellaneous nature, such as his "Philosophical, Historical, and Philological Miscellanies," "The Memoirs of Christina, queen of Sweden," and his "Elements of Philosophy." The king of Prussia offered him the office of president of his academy, and the empress of Russia courted him into her dominions as tutor to the grand duke, but Alembert refused both these flattering offers. In 1765 he published his dissertation on the destruction of the Jesuits. He also published 9 vols. of memoirs and miscellaneous pieces, and the elements of music.—In 1772 he was elected secretary to the French academy, and wrote the history of seventy of its members, who died between 1700 and 1771. He died in 1783.—D'Alembert, with all his affected moderation and candour, was a bigoted enemy to christianity, and projected with more art than honesty the Encyclopédie as a means of rooting out, if possible, that religion from among men. In this design he was supported by the talents and influence of Voltaire, Diderot, Condorcet, the king of Prussia, and other infidels. Unhappily their efforts had too much success in France, as the history of that unhappy country will evince to the latest generation.—New. Dict. Hist. Hutton's Mar. Dict. Barruel's Memoirs of Jacobinism.

ALEN (John Van), an eminent Dutch painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1651, and died 1698. He painted landscape, birds, and still life.—Houbraken.

ALENIO (Julius), a Venetian Jesuit. He propagated Christianity in China with great success thirty-six years, and died in 1649. He wrote several books on religious and mathematical subjects in the Chinese language.—Maeri.

ALEOTTI (Jean Baptist), an eminent architect, was at first a common labourer, but applied with great diligence to the study of geometry and architecture, in which sciences he wrote several books. He died in 1630.—Ibid.

ALES, or HALES (Alexander d'), a learned Englishman, who taught philosophy and divinity at Paris, and died there in 1245.—

He was called the Irrefragable Doctor.—Pispen. Dupin.

ALES (Alexander), a Scotch divine, born at Edinburgh in 1500. From being a zealous catholic he became as zealous a protestant. In 1535 he visited England, and was greatly esteemed by archbishop Cranmer, but soon after went to Germany, and was successively professor of divinity at Frankfurt and Leipzig. He died in 1565. He wrote several books on theological subjects, particularly on the necessity of good works to justification.—Bayle.

ALESSO (Matthew Perez d'), an eminent painter and engraver, was born at Rome, and died in 1600. His most celebrated performance is the figure of St. Christopher, painted in fresco in the great church of Seville. The calf of each leg is an ell in thickness, and all the other parts are in proportion.—New. Dict. Hist.

ALESSI (Galeas), a famous architect, was born at Perugia in 1500. Various places are adorned with buildings of his construction; but he acquired the greatest reputation by his plan of the monastery and church of the Escorial. He died in 1572.—Ibid.

ALETINO (Benedetto), the fictitious name of a professor of philosophy in the Jesuit's college at Naples, who printed, in 1688, 4 vols. with a view of overthrowing cartesianism, and establishing the system of Aristotle. He died in 1719.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, was the son of Philip, king of Macedon, and born at Pella, B. C. 355, the same year in which the famed temple of Diana at Ephesus was destroyed, a circumstance which was considered afterwards as ominous of his character. He had great advantages in his education, being placed first under Lyſimachus, and afterwards under Aristotle, who appears to have taken uncommon pains with so illustrious a pupil. When young he discovered numerous evidences of his restless and ambitious spirit.—Being told that Philip had gained a great victory, he seemed dissatisfied, and said, that if "his father went on at that rate, he would leave him nothing to achieve." At another time when his father expressed his surprize that he did not engage in the Olympic games, he replied, "give me kings to encounter, and I will enter immediately." At a very early age, he succeeded in breaking in his famous horse Bucephalus, which no one else had been able to manage. When Philip had repudiated Olympias the mother of Alexander, and taken another wife, he gave a public entertainment, during which one of the courtiers, to please the king, observed, that the gods should be supplicated to grant him a lawful heir.—Alexander fired at this, threw a goblet at his head, and exclaimed, "do you dare call me a bastard?" Philip in a rage instantly drew his sword and rushed towards Alexander, but being in liquor fell on the later: on which the youth sarcastically said to the company, "See what a general you have got, who cannot take a step without talking." The king was then about to march against Persia, but was assassinated soon after. Alexander on his father's death ascended the throne, and though some of the Grecian states endeavoured to shake off the Macedonian yoke, the young king soon quelled the design, and was acknowledged general of Greece. He then marched into Thrace, and gained several petty conquests.

 During his absence, Thebes revolted, on the intelligence of which Alexander returned into Greece, took that city by storm, and made a dreadful carnage of the inhabitants.
 On this occasion he destroyed all the buildings except the residence of Pindar the poet.
 This severe example had its effect on the other states, and even Athens, which was the most impatient under the domination of Macedon, distinguished itself by a servile submission to the conqueror. He next turned his arms against Darius Codomannus king of Persia, and in his 22d year crossed the Hellespont, with an army of less than 40,000 men. With this small force he defeated the Persians at the Granicus, with a prodigious slaughter, after which he made himself master of numerous important places. At Gordium, where he assembled his army, he is said to have cut the famous knot on which the fate of Asia was predicted to depend. While he was in Cilicia he fell into a dangerous fever, owing to his imprudently bathing in the river Cydnus when very hot. In this state he received a letter from Parmenio, intimating his suspicions that his physician Philip had been bribed to poison him. When Philip attended with a strong medicine, Alexander took it, and giving him the letter to read, drank off the potion. On his recovery from this illness, he liberally rewarded the physician for his integrity and skill.

Shortly after this he defeated Darius near Issus, took a vast quantity of treasure and a number of prisoners, among whom were the mother, wife, and children of the king of Persia, who had himself fled before the battle was over. The generous conduct of Alexander to these princesses forms the most brilliant action of his life. This victory was followed by the conquest of Phœnicia, Damascus, and other places. The siege of Tyre, however, took him seven months and in revenge he committed horrible cruelties on the inhabitants. He next marched to Jerusalem, where he was met by the high-priest dressed in his sacerdotal vestments. On seeing this venerable personage, the hero bowed to the ground with such reverence as excited the astonishment of Parmenio who attended him; when Alexander informed him, that a person of this description had appeared to him in a dream in Macedonia, and promised him success in his expedition. The high priest then presented to the monarch the prophecy of Daniel, in which it was foretold that a Grecian prince should destroy the Persian empire: in consequence of this, the monarch manifested his veneration for the temple, and having bestowed liberal presents on the Jews, passed into Egypt, which country he completely subdued. While there he founded the city of Alexandria, and consulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, the priests of which flattered his vanity by asserting that he was the son of that deity. Darius having collected a considerable army, resolved to make another struggle for his dominions; but was again defeated at Arbela, and the fate of Asia was decided. This battle was followed by the taking of Susa and Persepolis. The last city he caused to be burnt, at the instigation of the harlot Thais. While he was pursuing Darius he received intelligence of his having been slain by Belus, which greatly affected Alexander, who caused the murderer to be put to death. Every new conquest only served to encrease his ambition; and being told there were other worlds besides this, he is said to have wept, because he could not be master of them. At length he crossed the river Indus, on the banks of which he was opposed by Porus, an Indian prince, with a numerous army, in which were several elephants. The wonted fortune of the Macedonians prevailed, but Alexander was so pleased with the gallantry of Porus, that he restored him his kingdom, and entered into an alliance with him. After ranging India he returned to Babylon, which city he intended greatly to improve, when he was taken off by a fever in the 33d year of his age, B. C. 323. He had four wives, Barsine the daughter of Artabazes, Roxana a Persian princess, by whom he left a son of his own name who was assassinated with his mother by Cassander, Parisatis daughter of Artaxerxes Ochus, and Statira daughter of Darius Codomannus. By his own directions his body was carried to Alexandria, where Ptolemy Lagus deposited it in a gold coffin, which one of his successors changed for a glass one. Having appointed no successor, his generals divided his conquests among themselves.—The character of Alexander, as appears from his actions, was made up of very great and very bad qualities. He committed many odious cruelties; and he drank to a shameful excess. In one of his drunken fits he stabbed his most intimate friend Clytus with his own hand. Yet he often performed deeds that indicated a benevolent mind; and though he was pleased with the fulsome ascription of divinity, on other occasions he expressed his abhorrence of adulation and flattery. He had a taste for learning and the fine arts, and had always about him men of science, philosophers, and poets.—Plutarch. Nepos. Diod. Siculus. Q. Curtius. Arrian. J. J. G.

ALEXANDER (Balas), an impostor, who was employed by the Romans to personate the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, in order to take possession of that kingdom. He defeated Demetrius Soter the lawful heir, but that prince, with the aid of Ptolemy king of Egypt, afterwards gained a victory over the usurper, who fled into Arabia, where he was slain, B. C. 146.—Justin.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS, a Roman emperor, was a Phœnician by birth. His father, Genesius Marcianus, had been consul, and his mother was related to the emperor Heliogabalus; but though her family were notoriously vicious, she was distinguished by the purity of her manners, and is supposed to have been favourable to Christianity. From such a parent he could not but derive good instructions, which enabled him to resist the temptations held out in the odious court of his relations. His virtue excited the hatred of Heliogabalus, who attempted his life; which so enraged the Prætorian guards, that they put the emperor to death, and raised Alexander to the throne in the 17th year of his age. Not long afterwards he was engaged in a war with the Persians, over whom he gained a great victory in person, and on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph. He next marched against the Germans, who had made an incursion into Gaul, but while there a sedition broke out in his army, at the head of which was a Thracian named Maximin. In this mutiny the emperor and his mother were murdered A. D. 235, after he had reigned thirteen years. Alexander possessed many excellent qualities; he was pious, temperate, frugal, humane, and a great encourager of literature. He was also friendly to the Christians, and is said to have had the image of Jesus Christ in his private chapel.—Univ. Hist. Gibbon.

ALEXANDER JANNEUS, king of the Jews, was the son of Hircan, and succeeded his brother Aristobulus, B. C. 106. Aristobulus had cast him into prison, from whence he was taken at his death and placed on the throne. He began his reign by murdering one of his brothers; and had a long war with Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Egypt. His cruelties irritated his subjects, and produced a civil war, which lasted six years. Alexander, however, proved successful; and in one day caused eight hundred captives to be crucified, after their wives and children had been murdered before their eyes. Having thus secured the throne, he carried his victorious arms into foreign countries, and made several important conquests. He died of intemperance, in his camp, B. C. 79.—Josephus.

ALEXANDER II. was the son of Aristobulus the second king of the Jews. He was sent prisoner to Rome by Pompey, with his father, brother Antigonus, and two sisters.—On being delivered from prison, and going into Judea, he raised an army, and opposed Hircan the brother of Aristobulus, but was defeated by Gabinus the Roman general, A. M. 3979, and sent to Rome. Cæsar afterwards restored him to liberty, with the hope that he would be serviceable to him in Syria; but he again turned against the Romans, and with the same bad success. Scipio caused him to be put to death at Antioch, by order of Pompey, B. C. 49.—Josephus.

ALEXANDER, king of Poland. He was chosen on the death of his brother, John Albert, in 1501, and died in 1506, aged 45. He was a courageous, humane, and liberal prince.—Un. Hist.

ALEXANDER I. king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Edgar, in 1107. Before his accession he was remarkable for his seeming piety and humility, but afterwards he was as distinguished for his fiery disposition, on which account he was called the Fierce. He was very rigorous in the administration of justice, on which account several insurrections took place, all of which he defeated, and died in 1124.—Buchanan.

ALEXANDER II. king of Scotland, succeeded his father, William the Lion, in 1214, at the age of sixteen. He had a long and destructive war with John, king of England, who invaded his dominions, but he retaliated severely, by marching into England, where he committed great disorders. In 1221 he married the sister of Henry III. of England, in consequence of which peace was restored between the two kingdoms. He died in 1249.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER III. king of Scotland, was the son of the preceding by his second wife, and came to the crown at the age of eight years. Soon after he was married to Margaret, daughter to Henry III. of England, whom he assisted against the English barons. He also defeated the king of Norway, who had invaded Scotland with a large army. He was killed in hunting, in 1285, leaving the character of a great and good prince.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER, bishop of Hierapolis in the 5th century. He espoused the doctrine of Nestorius, that there were two different natures in Christ, which he supported in the council of Ephesus. He died in exile.—Cave.

ALEXANDER I. bishop of Rome, was a Roman by birth, and succeeded Evaristus in 109. He stands as a martyr and saint in the Roman calendar. He died in 129.—Platina attributes the introduction of holy water to this pope.

ALEXANDER II. pope, was raised to the papal see in 1061. The imperial party opposed his election, and in a council held at Basil procured Cadalous, bishop of Parma, to be elected pope by the name of Honorius II. After a strong contest the party of Alexander prevailed, and all Europe acknowledged him pope. He carried the papal power to a great height, and most of the sovereign princes yielded to his authority. He died in 1073.—Platina and Bower's Lives of the Popes.

ALEXANDER III. succeeded Adrian VII. in 1159. The imperial party sided with his competitor Victor IV. but England and France acknowledged Alexander. On the death of Victor, in 1164, the emperor procured cardinal Guy to be elected pope, by the name of Paschal III. but Alexander being supported by the Roman clergy, deposed the emperor, and absolved his subjects from their allegiance. On this, Frederic marched to Rome, and having driven out Alexander, placed his rival in the pontifical chair. At length, grown weary of the contest, he acknowledged Alexander as legal pontiff, who enjoyed it to his death in 1181.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER IV. pope, was raised from the bishopric of Ostia to the papal throne, in 1254. He claimed a right to dispose of the crown of Sicily, but was unsuccessful. He died in 1261.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER V. pope. He was born in the Isle of Candia, of such poor parents, that in his childhood he was obliged to go about begging. An Italian monk taking a fancy to him, got him admitted among the friars minors. After studying at Paris he obtained the bishopric of Vicenza, and next the archbishopric of Milan. Pope Innocent VII. made him cardinal, and appointed him legate in Lombardy. On the deposition of Gregory XII. in 1409, the council of Pisa elected him pope. He died the year following at Bologna, not without suspicion of poison. He was a very liberal-minded and munificent pontiff.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER VI. pope, was born at Valencia, in Spain, 1431. His original name was Roderic Borgia, and his mother was sister to Calixtus III. by whom he was made cardinal in 1455. On the death of Innocent VII. he contrived by his intrigues to get himself elected by the conclave, though he had then four sons and a daughter by a Roman lady. His favourite son, Caesar Borgia, was a monster of wickedness like himself. There is hardly a crime of which these profligate wretches have not been accused, and it seems with justice. At length Providence punished them by the same means which they had prepared for the ruin of others. In 1503, the pope and his son attempted to poison a rich cardinal on account of his wealth, when, by a mistake of the butler, they drank the very wine which had been destined for their victim. The pope died almost directly, but Borgia recovered, and was killed some years after.—Gaucciardini. Gordon's Life of Alexander VI.

ALEXANDER VII. pope. His original name was Fabio Chigi, and he was born at Sienna, in 1599. After passing through a variety of offices with credit, he became a bishop and cardinal. On the death of Innocent X. in 1655, he was elected pope, owing to his affectation of extraordinary piety and humility. He published, in 1656, a famous bull against the Jansenists; yet, it is said, he was a liberal-minded prelate, and particularly favourable to the protestants. He was an eminent scholar, and an encourager of learning. He died in 1667.—Mereri.

ALEXANDER VIII. pope, was born at Venice, in 1610. He received several preferments from Urban VIII. Innocent X. created him a cardinal, and in 1689, the college raised him to the papal chair. He died in 1691.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER, an abbot in Sicily, who wrote the life and reign of Roger, king of that island, which was printed at Saragossa, in 1578. He lived in the 12th century.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ALEXANDER, bishop of Alexandria, was exemplary in his life, and apostolical in his doctrine. He opposed Arius; who was a priest of his church, and condemned his errors in a council. He was also at the council of Nice on the same occasion, and died about 325.—Cave.

ALEXANDER of Aegæa, a peripatetic philosopher, was the tutor of Nero, whom it is said he corrupted by his instructions. He wrote a commentary on Aristotle's Meteorology.—Suidas.

ALEXANDER (Aphrodiseus), a peripatetic philosopher in the 2d century. He was called the Commentator, on account of his clear explications of Aristotle's works. His book "De Fato" was printed at London in 1688, and his Commentaries on Aristotle were printed by Aldus, at Venice. Vossius de Philof.

ALEXANDER (Polyhistor), an historian, who lived about 80 B. C. He was the slave of Cornelius Lentulus, who became his pupil, and gave him his freedom. He was burnt to death in his house at Laurentum, and his wife was so affected with the accident, that she became frantic and hanged herself. He wrote five books concerning Rome; and various other works of his, in history and philosophy, are mentioned by Plutarch and others. Suidas says, that in one of his pieces he mentions a Hebrew woman named Mofo, who was the author of the Jewish laws. All his writings are lost.—Vossius de Hist. Græc.

ALEXANDER (St.), was born in Asia Minor, and quitted the court for a religious retirement. He founded the order of the Acemetes, because one of them was always to be on the watch to sing hymns. He died about 430.—Mereri.

ALEXANDER (Trallianus), a philosopher and physician of the 6th century. His works were printed at Paris in 1548, and at Lausanne in 1772, 2 vols. 8vo.—Friend's Hist. Physic.

ALEXANDER, bishop of Jerusalem in the third century, is celebrated for his piety and for his sufferings. He studied under Pantæus, and afterwards under St. Clement of Alexandria. Being made a bishop of Cappadocia, he was imprisoned in the persecution begun by Severus, and remained in confinement near eight years. On his release he was associated in the government of Jerusalem with the venerable Narcissus, who was then grown quite infirm. On the death of that prelate, at the age of more than 116, he became sole bishop; but in the reign of Decius he was again imprisoned, where he was cruelly used, and died in 251. He wrote many letters, which are lost; but Eusebius has preserved extracts of four. This holy bishop founded a library at Jerusalem, of which Jerome makes mention.—Eusebius. Dupin. Cave.

ALEXANDER of Lycopolis in Egypt, who was a zealous writer against the Manichean system. It is undecided whether he was a christian or a pagan. His work was published at Paris in 1672, folio.—Fabricius. Tillamont.

ALEXANDER, a Norman by birth, was made bishop of Lincoln in 1123. He rebuilt his cathedral, which had been burnt down, and enlarged the revenues of his see; he also built the castles of Banbury, Sleaford, and Newark, and founded two monasteries. He died in 1147.—Godwin de Præsul. Biog. Br.

ALEXANDER DE ST. ELPIDE, archbishop of Amalfi; he wrote a book on the vindication of the papal authority over the emperor, which was printed in 1624. He lived in the fourteenth century.—Moreri.

ALEXANDER of Paris, a French poet in the twelfth century; he wrote a poem on the life of Alexander the Great, in verses of twelve syllables, which measure has ever since been called Alexandrine.—Ibid.

ALEXANDER, an English abbot, who was sent by Henry III. to support the rights of the English nation at the court of Rome, which commission he discharged with such fidelity, that Pandolphus, the pope's legate in England, excommunicated him, and caused him to be imprisoned; he died about 1217. His works are Victoria à Proteo; de Ecclesia Potestate; de Potestate Vicariâ; de cessatione Papali, &c.—Baleus, Bibl. Brit. Piffaut de Scrip. Angl.

ALEXANDER (Neckham), an English writer, was born at St. Albans, and taught philosophy with reputation at Paris. On returning to his own country he was made abbot of Exeter. He died 1227. His works are still extant in public libraries.—Bale. Pitt.

ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO, an eminent lawyer, born at Naples in 1461. He renounced his profession, owing to the corrupt state in which the practice of it was at that time. He wrote a curious book entitled "Genialium Dierum," in the manner of Aulus Gellius's Attic Nights. He died about 1524.—Vossius. Boyle.

ALEXANDER (William), a Scotch statesman and poet, was born in 1580. He published his poem, entitled Aurora, in 1604; and in 1607, a collection of tragedies, in 4to. In 1613, he became gentleman usher to prince Charles, and received the honour of knighthood. In 1621, the king gave him a grant of Nova Scotia, which he intended to colonize, and Charles I. patronized the scheme by appointing him lieutenant of that country, and founding an order of knights-baronet in Scotland, each of whom was to contribute towards the settlement, and to have a portion for the same. The number of these baronets was limited to 150. Sir William afterwards sold Nova Scotia to the French, but the order still continues. In 1630, he was created viscount, and afterwards earl Stirling; he died in 1640. About three years before he died, his poetical works were collected and published in one volume, folio.—Biog. Br.

ALEXANDER (Noël), called in Latin Natalis, was born at Rouen, in Normandy, in 1639. He entered into the order of the Dominicans, and became a doctor of the Sorbonne. He published a church history, in 26 vols. 8vo. in Latin, and the history of the Old Testament, in 6 vols. 8vo. At the close of his life, he lost his sight, which he bore with great patience and piety. He died in 1724. He wrote many books besides those abovementioned.—Moreri.

ALEXANDER (Dom James), a benedictine monk, was born at Orleans, and died in 1734, aged 82. He wrote a treatise on clocks, printed in 1734, 8vo.—Gen. B. D.

ALEXANDER (Nicholas), a benedictine monk, was born at Paris, and died in 1728. He practised physic, and gave his fees to charitable uses. He published, 1. Physic and Surgery for the Poor, Paris, 1738, 12mo. 2. A Botanical and Pharmaceutical Dictionary, 8vo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ALEXANDER (Nevskoi), grand duke of Russia, and a saint of that church, was born in 1218. His father, Yaroslav, in 1227, removed his residence from Novgorod to Poryassk, leaving at the former place his two sons, Feodor and Alexander, as his representatives. Five years after, Feodor died, and Alexander became sole viceroy. About 1239, he married a princess of Polotzk, and began to strengthen his kingdom against the incursions of his neighbours, who drew to their interest Valdemar II. king of Denmark, with the Swedes and the Teutonic knights. Notwithstanding this combination, Alexander mustered his forces, and proceeded to engage the enemy. The battle began at six in the morning, and lasted the whole day, on the banks of the Neva, where he gained a complete victory. After his death, he was canonized, and Peter the Great erected a monastery on the spot where he gained his fame, in 1712, to which, in 1723, he caused the bones of the saint to be brought in great pomp. The empress Catherine built a superb church within the same monastery, with a magnificent mausoleum for herself and her descendants. The shrine of the saint is of massy silver. Peter the Great instituted the order of St. Alexander Nevskoi, but dying before he had named the knights, this was done by Catherine I. in 1725.—Coxe's Travels.

ALEXANDRINI DE NEUSTAIN (Julius), a native of Trent, was physician to Maximilian II. who conferred several honours on him. He died in 1590, aged 85. He wrote Salubrium, or de Sanitate tuenda; De Medicina et Medico; Annotationes in Galenum, &c.—Moreri.

ALEXIS, a Greek comic poet, and uncle to Menander, lived about 383 years before Christ. A few fragments of his works are extant.—Voss, de Poet. Græc.

ALEXIS of Piedmont, the author of "Medical Secrets," printed at Basil, in 1586, and translated into Latin, French, and English. He was of a noble family, and travelled fifty-seven years; but at the age of eighty-two being at Milan, and seeing a poor man expire through the unskilfulness of the surgeon, he was so struck with remorse for not interfering to save his life, that he became a hermit. When he died is unknown.—Moreri.

ALEXIS (Michaelovitch), the son of Michael, czar of Russia, ascended the throne in 1613, when he was only sixteen. His reign was disturbed by foreign and civil wars. Having quelled the insurgents, he entered into a war with Poland, in which he was successful, and thereby enlarged his dominions; but he was not so fortunate in a contest with the Swedes, who compelled him to retire within his own territories. He had also a long war with the Turks, and joined his forces with the Poles, under the famous John Sobieski, who gained a splendid victory in 1674. He died in 1677, aged 46. He was an upright but severe prince, and was the first who caused the laws of Russia to be printed. He also greatly encouraged the arts and sciences, paid particular attention to the interests of commerce, and, in short, laid the plans of those mighty projects which his son Peter the Great afterwards carried into execution.—M. d. U. H.

ALEXIUS or ALEXEI (Petrovitch), the son of Peter the Great, by Eudocia Lapukina, was born in 1690. When a child, he was committed to the care of the Russian priests, a set of beings the most contemptible, who instilled into him all their silly and barbarous prejudices. At the age of eleven, he was put under baron Huylen, by whose instructions he might have profited, had he not been taken from him by prince Menzikoff, who placed about him persons of the most improper description, whereby he became vitiated in his manners, fond of low company, and extremely addicted to drinking. Finding his associates violently set against his father's measures for the reformation of the people, he joined in their complaints, and openly avowed his intention of restoring the old state of things when he should come to the crown. On this account his ruin was determined upon; and after suffering several persecutions, he was obliged to sign his renunciation of the right of succession in 1716. Soon afterwards he escaped to Vienna, and put himself under the protection of Charles VI. who sent him first to Inspruck, in the Tyrolese, and then to the castle of St. Elmo, at Naples. He was betrayed at last by a Finnish girl, whom he had long kept, and under promise of forgiveness, was prevailed upon to return to Moscow, where he was thrown into prison, tried secretly, and condemned to death. The trial was afterwards printed by order of the emperor. The public manifesto asserts that he died of an apoplectic fit, but it is suspected by good writers that he was secretly put to death.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ALEXIUS I. (Comnenus), emperor of the east, was born at Constantinople, in 1048. On the deposition of Nicephorus, in 1081, he was chosen emperor by the troops. The greatest part of his reign was disturbed by wars with the Turks, Scythians, and other formidable powers. He died in 1118. He appears to have been a vigilant prince, well versed in the art of government, and attentive to the true interests of his people. He was the father of the celebrated Anna Comnena, who has drawn his character in the most flattering colours.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ALEXIUS II. (Comnenus), surnamed PORPHYROGENETUS, was the son of Michael Comnenus, whom he succeeded in 1180, under the care of the empress Mary, his mother. Her conduct gave great offence to the nobility, and at length an open insurrection ensued, headed by Andronicus Comnenus, who took Constantinople in 1183, imprisoned the empress, and compelled the young emperor to admit him as his associate in the empire. The year following, however, he caused Alexius to be strangled.—Ibid.

ALEXIUS III. (Angelus), emperor of the east; he deposed his brother Isaac, and threw him into a prison, where he was deprived of his sight. Alexius, the son of Isaac, escaped, and got the French and Venetians to espouse his cause. A large army came and besieged Constantinople in 1203, and the usurper fled with his treasure to Thrace. The people then released Isaac, and placed him on the throne. Alexius, after rambling from one place to another, fell into the hands of Theodore Lascaris, who put out his eyes, and confined him in a monastery, where he died.—Ibid.

ALEXIUS IV. was associated with his father Isaac in the government, on the flight of his uncle. He was deposed and put to death by the people in 1204, for endeavouring to raise heavy contributions to pay his allies, and to bring the eastern empire under the authority of the pope.—Ibid.

ALEXIUS V. (Ducas), also called Murtzuffe, from his black heavy eyebrows. On the murder of the last-mentioned emperor, he was raised to the throne; the Latins, however, laid siege to Constantinople, and pressed it so closely, that Murtzuffe was glad to escape by night. He was deprived of his eyes by his father-in-law, to whom he fled for refuge; and, after rambling about as a mendicant, he was seized by the Latins, who cast him from the top of Theodosius's pillar, 147 feet high, by which he was dashed to pieces.—Rel. Un. Hist.

ALEYN (Charles), an English poet, was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge, and became usher to Thomas Farnaby, in London; he afterwards was tutor to the son of Edward Sherburne, esq. and died in 1640. He wrote two poems on the battles of Cressy and Poitiers, and some other pieces.—Biog. Brit.

ALFENUS VARUS (Publius), a native of Cremona, who, from being a shoemaker, became an eminent advocate, and at length consul; he wrote forty books of digests, and some collections, cited by Aulus Gellius. Horace mentions him in his third satire, and Virgil speaks of his conduct towards him with gratitude. He is not to be confounded with another of the name, who was captain of the guards to the emperor Vitellius.—Moreri.

ALFORD (Michael), an English jesuit, was born in London in 1587; he studied in Spain and at Rome, and was sent by his society as a missionary to England, where he resided above thirty years. He died at St. Omer's in 1652. He wrote "Britannia Illustrata," and "Annales Ecclesiastici Britannorum," &c.—Moreri.

ALFRAGANUS, an Arabian astronomer, who lived about the year 850; he wrote an introduction to astronomy, which was printed by Golius, at Amsterdam, 1669.—Golius in Pref. ad Alfrag.

ALFRED OF AELFRÉD THE GREAT, the youngest son of Ethelwolf, king of the West Saxons, was born at Wantage, in Berkshire, in 849. At the age of five years he was sent to Rome, where the pope anointed him with the royal unction. Ethelwolf died in 858, leaving his dominions to Ethelbald and Ethelbert, and his personal estate to his younger sons, Ethelred and Alfred. Ethelbald did not long survive his father, and was succeeded by Ethelbert; but he dying in 866, left the throne to Ethelred, who made Alfred his prime minister and general of his armies. Ethelred dying in 871, Alfred found himself, at the age of 23, in possession of a distracted kingdom. After several actions with the Danes, his followers were so dispirited that he soon found himself unable to make head against the invaders, wherefore, laying aside the ensigns of royalty, he concealed himself in the cottage of one of his herdsmen. One day as he sat by the fireside trimming his bow and arrows, his hostess left in his care some cakes, which were placed on the hearth to be baked. Alfred, however, was so intent upon his employment as to suffer the cakes to be burned; and when the woman returned she scolded him heartily, saying, "he could eat the cakes fast enough, though he would not take the trouble of looking after them." He afterwards retired to the life of Athelney, in Somersetshire, with a few followers, and there received information that Odun, earl of Devon, had obtained a great victory over the Danes, in Devonshire, and had taken their magical standard. On this, Alfred is said to have disguised himself as a harper, and to enter the Danish camp, where his skill was so much admired that he remained a considerable time, and was admitted to play before the chiefs. Having thus gained an exact knowledge of the state of the enemy, he directed his nobles to collect their vassals, and to meet him at Selwood, in Wiltshire, which was done so secretly, that the Danes were surprised at Eddington, and completely defeated. Alfred behaved with great liberality on this occasion, giving up the kingdom of the East Angles to those of the Danes who embraced the Christian religion. Having now some respite, he put his kingdom into a state of defence, and increased his navy; and having recovered London from the Danes, he soon brought it into a flourishing state. After a rest of some years, an immense number of Danish forces landed in Kent; on which those who were settled in Northumberland broke their treaty, and fitting out two fleets sailed round the coast, and committed great ravages. They were, however, soon defeated by Alfred, who caused several of the pirates to be executed at Winchester as an example. Thus he secured the peace of his dominions, and struck terror into his enemies, after sixty-six battles by land and sea, in all of which he was personally engaged. But what makes him most an object of admiration, is his character as a reformer of laws and manners, and the promoter of learning. He composed a body of statutes, instituted the trial by jury, and divided the kingdom into shires and tithings. He was so exact in his government that robbery was unheard of, and valuable goods might be left on the high road without danger of being meddled with. He also formed a parliament, which met in London twice a year. The state of learning in his time was so low in England, that from the Thames to the Humber, as he says himself, hardly a man could be found who understood Latin. To remedy this evil, he invited learned men from all parts, and endowed schools throughout his kingdom; and if he was not the founder of the university of Oxford, certain it is, that he raised it to a reputation which it never enjoyed before; and among other acts of munificence to that eminent seat of learning, founded therein

University college. He was himself a learned prince, and composed several works, and translated others from the Latin, particularly Boetius's Consolations of Philosophy. He divided the twenty-four hours into three equal parts, one devoted to the service of God, another to public affairs, and the third to refreshment. To Alfred, also, England is indebted for the foundation of her naval establishment, and he was the first who sent out ships to make the discovery of a north-east passage. In private life he was benevolent, pious, cheerful, and affable; and his person was amiable, dignified, and engaging. He died in 901, aged fifty-three. By his queen Elfritha, Alfred had two sons and three daughters. He was succeeded by Edward his second son, commonly called Edward the Elder.—Biog. Br.

ALFRED OF ALURED, the son of Ethelred the Unready, by Emma, daughter of Richard I. duke of Normandy, born A. D. 1003. The ravages of the Danes induced his father to send him with his brother, afterwards Edward the Confessor, to Normandy, where they were educated. On the death of Canute he landed in England with a chosen band of Normans, and would have succeeded in dethroning Harold, surnamed Harfleur, if it had not been for the treachery of earl Godwin. Alfred was taken prisoner, and his eyes were put out; after which he was confined in the monastery at Ely, where he died, or rather was murdered, about 1037.—Biog. Br.

ALFRED, an English prelate in the tenth century, was a benedictine in the abbey of Malmesbury, of which he became abbot, and afterwards bishop of Exeter. He was esteemed the most learned man of his age, and wrote, 1. De Naturis Rerum. 2. The Life of Adelmus. 3. The History of the Abbey of Malmesbury.—Pitt.

ALFRED, surnamed the Philosopher, an Englishman of the 13th century, who was greatly esteemed at Rome, where he served the cardinal Ottoboni, whom he attended to England on his being appointed legate. He died about 1270. He left five books on the consolations of Boethius, four upon the meteors of Aristotle, and one upon vegetables.—Leland. Bale. Pitt.

ALFRIDE OF ELFRID, the illegitimate son of Oswy, king of Northumberland, on whose death he was violently persecuted by Egfrid his brother: and to avoid his violence he retired to Ireland, or, according to others, to Scotland, where he led a philosophical life. His brother, however, followed him with implacable malice, and waged war with those who granted him an asylum. In this contest Egfrid was slain, on which the Northumbrians elected Alfride to the vacant throne in 686. He greatly endeared himself to his subjects, and was a liberal encourager of literature, being himself a learned prince. He died in 705.—Bede Hist. Eccl. Biog. Br.

ALGOARDI (Alexander), a painter and sculptor of Bologna. He studied under Lewis Carracci, and died at Rome in 1645. There is in the church of St. Peter of the Vatican a fine bas-relief by him, representing St. Leo appearing before Attila; and at Bologna, a groupe of the beheading of St. Paul.—Moreri.

ALGAROTTI (Francis), a polite writer, was born at Padua in 1712. He received a liberal education, and then visited different countries; he was at Paris in 1733, where he composed his Newtonianism for the Ladies. After making a long stay in France he came to England, and then went to Germany. Frederic, king of Prussia, made him chevalier of the order of merit, created him a count, and appointed him his chamberlain. The king of Poland also highly esteemed him, and gave him the title of privy counsellor for the affairs of war. The count died at Pisa in 1764; his works were published in Italian at Leghorn, 1765, in 4 vols. 8vo. and afterwards translated into French, in 8 vols. 8vo. Algarotti was a man of lively but superficial genius, and though his writings shew a taste for the fine arts, they convey little information.—New. Dict. Hist.

ALGAZIL, an Arabian writer and hermit of the 12th century, was born at Thous, a city of Khôraflan. The work by which he is most known, is on the different branches of science that relate to religion.—Pacock's Specimen Hist. Arab.

ALHAZEN, an Arabian mathematician, flourished about 1100. He wrote a large treatise on optics, and other works.—Poissus de Mathem.

ALI, the cousin and son-in-law of Mohammed, whom he ought to have succeeded, but being successfully opposed by Omar and Othman, he raised a sect of his own, and gained many followers. On the death of Othman he was declared caliph in 655, but in 669 he was assassinated in a mosque. He had nine wives, by whom he had fourteen sons and eighteen daughters.—D'Herbelot.

ALI BEG, first dragoman or interpreter to the grand seignior, was born in Poland of christian parents, but being taken prisoner by the Tartars when a child, and sold to the Turks, he was brought up in the mahometan faith. He understood English, and translated the catechism of the church of England, and all the Bible, into the Turkish language. His greatest work is a book on the Liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, &c. which was translated into Latin by Dr. Thomas Smith. He was about to acknowledge the christian religion, when he was taken off by death in 1675.—Bayle.

ALI BEY, a celebrated adventurer, was born in Natolia in 1728. When young, he was taken by robbers, and conveyed to Grand Cairo, where he was bought by Ibrahim, lieutenant of the janisaries, who entered him among the mamelukes. For his gallantry against the Arabs he was created a bey. In 1758 his patron was murdered by the party of Ibrahim, the Circassian. In 1763 he attained the dignity of scheik ec-balad, which is the first in the republic, and soon after slew Ibrahim, to revenge the murder of his master. This raised against him such a host of enemies that he was obliged to fly to St. John d'Acre, where he was protected by the scheik Daher. In 1766 he was recalled by the people, and after taking vengeance of his enemies, he declared war against the Arabs, in which he was successful. Egypt now began to revive; agriculture flourished, and that rich country seemed to bid fair to recover its former splendour. In 1768 war broke out between the Turks and the Russians, and Ali sent 12,000 men to serve in the Ottoman army. His enemies reported at Constantinople that these troops were deluged to assist the Russians, in consequence of which a capigi, and four attendants, were sent to take off his head. Ali being informed of this, seized the messengers, and put them to death. The Egyptians then declared war against the Porte, and for a time preserved their independence, and obtained several conquests. At last his principal commanders revolted with their troops, and in a battle which took place between Ali and the malcontents, he was taken prisoner, and died of his wounds, April 21, 1773. His object was to restore the freedom and independence of Egypt; and had the people of that country possessed a similar spirit, the Turkish yoke would have been broken, and they again have occupied a place in the scale of nations.—Folney's Travels in Egypt.

ALIMENTUS (Cincius), a Roman historian, flourished about 150 years B. C. Livy gives him a great character, but none of his works are come down to us. He wrote the history of Hannibal, and of Gorgias of Leontium.—Voss. de Hist. Græc.

ALIPPIUS, bishop of Tagaste, in Africa, was the countryman and intimate friend of St. Augustine. Like him he was for a time a zealous Manichee, and accompanied him to Rome, where he studied the law, and had some considerable employments. On embracing the christian religion he was baptized at Milan by St. Ambrose on the same day with his friend Augustine. He afterwards went to Palestine, and contracted an intimacy with St. Jerome. On his return to Africa he was chosen bishop of Tagaste, in 394; he assisted at several councils, particularly that of Carthage, where he opposed the Donatists. He died in 430.—Augustin Conf. Dapin ALKMAAR (Henry d'), a German poet of the 15th century; he wrote a satire called the Fable of Reynard, which has been translated into several languages. It is however asserted by credible authors, that Alkmaar is only a fictitious name assumed by Nicholas Baumann, a Frieslander, who died in 1503.—Newo. Diet. Hist.

ALLAINVAL (Leonor Soulas d'), a French abbe and poet, was born at Chartres; he wrote several comedies, and some operas, which were well received. He died of the palsy in the Hotel Dieu, at Paris, in 1753.—Ibid.

ALLAIS (Denys Vairaille d'), a French writer, was born at Allais, in Languedoc. In 1665 he served in the English navy under the duke of York, and on his return to France taught the English language. He wrote a French and English grammar, and a political romance, entitled "The History of Severambia," printed first in 1677, 2 vols. 12mo.—Ibid.

ALLAM (Andrew), an English divine, was born at Garlington, in Oxfordshire, in 1635; he was educated at Edmund-hall, of which he became vice-principal. He died in 1685. He published a translation of the life of Iphicrates, in 8vo. and assisted Wood in compiling his Athenæ Oxoniensis.—Biog. Br.

ALLARD (Guy), a voluminous French writer, who is principally known by numerous works upon the genealogical history of Dauphiny; he is also the author of a romance, entitled "The amorous History of Prince Zizim." He died in 1715.—Moreri.

ALLATIUS (Leo), was born in the isle of Scio in 1586; he was educated first at Calabria, and lastly at Rome, where he taught the belles lettres; he was appointed keeper of the Vatican library by Alexander VII. who once asked him, "why he did not enter into orders?" "Because," replied Allatius, "I would be at liberty to marry." "Well then," replied his holiness, "why don't you marry?" "Because," answered he, "I would be free to take orders." He published several MSS. some translations of Greek authors, and various pieces of his own, in which he is said to have shewn more learning than judgment. He died at Rome in 1649, aged 83.—Moreri.

ALLECTUS was prefect in Britain to the emperor Carausius, whom he murdered in 294, and seized the imperial crown. He was defeated and slain by the Roman general Asclepiodotus in 297.—Ibid.

ALLEGRAIN (Christopher Gabriel), an eminent French sculptor; his principal works are the figure of a young man, for which he was admitted into the academy, a Venus, and a Diana. His father and grandfather were both members of the academy of painting; his manners were simple, and his temper exceedingly modest. He died in 1795.—L'Encyc. Dict. Univ. 1803.

ALLEGRI, see CORREGGIO.

ALLEGRI (Gregorio), a celebrated musical composer; his compositions are still retained in the pontifical chapel. The chief is the "Miserere," which is always sung on Good Friday. Clement XIV. sent a magnificent copy of it to our present king in 1773. Allegri died in 1672.—Burney's Hist. Mus.

ALLEN (Richard), a nonconformist divine, was born in 1611, at Ditchet, in Somersetshire, of which place his father was rector. He was educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. and became curate to his father. In 1641 he obtained the living of Batcomb, in Somersetshire, and was made assistant to the commissioners for ejecting scandalous ministers. At the restoration he was turned out for nonconformity; after which he settled at Frome Selwood, where he preached privately till his death, in 1681. His writings on practical divinity have been very useful.—Calamy's Account of ejected Ministers.

ALLEN (William), son of the above, took his degrees in arts in Corpus Christi college, Oxford, after which he settled at Blandford, in Dorsetshire; from whence he was ejected for nonconformity. He died in 1677. He wrote a curious book on the millennium, and some other theological works.—Calamy.

ALLEN (Joseph), a nonconformist minister, was born at Devizes, in Wiltshire, in 1633. He was first placed in Lincoln college, Oxford, from whence he removed, in 1651, to Corpus Christi college, where he took his degree of B. A. In 1655 he became curate to Mr. Newton minister of Taunton. In 1656 he was ejected for nonconformity, but continued to preach privately, for which he was twice imprisoned. He died at Bath in 1668. His book, entitled "An Alarm to unconvered Sinners," has gone through numerous editions.—Life by Baxter.

ALLEN (John), archbishop of Dublin, was educated in the university of Oxford, but took his degree of LL.B. at Cambridge. Archbishop Warham sent him on a commission to the pope, and he continued at Rome nine years. On his return he was appointed chaplain to Wolsey, and was judge of his court as legate à latere, in which office he committed many dishonest acts. In 1528 he was made archbishop of Dublin, and chancellor of Ireland. He was most cruelly murdered by Thomas Fitzgeraid, son of the earl of Kildare, in 1534.—Boag. Br.

ALLEN (Thomas), a divine, was born in 1573, and educated at the king's school, at Worcester, from whence he went to Brazenose college, Oxford. He was admitted probationer fellow of Merton in 1593, and soon after entered into orders. By the interest of sir Henry Saville he got a fellowship in Eton college. He was a laborious scholar, and wrote observations in Libellum Chrysostomi in Efsiam. He died in 1633.—Boag. Br.

ALLEN (Thomas), a mathematician, was born at Uttoxeter, in Staffordshire, in 1542; he was of Trinity college, Oxford, and took his degree of M. A. in 1567. In 1570 he removed to Gloucester-hall, where he devoted himself to the study of the mathematics. Robert, earl of Leicester, would have procured him a bishopric, but he declined the offer through his love of retirement and study. That nobleman placed so much confidence in his abilities as to consult him on affairs of state. He published in Latin the second and third books of Ptolemy, "On the Judgment of the Stars," with an exposition. He died in 1632.—Wood A. O.

ALLEN (sir Thomas), a brave English admiral; he was the first that entered upon hostilities against the Dutch in 1665, by attacking their Smyrna fleet. His squadron consisted only of eight ships; but what he wanted in force he supplied by skill and valour. He killed their commodore Brackel, took four rich merchantmen, and drove the rest into the bay of Cadiz. July 25, 1666, he entirely defeated the van of the Dutch fleet, and killed the three admirals of that division. It was in that memorable action that De Ruyter exclaimed, "My God, what a wretch am I! among so many thousand bullets, there is not one to put me out of pain!"—Granger's Br. G. H. p.

ALLESTRY or ALLESTREY (Richard), a divine, was born at Uppington, in Shropshire, in 1619. He became student of Christ church, Oxford, and in 1641 took up arms, with many other young men of the university, in favour of Charles I. After serving some time in a military capacity, he returned to his studies. When the parliament forces entered that city he narrowly escaped bad usage, owing to his being concerned in removing the treasury from Christ church. Soon after this he took up arms again, and was at the battle of Kenton-field. At the end of the war he entered in a holy order, and was chosen censor of his college, but when the parliamentary visitors came to Oxford, he withdrew, and became chaplain to Mr afterwards lord Newport, with whom he lived till after the fight at Worcester, when he was appointed by the royalists to wait on the king at Rouen. In 1659 he went to his majesty in Flanders, and on his return was seized at Dover, but found means to secure his dispatches; he was however kept prisoner about eight weeks in Lambeth-house. At the restoration he was made canon of Christ church, and served one of the lectureships of Oxford, the salary of which he gave to the poor. In 1660 he took the degree of D. D. became chaplain in ordinary to the king, and regius professor of divinity. In 1665 he was appointed provost of Eton. In 1673 he resigned the professorship, and died in January following. He was buried in the chapel of Eton college, where there is a monument to his memory.—Life prefixed to his Sermons, folio, 1684.

ALLESTRY (Jacob), nephew of the above, was the son of James Allestry, a London bookseller; he was educated at Westminster school, from whence, in 1671, he was sent to Christ church, Oxford, where, the year following, he was elected student. He took his degrees in arts, was music reader in

ALLEY (William), an English bishop, was born at Wycomb, in Buckinghamshire, and educated first at Eton, and then at King's college, Cambridge. He afterwards studied at Oxford, and entered into orders; but on the accession of Mary he practised physic, and kept a school. When Elizabeth came to the throne he was appointed lecturer at St. Paul's, and, in 1560, bishop of Exeter. He died in 1570, and was buried at Exeter. He published a commentary on the first epistle of St. Peter, and translated the Pentateuch in the bishop's Bible.—Biog. Brit.

ALLEYN (Edward), founder of Dulwich college, in Surrey, was born in London in 1566; he acquired great reputation as an actor, and became proprietor of a playhouse in Moorfields, and keeper of the royal bear garden, which was worth 500*l.* a year. Aubrey relates a ridiculous story, that the devil appeared to him when personating the character of Satan, which so frightened him, that he grew serious, and quitted the stage. He laid the foundation of his college in 1614, and completed it in 1617, at the expence of 10,000*l.*; he then endowed it with 800*l.* per annum for the maintenance of one master and one warden (who must be unmarried, and always of the name of Alleyn, or Allen), and four fellows, of whom three must be clergymen, and the fourth an organist; besides six poor men and six women, with twelve boys, who are to be educated till the age of fourteen or sixteen, when they are to be apprenticed out to some trade. This building is called "The College of God's Gift." He was himself the firstmaster. He died in 1626, and was buried in the chapel of the college.—Ibid.

ALLIX (Peter), a learned divine, was born at Alençon, in France, in 1641. He became minister of the reformed church at Rouen, and afterwards of that at Charenton; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes he sought an asylum in England, where he met with a flattering reception, being created D.D. at Oxford, and made treasurer of the church of Salisbury. He died at London in 1717. His most esteemed works are, 1. Reflections on all the Books of Holy Scripture, published at London in 1688, and reprinted by bishop Watson in his Collection of Theological Tracts. 2. A Vindication of the ancient Jewish Church against the Unitarians, 8vo. 1691, mentioned with great respect by bishop Horley in his letters to Dr. Priestley. 3. Remarks on the Ecclesiastical History of the ancient Churches of Piedmont, 4to.—Ibid.

ALLOISI (Balthazar), an eminent historical and portrait painter, was born at Bologna in 1578, and studied under the Carracci. He died in 1638.—Pilkington.

ALLORI (Alexander), a painter of Florence, was instructed by his uncle Bronzino, and had for his pupil the celebrated Avoli. He excelled in naked figures, and died in 1607, aged 72.—Moreri.

ALMAGRO (Diego d'), a Spanish commander, of mean descent, accompanied Pizarro in the expedition against Peru in 1525. He is accused of having had a share in the murder of Atahualpa the inca. In 1535 he took Cuzco, the capital of Chili, and reserved the plunder for himself, which giving offence to Pizarro's brothers, who were there, he made them prisoners, and a civil war ensued. For some time Almagro's party experienced great success, but at length he was taken prisoner, after an obstinate battle. He was kept in confinement several months, and was then brought to his trial, and condemned to be strangled, which he underwent with fortitude in 1538, aged 75. His son Diego endeavoured to revenge his father's death, but failed in the attempt, and was beheaded by De Castro in 1542.—Mariana.

ALMAIN (James), divinity professor in the college of Navarre, at Paris. He wrote a vindication of Lewis XII. against pope Julius II. and defended the authority of councils against Cajetan. He died in 1515.—Moreri.

ALMAMON, or ABDALLAH, caliph of Bagdad, was the son of Haroun Al Raschid, and succeeded his brother Al Amin in 813; he was a great encourager of learned men, and founded an academy at Bagdad, to which he invited able professors to teach the languages and sciences. He calculated a set of astronomical tables, and caused the works of the most celebrated ancient authors to be translated into Arabic. He died in 833.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ALMANSUR, king of Cordova, in Spain, ascended the throne after Alhaca, who died in 976. Either through ambition, or from his zeal for Mahometanism, he was in perpetual war with the Christians, and gained many great battles. He died in 1002.—Moreri.

ALMARZOR (the Victorious), was the second caliph of the race of the Abbassides, and ascended the throne in 753. He was opposed by his uncle, Abdalla-ebn-Ali, who was defeated by Almarzor's general, Abu Moslem. Fearing this general's abilities and popularity, he caused him to be assassinated. Several insurrections took place in his reign, which were all suppressed. He died on a pilgrimage to Mecca, in the 63d year of his age.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ALMARUS, or AELMERUS, was abbot of the monastery of St. Austlin, in Canterbury, and bishop of Sherborne in 1022. On becoming blind he retired to his cell, and spent the remainder of his days in devotion.—Biog. Br.

ALMEIDA (Francis), a Portuguese gentleman, was appointed, in 1505, the first viceroy of India. He took the city of Quiloa, and made many other important conquests. Being informed that a rich Arabian fleet lay in the harbour of Panama, he proceeded thither with his Squadron, and found the ships protected by a rampart and a strong garrison. Almeida, however, ventured to land, and, after an obstinate conflict, defeated the enemy, and set the city and ships on fire. On the death of his son, who was killed in a severe engagement, Almeida only said "he thanked God for having honoured him with so glorious a death." While he was thus engaged, Albuquerque received orders from Portugal to supersede him, but Almeida being about to proceed to Dabul with a fleet, refused to deliver up his government. In this expedition he sullied his reputation by putting all the inhabitants of the city to the sword, not sparing even the infants. He afterwards fell in with the fleet of the enemy, and defeated it, making a slaughter of 4000 men. This produced a peace. On his passage to Europe he was slain at the Cape of Good Hope, in a skirmish with the natives.—Moreri.

ALMEIDA (Apollinarius de), a Portuguese jesuit, who was a missionary in Ethiopia, and a bishop. On being driven from that country he suffered great hardships. Afterwards he ventured to return with two other ecclesiastics, and was put to death with them in 1568.—Ibid.

ALMEIDA (Emanuel de), another jesuit, who also engaged in the same arduous service, and resided in Ethiopia ten years. He died at Goa when he was about to return in 1646. He wrote the history of Ethiopia.—Ibid.

ALMELOVEEN (Theodore Janfon), was professor of Greek, history, and physic, at Harderwick, in Holland. He published, 1. De Vitis Stephanorum. 2. Falli Confusales, &c. He died at Amsterdam in 1712.—Ibid.

ALMUYADAD (Ismael), an Arabian historian. He wrote an account of the Saracens in Sicily, from 842 to 904. This MS. is in the library of the Escurial in Spain, and a Latin version of it is inserted in Muratori's Rerum Italicarum Scriptores.—Gen. B. D.

ALGADDIN, better known by the appellation of the Old Man of the mountains, was prince of the Arsacides, or Assilans, from whence the word Assyria is derived; his residence was a castle between Antioch and Damascus, and he had a number of young men with him who were so devoted to his will, as to engage in any undertaking he chose to send them upon. This made the neighbouring princes very careful not to offend him. He and his subjects were Mohammedans.—Moreri ALFAO (Andrew), an Italian philosopher and physician of the 15th century. He travelled many years in the East, and resided a considerable time at Damascus. On his return to Europe he became professor of philosophy and medicine at Padua, where he died in 1520. He left behind him several MSS. some of which were published, among which is an history of Arabian philosophers and physicians.—Moreri.

ALP ARSLAN, second sultan of the dynasty of Seljuk, succeeded his uncle Toghrul Beg, in 1063; he defeated Romanus Diogenes, emperor of the Greeks, in 1068. He was stabbed by a desperate Carizmian, whom he had taken prisoner and sentenced to death, in 1072.—D'Herbelot.

ALPHERY (Nicephorus), a Russian prince, who when that country was rent in pieces by civil dissensions, at the end of the 16th century, was sent with two of his brothers to England, to the care of a Russian merchant, by whom they were placed in the university of Oxford, where two of them died of the small-pox. The other entered into orders, and in 1618, obtained the rectory of Warley, in Huntingdonshire, from whence he was ejected in the civil war, and barbarously treated by the republican party. At the restoration he was reinstated in his living, but being old and infirm, he committed the care of it to a curate, and retired to Hammersmith, where he died.—Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy.

ALFRESIUS, a Jewish rabbi, who made an abridgment of the Talmud. He died in 1103.—Buxtorf.

ALPHIUS (Avitus), a Roman poet, who flourished in the 3d century; he wrote the lives of eminent persons, and the history of the Carthaginian war, in verse.—Voss. de Hyst. Lat.

ALPHONSO I. king of Portugal, was the son of Henry, count of Portugal, by Theresa, daughter of Alphonso, king of Leon and Castile. At his father's death, in 1112, he was only three years old. In 1139, his territories were invaded by a prodigious army of Moors, but though his troops were greatly inferior in numbers, he obtained a signal victory on the plains of Ourique. In consequence of this, the government was changed to a monarchy, and he was proclaimed king on the field of battle. He is regarded by the Portuguese as the founder of their independence. He died in 1185, aged 76.—M. l. Un. Hyst.

ALPHONSO IV. king of Portugal, was born in 1290, and succeeded his father Denis in 1325. He instituted many good laws and regulations for the benefit of his subjects, and dispensed justice with impartiality, though sometimes with too great severity. He died in 1357.—Ibid.

ALPHONSO V. king of Portugal, was born in 1432, and succeeded his father Edward when he was but six years old. He invaded Africa several times, and took Arzila and Tangier, and died of the plague at Cintra in 1481. He was a benificent and affable prince, and a great encourager of learning. The Portuguese discovered Guinea in his reign.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

ALPHONSO III. (the Great), king of the Asturias, was born in 847, and ascended the throne in 865. He was successful in his wars with the Moors, but in the decline of life his peace was disturbed by commotions among his subjects. In 908 he resigned his crown to his son Garcia, who engaging soon after in a war with the Moors, Alphonso headed the army, and obtained a great victory in 912; he died soon after at Zamora, leaving a great character behind him. He wrote a chronicle of Spanish affairs.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

ALPHONSO V. king of Arragon, was born in 1384, and succeeded his father, Ferdinand the Just, in 1416. Soon after his accession a confederacy was formed against him, which he frustrated and generously pardoned the conspirators. He laid claim to the throne of Naples, in consequence of an agreement with Joan, queen of that kingdom, that he should be her heir. This embroiled him in a war with several of the Italian states, and he and his whole fleet were taken by the Genoese. The king was brought to Milan, where he made the duke his friend and ally, and was thereby enabled to prosecute his design on Naples, which he conquered in 1442. He died there in 1458, leaving his Neapolitan dominions to his natural son Ferdinand; and those of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily, to his brother Juan, king of Navarre. He was a learned prince, and a great encourager of men of letters; he was belidcs valiant and liberal, living familiarly with his subjects, and greatly beloved by them. A courtier remonstrating with him for walking about without a guard: "A father," says Alphonso, "has nothing to dread in the midst of his children." One of his vessels being in danger of perishing, he jumped into a boat, and hastened to her relief, saying, "I had rather partake, than behold the calamity of my people."—Bayle. Moreri.

ALPHONSO II. king of Naples, succeeded his father Ferdinand in 1494. He was of so cruel and tyrannical a disposition that his subjects invited Charles VIII. of France to invade the country. That prince took Naples; and Alphonso, after abdicating the throne, retired to a monastery in Sicily, where he died about 1496.—Pbil. de. Comines.

ALPHONSO X. (the Wise), king of Leon and Castile, was born in 1203, and succeeded his father Ferdinand III. in 1252, and died in 1284. His reign was very unprosperous, but he has acquired a great reputation as a man of learning and science. The Aplonine Tables were drawn up under his direction, and at his expence. He also wrote on the motions of the stars, and a history of Spain; but he has been charged with having uttered this foolish expression, "that if he had been consulted on the creation of the world, he would have given the Almighty better counsel." Some have supposed that this was merely in reprobation of the Ptolemaic system then commonly received, but this, it must be confessed, is a bungling excuse for an assertion which can hardly be called less than blasphemy.—Moreri.

ALPHONSUS (Peter), a Spanish writer of the 12th century, was at first a Jew, but embraced Christianity, and had Alphonso, king of Arragon, for his god-father, in 1106. He wrote a vindication of the Christian religion, which was printed at Cologne in 1536.—Ibid.

ALPHETEGIN, a Turk, who from being a slave rose to be governor of Khorassan and sovereign of Guzna; he reigned sixteen years, leaving the throne to his son-in-law, Sebek Teghin, whose son Mahmoud, founded the dynasty of the Gaznevids.—D'Hérbelot.

ALPINI (Prosper), physician and botanist, was born in 1553, in the state of Venice. He was at first a soldier, but quitted that profession and went to Padua, where he made so great a progress in learning that he became deputy rector and syndic. In 1578 he took his degree of M. D. and in 1580 went to Egypt as physician to the Venetian consul. He resided there three years, in which time he greatly improved himself in the knowledge of botany. He was the first who discovered the sexes and generation of plants. On his return to Venice in 1586, Andrew Doria, prince of Melfi, appointed him his physician, and in 1593 he was called to the botanical professorship at Padua, which he filled with high reputation till his death in 1617. His works are, "De Medicina Ægyptiorum, li. ri. iv." "De Plantis Ægypti," "De Balsamo," "De Prasagienda Vita et Morte Ægrotantium," "De Medicina Methodica," "De raphontico disputatione in gymnasio Patavino habita, &c." "De Plantis Exoticis."—Moreri.

ALSOR (Vincent), a nonconformist divine, was born in Northamptonshire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M. A. He was for some time usher in the school at Okeham in Rutlandshire, and afterwards settled as minister at Wilbee in Northamptonshire, from whence he was ejected in 1662 for nonconformity. Afterwards he became pastor to a congregation of dissenters in Westminster. He was in some favour with king James II. who pardoned his son after having been convicted of treason. He died in 1703. He wrote a book entitled, "Antisozzo," in answer to Dr. Sherlock, and some other pieces.—Calamy.

ALSO (Anthony), an English divine, was educated at Westminster-school, from whence he was elected to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. in 1696, and that of B. D. in 1706. In 1698 he published "Fabularum Æsopicarum delectus," 8vo. Dr. Trevelyan, bishop of Winchester, appointed him his chaplain, and gave him a prebend in his cathedral, with the rectory of Brightwell in Berkshire. In 1717 a verdict being given against him for the breach of a marriage contract, he found it necessary to go abroad, but how long he continued in exile is unknown. He died in 1726. In 1752 was published "Antonii Alfopi, ædis Christi olim alumni odarum, libri duo;" besides which he wrote some poems, to be found in Doddsley's and other collections.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ALSTEDIUS (John Henry), a German divine, and professor of philosophy and divinity at Herborn, in the county of Nassau, and afterwards at Waissenburg in Transylvania, where he died in 1638, aged fifty. His Encyclopædia was much read, and held in esteem even by Roman catholics; but he appears to greater advantage in his Theologia Polemica.—Bayle.

ALSTON (Charles), an eminent physician, was born in Scotland in 1683, and educated at Glasgow, from whence he went to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree. On his return he settled at Edinburgh, and became lecturer on the materia medica, and botany; he died in 1760. He published "Tirocinium Botanicum Edinburgense," 1753, in which he attacked the sexual system of Linnæus. His "Lectures on the Materia Medica," were published in two vols. 4to. 1770. He also wrote some papers in the "Edinburgh Medical Essays."—Pulteney's Sketches of Botany.

ALTHAMER (Andrew), a German divine of the sixteenth century, was a native of Nuremberg; he was a learned man, and strongly attached to the principles of the reformation. He wrote "Notes on Tacitus's Treatise on the Manners of the Ancient Germans," 4to. 1529, and 8vo. 1609.—Moreri.

ALTHUSIUS (John), a democratic writer of the 17th century, was a German lawyer. He wrote a treatise in defence of the sovereignty of the people, in which he opposed all forms of government as being tyrannical.—Ibid.

ALTILIUS (Gabriel), a modern Latin poet, was a native of Naples and bishop of Policastro. He died about 1500. His poems are in the Delicia poetarum Italorum.—Tiraboschi.

ALTING (Henry), a German divine, was born at Embden in 1583. In 1612 he accompanied his pupil the electoral prince palatine to England. The year following he took his degree of D. D. at Heidelberg; and in 1618 he was appointed one of the deputies of the palatinate at the synod of Dort. When Heidelberg was taken in 1662, he narrowly escaped with his life. In 1627 he was chosen professor of divinity at Groningen, where he remained till his death in 1644. He wrote several books on religious subjects.—Bayle.

ALTING (James), son of the above, was born at Heidelberg in 1618. Having completed his studies he went to England, where he was ordained by Dr. Prideaux, bishop of Worcester. In 1643 he was chosen Hebrew professor at Groningen, and in 1667 professor of divinity in conjunction with Des Marets, with whom he had so violent a dispute that the university of Leyden was referred to for its advice, and the judgment returned was a censure on both parties. Alting died in 1679, and his works were published at Amsterdam in 1687, in 5 vols. fol.—Ibid.

ALTING (Menfon), a burgomaster of Groningen, who wrote a work, entitled, "Descriptio Germaniæ inferioris" Amstel. 1697, fol. He died in 1713, aged 76.—Moreri.

ALURED, of Beverley, an ancient English historian, was canon and treasurer of the church of St. John in Beverley, and died about the year 1128. He wrote a chronicle of the English kings, which was published by Hearne in 1716.—Biog. Br.

ALVA (Ferdinand Alvarez, duke of), was descended from one of the most ancient and illustrious families in Spain, and was born in 1508. He made his first campaign at the age of 17, and was present at the battle of Pavia. He was in great favour with Charles V. who made him a general, but though he distinguished himself by high military talents, he was equally noted for the cruelty of his disposition. At the siege of Metz he performed prodigies of valour; but the place was so well defended that the emperor was obliged to raise the siege. In the campaign against the pope, Alva was completely successful, and obliged the pontiff to sue for peace, after which he repaired to Rome, fell on his knees before his holiness, kissed his feet and solicited his forgiveness. Thus it appears that superstition was as prominent a part of his character as cruelty. Philip II. sent him into the Low Countries in 1567 to reduce them to the Spanish yoke, from which they were about to revolt. Here he established a council which was called the bloody tribunal. He filled the United Provinces with terror and scenes of carnage, for which his memory is held in detestation to this day. After obtaining great advantages over the malcontents, the tide of success turned in their favour so rapidly, that Alva, in a fit of dejection, solicited his recall in 1573, which was granted. He enjoyed considerable marks of distinction from his sovereign for some time, but at last fell into disgrace through the misconduct of one of his sons. He was afterwards employed against Portugal, where he greatly added to his military renown, by driving Don Antonio from the throne in 1581. He died the next year, aged 74.—Robertson's Charles V. Mod. Un. Hist. Moreri.

ALVAREZ (Francis), a Portuguese divine sent by Emanuel, king of Portugal, on an embassy to Ethiopia or Abyssinia; he died in 1540, and the year following was published a relation of his mission.—Moreri.

ALVAREZ DE LUNA, or ALVARO, was the favourite of John II. king of Castile. He was the natural son of Don Alvaro de Luna; and born in 1388. He was, in 1408, appointed gentleman of the bed-chamber to the king, but the courtiers disliking him, he was obliged to retire from court for some time, and after an absence of a year and a half, was recalled by the king, who, at his request, banished his enemies. After enjoying the full splendour of royal favour forty-five years he fell into disgrace, and was beheaded for high treason in 1453.—Moreri.

ALVAREZ (Emanuel), a Portuguese jesuit, was born at Madeira, in 1525. He wrote a Latin grammar of great merit, and died at the college of Evora, of which he was rector, in 1582.—Ibid.

ALVAREZ DE PAZ (James), a Spanish jesuit, was a native of Toledo, and wrote several spiritual treatises. He died in 1620.—Ibid.

ALVAROTTO (James), professor of law at Padua, in the 15th century. He wrote "Commentaria in Libros Feudorum," Frankfort, 1587, fol. He died in 1452, aged 68. There were several other famous men of this family.—Ibid.

ALVIANO (Bartholomew), a Venetian general, who obtained signal advantages over the emperor Maximilian, for which he received triumphal honours. He died at the siege of Brescia, in 1515, aged 60. The state of Venice gave him a magnificent burial, and pensioned his family.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ALYATTES, king of Lydia, began his reign B.C. 619; he was engaged in perpetual wars with the Cimmerians and the Medes, and took Smyrna. He died in the 57th year of his reign.—Herodotus.

ALYPIUS, a Platonic philosopher of Alexandria; he is said to have been very diminutive in stature, but of a strong and capacious mind. He died in the 5th century.—Bayle.

ALYPIUS, a geographer of the 4th century, who was employed by the emperor Julian, first in Britain as deputy governor, and next at Jerusalem for the purpose of rebuilding the temple. At the close of life he was banished, but for what cause is not known. A geographical description of the world by him was printed in 4to at Geneva in 1628.—Bayle.

AMADEDDULAT, the founder of the dynasty of Buiyan, was the son of a fisherman. He first served as a common soldier, and rose to command in the armies of Makan, sultan of Dilem. He, and his two brothers, took Persia Proper, Persian Irak, and Caramania, which they divided between them. He settled at Schiraz, in Persia Proper, in 933, and died in 949. He was a liberal and warlike prince.—D'Herbelot.

AMADEUS V. count of Savoy, began his government in 1285; he immortalized his name by his defence of Rhodes against the Turks, on which occasion he added to his arms the cross of the order of St. John of Jerusalem. He died in 1323.—Mod. U. H.

AMADEUS VI. count of Savoy, was one of the most warlike princes of his age. He assisted John, king of France, against Edward, king of England, and in 1366 passed into Greece to the assistance of the emperor John Paleologus. On his return he presented the patriarch of Constantinople, who accompanied him, to pope Urban V. at Viterbo. He died of the plague in 1383, after a glorious reign of 40 years.—Moreri.

AMADEUS VIII. count of Savoy, entered upon the sovereignty in 1391. In 1416 Savoy was created a duchy, and not long after the duke retired from the throne and his family, to a monastery called Ripaille, where he instituted an order of knighthood, by the name of St. Maurice, or the Annunciata. Here, however, they lived in a luxurious style, without any of the severities of monachism. In 1439 by his intrigues he procured himself to be elected pope by the council of Basil, on which he took the name of Felix V. He was, however, dispossessed of his title, and made a formal abdication in 1449, in favour of Nicholas V. who gave him a cardinal's hat and dean of the sacred college. He died in 1451, aged 69.—Ibid.

AMADEUS IX. duke of Savoy, was a very charitable prince, and so beloved by his subjects, that they called him the blessed Amadeus. He died in 1472, aged 37.—Ibid.

AMADEUS, a Portuguese monk, of the order of St. Francis, published at Rome some whimsical revelations, which excited considerable attention at the time. He died in 1482.—Ibid.

AMADEUS, bishop of Lausanne in the 12th century, wrote a "Panegyric on the Blessed Virgin," printed at Basil in 1537. He died in 1158.—Ibid.

AMAJA (Francis), professor of civil law in the university of Salamanca in Spain. He wrote a commentary on the three last books of the Code, printed at Lyons, 1639, folio, besides other works of credit. He died at Valladolid, about 1640.—Ibid.

AMAK, or ABULNAGIS AL BOKHARI, a Persian poet in the 5th century; he was entertained at the court of the sultan Khe-dar Khan, who instituted an academy of poets, of which he made Amak president. He lived to a great age. His chief poem is the "History of the Loves of Joseph and Zoleiskah."—D'Herbelot.

AMALARIC, or AMAURY, king of the Visigoths, was the son of Alaric II. He succeeded his grandfather Theodoric, in 526. He married Clotilda, the daughter of Clovis, king of France, whom he used barbarously to make her embrace Arianism. At length she complained to her brother Childeric, king of Paris, who marched against Amalaric, and defeated him in 581. He was privately slain not long afterwards.—Mer.

AMALASONTIA, daughter of Theodoric

king of the Ostrogoths, was married in 515 to Eutharie, who died soon after, leaving a son, Athalaric, to whom Theodoric left his dominions under the guardianship of his mother, who endeavoured, but in vain, to make him worthy of the bequest. She was an enlightened princess, and well acquainted with the languages and philosophy; but her son, instead of profiting by her instructions, gave himself up to debauchery, and died at the age of 16. Amalasontha then placed her cousin Theodatus on the throne, by whom she was barbarously murdered in 534.—Moreri.

AMALEK, the son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau, gave name to a warlike people of Arabia Petrea, who were always at war with the Hebrews.—SS.

AMALRIC (Augeri), a writer in the 14th century, who dedicated a history of the popes to Urban V.—Moreri.

AMALTHEA, the Cumean sibyl, who offered Tarquin nine books on the fate of Rome, for which she demanded 300 crowns. Tarquin refusing the purchase, she burnt three of them, and demanded the same sum for the remainder, which being rejected, she then burnt three more, and required as much for those which were left. The king astonished, consulted the priests, and by their advice made the purchase, and the books were committed to the care of two magistrates, who were to consult them on extraordinary occasions. The Sibylline Oracles, printed at Amsterdam, in 2 vols. 4to. 1688, are deemed spurious.—Lactantius. Thus Livius.

AMALTHEUS (Attilius), a native of Italy, was made archbishop of Athens, by Paul V. who also sent him to Cologne in the character of nuncio. He was a learned man, and died about 1600.—Moreri.

AMALTHEUS (Jerom), an Italian physician and poet, was born at Oderzo, in the Trevisan, in 1507. He was professor at Padua, and died in 1574. His Latin poetry is in great esteem.—Ibid.

AMALTHEUS (John Baptist), brother of the above, was born in 1525. He attended the Venetian ambassador to England; and on his return was made secretary to pope Pius IV. He died at Rome in 1573. His Latin poems were printed in 1550. There was also another brother, Cornelius Amaltheus, who was eminent in physic and poetry. His Latin poems were printed at Venice in 1627.—Ibid.

AMAMA (Sixtinus), a learned man of the 17th century, was a native of Friesland in Holland, and educated at Franeker, where he became eminent for his knowledge of the Oriental languages. He was at Oxford in 1613, and taught Hebrew in Exeter college. After residing there some years he returned to Franeker, and became Hebrew professor. He died there in 1629. His greatest work is a censure of the Vulgate.—Wad. A. O. Bayle.

AMAND (Mark Anthony Gerard, Sieur de Saint), a French poet, was born at Rouen in Normandy in 1594. His father was a commander in the English navy, and was three years confined in the Black Tower at Constantinople. Our author's poems, which are chiefly comic, were published in 3 vols. 1649, Paris. He died in 1661.—Moreri.

AMASEUS (Romulus), professor of Latin and Greek at Bologna, and secretary to the senate of that place. He published a translation of Paulanias, and other works; he died in 1558. His son Pompilius was professor of Greek at Bologna, and published a translation of part of Polybius.—Bayle.

AMASIS, king of Egypt; he was prime minister to Apries, king of that country, on whose deposition he mounted the throne, B. C. 569, and immediately put Apries to death. Egypt flourished greatly in his reign. He died B. C. 525.—Herodotus.

AMATUS DE PORTUGAL, a learned physician, whose real name was John Castellblanco, was living in 1550. He published commentaries on Dioscorides and Avicenna.—Moreri.

AMAURI I. king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother Baldwin III. in 1163; he was a courageous and enterprising prince, but these qualities were sullied by avarice and cruelty. He died in 1174.—Maimbourg's Hist. of the Crusades.

AMAURI II. king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother, Guy de Lusignan, in 1194; his title was contested by Isabella, second daughter of Amauri I. but on her becoming a widow he married her, and was crowned. The Saracens having taken his capital, he applied for assistance to the European princes, but before the succours arrived he died, in 1205.—Moreri.

AMAURI (De Chartres), a French visionary of the thirteenth century, who maintained the eternity of matter, and that religion has three epochs, agreeable to the three persons of the trinity. His opinions were condemned by the council of Paris in 1209, and some of his followers were burnt. To avoid a similar fate, he renounced his errors, and retired to St. Martin des Champs, where he died of vexation.—Mor.

AMAZIAH, king of Judah, succeeded his father Joash at the age of 25. He blended idolatry with the worship of God; defeated the Edomites in the Valley of Salt, with the assistance of the Israelites, but afterwards commenced war on his allies, by whom he was taken prisoner. He was slain by his own subjects, B. C. 810.—SS.

AMBOISE (George d'), a cardinal, was born of a noble French family in 1460. Being brought up to the church, he became successively bishop of Montauban, archbishop of Narbonne, and lastly of Rouen. Lewis XII. made him prime minister, and he soon acquired great and just popularity, by taking off the taxes which had usually been levied on the people at the accession of every new monarch. The king, by his advice, undertook the conquest of the Milanese, and succeeded. Soon after this he was appointed the pope's legate in France, with the dignity of cardinal, and in that capacity effected a considerable reform among the religious orders. He died in 1510, and on his death-bed often said to the friar who attended him, "Brother John, why have not I been my whole life brother John?" D'Amboise was one of the best statesmen France ever had: he greatly reformed the church, purged the courts of justice, eased the burdens of the people, and endeavoured through his whole life to promote the public happiness. His nephew, George D'Amboise, succeeded him in the archbishopric, and in 1546 was created a cardinal. He died in 1550.—Moreri.

AMBOISE (Francis), a French writer, was the son of a surgeon, and educated in the college of Navarre, after which he became an advocate in the parliament of Paris, and lastly counsellor of state. He published several poetical pieces in French, and some in the Latin language; he also edited in 1616, the works of Peter Abelard, to which he prefixed a preface.—M. rev.

AMBOISE (Frances de), the wife of Peter II duke of Brittany, who treated her with great brutality, which she bore with meekness. She distinguished herself by effecting a reformation in the manners of the Bretons. On the death of the duke, in 1457, she was solicited in marriage by the prince of Savoy, but refused the offer, and retired into a monastery, where she died in 1485.—Barrin, Vie de la bienheureuse Françoise d'Amboise.

AMBROSE, deacon of the church of Alexandria in the third century, was converted from the errors of Valentinus or Marcion by the arguments of Origen, for whom he ever after had the greatest veneration. In the time of Maximin he narrowly escaped martyrdom, and died at Alexandria about the year 250. St. Jerome mentions some excellent letters of his, which are now lost.—Dupin, Tilletont.

AMBROSE (St.), archbishop of Milan, was born about 340. His father was prefect of Gaul, and gave his son an excellent education. His eloquence as a pleader procured for him the governorship of Liguria and Æmilia. On the death of Auxentius, archbishop of Milan, in 374, a contest arose between the arians and catholics about electing a successor. The tumult in the church was so great that Ambrose found it necessary to go thither to restore peace. His harangue to the people was so majestic and affecting, that a voice from the multitude exclaimed, "Let Ambrose be bishop." This operated so powerfully upon the people that all his endeavours to resist the appointment proved ineffectual, and he was consecrated bishop. In 385 he was sent by the emperor Valentinian to the tyrant Maximus, and prevailed upon him not to enter Italy. About the same time, the heathens endeavouring to restore their religion, employed Symmachus, prefect of Rome, to plead their cause, in which he was baffled by Ambrose, who also experienced some trouble from the arians. The empress Justina was of that sect, and demanded of him the Portian church at Milan for the arians, which he refused. He was sent again to Maximus; but notwithstanding his eloquence the tyrant entered Italy, and made himself master of the western empire, and entered Milan in triumph. Valentinian sought refuge with Theodosius, who defeated Maximus, and restored the fugitive monarch to his throne. While Theodosius was in Italy an insurrection happened in Thessalonica, in which the emperor's lieutenant was slain. Theodosius in revenge put to death a vast number of persons in cool blood. Soon after this massacre he came to Milan, and was about to enter the great church, when he was met at the door by Ambrose, who refused him admittance as a homicide; and it was not till a year afterwards, and his shewing tokens of repentance, that the prelate would admit him to christian communion. Ambrose died at Milan in 397, and was buried in the great church of that city. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, in 2 vols. folio, 1691. He composed that noble hymn "Te Deum laudamus."—Dupin.

AMBROSE, general of the order of Camalduli, was born at Portico, in Romagna. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the Greek language at the council of Basil, and by translating several ancient authors. He died in 1439.—Vossius, Dupin.

AMBROSE DE LOMBREZ (Père), a learned capuchin, was born at Lombez in 1708; he wrote several pieces on spiritual subjects, and died at St. Saviour, near Bareges, in 1778.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

AMBROSE (Isaac), a nonconformist divine, was born in Lancashire; he was of Brazen-nose college, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A. entered into orders, and served a small cure in his own country. On the breaking out of the rebellion he quitted the church of England, took the covenant, and became a presbyterian preacher, first at Garstang, and afterwards at Preston. He died in 1674. His works are much esteemed by the Calvinists, particularly one entitled, "Looking unto Jesus."—Calamy.

AMBROSINI (Bartholomew), professor of physic, and director of the botanical garden at Bologna, where he died in 1657. He published, 1. Panacea ex Herbis quæ a sanctis denominantur, 1630, 8vo. 2. Historia Capficorum cum Iconibus, 1630, 12mo. 3. Theodorica Medicina, 1632, 4to. His brother and successor, Hyacinth, published several valuable works on botany.—Gen. B. D.

AMBROSIVS AURELIANVS, king of the Britons; about 457 he came from Armenia to assist in expelling the Saxons, who had been invited over by Vortigern. On the death or deprivation of that monarch the sovereignty was vested in him, and he maintained the dignity with great credit. The famous Arthur was brought up under him. Ambrosius died at Winchester in 508.—Eng. Br.

AMELIUS (Gentilianus), a platonic philosopher, was the disciple of Plotinus, by whom he was employed to teach his other pupils. None of his works are extant. He lived in the third century.—Bayle.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSE (Abraham Nicholas), a French writer, was born at Orleans in 1634. He became secretary to the French ambassador at Venice, but being imprudent, he died very poor in 1706. He wrote a history of the government of Venice, and translated into French Machiavel's Prince, Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, Gratian's Courtier, Tacitus's Annals, and some other works.—Moreri.

AMELOT (Denis), a priest of the oratory, and doctor of the Sorbonne, was born in 1606. He translated the New Testament into French, with notes, 4 vols. 8vo. 1666; he also wrote "An Abridgment of Theology," 4to. and "A Harmony of the Gospels," 12mo. He died in 1678.—Ibid.

AMERBACH (John), a learned printer of Basil, in Switzerland, in the 15th century. He first made use of the Roman type instead of the Gothic and Italian. He died in 1515. His son John was professor of law at Basle, and syndic of that city; he was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and died in 1562, aged 67.—Melch. Adam. Vit.

AMERICA. This extensive continent, both north and south, takes its name from Americus Vesputius, who first discovered Mexico, in 1498, attributing to Columbus the knowledge of the West India islands only. Terra Firma, which reaches from Darien to Nicaragua, was conquered by the Spaniards under Pedrarias in 1514, and the other parts, as far as the river Orinoco, were reduced by private adventurers. Brazil was discovered by the Portuguese in 1500. In 1623, the Dutch took possession of the northern part, but were expelled in 1664. Peru was conquered by Francis Pizarro in 1532, in the reign of Huascar, the thirteenth inca from Manco Capac, the founder of the government, about 1270. Chili was conquered by Baldivia, a Spanish general, in 1540. Mexico was conquered by Cortez in 1521. Louisiana was discovered by the French in 1683, who did not take possession of it till 1718. In 1763 they yielded to the English that which lies to the east of the Mississippi, which was ceded to the Spaniards at the peace of 1783, who resigned it to the French in 1801, by whom it was sold to the United States in 1803. Florida remained in the possession of the Spaniards from 1521 to 1763, when it was ceded to the English, by whom it was relinquished in 1783. North America was discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1497. The first part of it colonized by the English was Virginia, in 1607, when James-town was built. New England was first settled in 1614. In 1620 the puritans fled thither from England, and built New Plymouth, Boston, and other places. Part of New York was settled by the Dutch in 1608. The Swedes arrived shortly after, and fixed themselves in another part; but they were both dispossessed in 1664 by the English. Pennsylvania was first settled by William Penn in 1681; Maryland by lord Baltimore in 1633; Carolina in 1670; and Georgia by general Oglethorpe in 1732. All these colonies, from New England in the north, to Georgia in the south, revolted from Great Britain in 1775, and the next year asserted their independence, which was allowed in 1783. New Scotia was settled by sir William Alexander in 1622, but ten years afterwards it was sold to the French. It was taken again in 1654, and ceded back in 1662; recovered by sir William Phipps in 1690, and given again to the French in 1697; but the English conquered it once more in 1710, and it was confirmed to them at the peace of Utrecht in 1714. Canada was taken possession of by the French in 1525. Quebec was built in 1608; but the whole country was conquered by the English in 1759, and has been in their hands ever since.—Mod. Univ. Hist. Robertson's Hist. Amer. Burke's Hist. of European Settlements in Amer. Gordon's Hist. of the American War.

AMERICUS, see VESPUTIUS.

AMES (William), a puritan divine, was born in Norfolk in 1576, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge, where he became a rigid puritan, and to avoid expulsion went to Franeker, in Holland, where he was for some time professor of divinity. He afterwards settled at Rotterdam as associate with the noted Hugh Peters, who had gathered a congregation of Brownists in that city. Ames died in his arms in 1633. He was a man of learning, but his principles were narrow and austere. The principal of his works is entitled "Medulla Theologica." His son William Ames was ejected from the living of Wrentham, in Suffolk, in 1662, and died in 1689, aged 66. He published a sermon, called "The Saint's Security against seducing Spirits, &c."—Nicoll's Hist. Puritans. Calamy's Account of ejected Ministers

AMES (Joseph), secretary to the society of antiquaries, was originally a ship chandler in Wapping. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, in which he acquired great eminence, and published a work entitled "Typographical Antiquities, being an historical Account of Printing in England, with some Memoirs of our ancient Printers," &c. &c. 4to. 1749; he also published, in 8vo. a list of English portraits, engraved and mezzotinto, and compiled the

* Parentalia," from the papers of Mr. Wren. He died in 1759.—Nichols's Anecd. of Bowyer.

AMHERST (Jeffery, lord), was descended from an ancient family at Sevenoaks, in Kent, where he was born in 1717. He entered into the army in 1731, and in 1741 was aid-du-camp to general Ligonier, under whom he served at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux. In 1756 he was appointed colonel of the 15th regiment of foot. In 1759 he went to America, and commanded at the siege of Louisbourg. The same year he was appointed commander in chief of all the forces in America, and governor of Virginia. On the accession of George III. he was made knight of the bath, and in 1763 returned to England. In 1771 he was appointed governor of Guernsey, and the year following lieutenant-general of the ordnance. In 1776 he was created baron Amherst of Holmsdale. In 1778 he had the command of the army in England; and in 1782 he received the gold stick from the king; but on the change of ministers his military appointments were transferred to other hands. He was again appointed to the command of the army of Great Britain in 1793, but in 1795 it was taken from him and given to the duke of York, when his lordship was made field-marshal. He died in 1798, and his remains were interred in Sevenoaks church. The character of lord Amherst will always stand high in the military history of England. Though a strict disciplinarian, he was the soldier's friend, and his private character was very respectable. He was twice married, but left no issue; the title, therefore, devolved to his nephew.—Annual Necrology for 1798.

AMHURST (Nicholas), was born at Marden, in Kent, and educated at Merchant Taylors' school, from whence he was removed to St. John's college, Oxford, but was expelled for irregularity without taking a degree. In consequence of this disgrace he wrote several satires against the university, under the title of Terræ Filius, which were collected in 2 vols. 12mo. 1726. On settling in London he became a writer by profession; his most celebrated undertaking was "The Craftsman," which was carried on for many years with great success. In this paper he was assisted by lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pulteney, who both neglected him when they got into place. He died, it is supposed, of a broken heart in 1742.—Cibber's Lives of the Poets.

AMICONI (Giacomo), an historical and portrait painter of Venice, who came to England in 1720, and painted many fine pieces for the principal nobility. He afterwards went to Spain, and was appointed portrait painter to the king, and died there in 1752.—Pilkington.

AMICUS (Antoninus), a Sicilian priest, and canon of the cathedral of Palermo, distinguished himself by a number of considerable works in history and antiquities. Philip IV. of Spain conferred on him the title of historiographer royal. He laboured assiduously in illustrating the ancient monuments of Naples and Sicily. His principal work is entitled "Siciliæ Regum Annales ab anno 1060 usque ad præsens seculum." He died in 1641.—Moreri.

AMIN, the son of the caliph Haroun al Raschid, succeeded his father in 809, on condition that his brother Almamon was to reign after him. He endeavoured to deprive his brother of the succession, and in consequence a war broke out between them. Thaher, the general of Almamon, took Bagdad, and having seized Amin as he attempted to escape, cut off his head. He was then thirty years old, and had reigned but five years.—D'Herbelot.

AMMAN (John Conrad), a native of Switzerland, and a physician, obtained great credit by teaching persons to speak who were born deaf. He published an excellent work on that subject, entitled "Surdus Loquens," in 1692. He died at Amsterdam about 1730.—Halleri Bib. Anat.

AMMAN (Paul), a native of Breslaw, and professor of physic at Leipzig. He wrote some descriptive pieces in botany, and died in 1690.—Gen. B. D.

AMMANATI (Bartholomew), a Florentine sculptor and architect, was born in 1511, and died in 1592. He built many elegant edifices in his own country and at Rome.—Novw. Diss. Hist.

AMMANATI (Laura Battiferri), wife of the preceding; was the daughter of John Antonio Battiferri, and born at Urbino in 1513. Her poems, which were published at Florence in 1560, and at Naples in 1594, are held in great esteem. She was elected a member of the academy of Intronati at Sienna, and died at Florence in 1589.—Ibid.

AMMIANUS (Marcellinus), a Latin historian, was born at Antioch, and served in the army of Julian. He wrote the Roman history from the reign of Nerva to the death of Valens, in thirty-one books, of which only eighteen are extant. The best edition is that of Gronovius in 1693. He died about 390.—Vossius de Hist. Lat. Boyle.

AMMIRATO, or AMMIRATI (Scipio), an Italian writer, was born at Lucca, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1531. He first practised the law, and then took orders; but being disappointed of preferment, he entered into the service of a nobleman as secretary. The city of Lucca employed him on a mission to the pope; he afterwards settled at Florence, of which republic he wrote the history, in 2 vols. folio, and received in recompence a canonry in the cathedral. He died there in 1600. He wrote several other works in the Italian language, both in prose and verse.—Moreri.

AMMON, the son of Lot, was father of the Ammonites, who were generally at war with the Israelites. He lived about 1900 years before Christ.—SS.

AMMONIUS, a peripatetic philosopher at Athens, who flourished about A.D. 60. Plutarch, who was his pupil, often mentions him in his works.—Plut. in Vit. Themist. Socratic.

AMMONIUS, another philosopher of the same sect, who lived in the 6th century, and taught at Alexandria. He was the disciple of Proclus, and obtained great reputation as a preceptor. His commentaries on Aristotle and Porphyry are still extant.—Bayle.

AMMONIUS SACCAS, a philosopher of the third century, and the founder of the eclectic sect, was born of christian parents, at Alexandria, where he studied under Athenagoras, Pantenus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, which circumstance seems to refute the assertion that he took the surname of Saccas from his being a porter. Porphyry says that he renounced the christian religion, in which he had been educated, and embraced paganism; but Eusebius and other authors deny it. He instituted an academy at Alexandria for the purpose of reconciling the principles of Plato and Aristotle; here, among other eminent disciples, he had the celebrated Longinus. This philosopher died about the year 243.—Porphyry. Vit. Plotin. Fabricius. Bayle.

AMMONIUS, the grammarian, flourished at Alexandria at the end of the fourth century. A lexicon of Greek synonymes, printed at Venice in 1497, is attributed to him.—Fabricius.

AMMONIUS, a famous surgeon of Alexandria, invented a method of extracting the stone from the bladder, which procured him the surname of the Lithotomist.—Le Clerc's Hist. of Physic.

AMMONIUS (Levinus), a Carthusian monk in Flanders, was greatly esteemed by Erasmus and other eminent men for his learning and piety. He died at Ghent in 1536.—Moreri.

AMMONIUS (Andrew), a learned Italian, who came to England at the beginning of the 15th century, and became secretary to Henry VIII. He died in London in 1517. He wrote some poetical pieces in Latin.—Bayle.

AMONTONS (William), a French philosopher, was born in Normandy in 1663. Being seized with an incurable deafness, he applied himself to the study of mechanics and practical mathematics. In 1687 he presented a new hygroscope to the academy of sciences, which was approved. He also discovered a method of conveying information from one place to another by signals, and which is now known by the name of the telegraph. In 1695 he published a book on the construction of barometers, thermometers, &c. which is the only piece of his in print, except some papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. In 1699 he was admitted a member of that learned body. He died in 1705.—Fontenelle's Eulogy. Nervo. Dict. Hist.

AMORY (Thomas), a dissenting divine, was born at Taunton, in Somersetshire, in 1700. He was educated under his uncle Mr. Henry Grove, whom he succeeded as principal tutor in the academy at Taunton. He also officiated to the congregation there till 1759, when he removed to London, and became afternoon preacher at the meeting in the Old Jewry, of which, on the death of Dr. Chandler, he was appointed sole pastor. In 1768, the university of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of D.D. At this time he became one of the lecturers at Salters'-hall. In 1770 he became morning preacher at Newton green. He was one of the committee appointed by the dissenters, in 1772, to procure an extension of the act of toleration. He died in 1774, and was interred in Bunhill-fields burying-ground. He was the author of two volumes of sermons, "The Life of Mr. Henry Grove," "Memoirs of Dr. Benson," and of "Dr. Samuel Chandler."—Biog. Br.

AMORY (Thomas) a very extraordinary writer, was the son of counsellor Amory, who was appointed by king William secretary for the forfeited estates in Ireland, but our author himself was not born in that kingdom. He appears to have been bred to physic, but never practised that or any other profession. He led a very recluse life in his house in Westminster, carefully shunning company, and never stirring out till the evening. He died there at the age of 97, in May 1789. His son, practised physic at Wakefield, in Yorkshire, many years. Our author wrote, 1. Memoirs, containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain, 8vo. 1755, and afterwards in 2 vols. 12mo. This singular work is of the novel kind, but it is made the vehicle of arianism or socinianism, as also is his next publication, "The Life of John Buncke, Esq." in 4 vols. 12mo; he wrote likewise two letters in the Theological Repository, on the natural proofs of a future state.—European Mag. vol. xv.

AMOS, the third of the minor prophets, was a shepherd of Tekoa, and supposed to have been the father of Isaiah. He prophesied in the reigns of Jehoram, king of Israel, and Uzziah, king of Judah.—SS.

AMOUR (William de St.), a doctor of the Sorbonne, and canon of Bouvais, was born at St. Amour, in Franche Comte; he was a zealous defender of the rights of the university of Paris; his book on the perils of the latter times was condemned by Alexander IV. who also banished him to his native place; but on the death of the pope he returned to Paris. He wrote other works, and died in 1272.—Dupin. Moreri.

AMOUR (Lewis de St.), doctor of the Sorbonne, and rector of the university of Paris. He went to Rome as the advocate for the janfenists. He was expelled the Sorbonne for not signing the condemnation of Armauld, and died in 1687.—Dupin. Moreri.

AMPHILOCHIUS, bishop of Iconium in the 4th century, was at the council of Constantinople in 381, and president of that of Sida in 385. He zealously opposed the arians, and recovered Theodosius from that party. He died about 394.—Dupin. Cave's Hist. Lit.

AMPHIBALUS, surnamed Brito, because he was a native of Britain, lived in the third century. He is said to have been a native of Exeter, where he acquired a knowledge of languages; after which he went to Rome, and having completed his studies, returned to his native country. He preached the gospel successfully in England and Scotland, and wrote pious pieces. Some authors say he was bishop in the isle of Anglesea, and others that he suffered martyrdom in 291.—Hætor Boice Hist. Scotiæ. Piss. de Script. Angl.

AMPHINOPUS and ANAPIUS, two rich brothers of Catania, in Sicily, who, in an irruption of Mount Ætna, abandoned all their property to save their aged and infirm parents, by carrying them on their shoulders.—Valerius Maximus. Seneca de Benef.

AMPSINGIUS (John Afluerus), professor of physic at Rostock in the beginning of the 17th century. He wrote some learned treatises on medical subjects in Latin, printed in 1619.—Gen. B. D.

AMRU-EBN-AL-AS, a famous Saracen general, was at first a great enemy to Mohammed, but afterwards he became his zealous disciple. He conquered Syria and Egypt, from whence he extended his victorious arms to Africa. He died governor of Egypt, which flourished greatly under his administration, A. D. 663.—D'Herbelot. Mod. Univ. Hist.

AMSDORF (Nicholas) bishop of Nuremberg, and a zealous Lutheran. He held, in opposition to Melancthon, that good works are not necessary to salvation; and a sect was formed called Amfordians. He died in 1541.—Moreri. Mylheim.

AMURATH I. sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father Orchan in 1360. He completed the conquest of the Greek empire, and defeated a formidable army of confederates on the plain of Kossova; but after the battle he was stabbed by a soldier of the enemy, of which wound he died in 1389, aged 71.—Mod. Un. Hist.

AMURATH II. succeeded his father Mohammed I. in 1422. The beginning of his reign was disturbed by pretenders to the throne, who were supported by the Greek emperor. After quelling these attempts he resigned his throne to his son Mahomet, and retired in 1443 to a society of dervises, from whence he was soon recalled to engage against the Hungarians, who had invaded the Turkish dominions. Amurath gained a great victory over the christians at Varna, and then returned to his retirement, but was called from it again in 1446 to quell a revolt of the janizaries, and to reduce the famous Scanderbeg. He succeeded in both these objects, and then turned his arms against the Hungarians with his wonted good fortune. Finding his son inadequate to the imperial station, he sent him to govern Asia Minor, and resumed the throne. He died in 1451, aged 47.—Ibid.

AMURATH III. succeeded his father Selim II. in 1575. On his accession he caused his five brothers to be murdered, which so affected his mother that she stabbed herself. He added several of the best provinces of Persia to the Turkish empire, and died in 1596, aged 52.—Ibid.

AMURATH IV. succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1622. He recovered Bagdad from the Persians in 1637, after which he put 30,000 of the enemy, who had surrendered at discretion, to the sword. He died of excessive debauchery in 1640, aged 31.—Ibid.

AMY (N.), an advocate in the parliament of Aix, died in 1760. He wrote, 1. Observations on the Waters of the Seine, &c. 12mo. 2. New filtering Fountains, 12mo. 3. Reflections on Copper, Lead, and Tin Vessels, 12mo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

AMYOT (James), bishop of Auxerre, and great almoner of France, was born of low parents at Milan, in 1514, and educated at Paris on charity. He left the university at the age of twenty-three, and became tutor to the children of a secretary of state, who was so pleased with him that he recommended him to the duchess of Berry, sister of Francis I. by whose means he became professor of Greek and Latin in the university of Bourges. Here he translated into French the memoirs of Theagenes and Chiricles, which procured him the abbey of Bellosane. By the recommendation of cardinal de Tournon he was appointed preceptor to the two youngest sons of Henry II. While engaged in this station he translated the Lives of Plutarch, which was followed by a translation of that author's morals. Charles IX. gave him the abbey of Cornelius de Compigne, and made him grand almoner of France, and bishop of Auxerre. He was also appointed curator of the university of Paris. Henry III. added to these distinctions that of commander of the order of the Holy Ghost. He died in 1593. Besides the above works he translated seven books of Diodorus Siculus, some Greek tragedies, and the pastoral of Daphnia.—Moreri. Bayle.

AMYRAUT (Moses), a French divine, was born in 1596, at Bourgueil, in Tourain. He studied theology with so much application and success at Saumur as to be chosen professor of divinity there. The council of Charenton deputed him to make a reason-

France to the king on the infraction of the edicts in favour of the protestants. His conduct on this occasion brought him acquainted with cardinal Richelieu, who held him in great esteem. Departing from the high calvinistic notions of election and reprobation, he brought upon himself the charge of heresy from no less a man than the great Peter du Moulin. This dispute occasioned for a time considerable disturbance among the French protestants. Amyrzon, however, by his moderation, came off with great honour, and was deservedly respected by good men of both religions. He also gained great credit in 1647, by writing against the democratic notion, that subjects have a right to take up arms against their sovereign. He was a man of universal charity, and distributed his whole salary to the poor without any regard to their religious sentiments. He died in 1664.—Bayle.

AMYRZTES, a peripatetic philosopher, and native of Trebizond, flourished in the fifteenth century. Having abjured the christian religion, the sultan Mahomet II. gave him several preferments, and employed him in translating some books of the christians into Arabic.—Bayle.

ANACHARSIS, a Scythian philosopher, travelled to Athens in the time of Solon, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He was the only stranger the Athenians ever admitted to the honour of citizenship. Cræsus invited him to Sardis, with the offer of riches, but he replied, "that he came to Greece for improvement and not for money." After a long stay in Greece he returned to Scythia, where he attempted to introduce the customs and institutions of Greece, which brought upon him the enmity of his countrymen. Going one day into a wood to perform a sacred rite to the goddess Cybele, he was shot with an arrow by the king. Many of his apophthegms are preserved by Lælius, who wrote his life, by Plutarch and others. An Athenian once reproaching him with being a Scythian: "True," says Anacharsis, "my country is a disgrace to me, but you are a disgrace to your country."—Herodotus. Plutarch. Diog. Laërt.

ANACLETUS, bishop of Rome, succeeded Linus in the second year of Titus, A.D. 79. He is said to have suffered martyrdom, after governing the Roman church thirteen years.—Eusebius. Dupin.

ANACLETUS, an anti-pope, was set up by Roger, king of Sicily, against Innocent II. whose cause was espoused by the emperor Lotharius II. After a violent struggle, the latter obtained the papal chair, and Anacletus died obscurely in 1138.—Morri.

ANACREON, a Greek lyric poet, was born at Teos, in Ionia, about the 6th century B. C. He was entertained at the court of Polycrates, at Samos, who held him in great esteem. At the invitation of Hipparchus, son of Pisistratus, he visited Athens; and on the death of that prince he returned to Teos, and remained there till the revolt of Hippias, when he removed to Abdera, where he was choked, while drinking, by a grape-stone. From the few particulars that can be gathered of his life, it is evident Anacreon was a man of vicious principles and most debauched manners. His poems, which are amatory and bacchanalian, are exquisitely beautiful, lively, and natural. The best editions of Anacreon are those of Barnes and Pauw. Two excellent translations of this poet have been published in English, that by Fawkes in 12mo, and the other by Moore, in 12mo.—Vossius.

ANAGNOSTA (John), a Byzantine historian, was living in the year 1433. He wrote De Rebus Constantinopolitanorum Macedonicis, which was published in Greek and Latin at Cologne, in 1653.—Hankii de Byzant. Hist.

ANASTASIUS I. emperor of the east, was born in 430, at Duras, in Illyricum, of mean parentage. He was an officer in the imperial palace for many years, and in 1491 became emperor by marrying the empress Ariadne, widow of Zeno. He was very popular at first, but lost the public favour by embroiling himself in religious feuds, and siding with the Eutychians. Several commotions were excited on this account, and the emperor was at last obliged to rescind what he had done in favour of the heretics. He died in 518.—Mod. Un. Hist.

ANASTASIUS II. was raised to the throne in 713, from a private station. A rival appeared against him, called Theodosius, who was so well supported that Anastasius was obliged to fly into Thessalonica. When Leo ascended the throne in 719, Anastasius prevailed on the Bulgarians to assist him in taking Constantinople; but finding a greater resistance than they expected, they delivered him up to Leo, who put him to death.—Ibid.

ANASTASIUS I. pope, succeeded Siricius in 398. He condemned the works of Origen, and excommunicated Rufinus, who had translated one of that father's treatises. He died in 402.—Platina. Dupin.

ANASTASIUS II. pope, succeeded Gelasius in 496. He endeavoured to bring about a union between the eastern and western churches, but was cut off by death from executing his design in 498.—Ibid.

ANASTASIUS III. pope, succeeded Sergius in 917, and died in 919.—Ibid.

ANASTASIUS IV. pope, succeeded Eugenius III. in 1153, and died the year following. He was a humane, and liberal-minded pontiff.—Ibid.

ANASTASIUS, an antipope, was supported by the imperial army against Benedict III. in 855, but was soon obliged to yield to his rival, and died in obscurity.—Morri.

ANASTASIUS, the Sinaite, so called from being a monk of mount Sinai, lived in the 7th century. He wrote some pieces on practical divinity, which were published at Ingoldstadt, 1605, 4to.—Cave's Hist. Lit.

ANASTASIUS (Theopolitanus), bishop of Antioch in the 6th century, was banished in 570 for holding the opinions of the incorruptibles, or that the body of Christ was incapable of suffering even before the resurrection. In 593 he was restored to his see, and died in 599. His successor was also called Anastasius, and there are some religious discourses of his extant.—Fabric. Bibl. Græc.

ANASTASIUS BIBLIOTHECARIUS, a Greek, was librarian of the vatican about the middle of the 9th century. His great work is the Liber Pontificalis; the best edition of which is that of 1718, 4 vols. folio. He is said to have assisted at the council of Constantinople in 865, and to have translated its canons into Latin.—Dupin.

ANATOLIUS (St.), a native of Alexandria, was bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, in 269. He was an eminent mathematician, and wrote a tract on the time of celebrating Easter, printed in the "Doctrina Temporum," Antwerp, 1634.—E. selen. Dupin.

ANATOLIUS, patriarch of Constantinople in the 5th century. He contended for some time with pope Leo for the equality of the two churches, but afterwards yielded the point, and behaved with more submission to the pontiff than became his station. He died in 458.—Moreri.

ANAXAGORAS, one of the most illustrious philosophers of antiquity, to whom by way of eminence was given the name of Mind or Spirit. He was a native of Clazomene, in Ionia, and renounced a very large estate that he might study philosophy, undisturbed by secular concerns. After studying many years he commenced preceptor, and had numerous disciples, among whom were Euripides and Pericles. He held that the moon was inhabited, and that the sun was a mass of burning matter, from which the other heavenly bodies derive light and heat. For these opinions, so contrary to the superstitious ideas of the Athenians, which ascribed divinity to those luminaries, he was charged with atheism and condemned to death, which sentence, through the exertions of Pericles, was changed to banishment. He then retired to Lampacus, where he taught philosophy till his death, which happened B. C. 428, at the age of 70. In his last illness his friends asked him if his body should be carried to Clazomene, on which he gave this remarkable answer, "it would answer no purpose, as the passage to hades was the same from one place as another." His only wish was, that the day of his death should be kept as a holiday yearly by the boys of Lampacus, which was complied with.—Diog. Lært. Stanley. Moreri.

ANAXANDRIDES, king of Sparta, began his reign about 550 B. C. He had two wives, which was unusual among the Lacedæmonians; by one he had a son, called Cleomenes, who succeeded him; and by the other, three children, one of whom was the famous Leonidas.—Univ. Hist.

ANAXANDRIDES, a comic poet of Rhodes, in the time of Philip of Macedon, who was starved to death for censuring the government of Athens.—Vossius. Bayle.

ANAXARCHUS, a philosopher of Abdera, and the favourite of Alexander the Great. He is said to have been pounded to death in an iron mortar by command of Nicoreon, king of Cyprus, but the story does not appear well founded, as he gained the name of the Fortunate.—Diog. Lært. Stanley's Lives of Philosophers.

ANAXILAUS, a pythagorean philosopher in the time of Augustus, who banished him from Italy as a magician, though he appears only to have been a juggler, A. D. 28.—Plin. Nat. Hist.

ANAXIMANDER, a philosopher of Miletus, the disciple and successor of Thales. He had a considerable knowledge of astronomy and geography, and was the first who noticed the obliquity of the ecliptic; he taught that the moon receives her light from the sun, and that the earth is globular: to him is ascribed the invention of the sphere, and geographical charts. He lived B. C. 547. He is not to be confounded with Anaximander the historian, who was also of Miletus, and is mentioned by Diogenes Lærtius.—Stanley. Moreri.

ANAXIMENES, the pupil and successor of Anaximander, the philosopher, maintained that "air" was the first principle of all things. Pliny attributes to him the invention of the sun-dial; he flourished B. C. 548.—Plin. Nat. Hist. Vossius.

ANAXIMENES, of Lampacus, a Greek historian, who instructed Alexander the Great in rhetoric, and accompanied him in the war against the Persians. His country having joined Darius, Alexander threatened its ruin, but was diverted from his purpose by Anaximenes. He wrote a history of Greece, and the lives of Philip and Alexander. His nephew Anaximenes wrote a historical treatise on the death of kings, cited by Clemens Alexandrinus.—Vossius de Hist. Græc.

ANCHARANO (Peter d'), a learned civilian of Bologna, was brought up under Baldus, whom he equalled in reputation. He died in 1417. He wrote commentaries on the Decretals.—Moreri.

ANCILLON (David), a French divine, was born at Metz in 1617. He had the early part of his education in the jesuit's college, and then went to Geneva, where he studied divinity. He was for some years minister of the church of Meaux, from whence he removed to Metz; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Frankfort. The same year he was called to the co-pastorship of the French church at Hanoü, where he was greatly followed. This excited the envy of his colleagues, who making his situation uneasy, he quitted it, and went first to Frankfort, from whence he removed to Berlin, and officiated as minister of the French church; here he enjoyed great favour, and his family were honoured with places of profit and distinction. He died at Berlin in 1692. He published, 1. A Relation of the Controversy concerning Traditions, 4to. 1657. 2. An Apology for Luther, Zuinglius, and Beza, 1666. 3. The Life of William Farel. His son printed a miscellany of his conversations, 2 vols. 12mo.—Byle.

ANCILLON (Charles), eldest son of the above, was born at Metz, in 1659. He became inspector of the French courts of justice at Berlin, and historiographer to the king of Prussia. He wrote some books against the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and other works. He died at Berlin in 1715.—Ibid.

ANCOURT (Florent-Carton d'), a French comic writer and actor, was born at Fontainebleau in 1661, and educated in the jesuit's college at Paris. He studied the civil law, and was admitted advocate at the age of 17, but on marrying an actress he quitted the bar for the stage, in which line he acquired a great reputation. He also wrote several plays, which had great success. Lewis XIV. distinguished him by many marks of favour. In 1718 he quitted the stage, and spent the remainder of his days in devotion. He died in 1726. His works were published in 9 vols. 12mo. 1729.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANCUS MARTIUS, fourth king of Rome, was the grandson of Numa Pompilius. He was elected B. C. 634. He obtained triumphs for victories gained over the Latins, Sabines, and Veientes, and extended his territories to the sea coast, where he built the port of Ostia. He died after a reign of 34 years.—Livy. Florus.

ANDERSON (Alexander), a Scotch mathematician of the 16th century. He was professor of mathematics at Paris, where he published, in 1592, a Supplement to Apollonius.—Vossius de Mathem.

ANDERSON (Andrew), a Scotch printer at Edinburgh, who in the reign of Charles II. obtained a patent for printing every thing in Scotland for 41 years. It was afterwards restricted to bibles and acts of parliament. Gen. Biog. D.

ANDERSON (Adam), a Scottish writer of considerable merit, was for 40 years clerk in the South Sea house, and also chief clerk of the stock and new annuities; he was besides a trustee for establishing the colony of Georgia in America, and one of the court of assistants of the Scots corporation in London. In 1762 he published the Historical and Chronological Deduction of Trade and Commerce, of which a new edition has since appeared in 4 vols. 4to. Mr. Anderson was thrice married, and died in 1775.—Ibid.

ANDERSON (Sir Edmund), an English judge, was born in Lincolnshire, and educated in Lincoln college, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. About 1578 he was made a judge, and in 1582 lord chief justice of the common pleas. He was in the commission for trying Mary, queen of Scots; and presided at the trial of Secretary Davison, for issuing the warrant by which that unhappy princess was executed. The chief justice was an able lawyer, and kept strictly to the letter of the statutes. He was, however, of a haughty and inflexible temper, and ventured on some occasions to oppose the arbitrary measures of the court. He died in 1605. His Reports were printed in 1644, fol. and Resolutions and Judgments in the Courts of Westminster in the latter end of Elizabeth, in 1653.—Biog. Brit.

ANDERSON (James), was born at Edinburgh in 1670, and became an advocate. In 1700 he was appointed clerk to the Scotch parliament, and in 1704 he printed a Vindication of the Independency of Scotland, for which he received the thanks of the parliament, and a pension of four hundred pounds a year. He made a collection of Scottish records, which was published in 1 vol. folio, with a preface by Thomas Rudiman. He died in 1712.—Gen. B. D.

ANDERSON (John), a Scotch divine, was born in 1678, and received his education at St. Andrew's, where he took the degree of A. M. In 1704 he became minister of Dumbarton, from whence he removed in 1716 to Glasgow. He was a zealous defender of presbyterianism, and died in 1720.—Ibid.

ANDERSON (John), was born in 1674 at Hamburg, of which city he became syndic, and was employed in negotiating its concerns in different courts of Europe. He published the Natural History of Iceland, Greenland, Davis's Straits, and other Northern Regions. He died in 1743.—Moreri.

ANDERSON (George), an English mathematician, was born at Weston, in Buckinghamshire, in 1760. His parents were common peasants, and he was obliged to work as a day labourer. His genius, however, overcame every difficulty, and he attained of himself a great knowledge of the mathematics. His extraordinary acquirements and modesty recommended him to a worthy clergyman, who sent him to a grammar school, and next to New college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. He entered into deacon's orders, but having no relish for a country curacy, he went to London, and after waiting some months, obtained a place as clerk to the board of controul, under Mr. Dundas. He attended with such assiduity to business, as to lay the foundation of a disorder which carried him off, April 30, 1796. He left a widow, who, in consideration of her husband's merits, obtained a pension. Mr. Anderson published Arenarius, or a treatise on measuring the fands, translated from the Greek of Archimedes; and a General View of the Variations which have taken place in the Affairs of the East-India Company, since the conclusion of the war in India, in 1784.—Annual Necrology for 1798.

ANDIER DES ROCHERS (John), engraver to the king of France, was born at Lyons, and settled at Paris, where he died in 1741, very old. He engraved several pieces after Correggio: but his greatest work is a series of portraits of eminent persons, consisting of above 700.—Now, Dict. Hist.

ANDOCIDES, an Athenian orator, who lived B. C. 470; he was banished from his country several times, but as often recalled. There are four orations of his in the Orationes Græci of Stephens, 1575, folio.—Plutarch. Fabricius.

ANDRADA (Diego de Payva d'), a Portuguese divine, was born at Coimbra, and distinguished himself at the council of Trent, the canons of which he defended against Chemnitius. He died in 1575, aged 47. He had two brothers, 1. Francis, who was historiographer to the king of Spain, and wrote the history of John III. king of Portugal, printed in 1533. 2. Thomas, a monk, and called by his order Thomas of Jesus. He attended king Sebastian to Africa, where the Moors shut him up in a cave. In this place he wrote a book entitled, The Sufferings of Jesus, which was translated into English by Welton. He died in 1582.—Moreri.

ANDRADA (Anthony d'), a Portuguese Jesuit, who discovered in 1694 the country of Cathay and Thibet, of which he published an account. He died in 1634.—Ibid.

ANDRE (Nathaniel St.), a French surgeon, who attended Mr. Pope, and was imposed upon by Mary Tofts the rabbit breeder, for which he apologised in the papers in 1726. He died at Southampton in 1776.—Ger. Biog. Dict.

ANDRE (John), an unfortunate British officer, was originally a merchant's clerk, but quitted the counting house for the camp, and so highly distinguished himself in the American war, as quickly to be raised to the rank of major. General Clinton had so high an opinion of his address and integrity, that when the American general, Arnold, made a secret offer of surrendering an important post to the British, he employed the major on the dangerous mission. Mr. André, on being challenged by the American guard, imprudently offered them his watch and purse, which they nobly refused, and conducted him to their commanding officer, by whose orders he was searched, and the fatal papers discovered. General Washington caused him to be tried as a spy by a court-martial, and the major was condemned to be hung, which sentence was rigorously executed. On going to the place of execution he said, with concern, "Must I die in this manner?" Being told it was unavoidable, he replied, "I am reconciled to my fate, but not to the mode; it will, however, be but a momentary pang." His fortitude excited the admiration, and melted the hearts of all the spectators. He was asked if he had any thing to say: "Nothing (says he), but to request that you will witness to the world that I die like a brave man." The conduct of the American commander on this occasion is not to be excused; and the intelligence was received in England with general indignation. A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, on which is the following inscription: "Sacred to the memory of Major John André, who raised by his merit, at an early period of his life, to the rank of adjutant general of the British forces in America, and employed in an important but hazardous enterprise, fell a sacrifice to his zeal for his king and country, on the 2d of October 1780, aged 29, universally beloved and esteemed by the army in which he served, and lamented even by his foes. His gracious sovereign king George III. has caused this monument to be erected."—Ann. Reg. 1780.

ANDREAS (James), an eminent German reformer, was born in the duchy of Wirtemberg in 1528. In 1546 he was appointed minister of the church of Stutgard; but on the publication of the interim, he retired to Tübingen. He was at the diet of Ratibon, and was one of the secretaries at the conference at Worms. He was also at the diet of Augsburg; and soon after was made chancellor and rector of the university of Tübingen. He died in 1590. Andreas was employed in reforming most of the churches in Germany, and wrote several learned treatises, the most known of which is that on concord.—Melch. Adam, Vit. Germ. Theol.

ANDREAS (John), a celebrated canonist of the 14th century, was born at Muzello, near Florence, and educated at Bologna, under Guy-de Baif. He gained great reputation as professor of civil law at Padua and Bologna. His daughter, Novella, in his absence used to read lectures to his pupils, and had a curtain drawn before her that the attention of the auditors might not be taken off by her beauty. His affection for her was so great, that he entitled his commentary on the decretals of Gregory X. the Novellæ. She was married to John Calderinus, a famous canonist. Andreas wrote many learned works, and died in 1348.—Boyle.

ANDREAS (John), a Moorish convert, was born at Xativa, in the kingdom of Valentia, and succeeded his father as alcajui of that city. He became a convert to christianity, on which he was ordained a priest, and was employed as a missionary among the Moors of Granada. He translated from the Arabic into Spanish the law of the Moors, and wrote a book entitled the Confusion of the Sect of Mohammed. It has been translated from the original Spanish into several languages.—Bayle.

ANDREAS (John Valentine), a German protestant divine, was born in 1546, and died in 1654. He wrote several mystical books in Latin, which have made some believe that he was the founder of the sect of rosicrucians.—Moreri.

ANDREX (John Gerhard Reinhard), an ingenious naturalist of Hanover, was born in 1724. His father was an apothecary, and his son succeeded him in his business. He gained an extensive knowledge in chemistry, botany, and natural history, and travelled through several countries to make himself acquainted with their productions. He published several pieces on the favourite subjects of his studies: particularly a Tour in Switzerland, 1776, &c. and a treatise on the several kinds of Earth in Hanover, 1769. He died in 1793.—Schlichtegroll's Necrology.

ANDREINI (Isabella), a celebrated actress of Padua, was born in 1562. She was also esteemed a good poetess, and was admitted a member of the academy at Padua. When in France she received the most flattering marks of distinction from their majesties. She died at Lyons in 1604. Her husband, Francis Andreini, caused her to be interred in that city, and erected a monument to her memory. Her poems were printed at Milan in 1605.—Bayle.

ANDREINI (Francis), husband of the preceding, was for a length of time a comedian, but quitted that profession on the death of his wife, and became an author. He wrote some dialogues which passed through several editions.—Ibid.

ANDRELINUS (Publius Faustus), a native of Forli in Italy, was professor of poetry and philosophy in the university of Paris, and poet-laureat to Lewis XII. He wrote moral and proverbial letters, which were printed at Strasburg in 1571. His poems, which are mostly in Latin, are to be found in the first tome of the Deliciz poetarum halorum. He died in 1518.—Ibid.

ANDREW (St.), the apostle, was born at Bethsaida in Galilee, and with his brother Peter followed their father's trade of a fisherman, till called by our Saviour. He had been the disciple of John the baptist, whom he left to follow Jesus Christ. He is said to have preached the gospel in Scythia, and to have been crucified on a cross shaped like the letter X.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

ANDREW I. king of Hungary, was the eldest son of Ladislaus the bald. He and his brother Bela were obliged to quit Hungary in 1044, on the accession of Peter. Afterwards they were recalled by the Hungarians, on promising to abolish christianity, and to restore paganism. But when Andrew got possession of the throne, he broke this engagement, and compelled his subjects to turn christians. He was defeated and slain by his brother in 1059.—Med. Un. Hist.

ANDREW II. succeeded his nephew Ladislaus as king of Hungary in 1204. He was engaged in the crusade against the Turks; and on his return, endeavoured to reform the manners of his subjects. He died in 1235.—Ibid.

ANDREW III. king of Hungary, was the grandson of the preceding, and ascended the throne on the death of Ladislaus, in 1299. He was opposed by Charles, son of the king of Sicily by a sister of Ladislaus; and these rivals kept Hungary in a distracted state till their deaths, which happened in the same year, 1305.—Ibid.

ANDREW of Hungary, king of Naples, called by the Neapolitans Andreasso, was the second son of Charobert, king of Hungary. He married Joan, queen of Naples, who caused him to be murdered in 1345, in the 19th year of his age.—Ibid.

ANDREW, bishop of Crete, was born at Damascus, and died about 720. He wrote commentaries on the scriptures, and sermons, which were pulished at Paris, 1644, folio.—Cave, Hist. Lit. Fabricius.

ANDREW (John), secretary of the vatican library; died in 1493. He was a learned and industrious man, and became bishop of Aleria in Corsica. He edited Livy, Anlus Gellius, and Herodotus, with other works.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANDREW of Ratisbon, an historian of the 15th century. He wrote a chronicle of the dukes of Bavaria, and a history of Bohemia.—Viss. de Hist. Lat.

ANDREW, bishop of Samosata, lived in the 5th century. He zealously vindicated Theodoret against Cyril. Some epistles of his are extant.—Dupin.

ANDREW of Pisa, a sculptor and architect, was born in 1270. He built many superb structures at Florence; and the arsenal of Venice is said to have been designed by him. He was also a painter, poet, and musician. He died in 1345.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANDREW DEL SARTO, an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1480. His copy of the portrait of Leo X. by Raphael, was taken for the original by Julio Romano, though that painter did the drapery of the picture himself. He died in 1530.—D'Argenville, vies des Peintres.

ANDREW (Tobias), professor of history and Greek at Groningen. He was a zealous cartesian, and wrote in defence of that system a treatise entitled Methodi Cartesianæ assertio, printed in 1653. He died in 1676.—Bayle.

ANDREW (Valerius), was born in Brabant, 1588. He became professor of civil law at Louvain, and librarian of that university. He wrote a book entitled Bibliotheca Belgica de Belgis vita Scriptisque clavis, printed in 1643. He was alive in 1632.—Moreri.

ANDREW (Yves Mary), a French jesuit, was born in 1675; he became professor of mathematics at Caen in 1726, and held it till 1759. He died in 1764. His Treatise on Man is a judicious philosophical discourse on the union between the soul and body; but his most celebrated piece is the Essay on Beauty. All his works were printed in 1766, in 5 vols. 12mo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANDREWS (Lancelot), an English prelate, was born in London, in 1565. From merchant Taylors' school he was sent on an exhibition to Pembroke-hall, Cambridge; where having taken his degrees in arts, he applied himself to divinity. Sir Francis Walsingham obtained for him the living of St. Giles, Cripplegate, and afterwards a prebend and residentiaryship of St. Paul's. On the death of Mr. Fulke he was chosen master of Pembroke-hall, to which he was a great benefactor. He was also appointed one of the chaplains to queen Elizabeth, who greatly admired his preaching. King James I. employed him to defend the sovereignty of kings against Bellarmine, who had attacked it under the name of Matthew Tortus. Dr. Andrews did this in a piece called Tortura Torti, for which he was made almoner to the king, a privy counsellor, dean of the chapel royal, and successively bishop of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester. The following anecdote of bishop Andrews will shew him to great advantage. Waller the poet was one day at court, while king James was at dinner, who was attended by the bishop of Winchester, and Neale, bishop of Durham. His majesty said to the prelates, "My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money when I want it, without all this formality in parliament?" Bishop Neale quickly replied, "God forbid, sir, but you should; you are the breath of our nostrils." On which the king said to the bishop of Winchester, "Well, my lord, and what say you?" "Sir," replied Andrews, "I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases." The king answered, "No put off, my lord; answer me presently." "Then, sir," said he, "I think it lawful for you to take my brother Neale's money, for he offers it." He died in 1626, and was buried in the church of St. Saviour's Southwark, where there is a monument to his memory. He had a share in the present translation of the bible. A volume of his sermons was printed after his death, by bishops Laud and Buckeridge. His private devotions and meditations in Greek were translated into English by Dr. Stanhope.—Bigg. Brit.

ANDREWS, or ANDREWE (Eusebius), a gentleman of a good family in Middlesex, who was secretary to Lord Capel, and a barrister. In 1642 he quitted the gown and took up arms in defence of Charles I. whom he served as colonel. On the failure of the king's affairs he settled in London, and practised the law; but being a suspected royalist, traps were laid to entangle him in a conspiracy against the usurpers. By these he was ensnared and brought before the high court of justice, as it was called, where he made so gallant a defence that the court itself became generally odious, and was discontinued. The sentence of hanging and quartering was changed, by his petition, into decapitation, which he suffered with christian fortitude on Tower-hill, August 22, 1650.—Ibid.

ANDRISCUS, an impostor who assumed the name of Philip, son of Perseus, king of Macedon. The Macedonians acknowledged him, and the Romans sent an army against him under the command of Scipio Nasica, whom Andriscus defeated, and thus established himself on the throne. He was afterwards defeated by Metellus, on which he took refuge among the Thracians, who delivered him to the Romans, and he was put to death by order of the senate, B. C. 147.—Univ. Hist.

ANDROMACHUS, a native of Crete, was physician to Nero in 65. He invented the-riaca, which he described in some elegiac verses addressed to the emperor.—Bayle. Vossius.

ANDRONICUS I. Comnenus, a Greek emperor, was the son of Isaac, and grandson of Alexis Comnenus. He was imprisoned for treasonable practices against the emperor Manuel, twelve years, but at last effected his escape, and fled to Russia. On the accession of Alexis II. who was quite a youth, he got himself chosen as a partner in the government, and in no long time contrived to put his innocent coadjutor to death, in 1183. Andronicus behaved in the most tyrannical and cruel manner to his subjects, particularly to those who were any way related to the royal family. At last the people, wearied with his oppressions, raised Isaac Angelus, a descendant of Alexis I. to the throne, who caused Andronicus to be given up to the insults of the populace. He endured the most miserable torments with uncommon patience, and behaved in his last moments like a true penitent. He died in 1185, aged 73.—Med. Un. Hist.

ANDRONICUS II. Palæologus, came to the crown in 1283. He was deposed by his grandson Andronicus the younger, on which he retired to a monastery, where he died in 1332, aged 74.—Ibid.

ANDRONICUS III. Palæologus. He was the grandson of the preceding, whom he deprived of his crown. He fell a victim to an irregular life, aged 45, in 1341.—Ibid.

ANDRONICUS (Cyrestes), an Athenian, who first applied himself to the study of the winds. He built the famous octagonal temple of the winds at Athens, and was the inventor of weathercocks.—Aulus Gellius.

ANDRONICUS (Livius), the oldest drama-the author in the Latin language. His first piece was performed about 240 years before Christ. His works are lost.—Vossius de poet. Lat.

ANDRONICUS, of Rhodes, a peripatetic philosopher, to whom we are indebted for restoring and publishing the works of Aristotle, in the time of Sylla. He also wrote commentaries on some of that philosopher's writings. He lived B. C. 63.—Boyle.

ANDRONICUS, of Thessalonica, a learned man of the 15th century, who taught the Greek language at various places with great reputation. He died at Paris in 1479.—Moreri.

ANDROUET DU CIRCEAU (James), a French architect of the 16th century. He designed the grand gallery of the Louvre, the Pont-Neuf, and many other noble edifices. He left France on account of his religion in 1585, and died abroad. He wrote on architecture and perspective.—D'Argenville vies des Architectes.

ANDRY (Nicholas), a French physician, was born at Lyons in 1658. He became a professor in the royal college, and dean of the faculty of medicine. He died in 1742, aged 84. His writings are, 1. A treatise on the Generation of Worms in the human Body. 2. Orthopædia, or the art of correcting deformities in children. 3. On Phlebotomy.—Moreri. Haller's Bibl. Med.

ANELLO, see MASSANIELLO.

ANEURIN, called the sovereign of bards and of flowing muse, a British poet of great celebrity. He was likewise a chieftain among the Olodinian Britons, who bore a conspicuous part in the battle of Cattraeth, which he made the subject of a noble poem, to be found in the Welsh archæology, with another piece of his, entitled the Odes of the Months, being all that is preserved of his works. He flourished at the beginning of the 6th century, and died about A. D. 570. It is supposed, with some plausibility, that Aneurin was no other than the celebrated Gildas the ecclesiastical historian.—Owen's Cambrian Biog.

ANGE DE ST. JOSEPH (Le Père), a carmelite of Thoulouse, was a missionary in Persia. He translated the Persian Pharmacopæia into Latin, which was printed at Paris in 1681, 8vo. He also published the Gazophylacium Linguz Perlarum, Amst. 1684, fol. He died in 1697.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANGE DE ST. ROSALIE, an Augustine monk, was born at Blois in 1655, and died in 1726. He compiled the History of the House of France and of the great Officers of the Crown, which was published after his death in 9 vols. fol. He was also the author of the State of France, in 5 vols. 12mo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANGELI (Peter), a modern Latin poet, was a native of Barga in Tuscany. He became professor of ethics and politics, in the university of Pisa, where he died in 1596. He wrote several Latin poems, the most esteemed of which are, 1. Cynegeticon, or of the Chase, 1568, 8vo. 2. Syrius, or the Expedition of Godfrey of Bouillon, for the recovery of the Holy Land, 1591, 4to. He died in 1596, aged 79.—Moreri.

ANGELI (Bonaventure), an Italian writer, was professor of law at Ferrara, which place he quitted, and settled at Parma, where he died in 1576. He wrote the history of Parma, which was printed in 1591.—Moreri.

ANGELI (Baldus), a physician, was born in Romana, in the 16th century. He wrote a Latin piece, on the nature of vipers, printed in 1589, 4to.—Gen. B. D.

ANGELICO (John), an Italian painter, was born at Fiesole, and entered into the society of dominicans. He painted the chapel of Nicholas V. who offered him the archbishopric of Florence, which he refused. He died in 1455, aged 68.—Vasari vies des Peintres.

ANGELIS (Dominico de), an Italian ecclesiastic, was born in 1675, at Lecce, in the kingdom of Naples. Philip V. king of Naples, appointed him principal historiographer. He died in 1719. He wrote several historical and biographical pieces of merit, in the Italian language, besides some poems.—Moreri.

ANGELO, see BUONAROTTI.

ANGELO (Thomas d'), a dominican, died at Messina, 1720. He wrote an ecclesiastical history of Sicily, and other works.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANGELONI (Francis), an historian, was born at Terni, in the duchy of Spalatto, and died at Rome in 1652. He wrote an illustration of the history of Rome by medals, which was printed in 1685, fol. also the history of Terni, 4to. 1646.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANGELUS (Christopher), a native of Greece, who after suffering many cruelties from the Turks, arrived in England, where he was well received. He taught Greek in the university of Oxford, and wrote several books; the most interesting of which is, an account of his sufferings, printed in 1617, in Greek and English. He died in 1638.—Moreri.

ANGIER (Samuel) a nonconformist divine, was born at Dedham in Essex, and bred at Emanuel College, Cambridge; after which he settled as minister at Denton in Lancashire, till he was ejected by the act of uniformity in 1662. He died in 1677, aged 72. He wrote a treatise concerning God's worship, entitled, "A Help to better Hearts for better Times."—Calamy.

ANGILBERT (St.), was born in Neustria, and educated at the court of Charlemagne, whose daughter he married. That monarch also made him his secretary, and ambassador, and governor of the French coast, from the Scheldt to the Seine. He afterwards entered into the monastery of Centula, or Requier, of which he became abbot, and died in 814.—Gen. B. D.

ANGIOLELLO (John), an historian, was born at Vicenza. Being taken captive by the Turks, he became slave to sultan Mustapha, whom he attended in an expedition to Persia in 1573. He wrote the history of Mahomet II. in the Italian and Turkish languages; also the history of Uffun Casson.—Boyle.

ANGLIUS (Gilbertus), an eminent English physician, about the end of the 13th century. He wrote a compendium of physics.—Gen. B. D.

ANGLICUS (Ricardus), an English medical writer, lived about 1230. He studied at Oxford and Paris. His works are lost.—Ibid.

ANGLUS (Thomas), an English priest, whose family name was White, which he used to disguise under that of Anglus, Albius, or Richworth. He was the friend of Sir Kenelm Digby, and adopted his opinions. He resided chiefly at Rome or Paris, and was well known by his philosophical publications, in which he was a great champion for Aristotle. Some of his books were condemned at Rome and at Douay. He died in the reign of Charles II.—Boyle.

ANGUIER (Francis and Michael), two sculptors, were natives of Eu in Normandy. Francis was made keeper of the royal cabinet of antiquities, and executed several great works, particularly the tomb of James Souvre, at St. John de Lateran, and the mausoleum of the duke of Montmorency. He died in 1669. Michael performed still greater works than his brother. The last piece of his was a large crucifix over the high altar of the church of the Sorbonne. He died in 1686.—D'Argenville vies des Sculpteurs.

ANGUILLARA (John Andrew dell'), an Italian poet, was born in 1517. He wrote a tragedy, entitled Oedipus, and translated Ovid's Metamorphoses, printed at Venice, 1554, 4to.—Tiraboschi.

ANGUSCIOLA (Sophonisba), an Italian of great eminence in historical and portrait painting. She was born in 1533, at Almona, and died in 1626. She had two sisters, Lucia and Europe, both ingenious in the same walk with their sister. Sophonisba became blind by over application to her profession.—Pilkington.

ANICETUS, pope, succeeded Pius about 157. He filled the see of Rome 11 years.—Plinius. Moreri.

ANICH (Peter), an ingenious mathematician, was the son of a labourer, at Oberperaus, near Inspruck, where he was born in 1723. His genius being discovered by father Hill, a jesuit, in the university of Inspruck, he became his tutor and patron. In a little while Anich became an able astronomer, and ingenious mechanic. He made an elegant pair of globes for the university of Inspruck, and constructed various mathematical instruments. He also drew maps and charts with great accuracy and neatness. He died in 1766, and the empress queen, from a regard to his merit, settled a pension of 50 florins a year on his sister.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

ANICHIINI (Lewis), a native of Ferrara in Italy, who made a medal for pope Paul III. on which was represented the interview between Alexander the great and the high priest at Jerusalem, so exquisitely engraved, that Michael Angelo, on viewing it, exclaimed that the art was arrived at the height of perfection.—Moreri.

ANNA COMNENA, daughter of the emperor Alexis Comnenus I. was a princess of extraordinary talents. She was married to a man of rank, named Nicephorus Bryennius, and was concerned in a conspiracy against her brother the emperor, which was frustrated. She was treated with great lenity, but lost all favour at court, in consequence of which she went into retirement, where she employed herself in writing the history of the reign of her father. This work, which has great merit, is still extant.—Vossius. Dupin. Gibbon.

ANNA IVANOVNA, empress of Russia, was the daughter of the czar Ivan Alexiovitch, and born in 1693. In 1710 she married Frederick William, duke of Courland, who died without issue the year following. She then took into favour Ernest John Biren, a man of low origin, by whom she was ruled in an arbitrary manner the remainder of her life. In 1730 she ascended the throne of Russia, and Biren managed all the affairs of government with such rigour, that it is said above twenty thousand persons were banished to Siberia. The empress herself was, however, meek and merciful; but she was forced to acts which she disapproved, by a wretch to whom she had yielded up her affection. She died in 1740, aged 47, leaving her crown to her grand nephew Ivan, under the guardianship of Biren.—Coxe. Novo. Dict. Hist.

ANNAND (William), a Scotch divine, was born at Edinburgh in 1633, and educated at Oxford. In 1670 he was made dean of Edinburgh, where he died in 1689. He wrote several theological tracts.—Wood, A. O. Biog. Br.

ANNAT (Francis), a French jesuit, and confessor to Lewis XIV. was born in 1590. He wrote many books in Latin and French, particularly against the provincial letters of M. Pascal. He was a learned, liberal, and pious man, and died at Paris in 1670.—Boyle.

ANNE of Austria, queen of France, was daughter of Philip III. king of Spain, and married Lewis XIII. in 1615. She lived on very bad terms with her husband, owing to cardinal Richelieu, who persuaded him that she was engaged in conspiracies. On the death of Lewis, she became sole regent during the minority of her son Lewis XIV. By placing her confidence in cardinal Mazarine, she embroiled herself with the nation, and was obliged to fly from Paris. At length matters were accommodated, and when the king took upon himself the government in 1661, she went into retirement, and died in 1666.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

ANNE of Beaujeu, daughter of Lewis XI. and wife of the duke of Bourbon, was appointed regent during the minority of her brother Charles VIII. She was an active and enterprising princess, and died in 1522, aged about 60.—Moreri.

ANNE of Britany, daughter of Francis I. duke of Britany, and queen of France, was first the wife of Maximilian of Austria, next of Charles VIII. of France, and lastly of Lewis XII. his successor. She was a woman of high mind, but of a liberal disposition, and died in 1514, aged 38.—Ibid.

ANNE of Cleves, the wife of Henry VIII. king of England, was the daughter of John III. duke of Cleves. A picture of her, by Holbein, being shewn to the English monarch by Thomas lord Cromwell, he demanded her in marriage; but soon growing disgusted with the "Flanders Mare" as he politely called her, a divorce ensued, and Anne, no way disconcerted, returned to her own country, where she died in 1557.—De Tbov. Hist. Moreri.

ANNE, queen of Great Britain, was the 3d daughter of James II. by lady Anne Hyde, daughter of the great earl of Clarendon, and was born in 1664. In 1683 she married prince George of Denmark, by whom she had several children, but all of them died young. In 1702 she succeeded to the crown on the death of William III. by whom she had been always treated with great unkindness, and sometimes with brutal rudeness. Her reign was a continual scene of public glory; and the domineering power of the French nation was completely subdued by the vigour of the British troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough. She had also some of the first statesmen in the world for her ministers, in the former part of her reign, but at length the contentions of party threatened to throw the nation into confusion, which was prevented by the death of the queen in August 1714. One of the greatest events of this important reign was the union with Scotland. On account of the number of eminent literary characters which flourished at this period it has been called the Augustan Age of Britain. Queen Anne, though too much the dupe of her ministers and favourites, will ever stand distinguished for her unshaken attachment to the church of England, and for the excellence of her private character.—Hume. Smollet.

ANNESLEY (Samuel), a nonconformist divine, was born in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained the degree of LL. D. in consequence of his zeal for the parliament cause in the great rebellion. He preached some violent sermons against the crown and church, for which he was presented to the vicarage of St. Giles, Cripplegate, but in 1662 was ejected from it for nonconformity. He died in 1696, aged 76. John Wesley, the founder of the methodists, was his grandson by the mother's side. The doctor has some sermons in print.—Calamy.

ANNESLEY (Arthur), earl of Anglesey, was born in 1614, at Dublin. At the age of 16 he was entered of Magdalen college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's-inn, where he studied the law, and then went on his travels. At the beginning of the rebellion he joined the royal party, and sat in the parliament at Oxford in 1643, but afterwards he made his peace with the republicans, and was sent commissioner to Ulster in 1645. He took an active part in the restoration of the king, with whom he held a correspondence while his majesty was in exile, and for which he was created earl of Anglesey, and in 1667 made treasurer of the navy. In 1672 he was appointed a commissioner for inspecting the settlements of Ireland, and the next year was made lord privy seal. In 1680 he was accused by Dangerfield, at the bar of the house of commons, with endeavouring to stifle evidence concerning the popish plot. In 1682 he presented a spirited remonstrance to Charles II. relative to the state of the nation, and the danger to be apprehended from the duke of York's being a papist. Soon after he was dismissed from his office, on which he retired to his country seat, where he devoted himself to his studies. He died in 1686, leaving several children. He wrote a History of the Troubles of Ireland, from 1641 to 1660, which is lost; but his Memoirs, published in 1603, 8vo. are full of curious and interesting matter.—Biog. Brit.

ANNIUS of Viterbo, whose true name was John Nanni, a dominican monk and master of the sacred palace; died at Rome in 1502, aged 70. He wrote 17 books of antiquities, pretended to be the remains of several eminent ancient authors, particularly Manetho, Archilochus, and Xenophon. They were first printed in 1498, folio. The fraud was well managed, and imposed for a time upon several learned men.—Bayle.

ANSCHARIUS, bishop of Hamburgh and Bremen, was born in France in 801. He was very successful in converting the Danes to christianity, and died in 865.—Dupin. Moreri.

ANSGISUS, abbot of Lobbes, a benedictine monastery in the diocese of Cambrai. He lived in the 9th century, and compiled, in 827, the capitularies of Charlemagne, and Lewis the Godly.—Ibid.

ANSELM, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Aost, in Piedmont, in 1033. He became a monk in the abbey of Bec in Normandy, of which he became abbot. In 1093 he was made archbishop of Canterbury by William Rufus, to whom he had been confessor. But soon after differences arose between the king and the archbishop, which were aggravated by the obstinate attachment of the latter to the pope's authority. The archbishop left the kingdom by stealth, and as soon as he was gone, the king seized upon his revenues. Anselm went to Rome, where he was honourably entertained by the pope, whom he accompanied to the council of Bari, where he distinguished himself by refusing the objections of the Greeks with respect to the procession of the Holy Ghost. The pope afterwards deserted Anselm, who went to Lyons, where he resided till the death of William, when he returned to England, and was received with great respect; but a new rupture arose, occasioned by the archbishop's refusing to be re-invested by the king; on which the dispute was referred to the pope, who decided in favour of Anselm. This induced the nobility to advise the king to break absolutely with Rome, in consequence of which some of them were excommunicated. At length the pope made a concession, by allowing the English bishops and abbots to do homage to the king for their temporalities, which restored Anselm to favour. He died at Canterbury in 1109. His works were printed at Cologne in 1612, and at Lyons in 1630. He was the first archbishop who restrained the English clergy from marrying, in a synod held at Westminster in 1102.—Biog. Br.

ANSELM of Paris, an augustin monk, was born in 1025. He wrote the Historical Genealogies of the House of France, 1694. It was continued by father Angé in 1726, 9 vols. fol. He died in 1694.—Moreri.

ANSELM, a Latin poet, was the friend of Mark Anthony, who gave him a country seat at Palernum, in return for his panegyrical verses. He is mentioned, but not with respect, by Virgil and Ovid.—Vossius de Hist. Lat.

ANSON (George lord), was born at his father's seat in Staffordshire, in 1697. He went to sea very early, and in 1724 was made post-captain. Being sent to South Carolina, he purchased land, and built a town there, which is called after his name. In 1739 he was chosen commander of an expedition against the Spanish settlements in South America, and sailed from Portsmouth September 18, 1740, with five men of war, a sloop, and two victuallers. He doubled Cape Horn in March, 1741, after losing two of his ships. In June following he arrived off Juan Fernandez, with no more than two ships, two tenders, and only 555 men. This place he left in September, took some prizes, burnt Païta, and continued on the American coast, in expectation of falling in with the annual Acapulco ship, till May 1742; when having only his own ship, the Centurion, of 64 guns, left, he crossed the southern ocean for China, where he staid several months, and then returned in quest of the galleon, which he fell in with, and captured after a smart action. Having sold his prize in China, he sailed for England, and arrived at Spithead, June 15, 1744, having sailed, in a fog, through the midst of a French fleet then cruising in the channel. Not long after his return he was made rear admiral of the blue, and one of the lords of the admiralty. He was also chosen member of parliament for the borough of Heydon. In 1747 he commanded the channel fleet, and captured six French men-of-war, and four East-Indiamen. For these services he was created lord Anson, baron of Soberton, in Hants, and on the death of sir John Norris, he was appointed vice-admiral of England. In 1751 he was appointed first lord of the admiralty, which post he held, with a slight interval, till his death. In 1758 he again commanded the channel fleet, having under him the gallant sir Edward Hawke. After this he was appointed admiral and commander-in-chief of his majesty's fleets. The last service he was engaged in, was in convoying to England her present majesty. He died suddenly at his seat at Moorpark, in Hertfordshire, in 1762. He married a daughter of the earl of Hardwicke, who died before him without issue. Lord Anson was a cool and steady man, but too fond of play, of which knowing little, he was the constant dupe of sharpers; this made some persons say smartly, that "though he had been round the world, he was never in it."—Biog. Br.

ANSTIS (John), an English antiquary, was born at St. Neot's in Cornwall, in 1669. He was educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. In 1702 he represented the borough of St. Germans. In 1714 he was appointed garter king at arms, which he held till his death in 1744. He published, 1. A Letter on the Honour of the Earl Marshal, 8vo. 1706. 2. The Form of the Installation of the Garter, 8vo. 1720. 3. The Register of the most noble Order of the Garter, 2 vols. folio, 1724. 4. Observations introductory to an historical Essay on the Knighthood of the Bath, 4to. 1725. His son John Anstis, LL. D. was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and was joined with his father in the office of garter. In 1725 he obtained the post of genealogist and register of the bath. He died in 1754.—Nichols's Anecd. of Bowyer.

ANTAGORAS, a Rhodian poet, in the service of Antigonus, king of Macedon. None of his works are extant.—Plutarch. Atheneæ.

ANTELM (Joseph), a French ecclesiastical historian, was canon of Frejus in Provence. He published an historical Dissertation on the Church of Frejus, and a critical Enquiry concerning the Author of Athanasius's Creed. He died in 1697, aged 47.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANTISIGNAN (Peter), a grammarian, was born in Languedoc, in the 16th century. He wrote a Greek and universal grammar, and published an edition of Terence.—Boyle.

ANTHEMIUS, emperor of the West, was grandson of Anthemius, the minister of Theodosius the younger. By marrying the daughter of the emperor Marcian, he rose to the highest offices of the state. In 467 he was called to the throne amidst the general applauses of the people. He married his daughter to Ricimer, who took arms against his father-in-law, carried Rome by storm, and murdered Anthemius in 472.—Univ. Hist.

ANTHEMIUS, a famous architect, who was employed by Justinian in building the church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, and other structures. He was also a good mathematician and experimental philosopher, and succeeded so well in imitating an earthquake, as to frighten one Zeno out of his house. He is likewise said to have made a burning glass.—Moreri.

ANTHONY (Francis), a famous empiric, was born in London in 1550, and educated at Cambridge, where he studied chemistry. He acquired a great fortune in London by the sale of a nostrum, called the aurum potable, concerning which a treatise was printed at Hamburgh in 1598. He died in 1623.—Biog. Br.

ANTHONY (John), son of the preceding, obtained a handsome income by the sale of his father's medicine. He wrote Lucas Redivivus, or the Gospel Physician, 1656, 4to. He died in 1655, aged 70, and was buried with his father in the church of St. Bartholomew the Great, London.—Ibid.

ANTIGENIDES, a Theban musician, who was famous for his skill on the flute, and had the honour of teaching Alcibiades, and other celebrated men.—Moreri.

ANTIGONUS I. a Macedonian captain, who on the death of Alexander obtained the provinces of Pamphylia, Lydia, and Phrygia Major, after which his ambition led him to enlarge his territories. He succeeded greatly, and obtained all Asia. He was slain in a battle which he fought with Seleucus and Lyfimachus at Ipsus, in the 34th year of his age, B. C. 301.—Un. Hist.

ANTIGONUS GONATUS, son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and grandson of the above, was a prince distinguished by his filial piety, and his extraordinary humanity. Though compelled to enter into war, first with the Gauls, and next with Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, in which he was successful, he shewed a noble spirit of forbearance. When his son brought him the head of Pyrrhus in triumph, he expressed his resentment at it, and caused the body to be interred with funeral honours. He died B. C. 243, aged above 80.—Ibid.

ANTIGONUS DOSON, king of Macedon, succeeded his brother Demetrius II. B. C. 237. He defeated Cleomenes, and took the city of Sparta. He also repelled the Illyrians, who had invaded his territories, and died soon after, B. C. 221, being succeeded by Philip his nephew.—Ibid.

ANTIGONUS CARYSTIUS, a Greek philosopher and historian, flourished B. C. 300. He wrote several books, one only of which remains; viz. A Collection of wonderful Stories, which was published at Basil in 1568, 8vo. and at Leyden in 1619.—Vossius de Hist. Græc. Fabricius.

ANTIGONUS SOCHÆUS, the founder of the Jewish sect of the sadducees, about 300 years B. C. He opposed the pharisees on the merit of good works, and some of his followers taught that there is no future state of rewards, or resurrection of the dead.—De Jussæ Hist. Jud.

ANTIMACHUS, a Greek poet, was the son of Hipparchus, and flourished B. C. 408. He wrote a poem entitled Thebaid, on the war of Thebes, but it is now lost.—Vossius.

ANTIMACO (Marc Anthony), a learned Italian, was a native of Mantua. He taught Greek with great reputation at Ferrara, where he died in 1552. He translated some pieces from the Greek, and wrote some Latin Poems.—Tiraboschi.

ANTINE (Maur Francois d'), a benedictine monk, was born at Gouvieux, in the diocese of Liege, in 1688. He published the first five volumes of Du Cange's Glossary in 1736; and wrote the art of verifying dates in 1750, 4to. afterwards reprinted in 1770, folio. He died in 1746.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ANTIOCHUS I. (Soter), the son of Seleucus, He fell dangerously ill in consequence of his passion for Stratonice, his mother-in-law, which being discovered by Erasistratus the physician, and communicated to the king, he gave to his son the object of his affections, together with the kingdom of Upper Asia. On his father's death he succeeded to the empire, and fixed the royal residence at Antioch. He died B. C. 261.—Univ. Hist.

ANTIOCHUS II. (Theos). He was complimented with the title of theos or god, for delivering the people of Miletus from the oppression of Timarchus, governor of Caria. In his reign the Parthians revolted, and established an independent government, and their example was followed by others; so that he saw himself stripped of a considerable part of his empire. He was poisoned by his wife Laodice, B. C. 246.—Ibid.

ANTIOCHUS III. (the Great), was the son of Seleucus Callinicus; and on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, he succeeded to the crown, B. C. 225. He was defeated by Ptolemy Philopator at Raphia, B. C. 217; in consequence of which Anriochus gave up Palestine and Cælo Syria. He afterwards marched to India, where his success was so great as to procure him the title of great. On the death of Ptolemy Philopator, who was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, Antiochus recovered Palestine and Cælo Syria, and reduced besides a great part of Upper Asia. This alarmed the free cities of Greece, who applied to the Romans for their aid, while Hannibal fought the protection of Antiochus. After several embassies had passed between the king and the republic, hostilities commenced, in which the armies of the latter, under the two Scipios, were victorious, and Antiochus was forced to make an ignoble peace. He did not long survive this disgrace, but the manner of his death, which happened B.C. 187. is uncertain.—Univ. Hist.

ANTIOCHUS IV. (Epiphanes), younger son of the above, succeeded his brother Seleucus Philopator, B.C. 176. He was a hostage at Rome for thirteen years after the defeat of his father at Magnesia. He invaded and reduced all Egypt, except Alexandria, and took the king Ptolemy Philometer prisoner, on which the people of Alexandria placed Ptolemy Euergetes on the throne. Antiochus restored his prisoner to that part of his dominions of which he was possessed; and the two brothers, after he was departed, agreed to reign in conjunction. Antiochus afterwards invaded Jerusalem, where he behaved with such horrid cruelty that the Jews revolted, and recovered their independence. He died B.C. 165, aged 39.—Ibid.

ANTIOCHUS V. (Eupator), was only nine years old at the death of his father the preceding king, and was slain by Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopator, after reigning about two years.—Ibid.

ANTIOCHUS (Sidetes, or the Hunter). was the son of Demetrius Soter. He married Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius, his brother; and having slain Tryphon, who had usurped the throne of Syria, was crowned B.C. 138. He was at last defeated, and killed in a battle with the Parthians, under Phraates, B.C. 130.—Ibid.

ANTIOCHUS (Grypus), the son of the above by Cleopatra, succeeded his brother Seleucus, who was murdered by his mother B.C. 123. Cleopatra finding that Antiochus was resolved to reign independent of her influence, prepared a bowl of poison for him, which he being aware of, obliged her to drink it, by which she suffered the fate she had merited. His half brother Cyzicus afterwards laid claim to the crown, which occasioned some bloodshed. At length it was agreed to divide the kingdom between them. Grypus was slain by one of his own subjects B.C. 97, and the other was killed by his nephew Seleucus a few years afterwards.—Ibid.

ANTIOCHUS, a stoic philosopher, flourished

ed B.C. 100. Cicero and Plutarch speak of him with great respect.—Voss. de Hist. Gr.

ANTRIOCHUS, a monk of Seba, in Palestine, in the 7th century, who wrote 190 homilies on the scriptures, still extant in the Bibl. Patrum.—Fabricius.

ANTIPATER, an eminent Jew, who was prime minister to Hyrcan, the brother and rival of Aristobulus the high priest. Antipater so ingratiated himself with the Romans as to procure the governorship of Judea, which excited the hatred of his countrymen against him. He died of poison B.C. 42.—Univ. Hist.

ANTIPATER, a native of Macedon, pupil of Aristotle, and the faithful minister of Philip and Alexander. The former monarch once coming late to the levee, said, "I have slept sound this morning, but then I knew Antipater was waking." A person observing to Alexander that all his officers of state wore purple except this prime minister; "Yes (answered he), but Antipater is all purple within." While Alexander was abroad, he left Antipater in the government of Macedon; and by his prudent management he kept all Greece in order. On the death of his master, in the general distribution of his territories, Antipater obtained the European provinces. Not long after the confederate states of Greece attacked him, but he subdued them, and totally subverted their democratic forms of government, on which he was called the father of Greece. His last advice to Polysperchon, whom he had chosen for his successor, was, "never to admit a woman to meddle in state affairs." He died B.C. 318, aged 80.—Plutarch.

ANTIPATER (Lælius Cælius), wrote the history of the punic war, which was greatly esteemed by Cicero, and preferred by the emperor Adrian to Sallust. Fragments of this work were printed by Riccoboni in 1568, and by Augustin, at Antwerp, in 1595.—Vossius.

ANTIPATER, of Sidon, a stoic philosopher and poet, is praised by Cicero and Seneca. He lived about the 171st Olympiad.—Moreri.

ANTIPATER, bishop of Bosra, in Arabia, about the end of the 5th century, wrote an answer to Eusebius's defence of Origen.—Fabric. Dupin.

ANTIPHILUS, a painter, and the rival of Apelles, is celebrated for several fine pictures, the principal of which was the representation of a youth blowing a spark of fire, whereby it should seem that the ancients were not ignorant of the magical effects of the chiaro oscuro.—Plin. Nat. Hist.

ANTIPHON (the Rhamnusian), an Athenian orator, flourished about 430 B.C. He was the first who laid down rules of oratory. He is said to have assisted in establishing the tyranny of the four hundred, for which he was put to death B.C. 411. There are sixteen orations under his name, in the collection of ancient orators.—Phæarch. Fabricius.

ANTISTHENES, founder of the sect of the cynics, was born at Athens. He got Meletus put to death, and Anytus banished, for their persecution of Socrates. His works were numerous but only a few apophthegms remain.—Stanley. Diog. Laërt.

ANTONIA, daughter of Marc Antony and Octavia, inherited the virtues and misfortunes of her mother. She was married while young to Drusus, brother of Tiberius, who expired as he was returning to receive a triumph for his victories in Germany. Antonia, disconsolate at the loss, readily refused every offer of a second marriage, but devoted herself to the education of her three children. The assassination of her son Germanicus, by order of Tiberius, and the bad conduct of her younger son Claudius, and her daughter Livilla, brought new miseries upon this excellent woman, who died in the reign of her grandson, the infamous Caligula.—Suetonius. Bayle.

ANTONIANO (Sylvio), an Italian poet and cardinal, was born at Rome in 1540, of mean parents, but shewing early marks of genius he was patronized by men of rank. Pope Pius IV. made him professor of belles lettres in the college of which he was afterwards chosen rector. Pius V. gave him the office of secretary to the sacred college, and Clement VIII. made him secretary of briefs, his chamberlain and at last cardinal. He died in the 63d year of his age, owing to excessive fatigue in application to business. He was the author of several pieces in prose and verse.—Bayle.

ANTONIDES VANDER GOES (John), a Dutch poet, was born at Goes, in Zealand, 1647. Having a natural turn for poetry, and possessing the advantages of a good education he improved his taste upon the best models of antiquity, and produced several translations of ancient authors. He next wrote a tragedy, entitled Trazil, or the Invasion of China, which was followed by a poem, entitled Bellona Chained on the peace of 1667. But his greatest work is a poem on the river Y, on which Amsterdam is built. Antonides was bred an apothecary, but under the patronage of M. Buïsero, one of the lords of the admiralty, he obtained a place at that board. He died of a consumption in 1681. His works were published at Amsterdam, in 1 vol. 4to. 1714.—Moreri.

ANTONINUS PIUS (Titus Aurelius Fulvius Boianus Antoninus), a Roman emperor, was born in 86 of a noble family. In 120 he was raised to the consulate. He was adopted by the emperor Adrian in 138, and succeeded him in the same year to the satisfaction of the whole empire. His reign was distinguished by its tranquillity, and by the emperor's uniform good management, which procured him the title of Pius. He used to say, "that he rather chose to save the life of one citizen, than to destroy a thousand enemies." This emperor was also a friend to toleration, and extended his protection to the christians. He died in 161.—Dis Cassius. Un. Hist.

ANTONINUS (Marcus Aurelius), surnamed the Philosopher, emperor of Rome was born A. D. 121. He altered his name in complaisance to the Aurelian family, by whom he was adopted. When Adrian chose Antoninus Pius for his successor, it was on condition that he should adopt Marcus Aurelius for his. In consequence he married Faustina, the daughter of that emperor, by whom he had several children. On the death of Pius he entered on the government, and chose as his colleague Lucius Verus, his son-in-law, whose character was the very reverse of that of Antoninus. He died while on an expedition against the Germans in 169, and thus the government, to the joy of the whole empire, devolved solely on Antoninus, who continued to prosecute the war with vigour; but in 174, being blocked up by the Quadi in a disadvantageous situation, the army was on the brink of perishing either by the enemy or by thirst when on a sudden the sky was overcast, and there fell a vast quantity of rain. At this juncture the enemy attacked the Romans, and would have defeated them had not a thunder-storm come on, which frightened the barbarians, and put them to the rout. Pagans and christians are agreed in the truth of this prodigy, but they account for it on different grounds; the first attribute it to a magician or Jupiter, and the latter to the prayers of the twelfth legion, consisting of christians, and which was in consequence honoured by the emperor with the title of the thundering legion. In 177 he chose his son Commodus to be consul, though only sixteen years old; he also honoured him with the title of emperor, and entered Rome with him in triumph on account of his German victories. He remitted all the debts due to himself and the public treasury for forty-first years, and applied zealously to the reformation of abuses, and the formation of beneficial regulations. In particular, he restrained the brutalities of the public games, and ordered that the gladiators should not fight but with foils. He died in 180, and his memory was so revered that the Romans enrolled him among their household deities. His Meditations have been often printed, and were translated into English by Collier, 8vo.—Dis Cassius.

ANTONINUS, a geographical writer, whose age is unknown; his valuable work, entitled Itinerarium, has been several times printed; the best edition is that by Gale, London 1709, 4to. William Eurtou published an excellent commentary on it as far as relates to Britain, in folio.—Vossius de Hist. Lat.

ANTONIO (de Messine), a native of Messina, was the first Italian who painted in oil, which art he learned of John Van Eyck in Flanders. On his return to Italy he imparted the secret to Bellini and Dominico, which last communicated it to Andrew del Castagno, who, from the desire of gain, basely assassinated him. Thus, by these incidents, oil-painting soon spread over Italy. Antonio flourished about the year 1430.—De Piles.

ANTONIO (Nicholas), a Spanish historian, was born at Seville in 1617, and educated at Salamanca. He compiled the Bibliotheca Hispanica, which was published at Rome in 1672, in 4 vols. folio. He died in 1685, and left nothing behind him but his library and his MSS. He printed in 1659 a Latin work on Exile.—Bayle. Moreri.

ANTONIUS (Marcus), a celebrated Roman orator, was made consul in the year of Rome 653, and was afterwards governor of Cilicia, where he distinguished himself by his military achievements, and obtained the honour of a triumph. After his return he discharged the office of censor with great credit. Cicero says, that in him Rome might boast herself a rival in eloquence to Greece itself. He was killed in the commotions raised by Marius and Cinna, B. C. 67.—Livy. Cicero de O at. Bayle.

ANTONIUS (Marcus), the triumvir, was the grandson of the preceding and son of M. Antonius Creticus, by Julia, a noble lady of great merit. On the death of his father he led a very dissipated life. Afterwards he applied to the art of war, and shewed great courage and address in restoring Ptolemy to the throne of Egypt. He next served in Gaul with great reputation under Cæsar, who enabled him to go to Rome, where he obtained the questorship, in which office he became very active in behalf of his benefactor. He assisted Cæsar in gaining possession of the sovereign power, and was made by him governor of Italy, and commander of the legions, in which office his liberality endeared him to the soldiers. Cæsar afterwards appointed him master of the horse for his conduct at the battle of Pharsalia, and chose him as his colleague in the consulship B. C. 44. On the death of Cæsar, Antony behaved with great art, first getting the acts of his colleague confirmed by the senate, and next that he should have a public funeral, at which he made an harangue in his favour, which produced such an effect on the populace that Brutus and Cassius were obliged to quit the city. He then began to exercise his authority in such a manner, as to convince all parties that he meant to assume the sovereignty to himself. The patriots, to check his career, espoused the cause of Octavianus, the heir of Cæsar, on which Antony retired to his government of Cisalpine Gaul, and began a civil war by laying siege to Mutina, now Modena. The consuls J. Hortius and Panfa, with Octavianus, were sent against him, and though Antony was defeated, both consuls were slain, and Octavianus found himself at the head of a victorious army. After his defeat Antony crossed the Alps, and joined Lepidus, with whom and Octavianus he contrived to form the second triumvirate, to which Cicero fell a victim through the personal revenge of Antony. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi he went into Asia, and outvalled all other princes by the splendour of his court. Here Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, captivated him by her charms, and he accompanied her to Alexandria, where he gave himself up to pleasure. In the mean time Octavianus, at the instigation of Fulvia, the wife of Antony, commenced hostilities in Italy; but a reconciliation being effected between them, Antony married Octavia, the sister of his colleague. A new division of the empire was the consequence of this alliance, the west being allotted to Octavianus, and the east to Antony, and Africa to Lepidus. Antony soon after renewed his intercourse with Cleopatra in so shameful a manner that he was deprived of his consular dignity, and war was declared against the Egyptian queen by the senate. Immense preparations were making on both sides, but Antony was immersed in dissipation, which destroyed his military spirit. At the battle of Actium he escaped in a small vessel, and finding himself deserted on all sides, he stabbed himself B. C. 30, aged 56.—Plutarch. Bayle.

ANTONIUS (Marcus Junius), the son of the former by Fulvia, was made consul in the year of Rome 744. Being discovered to have debauched Julia, daughter of Augustus, he flew himself. Horace addressed an ode to him. He left a son named Julius Antonius, in whom expired this illustrious but unfortunate family.—Ibid.

ANTONIUS (Honoratus), bishop of Constantine, in Africa, in 433. A letter of his may be seen in the Bibl. Pat.—Dupin.

ANTONIUS (Liberalis), the author of a work in Greek, entitled Metamorphoses, printed at London 1676, and at Amsterdam in 1688.—Fabric. Bibl. Græc.

ANTONIUS, surname NEBRISSENSIS, i. e. of Lebriza, his native place, a Spanish writer of the 15th century. He was an eminent professor of the languages in cardinal Ximenes's university at Alcalá, where he died in 1522. He had a share in the celebrated Polyglot of that cardinal, and was also the author of some considerable works.—Moreri.

ANTONY (St.), the founder of monachism; was born at Coma, in Upper Egypt, in 251. Although he had a large estate from his ancestors, he renounced all for a recluse life. He resided in a cell in the desert near twenty years, and the fame of his sanctity drew to him many followers, for whom he erected numerous monasteries. In the period cution of Maximin he visited Alexandria, to minister consolation to the suffering christians, and when the storm was over he returned to his solitude. In 335 he went again to Alexandria to assist the orthodox against the arians. He died in 356. The Roman catholic writers relate many whimsical stories of the assaults which this saint encountered from evil spirits.—Dupin.

ANTONY, of Padua, a franciscan monk, was born at Lisbon in 1195. He taught with reputation at different universities in Italy, and died at Padua in 1231. His works were printed at the Hague in 1641.—Moreri.

ANTONY, of Bourbon, king of Navarre, which title he obtained by his marriage with Joan d'Albert in 1548. He was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendôme, and quitted the protestant religion, in which he had been educated, and united with the duke of Guise and Montmorency in forming the famous league. On the breaking out of the civil war he raised an army, and took Blois, Tours, and Rouen. At the siege of the last-mentioned place he was wounded in the shoulder, of which he died in 1562. He left a son, who was afterwards Henry IV.—Moreri.

ANTONY, of Pratovecchio in Tuscany, an Italian lawyer of the 15th century, was professor at Bologna, and distinguished himself by a Course of Feudal Law, published in 1428, and other works on similar subjects. He died about 1461.—Landi Hist. Lit. Ital.

ANVARI, an elegant Persian poet, was a native of Chorasan, and became eminent in the service of Sangiar, sultan of the Seljuks. He was also well versed in astronomy, and composed several works on that science. But having failed in an astrological prediction, the ridicule upon him was so great, that he retired from court, and died in exile A.D. 1200.—D'Hérbel t.

ANVILLE (John Baptiste Bourguignon d'), geographer to the king of France was born at Paris in 1697. He was a most industrious student, labouring, it is said, sixteen hours a day for fifty years, to improve his favourite science. He died Jan. 28, 1782. His maps are in the highest estimation, and his works are all valuable. They are as follow: 1. A Dissertation on the Extent of the ancient Jerusalem. 2. Some Particulars of ancient Gaul, drawn from the Remains of the Romans. 3. On ancient and modern Egypt, with a Description of the Arabian Gulph. 4. An Abridgement of ancient Geography. 3 vols. 5. A Treatise on itinerary Measures, ancient and modern. 6. The Governments formed in Europe after the Fall of the Roman Empire.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

ANYTUS, a rhetorician of Athens, who was the declared enemy of Socrates. He got Aristophanes to ridicule the philosopher in a comedy, and never ceased his persecutions till, in conjunction with Melitus, he procured his condemnation. When the people discovered their error, Anytus was banished, and, according to Themistius, was stoned to death at Heraclea.—Plutar. b. Diog. Laërt.

ANYTA, a Greek poetess, some of whose verses are in a collection of eminent female poets, published at Hamburgh, in 1734, 4to.—Vossius de Poet. Græc.

APELLES, called the Prince of Painters, was born in the isle of Cos, and lived in the time of Alexander the Great, who would permit no other person to draw his picture, and gave him Campaspe, one of his mistresses, for a wife. Alexander often visited him, and one day talking absurdly on painting, Apelles bade him hold his tongue, for that the boys who mixed the colours laughed at him. The most famous picture of this artist was that of Venus rising out of the sea, which Augustus purchased of the people of Cos, and placed in the temple of Cæsar. The lower part had been hurt, but no painter would venture to repair the injury. He is said to have written several treatises on his art, but they are all, together with his paintings, swept off by the hand of time. Apelles was a man of great wit, and much addicted to pleasure. He is said to have been the first who had a connexion with Lais, the courtesan.—Plin. Nat. Hist. Ælian. Suidas. Bayle.

APELLES, the founder of an heretical sect of the second century, was born in Syria. He was at first a marcionite, but attached himself afterwards to a pretended prophetess called Philumena, whose revelations he published. They denied the scripture prophets, the law of Moses, and the doctrine of the resurrection.—Cave. Moreri.

APELLICON, a peripatetic philosopher, to whom the world is indebted for the works of Aristotle, which he bought at a vast price about ninety years before Christ. They were afterwards seized by Sylla, and carried to Rome.—Bayle.

APER (Marcus), a Roman orator of the first century. Some attribute to him the "Dialogue of Orators," which used to be printed with the works of Tacitus and Quintilian. He died about 85.—Lemprière.

APHTHONIUS, a rhetorician of Antioch in the third century, who wrote, 1. A System of Rhetoric, printed at Upsal in 1670, 8vo. 2. Tables, printed with those of Æsop, Franckfort, 1610, 8vo.—Fabricius.

APIRES, the name of three celebrated Roman gluttons. The first lived under Sylla, the second under Augustus and Tiberius, and the third under Trajan. Of these the second is the most noted; he spent immense sums upon his belly, and invented several sorts of cakes, which were called by his name. Finding himself reduced to 12,000l. which he thought would not keep him from starving, he poisoned himself. The third found out the method Active from 1939 to 1945, he was born in Miami, Fla., and became known as a poet, novelist, and screen writer. He died in 1952. His "Ode to a Tuna" was printed about 1939. He was the first to write about tuna sandwiches—tuna, mayo, lettuce.

James Earl Ray, son of the preacher, was born in Mississippi in 1928 and grew up in Troy, Oregon in 1950. He wrote a number of speeches and some other works. He also studied music at Willamette University.

ALLEN, an ancient philosopher was a native of Calais in France and lived at Rome in the reign of Augustus. In his "Antiquities of Rome" he attacked the Jews and was answered by Tertullian. This was not the only evil he did that people, for he incited Caligula to raise a persecution against them. His works are lost.—J. T. L. 554.

ARISTARCHUS (C. Seleucia), a native of Carthage, was a professor of grammar at Rome in the second century. He is supposed to have written the verses prefixed to the plays of Terence—See .

Apollinarius, Claudius, Bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia, about A. D. 171. He wrote an Apology for the Christian Religion, addressed to Marcus Aurelius, and some pieces against the heretics of those times.—See Ant. Bib.

APOLLINARIUS, father and son. The first was a presbyter of Alexandria in the fourth century. The son became bishop of Laodicea. He wrote a treatise against paganism which he sent to Julian, who returned it with this contemptuous answer: "I have read, understood, and condemned!" to which the bishop spiritedly replied, "You have read, but not understood, or you would not have condemned." He held the erroneous position that Christ did not take human flesh but passed through the virgin as through a pipe or canal, which opinion was condemned in two councils. He died about 342.—M.C.C.

APOLLONIOS, a grammarian of Athens, who flourished B.C. 104. Three books of his on the origin of the gods are extant, the best edition of which is that of Gale, 1675.
—Doct. Liébt. Poëtic.

APOLLODORUS, a famous architect, was born at Damascus, and lived under Trajan and Adrian. He was employed by the former to build the great bridge over the Danube, and other structures. His bluntness proved his ruin, for when Adrian sent him the design of a temple of Venus, which he had just built, the architect found that it was too small for the size of the statues, and said, "that if the goddesses should have a mind to rise and go out, they could not."

The French cost him his life.—Bayle. Mo-

APOLLONIUS, a famous painter at Athens, who flourished B.C. 408. He was conceived by Zeus, which he greatly lamented in a poem.—Pliny Nat. Hist.

A female christian of Alexandria, who, when very old, was required to renounce her religion, or be burnt alive. On refusing to be unbound, she threw herself into the fire, and was consumed.—

APOLLONIUS, a Greek poet, was born at Alexandria, and educated by Callimachus, whom he treated with ingratitude. He wrote a poem, in four books, on the expedition of the Argonauts. He afterwards taught rhetoric at Rhodes, and thence got the name of Rhodius. Ptolemy Euergetes made him keeper of the public library at Alexandria, where he died, and was buried in the same grave with his master. The best editions of his poems are those of Oxford, 2 vols. 4to. 1777, and of Brunk, in 8vo. Henry Stephens published an edition in 1774, 4to; it has been translated into English verse by Dr. Ekins, late dean of Carlisle.—Saxæ. Poetæ.

ARZIOLOGICA, of Perga, a city of Pamphylia lived at Alexandria in the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes, B. C. 240. He was called, by way of eminence, the Grometrician. Of all his works only part of his Conics remains, which was first published by Commandinus at Bologna in 1566. Dr. Halley gave a noble edition in 1710, at Oxford, in folio—Fabritius. Hutton's Math. Dict.

AROTIUS (Dyscolus, or the Lean), a grammarian of Alexandria in the second century. He wrote, in Greek, a work "On Syntax," which was printed first in 1495, at Venice, and at Franckfort in 1590. There is also ascribed to him a collection of historical curiosities, printed at Basil in 1568, and at Leiden in 1620.—Vossius.

AROLLENES, a christian martyr of the second century. He was a member of the Roman senate, and a man of great eloquence and learning.—E: sebius.

AROLLONIUS, a learned grammarian in the time of Augustus, who compiled a Greek lexicon to Homer, which was printed at Paris in 1773, 2 vols. 4to.—Novæ. Diæ. Hifi.

APOLLONIUS, a stoic philosopher of Chalcis, who came to Rome, and was sent for by the emperor Antoninus Pius to be preceptor to Marcus Aurelius, on which the philosopher rudely answered, that it was the place of the scholar to wait on the master, and not the master on the scholar. The emperor mildly observed, that he was surprised Apollonius should find it farther from his lodgings to the palace, than from Chalcis to Rome.—Morri.

APOLLONIUS, of Tyana, in Cappadocia, who flourished in the first century. He adhered to the rules of Pythagoras, and set himself up for a reformer of public morals.

He took up his abode in the temple of Æsculapius, where he is said to have performed numerous miracles. These are given in disgusting detail in his life by Philobrotatus.—Bayle.

APOLLONIUS COLLATIUS (Peter), a priest of Navarre in the 15th century, who wrote a poem on the siege of Jerusalem, which, with other poems, was published at Milan, in 1698, 8vo.—Moreri.

APOLLOS, an eloquent Jew of Alexandria, who was converted to christianity, and became so zealous a preacher, particularly at Corinth, that many of the Christians held him in higher esteem than St. Paul.—Acts of the Apostles.

ARON (Peter d'), a learned philosopher and physician, was born near Padua, in 1250. He took the degree of M. D. at Paris, and became very eminent in that line. He was prosecuted by the inquisition on the charge of magic, but died before the process was completed, in 1816. He wrote, 1. Heptameron, printed at the end of Agrippa's Occult Philosophy; 2. Elucidarium Necromanticum Petri de Apono; 3. Liber Experimentorum Mirabilium de Annulis Secundum xxviii. Mansiones Lunæ; 4. De Medicina Omnimoda, &c.—Bayle.

AROSTOLIUS (Michael), a learned Greek of the 15th century, who wrote a collection of apophthegms of wise men, and another of proverbs, but only abridgements of them have been published; of the first in 1619, and of the second in 1538.—Novv. Diet. Hist.

APPLAN, an ancient historian, was born at Alexandria, from whence he went to Rome, and became an eminent pleader. He wrote the Roman history in Greek, of which only a part remains, which was published at Geneva in 1592, folio, and at Amsterdam in 1670, 2 vols. 8vo.—Vossius de Hist. Græc.

APRIK, king of Egypt, succeeded his father Psammis B. C. 594. He was an enterprising monarch, and is supposed to be the Pharaoh-Hophra of scripture. He was deposed by his subjects, and afterwards strangled.—Josephus. Herodotus.

APROPIO (Angelico), a monk of Genoa, wrote a number of books, chiefly under fictitious names, but he is best known by a curious work, entitled Bibliotheca Apropiana, Bologna, 1673. He died about 1680.—Bayle. Moreri.

APULEIUS (Lucius), a platonic philosopher in the second century, was born at Madaura, in Africa. He spent all his fortune in travelling; but at last he settled at Rome, and became eminent as an advocate. Here a widow lady, very rich, fell in love with, and married him, which irritated her friends so much, that they prosecuted him on the charge of having used magic to gain her affections. Apuleius defended himself before the proconsul in a discourse which St. Augustine calls most eloquent and flowery. He composed several books, the chief of which is entitled the "Golden Ass," a romance. His works were printed at Paris, in 1628, in 2 vols. 4to.—Plotius, Aug. de Civ. Dei. Moreri.

AQUAVIVA (Octavio), cardinal and archbishop of Naples; was born of an illustrious family in that kingdom, and distinguished himself by his love of letters and learned men. He entertained several in his service, and had a particular friendship for the learned Peirefc. Pope Clement VIII gave him the legation of Avignon, where he governed with great moderation and wisdom. He died in 1612.—Moreri.

AQUAVIVA (Claude), the son of the duke of Atri, was born in 1542. He entered into the society of the jesuits, of which he became general in 1581. He wrote some pieces relative to his order and religion, the best of which is one on the cure of mental diseases. He died about 1607.—Ibid.

AQUILA, a mathematician of Pontus, who was employed by Adrian to rebuild Jerusalem, where he embraced the christian religion, and was baptized. But being excommunicated for practising astrology, he went over to the Jews, and was circumcised. He translated the Old Testament into Greek, which version was in great repute among the dispersed Jews, but only a few fragments of it remain.—Eusebius. Fabricius.

AQUILANO (Serafino), an Italian poet, was born at Aquila, in Abruzzo, in 1466. His poems were published at Rome in 1503. The sonnets are most admired. He died in 1530.—Moreri.

AQUILANUS (Sebastianus), an Italian physician, was born at Aquila, in the kingdom of Naples. He practised with reputation at Padua, and died there in 1543. He wrote some piece on physical subjects, and was a zealous defender of Galen.—Moreri.

AQUINAS (St. Thomas), called the Angelic Doctor, was descended from the kings of Sicily and Arragon, and born in the castle of Aquino, in Italy, in 1224. He entered into the society of the preaching friars at Naples, much against the inclination of his parents, who endeavoured to recover him, but in vain. In 1244 he went to Paris, and from thence to Cologne, where he attended the lectures of Albertus Magnus. He afterwards returned to Paris, and read lectures on the book of sentences with applause. In 1255, he was created D. D. and about 1263 went to Rome, and after teaching divinity in various universities, he settled at Naples, and obtained a pension from the king. Here he devoted himself to study and religious exercises, and refused the archbishopric of Naples, which was offered him by pope Clement IV. In 1274, he was sent for to assist at the second council of Lyons, but died on the journey, at the monastery of Fossanova, near Terracina, aged 50. [The authority of Aquinas has always been very high in the Roman of preserving bysters. There is a treatise, De Re Culinaaria, under the name of Apicius, which, though ancient, is supposed not to belong to either of the above persons.—Juvenal. Martial. Pliny.

APIEN (Peter), a German astronomer, was born in Misnia in 1495, and became mathematical professor at Ingolstadt, where he died in 1552. His "Cosmography" was printed about 1530; he published also several other learned works.—Malkb. Adam. Vossius.

APIEN (Philip), son of the preceding, was born at Ingolstadt in 1531, and died at Tübingen in 1589. He wrote a treatise on duelling, and some other works. He also studied medicine with success.—Ibid.

APION, an ancient grammarian, was a native of Oasis, in Egypt, and lived at Rome in the reign of Tiberius. In his "Antiquities of Egypt," he attacked the Jews, and was answered by Josephus. This was not the only evil Apion did that people, for he instigated Caligula to raise a persecution against them. His works are lost.—Vossius. Bz. le.

APOLLINARIS (C. Sulpitius), a native of Carthage, was a professor of grammar at Rome in the second century. He is supposed to have written the verses prefixed to the plays of Terence.—Bayle.

APOLLINARIS (Claudius), bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia, about A. D. 171. He wrote an Apology for the Christian Religion, addressed to Marcus Aurelius, and some pieces against the heresies of those times.—Eusebius. Dupin.

APOLLINARIUS, father and son. The first was a presbyter of Alexandria in the fourth century. The son became bishop of Laodicea. He wrote a treatise against paganism which he sent to Julian, who returned it with this contemptuous answer: "I have read, understood, and condemned;" to which the bishop spiritedly replied, "You have read, but not understood, or you would not have condemned." He held the erroneous position that Christ did not take human flesh, but passed through the virgin as through a pipe or canal, which opinion was condemned in two councils. He died about 342.—Mog. le.

APOLLODORUS, a grammarian of Athens, who flourished B. C. 104. Three books of his on the origin of the gods are extant, the best edition of which is that of Gale, 1675.—Droz. Lært. Vossius.

APOLLODORUS, a famous architect, was born at Damascus, and lived under Trajan and Adrian. He was employed by the former to build the great bridge over the Danube, and other structures. His bluntness proved his ruin, for when Adrian sent him the design of a temple of Venus, which he had just built, the architect found that it was too small for the size of the statues, and said, "that if the goddesses should have a mind to rise and go out, they could not."

This sarcasm cost him his life.—Bayle. Moreri.

APOLLODORUS, a famous painter at Athens, who flourished B. C. 408. He was outshone by Zeuxis, which he greatly lamented in a poem.—Pliny Nat. Hist.

APOLLONIA, a female christian of Alexandria, who, when very old, was required to renounce her religion, or be burnt alive. On requesting to be unbound, she threw herself into the fire, and was consumed.—Eusebius.

APOLLONIUS, a Greek poet, was born at Alexandria, and educated by Callimachus, whom he treated with ingratitude. He wrote a poem, in four books, on the expedition of the Argonauts. He afterwards taught rhetoric at Rhodes, and thence got the name of Rhodius. Ptolemy Euergetes made him keeper of the public library at Alexandria, where he died, and was buried in the same grave with his master. The best editions of his poems are those of Oxford, 2 vols. 4to. 1777, and of Brunk, in 8vo. Henry Stephens published an edition in 1574, 4to; it has been translated into English verse by Dr. Ekins, late dean of Carlisle.—Suidas. Vossius.

APOLLONIUS, of Perga, a city of Pamphylia, lived at Alexandria in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, B. C. 240. He was called, by way of eminence, the Geometrician. The authority of Aquinas has always been very high in the Roman church, and he was canonized in 1323. His works, making 17 vols. folio, have been printed several times, and at several places.—Dupin. Cave Hist. Lit. Moreri.

AQUINO (Philip), a Jewish convert of the 17th century. He taught Hebrew at Paris, corrected the Hebrew and Chaldee texts of I. e. Jay's Polyglot, and compiled a Hebrew, rabbinical, and talmudical lexicon. He died in 1650. His grandson Antony was first physician to Louis XIV.—Bayle.

ARABIA. This country has never been conquered, though it has often been attempted. About 622, the Arabians became formidable under the name of Saracens, and extended their conquests into various countries. In 891, the sect of Karmatians arose, and got possession of all Arabia; but about 990 their power fell to nothing. After this, Ismael, a nephew of Saladin, took upon him the title of caliph, but his subjects revolted, and put him to death. His descendants, however, it is said, still possess part of the country.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

ARABIAN, a Mohammedan historian, was a native of Damascus, where he died in 1450. He wrote a history of Tamerlane, and a treatise on the Unity of God. — D'Hierbet.

ARAM (Eugene), a self-taught genius, was born in Yorkshire. He received from his parents a very scanty education; but by the most persevering industry, he obtained a knowledge of the mathematics, and an extensive acquaintance with the Latin and Greek languages, together with the Hebrew and Chaldee. In 1744 he taught Latin and writing at a school in London; and after staying there two years, became an assistant in a boarding school at Hayes in Middlesex. He was afterwards employed to transcribe the acts of parliament to be registered in chancery: and in 1757, assisted in the free school at Lynn. During this period, he studied history, antiquity, and heraldry, and obtained some knowledge of botany. He was besides a tolerable poet. It is to be lamented, that a man of such talents should have disgraced them by the commission of the most atrocious of all crimes. In 1758 he was apprehended at Lynn, for the murder of Daniel Clarke, a shoe-maker of Knareborough, 13 years before, and removed to York Castle. He was brought to his trial August 3, 1759, and made an admirable defence, but was found guilty; and the next morning confessed the crime, alleging, that he was prompted to it through a suspicion of Clarke's having a criminal intercourse with his wife. On being called from his bed to have his irons taken off, it was found that he had cut his arm in two places with a razor; and in that condition was taken to the gallows at York, and there executed.—Gen. B. D.

ARANTUS (Julius Cæsar), an Italian physician and anatomist, was born at Bologna in 1520. He was the disciple of Vesalius and Bartholomew Magus. He died in 1589. He wrote De Humano Fœtu Opusculum, printed at Venice in 1595.—Haller. Bibl. Anat.

ARATUS, a Greek poet, was born in Cilicia about 300 B. C. His poem entitled Phænomena, which is still extant, shews him to have been an astronomer, as well as a poet. It was translated by Cicero into Latin: and St. Paul quotes a passage from it in his speech to the Athenians. Grotius published it in Greek and Latin at Leyden in 1600, 4to. besides which there are several other editions.—Fabricius.

ARATUS, of Sicyon, son of Clinias, was born B. C. 273. He was only seven years old when his father was murdered by Abantidas, and narrowly missed the same fate. Escaping into a house which was that of the tyrant's sister, she took pity on him, and sent him privately to Argos, where he received a liberal education. As soon as he had attained maturity, he determined to restore the liberty of his country, which he did without bloodshed. By his activity he brought about the Achæan league, and recovered Corinth from Antigonos of Macedonia. It is supposed that he died of poison, administered by order of Philip of Macedonia, B. C. 211. He wrote Commentaries of his own Transactions.—Life by Plutarch.

ARBOGASTES, a general and count of the Roman empire, who, after murdering Valentinian placed one Eugenius on the throne. He was defeated by Theodosius, and slew himself A. D. 394.—Moreri.

ARBUCKLE (James), a Scotch poet, was born in Glasgow in 1700, and kept a school in the north of Ireland. His poems were published in 1 vol. 12mo. He died in 1734.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ARBUTHNOT (Alexander), a Scotch divine, was the son of baron Arbuthnot, and born in 1538. He edited Buchanan's history of Scotland, and was a strenuous champion for the reformation, and an encourager of learning. He died at Aberdeen in 1583. He wrote orations on the origin and dignity of the law, printed in 1572.—Biog. Brit.

ARBUTHNOT (John), a celebrated writer, was born at Arbuthnot near Montrose, and educated at Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M. D. on which he came to London, and supported himself at first by teaching the mathematics. By accidentally administering relief to prince George of Denmark, he became physician to his royal highness, and in 1709 he was appointed physician in ordinary to queen Anne, and admitted a fellow of the royal college of physicians. In 1714, he engaged with Pope and Swift in a scheme to write a satire on the abuse of human learning, under the title of Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus; but the death of the queen put an end to the project. In 1727, he published Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures, 4to. which were followed by an Essay concerning Aliments, &c. and another on the Effects of Air on human Bodies. He died in 1735. Dr. Arbuthnot was one of the greatest wits of his time, and his humour is generally attic, without any mixture of ill-nature, for he was himself a most humane and amiable man.—Biog. Brit.

ARC (Joan of). Vide JOAN.

ARCADIUS, emperor of the east, succeeded his father Theodosius the Great in 395, at which time his brother Honorius was emperor of the west. He was governed by his ministers, and died in 408.—Un. Hist.

ARCADIUS, an African bishop, who rendered himself so obnoxious to the Arians, by his zeal for the orthodox faith, that, by their instigation, Genseric, king of the Vandals, caused him to be put to death in 437.—Moreri.

ARCERE (Antony), a learned Frenchman, was a native of Marseilles. At the age of 18 he entered into the congregation of the oratory, and applied with the greatest assiduity to the oriental languages. He made a tour into the east, and returned richly furnished with manuscripts. After this he began a dictionary, French and Turkish, in which he had made a great progress, when he was taken off by a fever in 1699, at the early age of 33.—Moreri.

ARCERE (Lewis Stephen), priest of the oratory, was a native of Marseilles, and died very old in 1781. He wrote the History of the Town of Rochelle, and the Country of Aunis, 1756, 2 vols. 4to.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ARCESILAUS, a Greek philosopher, was born 316 B. C. He succeeded Crates in the management of the academy, and made some changes, which produced a new school called the middle academy. He taught a wrangling system, and seems to have been a downright sceptic. Yet he was of a very generous disposition, and delighted in performing actions of kindness. The Athenians honoured him with a public funeral.—Bayle. Stanley.

ARCHELAUS, son of Herod the Great, king of the Jews, on the death of whom he was opposed by Antipas; and the cause being referred to the emperor, he allowed Archelaus half his father's dominions, over which he ruled so tyrannically, that Augustus confiscated his effects, and banished him, A. D. 6, to Gaul, where he died.—Josephus. Dict. C. Hist.

ARCHELAUS, king of Macedon, was the natural son of Perdiccas II. and succeeded him after murdering Alcetas, brother to Perdiccas. He put his kingdom into a state of great strength, and liberally encouraged literature and the arts. Euripides was entertained at his court, and his palace was ornamented by the pencil of Zeuxis. He died about 398 B. C.—Diog. Laertius. Bayle.

ARCHELAUS, a Greek philosopher, was the disciple and successor of Anaxagoras at Lampascus, but afterwards removed to Athens, where he had Socrates for a pupil.—Bayle. Stanley.

ARCHELAUS, bishop of Mesopotamia, and a warm defender of the catholic faith against the manichæans. A Latin translation of a work by him against Mani is extant. He lived about A. D. 278.—Eusebius. Dupin.

ARCHELAUS, a geographer, was the author of a treatise on all the countries conquered by Alexander, in whose time he lived. Stobæus quotes also another book on rivers written by one Archelaus.—Vossius.

ARCHIAS, a native of Antioch, whose cause was pleaded by Cicero. He wrote a poem on the war of the Cimbri, and some other pieces, of which only a few fragments remain. He lived about 60 years B. C.—Vossius, de Poet. Lat.

ARCHIDAMUS, king of Sparta, succeeded his father Agesilaus, B. C. 361. He was a warlike prince, but going to assist the Tarentines against the Messapians, he was slain, after reigning 15 years.—Plutarch.

ARCHIGENES, a Greek physician of eminence in the time of Trajan, is celebrated by Juvenal and quoted by Galen.—Suidas. Vander Linden de Script. Med.

ARCHILOCHUS, a Greek satirist, was born in the isle of Paros, about 660 B. C. The Lacedæmonians laid a prohibition on his poems. He was the inventor of iambic verses. Most of his writings are lost.—Bayle. Moreri.

ARCHIMEDES, a great mathematician, was born at Syracuse, and related to Hiero, king of that place. He boasted, that if he had a place to fix his machines, he would move the earth. His method of discovering the fraud of a jeweller discovers the singular penetration of his mind. Hiero suspecting that the crown he had ordered, did not contain the quantity of gold which had been given to the workman, desired Archimedes to find out the fraud. His thoughts being intent upon this problem while he was in the bath, he observed that a quantity of water overflowed equal to the bulk of his body; which at once suggested to him a method of determining the question, and leaping out of the bath, he ran home, exclaiming as he went, I have found it! I have found it! Then procuring two masses of gold and silver of equal weight with the crown, he carefully noticed the quantity of water which each displaced, after which he observed how much the crown caused to flow over; and on comparing this quantity with each of the former, he was able to ascertain the proportions of gold and silver in the crown. Some ancient authors celebrate a glass machine made by Archimedes, which represented the motions of the heavenly bodies. He is also said to have made burning glasses which destroyed ships at a great distance. In the siege of Syracuse by Marcellus, Archimedes contrived a variety of machines for annoying the enemy; but the place was taken at last, and the Roman commander gave strict orders that his house and person should be respected. He was, however, slain by a soldier, who did not know him, while he was deeply engaged in solving a geometrical problem, and inattentive to all the noise and uproar occasioned by the taking of the city. This happened B. C. 208. Several of his works are extant, but some of the most valuable are lost. Those which remain were printed at Basil in 54 folio; but the best edition is that of Oxford, in 1792, which was printed from the revision and collection of Joseph Torretti, purchased of his executor Albertini, by the correctors of the Clarendon press. When Cicero was quæstor in Sicily he discovered Archimedes's tomb, with an inscription upon it.—Plutarch. Livy. Vossius.

ARCHON (Louis), a French antiquary and divine, was born at Riom, in Auvergne, in 1645. He wrote the history of the chapel of the kings of France, printed at Paris, in 1711, 2 vols. 4to. He died in 1717.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ARCHYTAS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Tarentum flourished about 400 B. C. He was also famous for his valour, and was chosen general of the Tarentine army seven times. He was likewise a good mathematician and mechanic. A treatise of his, concerning the universe was published at Venice in 1731.—Vossius de Mathematic.

ARCONS (César de) was born in Gascony, and became an advocate in the parliament of Bourdeaux. He published several treatises on philosophy and theology, the principal of which are, 1. on the Flux and Reflux of the Sea, and on Longitude; 2. Disquisitions upon the Scriptures. He died in 1681.—Moreri.

ARCO (Philip Augustus de Foy chevalier d'), born at Paris, and supposed to have been the natural son of the count de Toulouse, and consequently the grandson of Louis XIV. He cultivated letters and wrote some esteemed works, as, 1. Loisir, 1733, 8vo; 2. Le Temple du Silence; 3. Letters of Olfan, 3 vols. 12mo.; 4. General History of Wars, 2 vols. 4to.; 5. History of Commerce and Navigation. At the close of his life he retired to Gentilly, where he devoted the remainder of his days to devotional exercises. He died in 1779.—L'Ecuyl. Dict. Univ.

ARCUDIUS (Peter), a Greek priest, was born in the isle of Corfu, and was sent by Clement VIII. to Russia to settle some religious differences. He wrote some zealous pieces in defence of the Roman church, against the Greek and protestant churches. He died about 1621.—Moreri.

ARCUDI (Alexander Thomas d') a dominican of Venice, obtained considerable fame by his works, chiefly biographical, of which his Galatina Laterata is the principal. His last performance was the History of Athanasius. He died about 1720.—Moreri.

ARCULPHUS, a French divine of the 7th century. He visited the holy land, and at his return wrote an account of his travels, which was printed at Ingolstadt in 1619.—Cave Hist. Lit.

ARDEN (Edward), a Roman-catholic gentleman of good family in Warwickshire, was born in 1532. He was executed in 1585, for a supposed plot against queen Elizabeth.

ARDERN (John), an English Surgeon of Newark upon Trent, who is extolled as the first reviver of surgery in England: he flourished in the 14th century. He wrote a book on the fistula in ano, published in 1588, and left also a MS. in the Stourian library, entitled De Re Herberia, Physica et Chirurgica.—Friend's Hist. Phys. Pulteney's Sketches of Botany.

AREAGATHUS, a Greek physician, who flourished B. C. 269. He practised with reputation at Rome, till for making use of caustics and the knife, he was banished.—Gen. B. D.

ARENA (Anthony de), or du Sable, a French poet of the 16th century. His poem on the war of Provence, carried on by Charles V. was reprinted in 1747. His other pieces were printed in 1670, in 12mo. He died in 1544.—Moreri.

ARESI (Paul), bishop of Tortona in the Milanese, was born in 1574. He wrote some philosophical and religious pieces, and died in 1645.—Moreri.

ARETEUS, a Greek physician, who flourished in the time of Vespasian. His works, which are in great esteem, were published by Dr. Wigan at Oxford in 1723, folio, and by Boerhaave at Leyden in 1731.—Vossius, Friend.

ARETAPHILA of Cyrene, the wife of Phœdimus, a nobleman of that place, who was murdered by Nicocrates, for the sake of his wife. The tyrant, however, suspicious that she intended to poison him, caused her to be racked to extort a confession, and afterwards solicited her forgiveness. By her management Nicocrates was slain, and Leander, his brother, ascended the throne, whom she delivered to Anabus king of Lybia and thus freed her country from oppression.—Plutarch.

ARETE, the daughter of Aristippus of Cyrene, flourished about 360 B. C. She taught her father's system of philosophy after his death, with great reputation.—Diog. Laërt.

ARETHAS, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, wrote a commentary on the Revelations about the 10th century, which is still extant.—Cave, Fabricius.

ARENIN (Francis), an Italian lawyer of the 14th century. He taught at several universities with applause; and his opinions on law cases were generally decisive; but he disgraced his reputation by his covetousarcs. He is not to be confounded with another of the same name and age, who translated St. Chrysostom's Commentaries on John into Latin, and wrote a treatise on the baths of Puteoli.—Ar. rer.

ARETIN (Guy), an Italian monk of the 11th century, who invented the gamut. He published a treatise on music, entitled Micrologus, and a letter printed by Baronius in his Annals, under the year 102.—Ar. rer.

ARETIN (Leonard), an Italian historian, was born in 1370. He was secretary to several popes; and afterwards to the republic of Florence. He added a supplement to Livy on the Punic war; and wrote the history of Italy, with other valuable works. He died about 1443.—Ibid.

ARETIN (Peter), called the scourge of princes, was born at Arezzo, about 1491. He was so dreaded for his satirical powers, that crowned heads courted his friendship; on which he caused a medal to be struck on one side of which he is represented with this inscription, "he divine Aretin," and on the reverse, he is seated on a throne receiving the oblations of princes. He wrote many obscene and irreligious pieces, but in his latter days is said to have employed himself in writing devotional tracts. He died in 1556.—Bayle.

ARGALL (John), an English divine, was born in London, and educated at Oxford. He died at his living of Halesworth, in Suffolk, in 1606. He wrote some religious tracts in Latin.

ARGENS (John Baptist de Boyer, marquis of), a French writer, was born at Aix, in Provence, 1704. He served some time in the army, but retired in disgust, and went to Holland, where he wrote some pieces, which recommended him to the notice of the king of Prussia, who made him chamberlain. After spending about 25 years at Berlin, he returned to his native place, where he died in 1771. His works are, Jewish Letters, Chinese Letters, Cabbalistic Letters, and the Philosophy of Good Sense, &c. Learning and ingenuity are evident in these productions, but mixed with infidelity and licentiousness.—New. Dict. Hist.

ARGENTSON (Mark René le Voyer, marquis de), an eminent man in the reign of Louis XIV. was born in 1652, at Venice, where his father was then resident as ambassador. In 1697, he was made lieutenant-general of the police in Paris, in which office he behaved with uncommon vigilance, and he first introduced lettres de cachet in the police. In 1719, he was made chancellor in the room of d'Aguesseau, but the year following he was deprived of all his places, and died of chagrin in 1721. He was a man of great talents and perseverance.—Ibid.

ARIANIZZI (John), an Italian physician, was born at Castelluovo, in Piedmont, in 1514, and died at Turin in 1572. His works were printed at Venice, in 2 vols. folio, 1592.—Moreri.

ARGENTINA (Thomas d'), general of the Augustines in 1345. He wrote Commentaries on the Master of the Sentences, printed at Strasburg, 1400, folio.—Ibid.

ARGENTRE (Charles, surnamed d'), a learned and laborious French prelate. He was born in 1673, and became doctor of Sorbonne, almoner to the king, and bishop of Tulle. Among his many works, the most valuable is his Collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus, &c. in 3 vols. folio. This very judicious and interesting compilation contains nearly the same materials as the great work of Bossuet, 1. histoire des Variations, Argentre died in 1740.—New. Dict. Hist.

ARGENVILLE (Anthony Joseph Dezallier d'), an ingenious French writer, was the son of a bookseller at Paris, and member of several societies in Europe. He wrote a valuable treatise on Gardening, 4to. 1747; the Lives of the most famous Painters, in 3 vols. 4to. 1755; a Catalogue of Fossils found in France, and other curious works. He was also one of the writers engaged in the Encyclopedie. He died in 1766.—Elog.

ARGOLI (Andrew), an Italian mathematician, was born at Tagliacozzo, in the kingdom of Naples. He was appointed, by the senate of Venice, professor of mathematics at Padua, with the title of chevalier, in 1636. He died in 1653. He published a treatise, de diebus criticis, in 4to. 1652, and Ephemerides, from 1640 to 1700.—Moreri.

ARGOLI (John), son of the preceding. He wrote an admired poem, entitled Endymion, and other works. He was professor of jurisprudence at Bologna, and died about 1660.—Ibid.

ARGONNE (Bonaventure d'), a carthusian monk, was born at Paris in 1640, and died in 1704. He wrote a Method of reading the Church Fathers, 1697, 12mo.; and Miscellanies, historical and literary, under the name of Vigneul de Marville, reprinted in 1725, in 3 vols. 12mo.—New. Dict. Hist.

ARGUES (Gerard d'), a French mathematician, was born at Lyons in 1597, and died in 1661. He was the friend of Descartes, whom he defended with great spirit. He wrote a treatise on Perspective; of Conic Sections; the Practice of Drawing; and on Stonecutting.—Ibid.

ARGYROPYLUS (John), an eminent scholar of the 15th century, was born at Constantinople and coming to Florence, was chosen professor of Greek. He also became tutor to the son of Cosmo de Medicis. He died at Rome in the 70th year of his age, about 1478. He was a great glutton, and spent all that he got in good cheer. He wrote a Commentary on Aristotle's Ethics, printed in 1511, folio.—Bayle. Fabricius.

ARIARATHES, king of Cappadocia, began his reign B. C. 224, and married the daughter of Antiochus the Great. He was a learned prince, and a great encourager of men of letters. He died B.C. 162, after reigning 62 years.—Univ. Hist.

ARIARATHES VI. surnamed Philopater, was the son of the preceding. His rival, Olophernes, succeeded for a time in driving him from his throne; but at length, by the help of Attalus, king of Pergamus, he recovered it. He was slain in battle, B.C. 129.—Ibid.

ARIARATHES VII. son of the above, married Laodice, sister of Mithridates the Great. He was murdered by his brother-in-law, who garrisoned the towns of Cappadocia with his troops; but the Cappadocians rose, and having expelled him, placed on the throne ARIARATHES VIII. son of the last mentioned. He was basely assassinated by his uncle Mithridates, who seized the kingdom B.C. 99, and placed upon the throne his infant son, by the name of Ariarathes IX.—Ibid.

ARIAS MONTANUS (Benedict) was born at Seville. He distinguished himself by his skill in the oriental languages. Philip II. employed him in editing a Polyglot Bible, which was printed at Antwerp in 1569—1572, in 8 vols. folio. He refused a bishopric, and contented himself with a pension of 2000 ducats, and the place of king's chaplain. He died in 1598, aged 71.—Moreri.

ARIEH (Jacob Juda). rabbi of the synagogue at Amsterdam, in the last century. He wrote a description of the Tabernacle in Hebrew, which has been translated into Latin.—Nov. Dict. Hist.

ARIOBARZANES I. king of Cappadocia, was elected by the people of that country, B.C. 91, but expelled shortly after by Tigranes, king of Armenia. He then went to Rome, where he obtained such support as enabled him to recover the crown, which he afterwards resigned to his son.—Univ. Hist.

ARIOBARZANES II. was greatly attached to Caesar, and in consequence was declared an enemy by the republic, and put to death by Cassius, B.C. 42.—Ibid.

ARIOBARZANES III. brother and successor of the preceding, was dethroned and put to death by Marc Antony.—Ibid.

ARIOSTI (Attilio), an eminent musician, was born at Bologna, and entered among the Dominicans; but quitted that order by virtue of a dispensation from the Pope. He was an opera-composer at Bologna and Venice for some time; after which he travelled into Germany and England. He distinguished himself as a performer on a new instrument, called the vo d'amore. He was greatly esteemed in this country; and published here a book of cantatas, by subscription, about 1725. When he died is not known.—Burney. Hist. Lins.

ARIOSTO (Ludovico, or Lewis), an Italian poet, was born at the castle of Reggio, in Lombardy, in 1474. He was patronized by the cardinal d'Este, by whose interest he obtained several employments. He afterwards entered into the service of Alfonso, duke of Ferrara, who appointed him governor of Grassignana. His most famous piece is entitled "Orlando Furioso," of which there are two English translations; the first by sir John Harrington, in 1634, folio; and the last by Mr. Hoole, in 1783, 8vo. Ariosto also wrote some comedies, which were performed in the hall of Ferrara before the duke and his court. He died at Ferrara in 1533, in which year he had been honoured with the laurel by Charles V. His remains were interred in the church of the benedictines, where there is a tomb to his memory. He left two natural sons.—Moreri. Nov. Dict. Hist.

ARIOSTO (Gabriel), brother of the above, was accounted a good Latin poet, and his poems were printed at Ferrara in 1582.—He died about 1552. His son Horace was the author of an heroic poem in Italian, called Aphæus.—Moreri.

ARIOVISTUS, king of the Germans, who being called into Gaul to assist the Sequani, made himself master of part of the country; on which the inhabitants applied for assistance to Caesar, who defeated Ariovistus with a great slaughter, near Besançon. After this we read no more of him.—Cæsar de Bell. Gall.

ARISTENETES, a Greek writer of the 4th century. He died at Nicomedia in 358. Two books of love epistles by him are extant, very elegant and tender. They were printed at Paris in 1595.—Fabricius.

ARISTANDER, a celebrated soothsayer, who accompanied Alexander the Great in his expedition, and was of great service to him by imposing upon the credulity of his soldiers.—Q. Curtius. Plutarch.

ARISTARCHUS, a Grecian philosopher, was a native of Samos, and is said to have been the first who asserted the rotation of the earth upon its axis, and its motion round the sun. He is also said to have invented sundials. There is only one work of his extant, on the bulk and distance of the sun and moon, which was published by Dr. Wallis in Greek and Latin in 1688.—Fabricius. Hutten's Math. Dict.

ARISTARCHUS, a grammarian, was born in Samothrace, but settled at Alexandria, where he taught the son of Ptolemy Philometer. B.C. 160. Cicero and Horace mention his name to express a severe critic; and it is used at this day for the same purpose. He starved himself to death at the age of 72.—Boyle.

ARISTARCHUS, a converted Jew of Thessalonica, who was the friend and companion of St. Paul in his travels through Asia.—Acts.

ARISTEAS, a Greek historian and poet, flourished about 550 B.C. Several marvellous stories are told of him by Herodotus and others. His works are all lost.—Vossius de Hist. Græc. Bayle.

ARISTEAS, said to have been one of the 72 translators of the Hebrew scriptures, at the court of Philadelphus, according to Josephus. A letter attributed to him on the subject of that version is extant, and was printed at Oxford in 1692.—Dupin. Fabric.

ARISTEUS, a Greek mathematician, flourished about 350 B.C. It is said that Euclid profited greatly by his writings, but they are now lost.—Bayle.

ARISTIDES, a celebrated Athenian, who rose to the first offices in the state, and discharged them with so much credit, as to obtain the honourable surname of Just.—He was a great admirer of the laws of Lycurgus, and very rigid in his notions of public justice. At the battle of Marathon, he distinguished himself by his bravery; but though he had the charge of the spoils, he took nothing for himself. The party of Themistocles at length prevailed against him, and he was banished by the ostracism. When the Athenians were apprehensive of a visit from Xerxes, they recalled Aristides, who, nobly forgetting past injuries, gave his assistance to Themistocles for the benefit of the commonwealth; and when that commander was prosecuted, he refused his consent to the sentence of his banishment.—Aristides was held in the highest esteem by all the confidential states of Greece, and was appointed by them to regulate the proportionate assessments which they were to pay for the support of the war. In this he acted with so much wisdom and justice, as to gain universal admiration. He died very poor about 467 B.C. The Athenians bestowed a magnificent funeral on him, and gave his son, Lyfimachus, an estate and pension, and portioned his daughters at the public expence.—Plutarchi vit. Arist.

ARISTIDES, a philosopher of Athens, in the second century, who became a convert to christianity, but without quitting his profession. He composed an excellent apology for the christians, which he presented to the emperor Adrian when he was at Athens, about A.D. 125.—Eusebius. Dupin.

ARISTIDES (Ælius), a famous sophist of the 2d century, was born at Adrian in Mysia. In 178, the city of Smyrna was destroyed by an earthquake; on which he wrote so pathetic a letter to the emperor, that he caused it to be rebuilt; and the inhabitants, out of gratitude, erected a statue to Aristides. He was an eloquent man, but very superstitious. He died about the 60th year of his age. His works were published at Oxford, by Dr. Jebb, in 1723, 2 vols. 4to.—Fabricius.

ARISTIDES, a Theban painter, who flourished about 340 B.C. He is celebrated for a picture of a town taken by storm, in which he represented a child creeping to the mangled breast of its dying mother, who still retains sufficient recollection to feel the moil expressive anxiety, that the child should not suck her blood instead of her milk. He excelled in expression, and in delineating the affections and emotions of the soul.—Pliny Nat. Hist.

ARISTIDES, of Miletus, an historian often mentioned by Plutarch. One of his works was a History of Italy. His writings, however, were filled with such licentious tales, that their loss is not to be regretted.—Vossius.

ARISTIPPUS, of Cyrene, the disciple of Socrates, and founder of the cyrenaic sect, differed widely from the doctrine of his master. His maxim was, that pleasure is the chief good of man. Dionysius the tyrant entertained him at his court, where Aristippus revelled in luxury. The tyrant once asked him, why the philosophers always sought the company of the great, whereas the latter seldom visited philosophers? to which the other replied, "Because the physicians usually go to the sick." Diogenes having said to him, "If Aristippus could be content to live upon vegetables, he would not demean himself in courting the favour of princes;" he replied, "If he who censures me were qualified to pay his court to princes, he would not live on vegetables." A person boasting before him that he had read a great deal, Aristippus remarked, "it was no sign of good health to eat more than one can digest." He flourished about 400 B.C. His daughter Arete was famous for wisdom as well as beauty.—Stanley's Lives of Philof.

ARISTO, of Chios, a stoic philosopher, who lived about 260 B.C. He endeavoured to form a sect of his own, and treated logic and physics as useless. He taught that all actions are indifferent in themselves, though he maintained that virtue is the supreme good. He died in consequence of the scorching rays of the sun striking upon his bald head.—Stanley.

ARISTO, a peripatetic philosopher, who flourished about 230 B.C. He was the author of Amatory Epistles, quoted by Athenæus.—Ibid.

ARISTO (Titus), an eminent Roman lawyer in the time of Trajan. Pliny the younger mentions his abilities and virtues in the highest terms. He wrote several books, the very titles of which are lost.—Bayle.

ARISTOBULUS I. king of the Jews, was at first high priest, in which he succeeded his father Hyrcanus. He took his elder brother Antigonus into partnership with him in the government, but put his mother and two younger brothers into prison, where they were starved. He afterwards caused Antigonus to be put to death. He died B.C. 104, having reigned but a year.—Josephus.

ARISTOTELUS II. was the son of Alexander Jannæus. In 69 B.C. he dethroned his brother Hyrcanus; but was deposed in his turn by the Romans under Pompey, who caused him to be poisoned.—Ibid.

ARISTOBULUS, a Jew of Alexandria, who joined the peripatetic philosophy with the law of Moses. He is frequently quoted by Eusebius, but his works are lost; he flourished 120 B.C.—Dupin.

ARISTOGITON, an Athenian citizen, who with his friend Harmodius formed a conspiracy against Hipparchus and Hippias the tyrants of Athens, B.C. 516. Harmodius was killed after dispatching Hipparchus, and Aristogiton being made prisoner, was tortured to make him confess the names of his confederates, on which he named the tyrant's friends, who were directly put to death; and being asked if there were no more, he answered, that there remained only Hippias, who deserved to die. The memory of these two friends was celebrated at Athens with enthusiasm.—Herodotus, Thucydides, Univ. Hist.

ARISTOMENES, a celebrated Greek, was the son of Nicomedes, and descended from the kings of Messene. He roused the Messenians to take up arms against Sparta, B.C. 685. He defeated the Spartans in the first battle, for which his countrymen would have made him king, but he contented himself with the title of general. He was twice taken prisoner, but escaped by very extraordinary means. Fortune at length turned against the Messenians, the greatest number of whom, under the son of Aristomenes, emigrated to Sicily, where they built the city of Messina. Aristomenes remained in Greece, with a view of recovering his country from the Lacedemonian yoke, and died at Rhodes, where he was buried with great pomp.—Diodorus Siculus, Univ. Hist.

ARISTOPHANES, an Athenian comic poet, was cotemporary with Socrates, Plato, and Euripides. He attacked the designs of those who aimed at the sovereign power at Athens with such success, that he was liberally rewarded by his fellow citizens for his patriotic exertions. His descriptions of the manners of the Athenians were so faithful, that when Dionysius the tyrant wrote to Plato for an account of the state and language of that country, he sent him his plays. Of all his pieces only eleven are extant. The Clouds was written to ridicule Socrates, who had a great contempt for the comic poets; and to the eternal dishonour of the Athenians they applauded the poet and persecuted the philosopher. The time of his death is uncertain. The best editions of this writer are those of Kuster, Bergler, Brunck, and Burnan. An English translation of The Clouds has been published by Mr. Cumberland.—Vossius de Poet. Græc. Moreti.

ARISTOTLE, the head of the peripatetic sect, was born at Stagyræ, in Thrace, B.C. 384. He was the son of Nicomachus, physician to Amyntas, the grandfather of Alexander the Great. He lost his parents when young, on which, it is said, he led such a dissipated life as soon to squander away his estate; but others assert, that he became a pupil of Plato at the age of seventeen, which ill accords with this story. He studied with indefatigable diligence under that great philosopher, to whom, however, some charge him with being guilty of base ingratitude. On the death of Plato he went to the court of Hermias, at Atarna, in Mysia, and married that prince's sister. He was afterwards sent for by Philip of Macedon to take upon him the tuition of Alexander, and gave such satisfaction to the king, that he erected statues to his honour, and for his sake rebuilt Stagyræ. On the accession of Alexander to the throne, Aristotle refused to accompany him in his expedition, but recommended to him his relation Callisthenes, and then settled at Athens, where the magistrates gave him the Lyceum, in which he taught his philosophy to a great number of disciples. Here he composed his principal works, particularly his animal history, which he undertook at the request of Alexander, who supplied him with subjects, and liberally rewarded him. Being accused of impiety, he wrote an apology for himself, addressed to the magistrates, but he soon after quitted Athens, and spent the remainder of his days at Chalcis, a city of Eubœa. Some say that he put an end to himself by poison, others that he cast himself into the river Euripus, because he could not comprehend the reason of its ebbing and flowing; and some assert, that he died of the colic, in the 63d year of his age, B.C. 323. His body was carried away by his countrymen, who erected altars to his memory. His works may be classed under the heads of rhetoric, poetry, politics, ethics, physics, mathematics, logic and metaphysics; and in the words of an elegant writer "whoever surveys the variety and perfection of his productions, all delivered in the chastest style, in the clearest order, and the most pregnant brevity, is amazed at the immensity of his genius." The best edition of Aristotle is that of Paris, 1629, in 2 vols. folio.—Diog. Laërt. Bayle, Stanley.

ARISTOXENUS, a Grecian philosopher and musician, was the disciple of Aristotle, and born at Tarentum. He flourished about 324 B.C. Of all his works, his treatise on Harmonic Elements only remains, which was printed by Meursius at Leyden, 1616, 4to.—Moreti, Burney.

ARIUS, founder of the sect of the arians, was born in Libya. He became popular at Alexandria, and was orthodox, till his ambitious views were crossed with respect to church-preference, when he broached his opinion against the divinity of the Word, which occasioned such disputes that the emperor called a council at Nice, in 325, to put an end to them. In this council the heresy of Arius was condemned, and the celebrated confession of faith, known by the name of the Nicene Creed, drawn up. Arius was then banished by the emperor; but two years after he was recalled to Constantinople, and made a confession of his faith, which was received as orthodox. In 331, he went to Alexandria, where Athanasius refused to receive him. When that prelate was banished, Arius again came to that city, but the people, being enraged against him, obliged him to withdraw. He then went into Egypt, where he raised new disturbances by his opinions; on which the emperor sent for him to Constantinople, and demanded of him, whether he adhered to the Nicene faith; to which Arius answered on oath that he did, at the same time delivering his own confession, which appearing found, the emperor ordered that he should be re-admitted into the church. He was then conducted in triumph by his followers to the great church, but on the way being pressed by a natural necessity, he retired to a house of convenience, where he died, in 386. His doctrines did not expire with him, but occasioned fierce contentions in christendom for ages.—Cave Hist. Lit. Mæheim. Bayle.

ARKEL (Cornelius Van), a Dutch divine, was born at Amsterdam in 1670, and educated under Limborch and Le Clerc. He was a celebrated preacher among the remonstrants, or arminians, and died in 1724. He published Hadriani Junii Homani, Medici animadversa ejusdemque de Coma Commentarius, &c.—Moreri.

ARKENHOLZ (John), a Swedish writer, was born at Helsingfors, in 1695. He studied at Upsal, and travelled through a great part of Europe. While at Paris, he wrote a piece, entitled Considerations sur la France par Rapport à la Suede, in which he severely censured cardinal Fleury, who complained of him to the Swedish court, by which means he lost his place of registrar. In 1743 he obtained the office of secretary of public accounts, and in 1746 he was keeper of the cabinet of curiosities at Cassel. He was afterwards employed in writing the history of Frederic I. which he never finished. He died in 1777. He published the letters of Grotius to Queen Christina. Memoirs of the same Queen, and several pieces on political and other subjects.—Gen. Biog.

ARKWRIGHT (Sir Richard), an English manufacturer, was originally a barber at Wirksworth in Derbyshire, which situation he quitted about 1767, and went about the country buying hair. At Warrington he got acquainted with one Kay, a clockmaker, and projected with him a machine for spinning cotton, in perfecting of which they were assisted by Mr. Atherton of Liverpool. Mr. Arkwright afterwards went into partnership with Mr. Smalley of Preston, but not succeeding there, they went to Nottingham, and erected a cotton mill, which was worked by horses. By this time Mr.

Arkwright had taken out a patent for his machine, which, however, was set aside in 1785, in the court of King's Bench. He afterwards erected works at Crumford, in Derbyshire, and acquired a fortune of near half a million sterling. He was knighted on presenting an address to his majesty in 1786, as high sheriff of the county of Derby, and died at his seat August 3, 1792.—Ibid.

ARLAUD (James Antony), an eminent painter, was born at Geneva in 1668. He went early to Paris, where he was patronized by the king. Here he painted his Leda, a copy of which he sold in London for 600*l.* but he would never part with the original. In a fit of enthusiasm he destroyed this exquisite production, by cutting it to pieces. He died in 1743.—Moreri.

ARLOTTA, mother of William the conqueror. She was a tanner's daughter at Falaife, where she attracted the notice of Robert duke of Normandy, who made her his mistress. On his decease she married a Norman gentleman, by whom she had three children, who were all provided for by William.—Biog. Brit.

ARLOTTO, a religious buffoon, was born in Tuscany in 1395. Having entered into orders he obtained several preferments, and was greatly esteemed by Lorenzo de Medici, and other great men, on account of his wit. He died at Florence in 1483. A collection of his jests was published after his death.—Nov. Diss. Hist.

ARMENIA MAJOR, or ADHERBITZAN, was part of the empire of the Medes, and passed through the same changes till 224 B. C. when Zadiades and Artaxas revolted from Antiochus the Great, the former taking possession of Armenia Minor, and the latter of this country. Tigranes the Great, who reigned here in 95 B. C. reduced Armenia Minor and other provinces. He became tributary to Rome in 66 B. C. and Trajan made this country a Roman province in 106. In 370 it was conquered by Sapor king of Parthia, but the Romans soon recovered it. Afterwards it was governed by its own princes, till the Saracens obtained it about 651. It was conquered by the Seljukian Turks about 1046, after which it suffered many changes till it was reduced by the prince of Kharrasm in 1200, who was driven out of it by Genghis Khan in 1218. In 1385 the Ilkhanian dynasty began here, and continued till 1385, when it was conquered by Timur, from whom it was soon after recovered by the Ilkhanian princes. On the death of Ahmed Jalavir, the last of that line, in 1405, Kara Yusuf, the chief of the Turcomans, got possession of it. This dynasty had the name of the Black Sheep, and in 1498 it fell by conquest to the family of the White Sheep. In 1501 it was conquered by Ismael Sofi, and reduced by Selim II. in 1552, since which the Turks have held possession of all, except the eastern part, which belongs to the Persians.—Univ. Hist.

ARMENIA MINOR underwent the same changes with Armenia Major, till about 224 B. C. when it became a distinct kingdom under Zadiades. In 95 B. C. Tigranes conquered it, after whom it came to the Romans, who reduced it in 71 to a Roman province. When the Roman empire declined, this country fell to the Persians, but about 651 the Saracens took possession of it. In 1016 the Seljukian Turks took it, but in 1500 the prince of Kharasim made a conquest of the country, which was taken from him by Jenghis Khan. In 1335 the Ilkhanian dynasty commenced here. Timur conquered it in 1381, and the Turcomans got it in 1405, when it was called Turcomania. In 1488 it was reduced, with Armenia Major, by the family of the White Sheep. Imael Sofi conquered it in 1500, but in 1514 it was taken by Selim I. sultan of the Turks.—Ibid.

ARMINIUS, or the Deliverer of Germany, was the son of Sigimer, a chieftain of the Catti. He served with reputation in the Roman armies, and was honoured by Augustus with knighthood, and the citizenship of Rome. But his attachment to his native country prevailed over all considerations, and at his instigation the Germans openly revolted against the Roman power. By his contrivance Varus fell into an ambuscade, where he perished with nearly all his forces. In 16 Germanicus marched to revenge the death of Varus, having in his army a brother of Arminius named Fulvius, who was greatly attached to the Romans. After a variety of fortune Arminius was treacherously assassinated in the 37th year of his age, A. D. 21.—Tacitus.

ARMINIUS (James), a Dutch divine, was born at Oudewater in 1500. He lost his father in his infancy, and his mother, sister, and brothers, were butchered by the Spaniards while he was at Marburg in 1575. He afterwards studied at Leyden and Geneva, from whence he travelled into Italy, and spent some time at Padua. In 1588 he was ordained, and became a popular preacher. About this time Lydius, theological professor at Franeker desired him to refute a piece which had been written against Beza on predestination, by some divines at Delit. In studying this point Arminius became a convert to the opinion which he was employed to confute. In 1603 he was appointed professor of divinity at Leyden, where his lectures made a great noise, and brought off many from the rigid doctrines which had hitherto prevailed on the divine decrees. His great adversary was Gomarus, with whom he held several conferences. In 1607 he wrote an apology to the elector palatine, respecting the disputes in which he was engaged on the controverted points. It is supposed that these fierce dissensions occasioned the illness of which he died in 1609. Arminius was a very learned, pious, and eloquent man, and remarkable for the evenness of his temper. His motto was, "A good conscience is a paradise." His works were published at Franckfort in 1 vol. quarto, 1631. The arminians in Holland are still a distinct sect from the establishment.—Brand's Hist. vit. Arm. Bayle.

ARMSTRONG (Sir Thomas), an English gentleman, who was very active in the time of the rebellion in behalf of the king, for which Cromwell threw him into prison, and threatened his life. He was an avowed enemy to popery, and engaged with great zeal in the service of the duke of Monmouth. Soon after the new sheriffs were imposed on the city of London by the influence of the court, an insurrection was planned by the country party. Sir Thomas Armstrong went with the duke of Monmouth to view the king's guards, in order to judge whether they might venture to attack them in the projected insurrection. Finding himself obnoxious to the court he fled the kingdom, and was outlawed. He was seized abroad and sent to London, where he was condemned and executed without a trial, June 20, 1684.—Big. Br.

ARMSTRONG (John), a poet and physician, was born at Cattleton in Roxburghshire, where his father and brother were ministers. He took his degree of M. D. at Edinburgh, in 1732. In 1745 he published an anonymous tract, entitled An Essay for the Abridging the Study of Physic. In 1757 appeared his Synopsis of the History and Cure of the Venereal Disease, 8vo. Not long after came out his Economy of Love, a poem, in which he has caught the spirit of Ovid, with his licentiousness. In the edition of 1768, the author purged this piece of many offensive passages. In 1744 he published the Art of preserving Health, one of the best didactic poems in our language. In 1746 he was appointed one of the physicians to the military hospital behind Buckingham-house. In 1758 he printed Sketches, or Essays on various subjects, by Launcelot Temple, esq. In 1760 he was appointed physician to the army in Germany, and the next year wrote a poem called Day, an epistle to John Wilkes of Aylesbury, esq. In this letter he threw out a reflection upon Churchill, which drew on him the resentment of that satirist. Dr. Armstrong published a collection of Miscellanies in 1770, in 2 vols. 12mo and the year following a short ramble through some parts of France and Italy, by Launcelot Temple. In 1773 appeared his Medical Essays, in 1 vol. 4to. He died in 1779. Dr. Armstrong was a man greatly beloved by his friends for the goodness of his heart, as well as for his literary talents.—Big. Br.

ARMSTRONG (John), a Scotch writer, was born at Leith and educated at Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.A. During his residence in the university, he published a volume of Juvenile Poems, with an Essay on the Means of punishing and preventing Crimes. In 1790 he came to London, and supported himself by writing for the daily papers. He also preached occasionally in some of the dissenting meeting houses, and was rising in reputation and prospect when he was taken off in the 26th year of his age, 1797.—Monthly Mag.

ARMYNE (Lady Mary) an English lady, was the daughter of Henry Talbot, fourth son of George earl of Shrewsbury, and wife of sir William Armyne. She was distinguished for her talents and her piety. She was mistress of the French and Latin languages, and skilled in history and divinity. It was her custom to distribute books among the poor; and she gave large sums to the missionaries employed in converting the Indians in North America. She endowed three hospitals, and performed several other noble deeds of charity. She died in 1675.

—Clarke's Lives.

ARNALD (Richard), an English divine, was born in London, and educated at Bene't college, Cambridge, but afterwards became fellow of Emanuel college. In 1728 he took the degree of B.D. and was presented to the rectory of Thurcaston, in Leicestershire. He published several single sermons, but his most celebrated performance is his Commentary on the Apocrypha. He died in 1756.—Gen. B. D.

ARNALL (William), a political writer, who was employed by sir Robert Walpole to defend his administration, for which he is said to have received near 11,000*l.* in 4 years. Notwithstanding this, he died in debt, in 1741, aged 26.—Gen. Biog. Diet.

ARNAUD (Francis), abbé of Grand Champ, was born at Aubignan. He was employed in writing the Journal Etranger, and the Gazette littéraire de l'Europe. He also published a collection of pieces on Philosophy, Literature, and the Arts, Paris, 1777, 4 vols. 12mo. He was a man of genius and taste.—Nouv. Dict. Hyg.

ARNAULD DE VILLA NOVA, a physician at Paris, of the 14th century, was a man of learning, but broaching some mystical notions in religion, he found it necessary to quit France, and retire to Sicily, where he was entertained by Frederic, king of Aragon, who sent him to attend pope Clement in his illness, but in the voyage Arnould perished by shipwreck, about 1310. His works were printed at Lyons in 2 vols. folio, 1520, and at Basil, 1585.—Moreri.

ARNAULD (Anthony), a French lawyer, was born at Paris in 1550, and took his degree of M. A. in 1573. He became advocate of parliament, and attorney-general to queen Catherine de Medicis. His pleadings in behalf of the university of Paris, against the jesuits, in 1594, procured him a great reputation. A tract concerning the re-establishment of the jesuits has been ascribed to him, but seemingly without reason. He died in 1619.—Bayle. Moreri.

ARNAULD D'ANDILLI (Robert), eldest son of the above, was born at Paris in 1590. He held some considerable offices, and fulfilled them in the most honourable manner. At the age of 55 he retired to the convent of Port Royal des Champs, where he spent the remainder of his days in religious studies. He published a translation of Josephus, a Memoir of the House of Port Royal, Memoirs of his own life, and several other works. He died in 1674.—Moreri.

ARNAULD (Anthony), brother of the foregoing, was born at Paris in 1612 and studied philosophy at the college of Calvi, from whence he removed to the college of the Sorbonne, and applied himself to divinity. In 1641 he commenced doctor. In 1643 he published a book on frequent communion, which gave offence to the jesuits. The controversy between them and the jansenists was then at its height, and M. Arnauld joined the latter, whom he defended with great ability. For this he was expelled the Sorbonne, on which he went into retirement, where he employed himself in writing a great number of treatises. When this famous controversy subsided, in 1668, Arnauld turned his polemical weapons against the calvinists. His treatise, entitled La Perpetuité de la Foi, in which he was assisted by M. Nicole, brought on the grand dispute between them and M. Claude, in which each party claimed the victory. In 1679 he quitted France, and went into the Netherlands, where he continued to write against the jesuits and protestants, with equal sharpness and facility. He died in 1684, and his heart, at his own request, was sent to be deposited in the Port Royal. The works of Arnauld are exceedingly numerous, but mostly polemical. After his death, father Quefnel published his letters in 9 vols.—Bayle. Mor.

ARNAULD (Henry), brother of the above, was born at Paris in 1597. He was made dean of Cournay; and in 1604, bishop of Angers, which diocese he never left but once, and that was to reconcile the prince of Tarento to his father, the duke de la Tremouille. When Angers revolted in 1632, the queen-mother was about to take heavy vengeance upon it but was prevented by this bishop; who, as he administered the sacrament to her, said: "Take, madam, the body of him who forgave his enemies when he was dying on the cross." He divided his time between prayer, reading, and his public duties. A friend saying to him that he ought to allow himself one day in the week for recreation; "That I will do with all my heart," he replied, "if you will name a day wherein I am not a bishop." He died at Angers in 1692. His "Negotiations at Rome," were pub-

ARNAULD (Angelique), sister of the preceding, and abbess of the convent of Port Royal, was born in 1596. She set about a rigorous reformation of her society, and obtained so great a reputation for sanctity, that numbers of persons of both sexes came and built huts about the convent, under the name of jansenist penitents. At the age of 29, she was appointed to reform the convent of Maubuisson, where she remained five years. She afterwards had the king's permission to remove her society to Paris. She died in 1661. Six sisters of the Arnaulds, with their mother, ended their days in this convent.—Moreri. Bayle.

ARNDT (John), a German divine, was born at Ballenstadt, in the duchy of Anhalt, in 1555. He became minister first at Quedlinburg, and then at Brunswick, from whence he removed to Ilseben. In 1611, the duke of Luncenburg gave him the church of Zell, and appointed him superintendent of all the churches in the duchy. He died in 1625. His most celebrated work is his Treatise on true Christianity, the first part of which appeared in 1605, and the rest in 1608. It was translated into English by Mr. Boehm, in 1712, 3 vols. 8vo.—Moreri.

ARNDT (Joshua) a German divine, was born at Gustrów. He became professor of logic at Rostock, and chaplain to the duke of Mecklenburg. He died in 1678. He wrote Miscellanea Sacra, 8vo. 1648; Clavis Antiquitatum Judaicarum, Leipzig, 1707, 4to.; and Tractatus de Superstitione. His son Charles was professor of poetry and Hebrew at Melchin, and died in 1721.—Moreri.

ARNE (Thomas Augustine), an English musician, was born in 1710. His father was an upholsterer in Covent-garden. He had his education at Eton, and was afterwards articled to an attorney; but music had more charms for him than the law, and he soon abandoned the desk for the fiddle: his proficiency was so great, that in no long time he was engaged as leader of the band at Drury-lane; and in 1733 he composed the music for Addison's opera of Rosamond, which was received with universal applause. In 1738, he acquired great credit by setting Milton's Comus. In 1740 he set Mallet's Masque of Alfred, in which first appeared the song of Rule Britannia. He had great success in setting popular ballads to music. In 1759 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of music. He died in 1778, of a spasm of the lungs. Having been bred a Roman catholic, he had recourse in his last illness to the consolations of that religion for support, though in the progress of his life, he had paid little respect to any form of worship.—Monthly Mag. Oct. 1796.

ARNORIUM (Jonas), a clergyman of Leland, was a man of considerable learning and merit and illustrated the history of his country by several able disquisitions. He also wrote a piece on the Runic letters, to be found in Olaus Wormius's Collections. He died in 1649.—Gen. Big.

ARNISEUS (Henningsius), a learned German, was a native of Halberstadt, and became professor of medicine at Helmstadt. He wrote some poetical pieces in defence of the doctrine of passive obedience, and some on physic and philosophy. He died in 1685.—Moreri.

ARNOBIUS, professor of rhetoric at Sicca, in Numidia, at the end of the 3d century; was, at first, an enemy to christianity; but afterwards became a convert and wrote an eloquent piece against the gentiles, which has been printed several times. Lactantius was his pupil.—Cave. Dupin.

ARNOBIUS, of Gaul, a christian divine of the 5th century. He wrote a commentary on the Psalms, and defended the Pelagians against the followers of St. Augustine.—Ibid.

ARNOLD, an Italian monk of the 12th century, was a native of Brescia; and became a pupil of Peter Abelard. On his return to Italy, he set up for a reformer, and asserted, among other things, that it was a deadly sin for the clergy to enjoy a temporal estate. His doctrines procured him many followers. In 1139 they were condemned, by pope Innocent II.; on which Arnold left Italy and went to Switzerland. On the death of that pope he returned to Rome, and excited commotions against the papal authority, which obliged Adrian IV. to lay the city under an interdict, till the arnoldists were banished. Arnold and his followers then retired to Tuscany, where he was treated as a prophet: but was at last seized and executed in 1155. Some of his followers came to England, in 1160; but were all put to death.—Gibbon. M. libem.

ARNOLD (Samuel), an eminent musical composer, was educated at the chapel royal St. James's, under Mr. Gates and Dr. Nares. About 1760 he became composer to Covent garden theatre, where he distinguished himself by several fine productions. His Cure of Saul attracted crowded houses; this was succeeded by the Prodigal Son, an oratorio, for which in 1773, he obtained his doctor's degree at Oxford. At this time he was proprietor of the Marybone Gardens, then a favourite place of public amusement. On the death of Dr. Nares in 1783, he was appointed organist and composer to the chapel royal. In 1786 he commenced a splendid edition of Handel's works. He died October 13, 1802, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, of which church he was organist.—Public Characters, vol. ii.

ARNOLD (Nicholas), a protestant divine, was born at Leina, in 1618. He became professor of divinity at Franeker, where he died in 1680. He wrote some polemical pieces, which were printed at Leipzig in 1696.—Bayle.

ARNOLD (Jeffery), a zealous pietist and minister of the church of Perleberg, wrote several works, particularly a History of the Church, and of Heretics, printed at Leipzig in 1700. He died in 1714.—Moreri.

ARNOLD of Hildesheim, a German historian of the 13th century. He wrote a continuation of Helmeldus's Chronicle of the Slavonians, which was published at Lubeck in 1659.—Moreri.

ARNOLD (Christopher), a learned German, was born near Nuremburg, in 1627. He studied at Altorf; after which he visited England and other countries. On his return he was chosen professor, and died in 1685. His works are, 1. Testimonium Flavianum, seu, Epistola 90 de Josephi testimonio de Christi; 2. Ruperti Historia Universalis; besides several editions of Latin authors, with prefaces and commentaries.—Moreri.

ARNOLD (Benedict), an American general of singular fortune and character, was a native of New England, and bred a surgeon, which profession he quitted for a sea life. He was for many years master and supercargo of a trading vessel; but on the commencement of hostilities between Great Britain and the colonies, he entered into the service of the latter, and was chosen captain of a company of volunteers at Newhaven. Soon after he rose to the rank of colonel, and commanded an expedition to Canada. He marched through great difficulties with an intention of taking Quebec by surprise, but the garrison was prepared for his coming. He was afterwards joined by general Montgomery, and in the attempt to storm the city received a wound in the leg. On the death of Montgomery he drew off the troops and retreated to Crown Point. He next commanded a flotilla on Lake Champlain, where he distinguished himself by his bravery. He continued to be actively employed on that side till 1780, when he opened a correspondence with sir Henry Clinton for betraying to the British West Point; in which unfortunate negotiation, Major André became a victim. Arnold had a narrow escape, and got on board an English ship of war. He now served with equal ardour on the other side, and at the close of the war retired to England, where he had a pension. After the peace he went to Nova Scotia, from whence he sailed to the West Indies, and on his passage was taken by the French, from whom he effected an escape. He died in London in 1801.—Monthly Mag. vol. XL.

ARNTZENIUS (John Henry), professor of law in the university of Utrecht, was a good poet and a man of extensive erudition. He died at Utrecht in 1799. His works are 1. Academical Discourses and Dissertations. 2. Miscellanies. 3. Insti-tionis juris belgici, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Sedulius et Arator. 5. Panegyrici Veteres.—L'Escur Dich. Univ.

ARNOUL, bishop of Lisieux in the 12th century; died in 1184. His Letters, relating to the history of his times, were printed at Paris in 1585, 8vo.—Moreri.

ARNU (Nicholas), a learned dominican, was born in Lorrain, 1629, and died in 1692, at Padua, where he was professor of metaphysics. He wrote ten volumes on the philosophy and theology of Aquinas.—Moreri.

ARNULPH, emperor of Germany, was the natural son of Carloman, king of Bavaria, and elected in 888. He was crowned at Rome by pope Formosus in 896. He died in 899, as it is supposed of poison. He was succeeded by his son Lewis IV.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

ARNULPH, or ERNULF, bishop of Rochester in the reign of Henry I.; died in 1124, aged 84. He wrote a history of the church of Rochester, entitled Textus Roffensis.—Biog. Br.

ARNULPHUS, an Egyptian, who obtained a great name at Rome by his pretended skill in magic in the reign of Marcus Antoninus.—Moreri.

ARNWAY (John), was born in Shropshire in 1601, and educated at Edmund-hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. He had the rectories of Hodret and Lightfield, in his native county, of which he was deprived in the great rebellion. He also suffered the loss of his temporal estate in the same cause. In 1640 he attended the king at Oxford, and was created D.D. and made archdeacon of Coventry. He afterwards went to Virginia, where he died in 1653. He wrote some tracts in defence of Charles I.—Biog. Br.

ARON (Peter), a musical writer in the 16th century, was born at Florence, and became canon of Rimini. He also belonged to the chapel of Leo X. He wrote several books, in Italian, on music, one of which, entitled De Institutione Harmonica, was translated into Latin, 1516.—Burney. Hawkins.

ARPINO (Joseph d'), an Italian painter, was born at the castle of Arpino in 1560. While a boy he was put under some painters employed in the Vatican, in the time of Gregory XIII. who, observing his genius, allowed him a crown of gold a day. He became eminent in his profession, and was knighted. He died at Rome in 1640. Among painters he goes by the name of Josephin.—Moreri.

ARRAGON (Joan of), an illustrious Italian lady of the 16th century, was married to one of the princes of Colonna, by whom she had the famous Marc Antony Colonna, who vanquished the Turks at Lepanto. Several eulogies were printed at Venice, in 1556, to her honour. She died in 1577.—Bayle.

ARRAN (James Hamilton, earl of), was in the earlier part of his life the most accomplished gentleman of his family. In 1553 he went to the court of France, where he was highly in favour with Henry II. who made him captain of his Scottish life guards. Here he became enamoured with queen Mary, but he regarded her with that admiration with which a subject beholds his sovereign. He had afterwards some hopes of espousing queen Elizabeth, but when Mary became a widow he fell violently in love with her, and being treated with indifference, sunk into depondency, and lost his reason. He died in 1609.—Granger.

ARRIA, the wife of Cæcina Pætus, the Roman consul, is immortalized for her heroism and conjugal affection. When her husband was sentenced to put himself to death by Claudius, she, perceiving his hesitation, plunged a dagger into her bosom, and drawing it out, said, "My Pætus, it is not painful!"—Martial. Tacitus.

ARRIAZO (Roderic d'), a Spanish jesuit, was born in 1592. He became professor in theology and philosophy at Prague, where he died in 1667. His Course of Philosophy was printed at Antwerp in 1633, and his Course of Theology in 1643, 8 vols. folio.—Bayle.

ARRIAN, a Greek historian of the 2d century, was a native of Nicomedia, and raised to some of the highest dignities at Rome. He united in himself the character of a warrior and philosopher. He wrote, Diatribæ, or Dissertations on Epictetus; the History of Alexander the Great; An Account of a Voyage along the Borders of the Euxine Sea; on Hunting; and on Tactics; all which are extant. To him also we are indebted for the Enchyridion, or Discourses of Epictetus, whose disciple he was. An English translation of his History of Alexander was published by Rooke, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1729. In Pliny's letters are seven addressed to Arrian.—Vossius de Hist. Græc.

ARROWSMITH (John), a nonconformist divine, was theological professor at Cambridge in 1660. He wrote Tactica Sacra; Godman, or an Exposition of the first Chapter of St. John's Gospel; a Chain of Principles, or a Course of Theology; all in 4to. and highly Calvinistic. He died about the time of the restoration.—Neal.

ARSACES I. founder of the Parthian monarchy. He persuaded his countrymen to break off the Macedonian yoke, B.C. 250, on which they raised him to the throne. Arsaces was slain in battle, after reigning 38 years. His successors all took his name.—Grote. Hist.

ARSACES II. son of the above, was a formidable enemy of Antiochus the Great. He left his throne to his son Arsaces Priapatius.—Ibid.

ARSACES TIRANUS, king of Armenia, was treacherously taken prisoner by Sapor, king of Persia, who caused him to be bound with silver chains, and cast into prison at Ecbatana, where he died B.C. 362. His country then became a Persian province.—Ibid.

ARSENIUS, bishop of Constantinople in the 13th century. He excommunicated Michael Paleologus for taking the imperial crown from John Lascaris, the son of Theodore. Michael solicited absolution, which the resolute patriarch refused on any other condition than that of restitution. Arsenius was then banished to a small island, where he died.—Dupin. Cave.

ARSENIUS, a Roman deacon of the 4th century, was tutor to Arcadius, son of Theodosius. The emperor coming into his study, and seeing the pupil sitting and the master standing, ordered his son to rise, and receive his lessons in a becoming posture, which so irritated the prince, that he directed an officer to dispatch Arsenius; but the officer gave him information of the prince's baseness, on which he fled into Egypt, and spent the remainder of his days among the anchorites of Scetis. He died at the age of 95. A tract of his, for the conduct of the monks, is still extant.—Moreri.

ARSENIUS, archbishop of Malvasia, in the Morea, who submitted to the church of Rome, for which he was excommunicated by the Greek patriarch. He died at Venice in 1435. He wrote a collection of Greek apophthegms, and scholia on seven of Euripides's tragedies.—Bayle.

ARTABANUS II. was king of Media, when he was invited about A.D. 16 by the Parthians to be their king, in opposition to Vonones, who was in the interest of the Romans. He ruled with great severity for some time, which made the Parthians call in the aid of the Romans, who compelled him to fly into Hyrcania. He was twice deposed for his arbitrary conduct, and as often reinstated on the throne. He then governed with such discretion that his death was lamented by his subjects, about A.D. 48.—Univ. Hist.

ARTABANUS IV. brother of Volageses III. Caracalla behaved to this prince in a most infamous manner; for, on entering his capital, where he was received with the greatest friendship, he gave a signal to the Roman soldiers, who fell upon the populace, and made a dreadful massacre. Artabanus, who escaped with difficulty, mustered an army, and attacked the Romans with great fury. The battle lasted two days, but as the armies were preparing for the combat, the Roman general sent to inform Artabanus of the death of Caracalla, and to propose a negotiation. Peace was accordingly made on honourable terms; this happened in 217. Artaxerxes incited his subjects to revolt, and in a battle, in 226, Artabanus was taken prisoner, and put to death. Thus ended the Parthian empire.—Ibid.

ARTALIS (Joseph), an Italian poet and soldier, was born in Sicily in 1628. He was at the siege of Candia, and for his bravery received the honour of knighthood. He died at Naples in 1679. He wrote some poetical pieces in Italian.—Moreri.

ASTAUD, archbishop of Rheims, is famous for his disputes with Hebert and Hugues, counts of Paris. These noblemen, with the assistance of William duke of Normandy, laid siege to Rheims, on which he was obliged to resign his see. He then retired to court, and Hugues was ordained in his room; but in 947 the king restored Astaud to his diocese. He died the year following.—Moreri.

ARNAUD (Peter Joseph), bishop of Caillon, in France, died in 1760, aged 54. He was a very exemplary prelate, and wrote some religious discourses, in which good sense and eloquence are displayed to advantage.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ARTAVASDES I. king of Armenia, succeeded his father Tigranes. He joined the Roman forces under Crassus, but basely deserted, and went over to the enemy, in consequence of which the Romans were defeated, and Crassus slain. He behaved in a similar manner to Marc Antony when engaged against the Medæ. Antony, about two years after, got Artavasdes into his power, and took him, with his wife and children, to Alexandria, where they were dragged at his chariot wheels in chains of gold. After the battle of Actium, Cleopatra caused his head to be struck off, and sent to the king of Media.—Univ. Hist.

ARTAVASDES II. grandson of the above, was placed on the throne of Armenia by Augustus, but was expelled soon after by his own subjects, who preferred the government of the king of Parthia. The emperor restored Artavasdes to his throne, but he died shortly after.—Ibid.

ARTAXERXES I. surnamed Longimanus, was the third son of Xerxes, king of Persia. He slew his brother Darius on suspicion of his being guilty of the murder of his father, which crime was, in fact, committed by Artabanus, captain of the guards. Artaxerxes then ascended the throne B. C. 465, and in his time peace was restored between Persia and Athens, after a war of fifty-one years. Artaxerxes is generally supposed to have been the Ahazuerus of scripture, who married Esther, and by whose permission Ezra restored the Jewish religion at Jerusalem. The 70 weeks of Daniel are also dated in his reign. He died B. C. 424, and was succeeded by his only son Xerxes.—Ibid.

ARTAXERXES II. surnamed Mnemon on account of his great memory, was the eldest son of Darius Nothus, and began his reign B. C. 404. His brother Cyrus soon after formed a conspiracy against him, for which he was sentenced to death, but at the intercession of his mother Parysatis he was banished to Asia Minor. This act of kindness Cyrus repaid by mustering a large army of Asiatics, and hiring some Greek troops, under Clearchus, with which he marched to Babylon, but was met by Artaxerxes, and after an obstinate battle defeated, Cyrus himself being numbered with the slain. The Greeks, however, escaped, and reached their own country, under Xenophon, who has immortalized this retreat in his history. After the death of Statira, who was poisoned by the mother of Artaxerxes, he married his own daughter; such was the morality of that age! He died at the age of 94, after reigning 62 years.—Ibid.

ARTAXERXES III. succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, B. C. 359. To pave his way to the succession he murdered two of his brothers, and afterwards put to death all the remaining branches of the family. He quelled several insurrections that were raised against him. While he was in Egypt he slew the sacred bull Apis, and gave the flesh to his soldiers; for which his eunuch, Bagoas, an Egyptian, caused him to be poisoned, and after giving the carcase to the cats, made knife handles of his bones. This happened B. C. 338.—Ibid.

ARTAXERXES BRBEGAN, or ARDSHIR, the first king of Persia of the race of Sassanides, was the son of a shepherd; but his grandfather, by the mother's side, being governor of a province, he received a good education, and was introduced at the court of Ardavan. On the death of his grandfather he solicited the government, which being refused, he retired to Persia Proper, where he excited the people to revolt. He defeated and slew Ardavan and his son, on which he assumed the title of king of kings. He made great conquests, and regulated the affairs of his kingdom with prudence and wisdom, restraining the power of the nobles within proper limits, and ministering justice to all his subjects alike. He married the eldest daughter of Ardavan, who attempted to poison him, for which she was sentenced to death. The officer, however, to whom the execution was committed, concealed the queen, who was in a state of pregnancy, and she was afterwards delivered of a son. The secret being discovered to the king he applauded the conduct of the officer, and acknowledged the child as his heir. This was his successor, Sapor. Ardshir reigned 14 years, and died A. D. 240.—Ibid.

ARTAXIAS I. king of Armenia, of which country he was joint governor with Zabriades, under Antiochus the Great, but setting up for themselves they established the two kingdoms of Greater and Lesser Armenia, the first of which was obtained by Artaxias. He was defeated and made prisoner by Antiochus Epiphanes, but afterwards obtained his liberty and his throne. The time of his death is uncertain.—Ibid.

ARTAXIAS II. king of Armenia, was placed on the throne when his father Artavasdes I. was taken prisoner; but he was soon expelled by Anthony, and by the as-stances of the Parthians he recovered his kingdom. He was slain by his subjects, and succeeded by his brother Tigranes.—Univ. Hist.

ARTAXIAS III. son of Poleno, king of Pontus, was placed on the throne by Germanicus, in the room of Orodes, son of Vologases. He reigned 17 years.—Ibid.

ARTEAGA (don Estevano), a Spanish jesuit, and the author of several ingenious works in different languages; the principal of which are, 1. A Treatise on ideal Beauty, in Spanish, a new edition of which, revised and enlarged, has been published in Italian. 2. Le Rivoluzioni del teatro musicale italiano dalla sua origine fino al presente, 1785, 3 vol. 8vo. He left the MS. of another Italian work, entitled Ritmo Sonoro e del ritmo muto degli Antichi, full of learned remarks on what the ancients called rhythm. He died at Paris in 1800, aged 55.—L'Esprit Dis. Hist.

ARTEDI (Peter), a Swedish naturalist, was born in 1705, and educated in the university of Upsal, where he applied to the study of medicine. There was so great a friendship between him and Linnæus, that they made each other heirs to all their MSS. Artedi devoted himself chiefly to ichthyology, in which he made great improvements. He was drowned at Leyden in 1735. Linnæus published in 1738 his Bibliotheca Ichthyologica, and his Philosophia Ichthyologica.—Moreri.

ARTEMAS, or ARTEMON, the founder of a sect in the third century. He taught that Jesus Christ was but a man, and he and his followers are accused of having corrupted the scriptures to support their heretical opinions.—Lardner.

ARTEMIDORUS, was born at Ephesus, and acquired fame by his book on dreams. He lived in the time of Antoninus Pius. His work was first printed by Aldus in Greek, in 1518, 8vo.—Bayle.

ARTEMIDORUS of Ephesus wrote a description of the earth about 100 B.C. Of this work only a few fragments remain.—Voss. de Hist. Græc.

ARTEMISIA I. queen of Caria; she assisted Xerxes in person against the Greeks, and behaved with such valour that the Athenians offered a reward for taking her, and the Spartans erected a statue to her honour.—Un. Hist.

ARTEMISIA II. queen of Caria, is celebrated for her conjugal affection. She erected a monument to her husband Mausolus, which was so magnificent as to give a name to structures erected in honour of the dead. She is also said to have mixed his ashes in her drink, and to have given a prize for an eulogium upon his character. Having captured the whole Rhodian fleet, she went with it to Rhodes, and took that city, B.C. 351.—Ibid.

ARTINGTON (Henry), an English fanatic of a good family in Yorkshire. Becoming a zealous puritan, he exerted himself very actively in promoting what was called the work of reformation; in prosecution of this design he joined with Edmund Coppinger, who introduced him to Hacket, a pretended prophet. These men were guilty of the most frantic proceedings, for which Hacket was executed. Arthington recanted, and was pardoned.—Big. Br.

ARTHUR, a British prince, was the son of Uther pendragon, or dictator of the Britons, by the wife of the duke of Cornwall. He succeeded Uther in 516, and was immediately engaged in a war with the Saxons, in which he was completely successful. He next turned his arms against the Scots and Picts, in which he was also victorious. It is moreover said, that he conquered Ireland and the western isles of Scotland; and that, after a series of warlike exploits, he passed the remainder of his days in peace, governing his kingdom with great wisdom and moderation. He instituted the military order of the knights of the round table, and settled christianity at York in the room of paganism. These appear to be the real historical facts of this celebrated personage, of whom abundance of fabulous circumstances are related, which do not deserve to be mentioned. He died A.D. 542.—Big. Brit.

ARTHUR, duke of Brittany, the posthumous son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of Henry II. by Constance, daughter of the duke of Brittany. He was born in 1187, and was declared heir by his uncle Richard I. who afterwards devised his kingdoms to his brother John. A peace, however, took place, and Arthur did homage to his uncle for the dukedom of Brittany. In another rupture between England and France, Arthur was taken prisoner by John, who caused him to be confined in the castle of Rouen, where it is supposed he was murdered.—Ibid.

ARTONI (Anthony Gachet), was born at Vienna in 1704. He wrote Memoires d'Histoire de Critique & de Litterature, 7 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1749. He was canon of the Greek church at Vienna, where he died in 1768.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ARTUSI (Giamaria), a musical writer of the 16th century. He published at Venice, in 1586, the Art of Counterpoint reduced to Tables, which he completed in 1589. He also wrote on the Imperfections of modern Music, 1600 and 1603.—Burney. Harvins.

ARVIZU (Laurent d'), was born at Marseilles in 1635. He resided in Syria and Palestine twelve years, and returned to France, stored with oriental knowledge, in 1665. In 1668 he was sent envoy to Tunis, and brought back with him 380 French captives. In 1672 he was employed at Constantinople, and in 1674 went to Algiers, where he obtained the freedom of 240 French slaves. In 1679 he was appointed consul at Aleppo, from whence he returned to Marseilles in 1686, and resided there till his death in 1702. His memoirs, or travels, were published in 1734, in 6 vols. 12mo.—Morri.

ARVIRAGUS, a British king, said to have flourished in the time of Domitian. Jeffery of Monmouth says, that after a long and prosperous reign, he died, and was buried at Gloucester, in a temple which was built by him to the honour of Claudius.—Biog. Br.

ARUNDEL (Thomas), archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1353. At the age of 21 he was consecrated bishop of Ely. In 1396 he was raised to the primacy, with which he exercised the office of lord high chancellor. Richard II. banished him for some attempts to establish a regency, on which he went to Rome. When Henry IV. ascended the throne, Arundel returned to England. He was a zealous defender of the temporalities of the church, and exerted himself with great violence against the lollards, or wickliffites, many of whom were brought to the stake. He died in 1413.—Ibid.

ARUNDEL (Mary), was first the wife of Robert Ratcliff, who dying in 1566 she married Henry Howard, earl of Arundel. She was a learned woman, and translated the Wise Sayings and Deeds of the Emperor Alexander Severus, and from the Greek into Latin the Apophthegms of the seven wise Philosophers.—Bullard's Brit. Ladies.

ARUNDEL (Blanche, lady), the daughter of the earl of Worcester, and wife of Lord Arundel, deserves commemoration for her gallant defence of Wardour castle against the rebel army under sir Edward Hungerford. The besiegers were about 1300, and the garrison consisted of no more than 25; yet with this little force she bravely maintained the place six days, and then capitulated on honourable terms, which the rebels basely violated. She died in 1649, aged 66, and was buried in the chapel of Wardour castle.—Seward's Anecdotes.

ARZACHEL, a Spanish astronomer of the 11th century, who wrote a book of Observations on the Obliquity of the Zodiac.—Morri.

ASA, king of Judah, the son of Abijah, began his reign about 955 B.C. He was zealous in repressing idolatry; but in a war between him and the king of Israel, he called in the aid of Benhadad, king of Syria, for which the prophet Hanani was sent to reprove him. He reigned 41 years.—SS.

ASAPH, a Hebrew musician of the tribe of Levi, was cotemporary with David, and composed several of the psalms.—Ibid.

ASAPH (St.), a Welsh prelate, who gave name to the see he governed, flourished about the year 500. He wrote the life of his predecessor, Kentigern, and some other pieces.—Biog. Br.

ASAR-HADON, son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, succeeded his father B.C. 712. After reigning 32 years in Nineveh he obtained the kingdom of Babylon. He died B.C. 667.—Esfiras I.

ASCELIN, a divine of the 11th century, who defended transubstantiation against Berenger.—Morri.

ASCHAM (Roger), a learned English writer, was born in Yorkshire about 1513. In 1530 he entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, where, in 1534, he took his degree of B.A. and was elected fellow. In 1536 he was created M.A. and appointed teacher of Greek. In 1544 Henry VIII. settled a pension of 10l. a year upon him, and about the same time he was appointed tutor to lady Elizabeth, with whom he read Cicero, Isocrates, Sophocles, and other ancient authors. After being thus honourably employed two years he returned to Cambridge, and had a pension settled upon him by king Edward; here he filled the office of public orator with great reputation. In 1550 he attended sir Richard Morysine in his embassy to the emperor Charles V. and remained in Germany three years. During this time he was appointed Latin secretary to king Edward, but on the death of that prince he lost his place and his pension. Afterwards he was made Latin secretary to queen Mary, and employed by cardinal Pole. On the accession of queen Elizabeth he continued in his office of secretary, and became her private tutor in the learned languages. The only preferment he obtained was a prebend in the church of York. He died in London in 1568. His most esteemed work is entitled, The Schoolmaster, or a plain and perfect Way of teaching Children to understand, write, and speak the Latin Tongue, &c.; an excellent edition by Mr. Upton appeared in 1711. His Latin epistles have been frequently printed, and are admired by all good judges of elegant composition. His works were printed entire, in 1 vol. 4to. in 1769.—Biog. Br. Life by Dr. Johnson.

ASCHAM (Anthony), a priest and vicar of Burnishton, in Yorkshire, to which he was presented by Edward VI. He published several tracts on astrology, and a book entitled, A lyttel Herbal of the Properties of Herbs, &c. made and gathered in the year 1550, by Anthony Ascham, Physician, 12mo.—Pullen's Sketches of Biog.

ASCHAM (Anthony), an English republican, was educated at Eton school and King's college, Cambridge. At the beginning of the rebellion he joined the presbyterians, and became a member of the long parliament. In 1649 he was sent to the court of Spain in the quality of envoy, where six exiled royalists assassinated him and his interpreter, June 6, 1650. He was the author of a Discourse on the Revolutions and Confusions of Governments, 8vo. 1648.—Wood Ath. Oxon.

ASCHARI, the head of a sect of musul-mans, who denied fate and predestination. He died at Bagdat A. D. 940.—D'Herbilot.

ASCLEPIADES, a Greek philosopher, lived about 350 B. C. He and his friend Meno-demus studied under Plato, at Athens, and their poverty was so great that they were obliged to work at the mill in the night to enable them to attend the academy in the day. This being mentioned to the magistrates they presented the young disciples two hundred drachmas.—Stanley. Bayle.

ASCLEPIADES, a physician of Bithynia, who lived at Rome in the time of Pompey, and founded a new sect in physic.—Pliny Nat. Hist.

ASCOLI (Cecco di), whose right name was Francesco de Stabili, was one of those few luminaries who brightened the horizon of the dark ages. He was professor of mathematics at Bologna, and author of a commentary on the sphere of John Holywood (i.e. Sacrobosco). He also wrote an Italian poem on the system of Empedocles, for which he was accused of heresy, and burned alive at Florence, in 1328, aged 70.

ASCONIUS (Pedianus), an ancient grammarian, was a native of Padua, and flourished about the time of Augustus. He wrote notes on Cicero's Orations, which are still extant.—Fabricius Bibl. Lat.

ASCOUGH (William), an English bishop, was descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire, and consecrated bishop of Salisbury in 1438. He was inhumanly murdered at the altar by Jack Cade and his followers in 1450.—Biog. Br.

ASDRUBAL, a Carthaginian commander, was brother-in-law of Hannibal. He succeeded Hamilcar in Spain, where he built a city named New Carthage, now Carthage, and reduced the whole country into subjection to the Carthaginians. He was assassinated by a Gaul, in revenge for having put his master to death.—Polybius. Plutarch.

ASDRUBAL BARCA, the brother of Hannibal, commanded in Spain, where he was several times defeated by the Romans. He afterwards entered Italy with a numerous army to assist his brother, but at the river Metaurus he was attacked by the Romans, and after a bloody battle his army was routed, and himself slain B. C. 203.—Ibid.

ASELLI (Gaspard), was born at Cremona, and became professor of anatomy at Pavia. He discovered the lacteal veins in the mystery. He died in 1626, and the year after his description of the lacteals was published in 4to at Milan.—Haller Bibl. Anat.

ASOILL (John), an English writer, was born about the middle of the 17th century. He studied in Lincoln's-inn, and in 1699 went to Ireland, where he acquired a fortune, and was elected a member of parliament; but in 1700 he was expelled the house for writing a book entitled An Argument, proving that Man may be translated from hence without passing through Death, &c. This work was voted a blasphemous libel, and ordered to be burnt. Finding his affairs desperate he returned to England, where he was chosen member for Bramber, in Suffex, and enjoyed his seat two years. During an interval of privilege he was committed to the Fleet for debt; while he was in confinement, the house took into consideration the above book, and having voted it blasphemous, he was expelled from his seat. He continued in the rules of the Fleet and King's-bench thirty years, in which time he published several political tracts. He died in 1738.—Biog. Brit.

ASHE (Simeon), a nonconformist divine, was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and exercised the ministry among the presbyterians in London above twenty years. He was an active man in the rebellion, and very zealous against the church. He died in 1662. Several sermons by him are in print.—Calamy.

ASHLEY (Robert), a native of Wiltshire, was educated at Hart-hall, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple, and in due time was called to the bar. He died in 1641. He published a Relation of the Kingdom of Cochin China, and the Life of Almanzor.—Biog. Br. Wood.

ASHMOLE (Elias), an English antiquary, was born in 1617 at Iitchfield, and educated at the grammar-school there; after which he served baron Paget of the exchequer. In 1638 he settled in London as an attorney; but on the breaking out of the rebellion he went to Oxford, and entered of Brazen-nose college. He was for some time in the royal army, but when the king's affairs were ruined he settled in London, and became a member of the society of astrologers. In 1649 he married lady Manwaring, with whom he had a good fortune. In 1658 we find him at Oxford, employed in drawing up a description of the coins given to the public library by archbishop Laud. On the restoration of Charles II. he was appointed Windsor herald, and became one of the first members of the Royal Society. In 1669 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.D. In 1672 he presented his History of the Order of the Garter to the king, who rewarded him with 400l. In 1683 he gave to the university of Oxford his collection of curiosities, which gift was augmented at his death by the bequest of his MSS. and library. He died in 1692, and lies buried in Lambeth church. He left a great number of MSS. some of which were published, viz. The Antiquities of Berkshire; Miscellanies on several curious subjects; and Memoirs of his own Life, by way of diary.—Biog. Br.

ASHTON (Charles), a learned divine, was chosen master of Jesus college, Cambridge, in 1701; and at the same time installed prebendary of Ely. He lived to a good old age, and published some valuable works.

but anonymously, particularly, 1. Leona Justin Martyris emendatus in Apol. 1. p. 21. ed. Thirdy, in the Biblioth. Liter. 1744, No. viii. 2. Tully and Hirtius reconciled as to the Time of Caesar's going to the African war, with an Account of the old Roman Year made by Caesar, No. iii. p. 89. 3. Origines de Oratore, &c. 4. Hieroclis in Anna Carmina Pythagoreæ, Comment. 1748, 8vo.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ASHTON (Thomas), a learned divine, was born in 1716, and educated at Rton, from whence he was removed to King's college, Cambridge, in 1783. In 1749 he was presented to the rectory of Sturminster Marshall, in Dorsetshire. In 1752 he obtained the rectory of St. Botolph's Bishopsgate, and in 1759 took the degree of D.D. In 1762 he was appointed preacher at Lincoln's-inn, which he resigned in 1764. He died in 1775. A volume of his sermons was published in 1770.—Ibid.

ASWELL (George), a divine, was born in London in 1612, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, of which society he became fellow, and was presented to the living of Hanwell, in Oxfordshire, which he held till his death in 1693. He published a work on the Apostolic, Athanasian, and Nicene Creeds, 8vo. 1653, and some other pieces.—Biog. Br.

ASWOOD (Bartholomew), a nonconformist divine, was ejected from the living of Axminster, in Devonshire, in 1662; he afterwards officiated to a congregation of dissenters at Peckham, in Surrey, where he died about 1690. He wrote two tracts, one entitled The Heavenly Trade, and the other The best Treasure.—Calvary.

ASWORTH (Caleb), a dissenting minister, was born in Northamptonshire in 1709, and bred a carpenter, which calling he abandoned, and became a student under Dr. Doddridge. He afterwards had a congregation at Daventry, and kept an academy there. He was created D.D. by some university in Scotland, and died in 1774. He wrote on the paradigms of the Hebrew verbs, and some other pieces.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

ASKW (Anthony), a learned physician, was born at Kendal, in Westmoreland, in 1722, and educated at Sedburgh school, from whence he was removed to Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1745, and then went to Leyden. After studying there a year he accompanied the English ambassador to Constantinople. On finishing his travels he returned to Cambridge, and took his degree of M.D. soon after which he was admitted fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and of the Royal Society. He collected a noble library, which at his death was sold by auction for upwards of 5000l. He died at Hampstead in 1784.—Gen. Mag. June 1803.

ASKW (Anne), an accomplished English lady, was the daughter of sir William As-low, of Killy, in Lincolnshire, where she was born about 1520. She had a learned education, and when young was married to one Mr. Kyme, much against her inclination. On account of some harsh treatment from her husband she went to the court of Henry VIII. to sue for a separation, where she was greatly taken notice of by those ladies who were attached to the reformation; in consequence of which she was arrested, and having confessed her religious principles, was committed to Newgate. She was first racked with savage cruelty in the Tower, and then burnt in Smithfield in 1546, in company with her tutor, and two other persons of the same faith. From her letters and other pieces in Fox and Strype, it appears that she was an accomplished as well as a pious woman.

ASPASIA, a Grecian lady, celebrated for her talents, was born at Miletus, but settled at Athens, where she kept a brothel. She was so eminent, however, for philosophy and rhetoric that the greatest men of the age, and the virtuous Socrates in the number, did not scruple to visit her house. Pericles having divorced his wife, married Aspasia, although she had been his concubine. After his death she became the mistress of a man of low condition, whom she raised to a post of importance in the state.—Bayle.

ASPASIA, the mistress of Cyrus, was by birth a Phœcean. Her name was originally Miltis, which Cyrus changed to Aspasia, and admitted her to his councils. When Cyrus was slain by his brother, she became the mistress of the victor.—Moreri.

ASSELIN (Giles Thomas), a French poet, and doctor of Sorbonne, was a native of Vire. In 1709 he gained the prize from the academy for the best poetry. He died in 1767, aged 85. His best performances are, an Ode on the Existence of God, and another on the Immortality of the Soul.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

ASSELYN (John), a Dutch painter, was born in 1610. After studying under Vandewelde, a painter of battles, he went to Italy. In 1645 he returned to Amsterdam, where he obtained great reputation as a landscape and historical painter. He died in 1650.—D'Argenville's Vies des Peintres.

ASSEI, a Jewish rabbi, he lived in the 5th century, and wrote the Talmud of Babylon, so called from the place of the author's residence. It was printed at Amsterdam, with notes, in 12 vols. folio, 1744.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

ASSER, or ASSERIUS MENEVENSIS, bishop of Sherborne in the 9th century, was a native of Wales, and a monk of the benedictine order at St. David's. It is said that Alfred founded the university of Oxford by his advice. In gratitude to that prince, by whom he was created a bishop, he wrote his life, which was published by archbishop Parker in 1574. The Annals of Asserius were printed at Oxford, in folio, in 1691. He died according to some in 883, and to others in 909.—Godeuin de Praefat. Cave.

ASSHETON (William), an English divine, was born at Middleton, in Lancashire, in 1641, and educated in Brazen-nose college, Oxford, where he took the degree of D.D. He became rector of Beckenham, in Kent, and was several times chosen prolocutor for Rochester in the convocation. He was a pious and learned man, and published several pieces in defence of the established church. But he is chiefly entitled to a place here, for being the author of a project for providing for clergymen's widows, and others, by a jointure payable by the merchants' company. He died at Beckenham in 1711.—Biog. Br.

ASSOURI (Charles Coypeau Sieur d'), a French poet, was born at Paris in 1604. He was an idle adventurer, and suffered imprisonment in the Bastille and Chatelet for imposture and intrigues; and at Rome he was lodged in the inquisition, which office he called a "pious hell." He died in 1679. His poems, in 3 vols. were published in 1678, but they possess little merit.—Novo. Ditt. Hist.

ASSYRIA. This ancient and extensive empire cannot well be dated before the establishment of monarchy at Nineveh, in the person of Pul, B.C. 790. This empire was overthrown, and Nineveh taken by Oyzaxares, king of Media, and Nebuchodonosor, king of Babylon, 609 B.C. This country afterwards shared the fate of the Babylonian and Persian empires, the greatest part being added to the Parthian empire. In 1514 it fell into the hands of Ismael Sofi, and was finally conquered by the Turks in 1637.—Univ. Hist.

ASTELL (Mary), an English writer, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1668. Her father was a merchant, and from her uncle, who was a clergyman, she learnt Latin and French, with mathematics and philosophy. At the age of twenty she came and settled near London, where she devoted herself to a studious life, and formed an acquaintance with some of the greatest men of the age, as Atterbury, Hickes, Norris, and others. She died of a cancer in her breast, after suffering amputation with great patience, in 1731. Her works are as follow: 1. Letters concerning the Love of God, 8vo. 1695. 2. An Essay in Defence of the female Sex, in a Letter to a Lady, 1696, 8vo. 3. A serious Proposal to the Ladies for the Advancement of their true and greatest Interest, &c. 2 parts, 12mo. 1697. 4. A fair Way with the Dissenters and their Patrons, 1704, 4to. 5. Reflections upon Marriage, 1705, 8vo. 6. The Christian Religion as professed by a Daughter of the Church of England, 1705, 8vo. &c.—Biog. Br.

ASTERIUS, an arian writer of the 4th century, was born in Cappadocia. In the persecution by Maximian he forsook christianity, on which account he was never afterwards held in estimation even by the sect to which he attached himself. He wrote several books against the catholic faith, none of which are extant.—Lardner. Dupin.

ASTERIUS, bishop of Amasea, in Pontus, in the 4th century, was born at Antioch, and educated by a Scythian slave. Some of his homilies are contained in the Bibl. Pat. 1641.—Moreri.

ASTERIUS URBANUS, a christian presbyter or bishop of the 3d century. He held a disputation with the montanists at Ancyra, in Galatia, an account of which is extant in Eusebius.—Cave. Lardner.

ASTLE (Thomas), an English antiquary, was the son of a farmer in Staffordshire, and after receiving a good education obtained the patronage of Mr. Grenville, who employed him about 1763, with sir Joseph Ayloffe and Dr. Ducarel, in superintending the records at Westminster. In 1766 he was appointed to manage the printing of the ancient records of parliament. In 1775 he became chief clerk in the record office in the Tower, and on the decease of sir John Shelly he succeeded to the office of keeper of the records. He died in December 1803. Many curious papers by him are in the volumes of the Archæologia; besides which, he wrote the Origin and Progress of Writing, as well hieroglyphic as elementary, first printed in 1784, 4to. and again in 1803.—Gent. Mag. Monthly Mag. February, 1804.

ASTON (Sir Arthur), a commander in the service of Charles I. during the great rebellion, was born at Fulham, in Middlesex, of an ancient family. He made several campaigns in foreign countries, and returning to England at the commencement of the civil war, engaged heartily in the king's cause. He commanded the dragoons at the battle of Edgehill, and thrice defeated the earl of Essex. He was successively governor of Reading and Oxford. Having the misfortune to break his leg he was obliged to have it amputated. After the murder of the king he served in Ireland, where he was appointed governor of Drogheda, on the taking of which by Cromwell he had his brains beat out with his wooden leg.—Wood. Biog. Br.

ASTON (sir Thomas), was born in Cheshire of an ancient family, and educated in Brazen-nose college, Oxford. In 1628 he was created a baronet, and in 1635 was high sheriff of Cheshire. On the breaking out of the rebellion he raised a troop of horse for the king, but was defeated and wounded in 1642 near Nantwich. Afterwards he was taken prisoner, and carried to Stafford, from whence, as he endeavoured to escape, a soldier gave him a blow on his head, which, with other wounds, produced a fever, of which he died in 1643. Sir Thomas wrote, 1. A Remonstrance against Presbytery, 1641, eto. 2. Short Survey of the Presbyterian Discipline. 3. Brief Review of the Institution, Succession, and Jurisdiction of Bishops.—Wood. Biog. Brit.

ASTRONOME (L'), an historian of the 9th century. He wrote the life of his patron, Lewis the Debonnaire, to be found in Du Chesne's collection.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ASTRUC (John), a medical writer; he was born in 1684 in the diocese of Alais, and studied physic at Montpellier, where he became professor. In 1748 he was appointed physician to the king, and professor in the royal college at Paris. He was some time at Warsaw, as first physician to the king of Poland, which post he quitted for his native country and literary pursuits. He died in 1766. His works are numerous and respectable. The principal of them are: 1. De Morbis Venereis. 2. Memoirs relative to the Natural History of Languedoc. 3. A Treatise on Pathology. 4. A Treatise on Therapeutics. 5. On the Inoculation of the Small-pox. 6. On Tumours and Ulcers. 7. On the Diseases of Women. The first and last have been translated into English.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

ASTYAGES, king of the Medes, began his reign in the 594th year B. C. He was the grandfather of Cyrus the Great, and is called by some the Abeserus of the scripture.—Univ. Hist.

ATACALIPA, or ATAHUALPA, the last of the incas. His father dying in 1529 he became king of Quito, and his brother Huascar obtained the throne of Peru, on which a war broke out between them, in which Huascar was defeated. About this time the Spaniards, headed by Pizarro, invaded Peru, where they were hospitably entertained by the king and his people, in return for which they treacherously held him in captivity. The inca offered them, as a ransom, to fill a room full of gold; and after the Spaniards had got possession of the treasure, they basely burnt the unhappy monarch at the stake in 1533.—Robertson's Hist. of America.

ATHALIAH, the daughter of Ahab, or of Omri, wife of Jehoram, and mother of Ahaziah, king of Judah. She counselled her son in all manner of wickedness; and after his death, that she might obtain the throne, murdered the whole royal family, except Joash a child, who was preserved by Jehoshaphat, the daughter of Jehoram. After enjoying the supreme power for seven years she was justly put to death.—SS.

ATHANASIUS (St.), was born in Alexandria; he distinguished himself so much at the council of Nice, that on the death of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, he was chosen to succeed him in 326, when he was about twenty-eight years of age. He had been greatly persecuted by the arians before his consecration, and now their rage against him was redoubled, particularly as he refused to admit their leader into the church, though he was commanded to do so by Constantine. They raised against him various false accusations, and at length succeeded in getting him banished. On the death of the emperor he returned to Alexandria, where he was received by the people with great joy. When Constantine came to the throne, his enemies prevailed, on which he fled to Rome, where pope Julius espoused his cause, and by his good offices got him recalled, and reinstated in his bishopric. At the end of Julian's reign he was driven into exile once more; but on the accession of Jovian he was restored, and the Nicene creed with him. He continued to enjoy his seat unmolested till his death in 371. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, in 3 vols. folio, 1698. The creed which goes by his name is supposed to have been compiled by an African bishop in the 5th century.—Dupin. Cave.

ATHELING (Edgar), the son of Edward, the son of Edmund Ironside, king of England, was bred up by Edmund the confessor, his great uncle, who intended him for his successor. But on his death he was supplanted by Harold, the son of earl Godwin, in 1066, after whose death the people considered Edgar as king; but the success of William duke of Normandy frustrated their loyal intentions. He afterwards retired to the north, where he collected many followers and made himself master of York, but being deserted by many of his troops he was obliged to retire to Scotland. From thence he went to Normandy, where he was well treated by duke Robert. He was with Baldwin II. in the crusade, and on his return was honoured by several of the European sovereigns for his valour. He spent the remainder of his days at Malmesbury.—Biog. Br.

ATRELISTAN, king of England, was the natural son of Edward the elder, whom he succeeded in 925. He obtained a great victory over the Danes in Northumberland, after which he reigned in tranquillity. He greatly encouraged commerce by conferring the title ofthane on every merchant who had made three voyages. He died in 941.—Hume's Hist. of Eng.

ATHENAGORAS, a christian philosopher of Athens in the 2d century, who addressed an apology for the christians to Antoninus and Commodus. He also wrote a Discourse on the Resurrection of the Dead. These pieces were printed in Greek and Latin at Oxford in 1706, 8vo.—Cave. Dupin. Bayle.

ATHENEUS, a Greek grammarian of the 3d century, was a native of Naucratis, in Egypt. His work, entitled The Table Talk of the Sophists, was published by Casaubon in 1657.—Bayle. Fabric. Bibl. Græc.

ATHENÆUS, an ancient mathematician, who lived about 200 years B. C. A tract of his on warlike machines was printed at Paris in 1693.—Fabricius.

ATHENEUS, a Roman orator and peripatetic philosopher in the time of Augustus.—Strabo.

ATHENAI, see EUDOCIA.

ATHENODORUS, a stoic philosopher; he was the tutor of Augustus, who always paid him the greatest respect. In his old age Athenodorus retired to Tarsus, in Cilicia, his native place, where he died at the age of 82. His countrymen honoured him with an altar, and a yearly festival. There was another philosopher of the same name and place, who was the intimate friend of Cato.—Diog. Laërt. Fabricius.

ATHENS was founded by Cecrops B.C. 1080. On the death of Codrus, in 804, it became a republic, and attained to great power; but in 404, at the close of the Peloponnesian war, it fell into the hands of the Spartans. In 481 Thrasybulus altered the form of government, and the Athenians recovered their liberty. It was taken by Sylla in 87 B.C. When Constantinople was taken by the Latins, in 1204, Athens was given to the Venetians, from whom the Turks took it in 1455. The Venetians recovered it in 1687, but it was soon afterwards taken from them by the Turks, who still hold possession.—Univ. Hist. Young's Hist. Athens.

ATHIAS (Joseph), a Jewish printer at Amsterdam in the 17th century. He published a Hebrew Bible in 2 vols. 1667, which is held in great esteem. He also printed the Bible in Spanish, German, and English. The states presented him with a gold medal and chain for his useful labours.—Moreri.

ATHIAS (Isaac), a Spanish Jew, who wrote a curious explication of the law of Moses, printed at Venice and Amsterdam.—Ibid.

ATKINS (James), a Scotch prelate, was born at Kirkwall, in Orkney, and educated first at Edinburgh, and lastly at Oxford, where he took the degree of D.D. In 1677 he was made bishop of Moray, from whence he was afterwards translated to Galloway. He died in 1687. This bishop wrote some pieces in defence of episcopacy.—Gen. Biog. Dietl.

ATKYN (Sir Robert), an English judge, was born in Gloucestershire in 1621. He received his education at Balliol college, Oxford, from whence he removed to one of the inns of court. At the restoration he was made knight of the bath, and in 1672 was appointed a judge of the common pleas; but being disgusted with the proceedings of the court he resigned the office in 1679, and retired to his estate. He assisted lord Russell with his advice. In 1689 king William appointed him chief baron of the exchequer, and the same year the house of lords chose him for their speaker. In 1695 he resigned his place, and went to his seat in Gloucestershire, where he died in 1709. His tracts, in one vol. 8vo. are valued as a treasure of constitutional and legal knowledge.—Biog. Brit.

ATKYN (Sir Robert), the son of the preceding, was born in 1646. He was educated under his father's inspection, and became representative for his native county in parliament. He wrote the history of Gloucestershire, which has been twice printed in folio. He died in 1711.—Ibid.

ATKYN (Richard), a typographical author, was born in Gloucestershire and educated at Oxford. He published the Original and Growth of Printing in England, 4to. 1664, and some other pieces. He died in the Marshalsea prison in 1677.—Ibid.

ATRATUS, or BLACK (Hugh), a cardinal in the 13th century, was born at Evesham, in Worcestershire, and made so great a progress in the sciences, particularly philosophy, mathematics, and medicine, as to obtain the appellation of being the phoenix of his age. Pope Martin II. made him a cardinal in 1281. He died of the plague in 1287. He wrote Genealogia Humanis; Problemata, Canones Medicinales.—Pisf. de Script. Angl. Moreri.

ATTALUS I. king of Pergamus, began his reign B.C. 241. He was a warlike prince, and an encourager of learned men. He made great conquests in Ionia, and vigorously repelled Philip II. of Macedonia. He died in the 72d year of his age, and the 43d of his reign.—Univ. Hist.

ATTALUS II. son of the above, succeeded his brother Eumenes B.C. 159. His country was invaded in his time by Prusias, king of Bithynia, but was relieved by the Romans. Attalus passed the remainder of his days in peace, and died aged 82, after reigning 21 years.—Ibid.

ATTALUS III. nephew of the preceding, began his reign B.C. 138. He put to death most of his own family, and a great number of other persons, of whom he was suspicious. He died in the 5th year of his reign, and having left his goods to the Romans, they seized the whole of his dominions, and thus put an end to the kingdom of Pergamus.—Ibid.

ATTALUS, a Christian martyr in the 2d century, was a native of Pergamus, in Phrygia, and was burnt alive in the persecution of Marcus Antoninus, A.D. 177.—Enfidius.

ATTERBURY (Lewis), an English divine, was born at Milton, in Northamptonshire, in 1631, and became student of Christ church, Oxford, in 1647. In 1654 he was presented to the living of Broad Rissington, in Gloucestershire. In 1657 he obtained the rectory of Milton, in Buckinghamshire; and after the restoration he was created D.D. at Oxford. He was accidentally drowned in 1623. Dr. Atterbury printed a few single sermons.—Biog. Br.

ATTERBURY (Francis), an English prelate, was the son of the above, and born at his father's rectory in Buckinghamshire in 1662. He was educated at Westminster school, from whence he was elected to Christ church, Oxford, in 1681. In 1687 he took his degree of M.A. and the same year vindicated the character of Luther against Obadiah Walker. He had for a pupil the hon. Charles Boyle, whom he assisted in his controversy with Bentley. In 1691 he came to London, where his eloquence brought him into notice. He became chaplain to William and Mary, lecturer of St. Bride's, and preacher at the Bridewell chapel. One of his sermons, On the Power of Charity to cover Sin, was attacked by Hoadly; and another, entitled The Scorn, was severely animadverted upon by an able but anonymous disputant. In 1700 he engaged in a dispute with Dr. Wake on the rights of convocations, and was presented with his doctor's degree by the university of Oxford; the same year he was installed archdeacon of Totnes. In 1704 he was promoted to the deanry of Carlisle, and in 1707 bishop Trelawney appointed him canon residentiary of Exeter. In 1709 he had another dispute with Hoadly on the subject of passive obedience. In 1710 he assisted Dr. Sacheverel in drawing up his defence, for which the doctor left him a legacy. The same year he was chosen prolocutor of the lower house of convocation. In 1712 he was made dean of Christ church, Oxford, and the year following promoted to the bishopric of Rochester, and the deanry of Westminster. The death of queen Ann put a stop to the hopes of further advancement. When the rebellion broke out in Scotland he and bishop Smalridge refused to sign the Declaration of the Bishops; besides which he drew up some violent protests in the house of lords. In 1722 he was apprehended on suspicion of being engaged in a plot to bring in the pretender, for which he was committed to the tower. An act of parliament having passed, though not without much opposition, for "inflicting pains and penalties on the bishop," he was banished for life, and left the kingdom in June 1723. He died at Paris in 1734. * The proceedings against him were arbitrary, harsh, and illegal in the extreme. His remains were brought to England, and interred in Westminster abbey. Not long before his death he published a vindication of himself, bishop Smalridge, and dean Aldrich, from the charge brought against them, of having corrupted the MS. of lord Clarendon's history. Bishop Atterbury was a man of deep learning and brilliant talents, and he shines as a fine writer and an elegant preacher.—Biog. Br.

ATTERBURY (Lewis), the eldest brother of the bishop, was born in 1656, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he went to Christ church Oxford. In 1684 he was preferred to the rectory of Symel, in Northamptonshire. He took his degree of L.L.D. in 1687, and in 1695 was chosen preacher of the chapel at Highgate; about which time he became chaplain to princess Ann of Denmark. In 1707 he was presented to the rectory of Shepperton, in Middlesex, and in 1719 to that of Hornsey. He died in 1731. There are four volumes of his sermons and tracts in print. He endowed a school for girls at Newport Pagnel, and bequeathed a number of books to Christ church library.—Ibid.

ATTICUS (Herodes), a celebrated orator of antiquity, was born at Marathon. He gave lectures on elocution with such applause that Titus Antoninus sent for him to instruct Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. He was promoted to the consularship, and several other high offices. He was a liberal benefactor to Athens, and died at Marathon at the age of 76.—Life by Burigny.

ATTICUS (Titus Pomponius), a Roman knight, was descended from an ancient family. His manners were so affable that he contrived to preserve the good will of opposite parties in times of the greatest dissensions. He assisted Marius the younger, and preserved the friendship of his adversary Sylla at the same time. In the contest between Cæsar and Pompey he kept the friendship of both these generals; he did the same with regard to Brutus and Antony. And in the fierce contentions between Antony and Augustus he not only preserved himself in quietness, but enjoyed the esteem of each. He was greatly beloved by Cicero, and brought about a reconciliation between him and his rival Hortensius. Atticus never attempted to aggrandize himself, and to his moderation we may attribute the tranquillity which he uniformly enjoyed. His daughter was married to Agrippa. He starved himself to death at the age of 77, B.C. 54.—Cornelius Nepos.

ATTICUS, patriarch of Constantinople. He flourished in the 5th century, and was by birth an Armenian. In 406 he condemned John Chrysostom, and got possession of the patriarchate, for which he was excommunicated by pope Innocent I. On the death of St. Chrysostom he was suffered to hold his seat. He died in 427.—Dupin.

ATTILA, king of Hungary, came to the crown with his brother Bleda in 433. He afterwards caused his associate to be assassinated. Attila obliged the emperor Theodosius II. to sue for peace, and laid him under tribute. In the reign of Valentinian, A.D. 451, he entered Gaul at the head of a numerous army, and committed horrible ravages. The imperialists, however, attacked him at Chalons, and after a bloody contest forced him to retreat. Not long after he entered Italy, which he nearly desolated. At last he retired, on condition that Valentinian should pay him a large sum of money, and send him his sister Honoria for a wife. Soon after his return home he married a beautiful maiden, and died the same night by the bursting of a blood vessel. This happened in 453, and with him expired the empire of the Huns.—Univ. Hist.

AVALOS (Ferdinand Francis d'), marquis of Pescara, was born in the kingdom of Naples. He served in the army of Charles V. and was taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna in 1512. He beguiled the hours of captivity in writing a Dialogue on Love, which he dedicated to his wife. On being released he again served the emperor in a military capacity, and was present at the taking of Milan, where he died in 1525, aged 36.—Moreri.

AVALOS (Alphonso d'), marquis del Vasto, was nearly related to the preceding. He was born in 1502, and served in the armies of Charles V. with great zeal. He died in 1546.—Ibid.

AVANTIO (John Mario), an eminent Italian lawyer, was born in 1564. He professed first at Ferrara, and lastly at Padua, where he died in 1622. He wrote an ecclesiastical history from the beginning of the reformation, and some other pieces. His son Charles was a celebrated physician, and wrote a commentary on the work of Bapt. Fiera, printed at Padua in 1649.

AUBERT (Peter), a French lawyer, was born at Lyons in 1642. When young he published a romance, called Rétour d'Isle d'Amour. He filled several distinguished stations in his native city, and established a large library there for general use. He published 2 vols. of cases in 1710, and a new edition of Richelet's Dictionary, 3 vols. fol. 1728.—Moreri.

AUBERTIN (Edmund), a French protestant divine. He was born in 1595, and became minister of the reformed church at Paris in 1631. In 1633 he printed a work on the Eucharist of the ancient church, which was attacked by Arnauld, and other learned catholics. He died at Paris in 1652.—Bayle.

AUBERY (Anthony), a French lawyer and historian, was born in 1617. He was a very hard student, and preferred a life of retirement to the hurry of business. He died in 1695. His principal performances are: 1. The History of the Cardinals, 5 vols. 4to. 1642. 2. Memoirs of the Cardinal de Richelieu, 2 vols. folio, 1690. In this work he praises the cardinal at the expense of truth. 3. The History of the Cardinal Mazarin, 4 vols. 12mo. 1751. 4. On the Pre-eminence of the Kings of France, 1649, 4to. 5. A Treatise on the Pretensions of the King of France to the Empire, 1667, 4to.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

AUBERY (John), a French physician of the 17th century. He wrote an Apology for Physic, in Latin, Paris, 1608, 8vo. and an Antidote to Love, in French, 1559, 12mo.—Moreri.

AUBERY (Louis de Maurier), a French writer. He published Memoirs for a History of Holland, 2 vols. 12mo. 1682. He died in 1687. In 1737 appeared at Amsterdam, his Memoirs of Hamburg, Lubeck, Holstein, Denmark, and Sweden.—Moreri.

AUBESPINE (Claude de l') baron of Chateau-Neuf. He was descended of a noble family at Chartrain, and became secretary of state to several of the French kings; and died in 1567.—Ibid.

AUBESPINE (Charles de l'), chancellor of France, and marquis of Chateau-Neuf, was imprisoned ten years, but afterwards became a favourite with Henry IV. He died in 1653.—Ibid.

AUBESPINE (Gabriel de l'), bishop of Orleans, was of the same family with the above. He was a learned divine, and died in 1630, aged 52.—Ibid.

AUBESPINE (Magdalen de l'), a celebrated French lady. She was the wife of de Neuville, seigneur de Villeroy, and wrote several pieces in prose and verse. She died in 1596.—Dict. Historique des Femmes Célèbres.

AUBIGNE (Theodore Agrippa d'), a celebrated Frenchman, was born about 1550. Henry IV. had an esteem for him, and bestowed on him several places; but at length he lost the royal favour by his frankness, and retired to Geneva, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. His chief work is, a Universal History, in 3 vols. folio, which was condemned by the parliament of Paris. He also wrote two satirical pieces, The Confession of Sancy, and The Baron de Foeneste. The Memoirs of his own life were not printed till 1731. He died in 1630. His son Constant d'Aubigne was father of the celebrated madame de Maintenon.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

AUBREY (John), an English writer, was born at Easton-Piers, in Wiltshire, about 1626, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. In 1646 he was entered of the Middle Temple, but quitted the study of the law owing to some embarrassments in his private affairs. He contracted an intimacy with several learned men, and was one of the first members of the Royal Society. Being reduced to poverty, he was supported at the close of life by lady Long, of Draycot, in Wiltshire, and died at her house in 1700. His works are: 1. Miscellanies, on Apparitions, Magic, Charms, &c. 1696 and 1721, 8vo. 2. A Perambulation of the County of Surrey, 1719, 5 vols. 8vo. Besides which he left several curious MSS. to the museum at Oxford.—Biog. Brit.

AUBRIOT (Hugo), treasurer of the finances, and mayor of Paris, who built the Bastille in 1369, but being accused of heresy he was sentenced to be confined between two walls, from whence he was released in 1381 by the Maillotins, a set of insurgents. He quitted them, and retired into Burgundy, where he died the year following. From him the French reformed were called Hugonots.—Moreri.

AUBUSSON (Peter d'), grand master of the knights of Rhodes, was born in La Marche in 1423. He entered into the order of St. John of Jerusalem, of which, in 1476, he was elected grand master. He vigorously repulsed the attack made upon the island by the Turks in 1480. Prince Zim, brother of Bajazet, having escaped to Rhodes to avoid the vengeance of the sultan, d'Aubusson delivered him to the pope, for which treachery he received a cardinal's hat. He died in 1503.—Moreri.

AUDEBERT (German), a counsellor of Orleans. While at Venice he wrote a panegyric in verse upon that republic, for which the senate conferred on him the order of knight of St. Mark. Henry III. gave him a patent of nobility. He died in 1598. His poems were published in 1602, 8vo.—Ibid.

AUDEBERT (John Baptiste), a French naturalist and engraver of natural history, was born at Rochefort in 1759. He excelled in the faithful and elegant representations of animals, so that his productions are esteemed as amongst the most valuable of their kind. His first performance was L'Hist. Nat. des Singes des Makis et des Galéopithèques, 1 vol. folio, 1800. This work introduced him to the professors of the museum of natural history at Paris, who made honourable mention of it, as well as of the author, to the minister of the interior. He was engaged upon other works of equal splendor, when he was taken off by death in the prime of life in 1800.—L'Esay Dict. Hist.

AUDIFRET (John Baptiste), a French geographer, was ambassador at the courts of Mantua, Parma, and Modena. He died at Nancy in 1733, aged 76. He wrote Ancient and Modern Geography, printed at Paris in 3 vols. 4to. 1689.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

AUDOUIN (Vital d'), a French nobleman, was born at Nais, near Ville-franche de Rouergue, about 1565. He wrote a treatise on Duels, printed at Paris in 1617; poems, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1614, and some other pieces. He died about 1630.—Bayle.

AUDINUS, the founder of a sect called by his name. He lived in the 4th century, and was banished into Scythia, where he gained many followers. They celebrated Easter after the manner of the Jewish passover, and attributed a human form to the Deity.—Mosheim.

AUDLEY (James, lord), of Heleigh, in Staffordshire, was born about 1314. He distinguished himself greatly under Edward III. in France, and was one of the first knights of the garter. He was present at the famous battle of Poitiers, where he was so grievously wounded that his esquires were obliged to bear him out of the field of battle, after which the Black Prince bestowed on him a noble pension, with many marks of his regard. For his services he was appointed constable of Gloucester castle, governor of Aquitaine, and seneschal of Poitou. He died about 1386.—Biog. Brit.

AUDLEY (Edmund), a descendant of the above, was educated at Oxford, and in 1480 was made bishop of Rochester, from whence he was translated first to Hereford, and lastly to Salisbury. He was a munificent prelate, and died in 1524. He was chancellor of the order of the garter, which honour now belongs to his successors, through the interest of bishop Seth Ward.—Ibid.

AUDLEY, or AWDELY (Thomas), lord chancellor of England, was born of a noble family in Essex. After receiving a university education he entered of the Inner Temple, and became learned in the law. In 1529 he was chosen speaker of the parliament, in which capacity he was very subservient to the king, who, on the resignation of sir Thomas More, gave him the seals, and the site of the priory of Christ church, with all the church plate and lands belonging to that house. He sat in judgment on his predecessor, sir Thomas More, and on bishop Fisher. Audley appears to have been a mere tool to Henry, and to have been as rapacious as any in the seizure of the church property. He died in 1544. He was a considerable benefactor to Magdalen college, Cambridge.—Ibid.

AUDRAN, the name of a family of artists in France: viz. Charles AUDRAN the elder was born at Paris in 1594. His works are numerous and excellent. They are distinguished by a K. He died in 1674.—Claude, a nephew of the preceding, was born at Lyons in 1639, and studied under his uncle. He was employed by Le Brun in painting part of the pictures of Alexander's battles, at Versailles, and became professor of painting in the royal academy of Paris, where he died in 1684.—Girard, the brother of the last-mentioned, and the most celebrated of the family, was born at Lyons in 1640, and studied under Le Brun at Paris. He engraved that artist's pictures of Alexander's battles in a masterly manner. He died at Paris in 1703.—Claude, nephew of Girard, was born at Lyons in 1685, and became famous for painting ornaments. He was appointed king's painter, and died in 1734.—John, brother of the last mentioned, was born in 1667, and studied engraving under his uncle Girard. He was an ingenious artist, and died at Paris in 1756.—Moreri, Novv. Dict. Hist.

AVENPACE, a peripatetic philosopher of the 12th century. He was a Spanish moor, and for attempting to explain the Koran by the system of Aristotle was committed to prison at Corduba. He wrote a comment upon Euclid.—Pococke Specimen Hist. Arab.

AVENTINE (John), a German historian, was born in 1466 at Abensperg, in Bavaria, and studied at Ingolstadt, and at Paris. In 1512 he became tutor to the two sons of the duke of Bavaria. He wrote the Annals of Bavaria. He died in 1534.—Bayle.

AVENZOAR, a physician of the 12th century, was born at Seville, in Spain, and died at Morocco in 1159, aged 135. He wrote a compendious practice of physic, which contains many curious facts and observations.—Friend's Hist. Phys.

AVERANI (Benedict), a native of Florence, became Greek professor at Pisa, and wrote several critical discourses on classical authors. He died in 1707. His works were printed at Florence in 3 vols. 8vo. 1717.—Landi. Hist. Lett. de'Italie.

AVERANI (Joseph), brother of the preceding, was born in 1662. He became professor of law at Pisa, but applied chiefly to the study of mathematics and natural philosophy. He died in 1738. Two volumes of his orations in the academy at Florence, and other tracts, were printed after his death.—Ibid.

AVERDY (Clement Charles de l'), minister and comptroller general of the finances under Louis XV. was born at Paris in 1720. He was counsellor of parliament, and so high was his reputation that his appointment gave general satisfaction to the people; which, however, he lost by mismanagement, and in 1764 he requested his dismissal, on which he retired to his estate, where he employed himself in agricultural pursuits. In the revolution he was perfectly neutral, notwithstanding which he was seized, and guillotined Oct. 2, 1793. He wrote, 1. Suite des Experiences de Gambais sur le bles noirs ou cariés, 8vo. 2. Memoire sur le Procès criminel de Robert d'Artois, Comte de Beaumont pair de France.—L'Ecu. Dict. Hist. Univ.

AVERROES, or AVEN ROSCH, an Arabian philosopher of the 12th century. His father was chief magistrate of Corduba, in Spain, but Averroes was educated at Morocco, where he studied law, philosophy, and medicine. He succeeded his father, and became also a judge in Morocco, where he appointed deputies, and returned to Spain. The freedom of his opinions gave offence to the zealous Mussulmans, who complained of him to Almanzor, the caliph, by whose orders he was degraded from his employments. He was shortly after thrown into prison, but on doing penance in the mosque, and making a recantation, he was released. He died at Morocco in 1206. He studied ardently, and never indulged in any diversion. His attachment to Aristotle was almost enthusiastic, and his commentaries on that philosopher's works procured him the name of the commentator. He wrote a treatise on the art of physic, an Epitome of Ptolemy's Almagest, and a Treatise on Astrology. The best edition of his works is that of Venice, in 1608.—Bayle. Moreri.

AVESBURY (Robert of), an English historian of the 14th century. He wrote the history of the reign of Edward III. as far as 1356, which was published by Hearne in 1720.—Dug. Br.

AUGER (Edmund), a French jesuit, was born in 1530. He is said to have converted 40,000 protestants to the Roman communion by the force of his arguments. His zeal appears to have been honest, for he repeatedly refused a bishopric, and other preferments. He died in 1591.—Moreri.

AUGURELLO (John Aurelio), an Italian poet, was born at Rimini in 1441. He was professor of the belles lettres at Trevisa, where he died in 1524. He wrote several pieces, the best of which is a Latin poem, entitled Chrysopæia, or the art of making gold, printed in 1518. This poem he dedicated to Leo X. who presented him with a large empty purse, saying, "that as he could make gold he knew how to fill it."—Tiraboschi. Moreri.

AUGUSTINE (St.), a father of the church, was born at Tagaste, in Africa, in 354. His father was a plebeian, and his mother Monica was a woman of exemplary piety. Though he had all the advantages of a good education he squandered away his time in debauchery. In 371 his father sent him to Carthage, where he led a dissipated life, and became a convert to the manichees. In 380 he taught rhetoric at Carthage with great reputation, but still continued his licentious course of life, and kept a woman publicly, by whom he had a son named Adeodatus. His good mother took uncommon pains to bring him back to virtue, but finding all her endeavours ineffectual, she had recourse only to prayer on his behalf. Wearied with his situation in Africa, Augustine removed to Rome, where he taught rhetoric with great applause, and in 383 was appointed professor of rhetoric at Milan. Here the sermons of St. Ambrose effected a conversion. He renounced his heretical notions, and was baptized in 387. The next year he returned to Africa, and was ordained priest in 391. He was at first the coadjutor of Valerius, bishop of Hippo, and afterwards his successor. He died in 430. His writings have always been held in veneration by the catholic church, and from them was formed that system commonly called scholastic divinity. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, in 10 vols. folio, 1679 and 1690.—Augustin. Confess. Bayle. Moreri.

AUGUSTINE (Leonard), or AGOSTINI, an Italian antiquary, was a native of Sienna, and flourished in the 17th century. He published an elaborate work on ancient gems, which first appeared in 1657, in 2 vols. 4to. and the last in 1707, 4 vols. 4to. It was translated into Latin by Gronovius, and published at Amsterdam in 1685, and at Franker in 1694.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

AUGUSTIN, or AUSTIN (St.), the first archbishop of Canterbury, was a Roman monk, and sent by Gregory I. with 40 others, to convert the inhabitants of this island, about 596. On landing in Thanet, they informed king Ethelbert of their business, when the king assigned them Canterbury for their residence, with permission to exercise their function. The good monarch himself embraced christianity, but never attempted to bring over any of his subjects by force. Augustin was in consequence consecrated at Arles archbishop and metropolitan of the church. He fixed his seat at Canterbury, and then endeavoured to form a correspondence with the Welsh bishops, for christianity had long before been settled in Wales. To this end a conference was held in Worcestershire between Augustin and some monks from the monastery of Bangor. These fathers, it is said, before their departure from Wales, applied for advice how to act to an old hermit, who told them, that if Augustin was a man of God, they should submit to be directed by him; and, on their asking how they were to know this, he said, "if on your arrival in his presence he rises to salute you, he is God's messenger; but if not, he is haughty and proud, you ought to have no more to do with him." When they came to the assembly, Augustin received them sitting, in consequence of which the sturdy Welshmen opposed all measures of accommodation. The points in which they were required to yield were, the celebration of Easter, the mode of administering baptism, and the acknowledgement of the pope's authority. Augustin died at Canterbury in 1604, and was afterwards canonized.—Biog. Brit.

AUGUSTIN (Anthony), a Spanish prelate, was a native of Saragossa. In 1554 he was sent to England by the pope; after which he was at the council of Trent. In 1574 he was made archbishop of Tarragona. He was so charitable as not to leave enough to bury him suitable to his dignity. He died in 1586. He wrote several treatises on law, and dialogues on medals, printed in 1587 in Spanish.—Dapin. Moreri.

AUGUSTULUS, or ROMULUS AUGUSTUS, a Roman emperor, was the son of Orestes, who having deposed Julius Nepos, refused the throne for himself, but placed upon it his son in 476. Shortly after, Odoacer and the barbarians invaded Italy, slew Orestes, and deprived the young emperor of his dignity. He was, however, suffered to live a private life in Campania, and a liberal pension was allowed him. With him ended the Roman empire in the west.—Un. Hist.

AUGUSTUS (Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus), was the son of Caius Octavius, by Atia, the niece of Julius Cæsar. He was born B. C. 62, and having received a liberal education, was adopted by Julius Cæsar. He was at Apollonia in Epirus, when his uncle was assassinated; and, on receiving the news, returned to Rome, where he found two parties, the republicans, and the followers of Antony and Lepidus. Octavianus was treated with great respect by the magistrates and principal citizens; but Antony treated him with contempt. When Antony was proscribed, he joined the army that was sent against him; but afterwards he thought it prudent to enter into a treaty with that commander; and these two leaders, together with Lepidus, formed the famous triumvirate, by which they agreed to enjoy an equal portion of authority for five years. Soon after this, Octavianus gratified the malicious spirit of his associates, by sacrificing his friend Cicero: and, in short, the triumvirs filled Rome with the blood of its best citizens. On the death of Brutus at Philippi, another partition took place, Antony and Octavianus sharing the Roman empire, and Lepidus taking the African provinces. Octavianus obtained Rome, and gave his sister, Octavia, in marriage to Antony. At length Lepidus was deposed, and a difference broke out between Antony and Octavianus, which ended in the destruction of the former, and the establishment of the latter in the empire. In the 36th year of his age, the senate gave him the title of Augustus. It also complimented him by changing the name of the month Septilis, in which he came to the consulate, to August. After attaining the imperial dignity, he seems to have corrected his eager temper, and to have conducted himself with moderation. He made some good regulations in the government; reducing the number of the senators from 1000 to 600, and raising the degree of wealth which was to qualify them for that dignity. He also set about reforming the public morals. Augustus carried his arms with success into Gaul, Germany, and the East; but in the latter part of his life the Romans suffered some severe losses in Germany. He died at Rome A. D. 14, and in the 76th year of his age. He improved Rome considerably, and might say with justice, "that he had found it brick, but left it marble." He was, moreover, a great encourager of men of letters, so that his reign was called the Augustan age.—Suetonius. Tacitus.

AUMADI-MARAGAN, a Persian poet, who wrote some religious and amorous verses. He was liberally rewarded by the king of the Tartars, and died in 1319.—D'Herbelot.

AVICENNA, an Arabian physician, was born in 980. At the age of 18 he began to practise, with such success, that he became physician to the court of Bagdad. At last he fell under the displeasure of the prince in whose service he was engaged, and was thrown into prison, where he died in 1036. He left a number of works, chiefly on metaphysical and medical subjects, which have been often printed in Arabic and in Latin.—D'Herbelot. Moreri. Friend.

AVIENUS (Rufus Festus), a Latin poet of the 4th century. He translated the Phænomena of Aratus; the Description of the Earth by Dionysius; Ætios's Fables, &c. An edition of his works was printed at Paris, 12mo. 1690, and again in 8vo. 1731.

—Vossius de Poet. Lat.

AVILA (Giles Gonzales), a Spanish historian. He was educated at Rome, and, on his return to his own country, he obtained a rich benefice, and was appointed historiographer to the king. He wrote the Antiquities of Salamanca, the Theatre of the Churches of India, &c. He died in 1658.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

AVILA (Louis d'), a Spanish writer, and commander of the order of Alcantara. He wrote the history of the war carried on by Charles V. against the German protestants, printed in 1546; also, Memoirs of the War in Africa.—Ibid.

AVILER (Augustine Charles d'), a French architect, was born in 1653. On his passage to Rome he was taken by the Algerines, and carried to Tunis, where he designed a grand mosque, which is greatly admired. He obtained his liberty in two years, and settled at Montpellier, where he died in 1700. He wrote a course of architecture in 2 vols. 4to.—Moreri.

AVIRON (James le Bathelier), a French lawyer of the 16th century. He wrote Commentaries on the Provincial Laws of Normandy, which were published after his death.—Ibid.

AVITUS (Marcus Macilius), emperor of the west, was born in Auvergne, of an illustrious family. His merit raised him to several important stations, and, on the death of Maximus, in 453, he was chosen emperor. After his election he gave way to pleasure, which alienated the affections of the Romans from him, and he was obliged to resign his dignity in fourteen months after his election, and the senate intended to put him to death, on which he fled towards the Alps, but died on the road. His daughter married Sidonius Apollinaris, who wrote an eulogy on his father-in-law, which is still extant.—Univ. Hist.

AVITUS (Sextus Alcimus Ecdicius), bishop of Vienne in Dauphiné, was nephew to the preceding. He was raised to the episcopal dignity in 490. He was a great enemy to the arians. He died in 523. A collection of his poems, letters, &c. is extant.—Dupin. Moreri.

AULUS GELLIUS, a celebrated grammarian, was born in the reign of Trajan, and died in the beginning of that of Marcus Aurelius. He resided a considerable time at Athens. His Noctes Atticæ, Attic Nights, is a curious and valuable work. It has gone through a variety of editions, and been translated into English by Mr. Beloe.—Fabric.

AUMONT (John d'), count of Chateauroux, a distinguished French general of the 16th century. He served with great reputation under Henry III. who made him a marshal of France. Henry IV. appointed him governor first of Champagne, and afterwards of Brittany. He was shot at the siege of Comper, a castle near Rennes, in 1595, aged 73.—Nouv. Hist. Dict.

AUNGERVILLE (Richard), bishop of Durham, was born at St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk, in 1281, and educated at Oxford. He was tutor to Edward III. by whom he was preferred to the episcopal dignity, in 1333; the year following he was made lord high chancellor, and in 1336 treasurer of England. He was a very learned prelate, and founded a noble library at Oxford. He wrote a piece entitled Philobiblos, a discourse on the right use of books, which was printed at Oxford in 1599. He died at Durham in 1345.—Biog. Brit.

AUNOY (Marie Catherine comtesse d'), a celebrated French lady, was the wife of the count d'Aunoy, and died in 1705. She wrote Tales of the Fairies; The History of Hippolytus, Earl of Douglas; Historical Memoirs of Europe, from 1672 to 1679; Memoirs of the Court of Spain; and the History of John of Bourbon, Prince of Cænency.—Moreri. Bayle.

AURELIAN, emperor of Rome, was the son of a peasant in Illyricum. He displayed such bravery as a soldier, that Valerian appointed him superintendent of the troops, and, at last, consul. On the death of Claudius II., who chose him for his successor, he ascended the imperial throne. He delivered Italy from the barbarians, reduced Tetricus, who had assumed the title of emperor in Gaul, and conquered Zenobia, queen of Palmyra. After these victories he entered Rome in triumph, attended by his illustrious captives, to whom he behaved in the most generous manner, presenting Zenobia with a villa at Tibur, and restoring Tetricus to his rank as senator. He next turned his attention to the improvement of Rome, and to the reformation of public manners. On his march against Persia, he was assassinated in 275.—Cresier's Hist. Rom. Emperors.

AURELIUS VICTOR (Sextus), a Roman historian of the 4th century, was born of mean parents, in Africa; but his talents raised him to distinction. Julian made him prefect of the second Pannonia, in 361; and in 369 he was chosen consul with Valentinian. His Roman history has been several times printed; the best edition is that of Amsterdam, in 1733, 4to. It is faithful and minute.—Fabricius. Vossius.

AURELLI, or ARELLI (John Mutio), a Latin poet of the 16th century. Leo X. appointed him governor of some district, where he behaved so tyrannically that the inhabitants threw him into a well in 1520. His poems are much in the manner of Catullus.—Moreri.

AURENG-ZEBE, the great mogul, was third son of Schah Jehan, and born in 1618. In his youth he put on the appearance of religious sanctity; but, in 1658, he and his brother, Morad, seized Agra, and made their father prisoner. Soon afterwards he put Morad and his other brother, Dara, to death. It must be allowed, however, that he behaved tenderly to his father, who died in 1666. Aurengzebe greatly enlarged his dominions, and became so formidable, that all the eastern princes sent him ambassadors. Being jealous of the ambitious views of his sons, he constantly resided in his camp, which was prodigiously large, and resembled a populous city. He died at Ahmednager in 1707, aged 89. By his will he divided his possessions among his sons.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

AUREOLUS (Manius Acilius), who, from being a shepherd in Dacia, rose to the rank of general in the Roman army, under Gallienus, whom he caused to be assassinated. Claudius II. took him prisoner at Milan, and put him to death in 267.—Univ. Hist.

AURIA (Vincent), a Sicilian writer, was born at Palermo in 1625, and died in 1710. He wrote several books in Latin and Italian, particularly a History of the eminent Men of Sicily, 1704; and a History of the Viceroys of Sicily, 1697, folio.—Novo. Diß. Hist.

AURIFICUS (Nicholas), a carmelite monk of the 16th century, who published several books of devotion. He died about 1590.—Moreri.

AURIGNY (Gilles de), a French poet of the 16th century. Several good pieces by him are to be found in the Annales Poétiques.—Novo. Diß.

AURISPA (John), a Sicilian writer. Nicholas V. appointed him his secretary, and gave him two abbies. He died at Ferrara, at the end of the 15th century. He translated the works of Archimedes, and Hierocles's Commentary on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras.—Moreri.

AUROGALLUS (Matthew), professor of languages at Wittenberg, was by birth a Bohemian, and died in 1543. He assisted Luther in his translation of the Bible into German, and wrote a Hebrew and Chaldee Grammar, printed at Basse in 1539.—Bayle.

AUSONIUS (Decimus Magnus), a Latin poet of the 4th century, was the son of Julius Ausonius, a famous physician at Bourdeaux. The son became a teacher of grammar and rhetoric at that place with such reputation, that his fame reached Rome, and Valentinian, the emperor, sent for him to instruct his son Gratian. He gave so much satisfaction that, in 379, he was raised to the consular dignity. His poems, though sometimes inharmonious, have great merit. The best edition is that of Amsterdam, in 1671.—Bayle. Vossius.

AUSTIN (William), an English author, was a barrister of Lincoln's Inn. He was the author of Hæc Homo, or the Excellency of Women, 12mo. He appears to have been indebted for a considerable part of this book to Agrippa's De Nobilitate et Præcellentia Femine Sexûs. He also wrote Meditations on the principal Fasts and Feasts of the Church, published after his decease, in folio, 1637.—Granger.

AUTEROCHÉ; see CHAPPE.

AUTHON (John d'), a French historian of the 16th century. He was abbot of Anglé in Poitou, and wrote the History of France from 1490 to 1508, part of which has only been printed. He died in 1523.—Moreri.

AUTONINE (Bernard), a French lawyer, and advocate to the parliament of Bourdeaux. He wrote several books; as, a Comparison of the French and Roman Law; a Commentary on the Provincial Law of Bourdeaux; Censura Gallica in Jus Civile Romanum, &c.—Moreri.

AUTREAU (James d'), a French painter and poet, died very poor in the hospital of incurables at Paris in 1745. His dramatic works were published in 4 vols. 12mo. 1749. He had little merit as a painter.—Moreri.

AUVIGNY (N. Castres d'), a French historian. He was both a writer and soldier, and was killed at the battle of Dettingen in 1743, aged 31. He wrote, 1. The Memoirs of Madame Barneveldt, 2 vols. 12mo.; 2. the Histories of Rome and France, abridged, for young persons; 3. the History of Paris, 4 vols. 12mo.; 4. the Lives of illustrious Frenchmen, 8 vols. 12mo.—Novo. Diß. Hist.

AUXENTIUS, an Arian of the 4th century, was a native of Cappadocia. Constantius made him bishop of Milan; but he was excommunicated in a council held at Rome in 368. However he held his see to his death in 374. There was another of the same name and party who challenged St. Ambrose to a public disputation, which that great prelate wisely declined.—Moreri.

AUZOUT (Adrian), a French mathematician, was born at Rouen, and died in 1691. He is said to have invented the micrometer, his treatise on which was printed in 1693, folio. He was the first who thought of applying the telescope to the astronomical quadrant.—Hutton's Math. Diß.

AXIOTHEA, a female philosopher of Greece, who lived in the time of Plato, and whose lectures she attended dressed in man's clothes.—Diog. Laërt.

AXTEL (Daniel), a colonel in the parliamentary army in the reign of Charles I. He was originally an apprentice to a grocer in London; but, becoming a follower of the puritans, they persuaded him to engage against the king; on which he entered into the army, and quickly rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Axtel had the principal charge of the king on his trial, to whom he behaved with singular brutality. He accompanied Cromwell to Ireland, where he behaved with great courage, and was made governor of Kilkenny. In 1659 he hastened to England to prevent the restoration, but was frustrated by the management of Monk. Soon after he was tried for high treason, found guilty, and executed.—Biog. Br.

AYESHA, the wife of Mohammed, and daughter of Abubeker. Though she bore the impostor no children, yet he loved her better than his other wives. His followers had a profound regard for her. She opposed the succession of Ali, and levied an army against him. After a severe contest she was taken prisoner, but was dismissed by the conqueror with civility. This turbulent woman died in 677, aged 67.—Med. Univ. Hist.

AYLESBURY (sir Thomas), a mathematician, was born in London, and educated at Westminster-school, from whence he removed to Christ church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. His mathematical knowledge recommended him to the duke of Buckingham, by whose means he was created a baronet, and made master of the mint. He greatly encouraged men of science, and the famous Thomas Harriot was one of his dependants. The learned Thomas Allen confided his MSS. to sir Thomas, as the best judge of their value. He suffered greatly in his property during the rebellion, and on the murder of his sovereign retired to Flanders, where he died in 1657. His daughter married the great earl of Clarendon.—Biog. Br.

AYLESBURY (William), son of the above, was born in Westminster, and entered of Christ church, Oxford, in 1628. After taking one degree he was made, by Charles I. governor to the duke of Buckingham and his brother, lord Francis Villiers, whom he accompanied on their travels. In Italy he was dangerously wounded by two bravoes, who mistook him for another person. On his return the king made him groom of the bed-chamber, and commanded him to translate D'Avila's History of the Civil Wars of France, which was printed in London in 1647, and again in 1678, folio. He was reduced to great poverty during the rebellion, but afterwards procured a situation at Jamaica, where he died in 1657.—Wood, A. O.

AYLETT (Robert), an English writer of the 17th century, was educated at Trinity-hall, Cambridge, where he took the degree of LL.D. in 1614, and afterwards became a master in chancery. He wrote Sufanna, or the Arraignment of the Two Elders, a poem, 1622, 8vo. and some other poetical pieces. Wood seems to attribute to him the Britannia Antiqua illustrata, which goes under the name of his nephew, Aylett Sammes.—Biog. Br.

AYLIN (John), an Italian writer of the 14th century. He wrote the History of Friuli, which may be found in Muratori's Antiquitates Italicae medii Aevi. Milan, 1740.—Moreri.

AYLMER (John), an English prelate, was born in Norfolk about 1521. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards became tutor to lady Jane Grey. In 1553 he was made archdeacon of Stow in Lincolnshire, and exerted himself strenuously against popery. On the accession of Mary he went abroad, and settled at Zurich. When queen Elizabeth came to the throne, he returned to his native country, and in 1576 was made bishop of London. He was a very diligent prelate, and kept a strict hand upon the puritans, for which he has been severely censured by their writers. He died at Fulham, in 1594, leaving a large family. Dr. Aylmer was a learned and eloquent man; but his temper was quick and intemperate. He wrote an answer to Knox's Blast against the Empire of Women.—Life by Strype, Biog. Br.

AYLOFFE (sir Joseph), bart. of Framfield, in Sussex, an eminent antiquary, was born about 1708, and educated at Westminster-school. In 1724 he was admitted of Lincoln's-inn, and about the same time entered of St. John's college, Oxford. In 1731 he was elected fellow of the antiquarian and royal societies. He was secretary to the commissioners for building Westminster bridge, in 1737; and appointed one of the keepers of the state-papers in the paper office. He printed in 1772 Calendars of the ancient Charters, &c. in the tower of London, 4to. He also edited Leland's Collectanea in 9 vols. 8vo.; Liber Niger Scaccari, 2 vols. 8vo.; and Hearne's Curious Discourses, 2 vols. 8vo. besides other works. He died in 1781. There are many curious papers of his in the Archæologia.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

AYMAR (James), a French impostor; was born at St. Veran in Dauphiné. He gained a great name and considerable wealth at the close of the 17th century, by pretending to be in possession of a divining rod, for the discovery of hidden treasure. The fraud being detected, he returned to his former obscurity; but it gave occasion to de Vallemont's learned book on the powers of the divining rod.—Nouv. Diß. Hist.

AYMON (John), a Roman catholic priest of Piedmont, who turned protestant, and then went back to his former communion. He was pensioned by cardinal de Noailles, and wrote several books against the reformed churches. He also published the letters of Cyril Lucar, Les Synodes nationaux des Eglises reformées de France, 1710, 2 vols. 4to. and Tableau de la Cour de Rome, 1707, 12mo.—Ibid.

AYRES (John), an English penman of the 17th century. He was servant to sir William Athhurst, lord mayor of London in 1694, to whom he dedicated his Arithmetic made Easy. The year following he published his Tutor to Penmanship, engraved by John Strut. He lived at the Hand-and-pen in St. Paul's Church-yard, and probably taught school there.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

AYRMIN or AYERMIN (William), bishop of Norwich in the 14th century, was born in Lincolnshire. Edward III. made him chancellor of England and afterwards treasurer. He was also sent ambassador to Rome, where, instead of forwarding the king's business, he solicited and obtained the grant of the bishopric of Norwich. This greatly provoked the king, who refused him admission into the see for some time, but at last consented. He died in 1337.—Godwin de Praesul. Fuller's Worthies. B. B.

AYSCUGH (George Edward), an English military officer, was the son of Dr. Ayscough, dean of Bristol, by a sister of lord Lyttleton. He died of a consumption in 1779. He wrote Semiramis, a tragedy, 1777, and Letters from an Officer in the Guards to his Friend in England, containing some accounts of France and Italy, 1778, 8vo.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

AYSCUGH (sir George), a brave English admiral, was descended from a respectable family in Lincolnshire, and received the honour of knighthood from Charles I. He distinguished himself greatly against the Dutch in the time of the commonwealth, and in 1666 was appointed to the command of the Royal Prince, the finest ship then in the world. He was engaged in the great fight with the Dutch which lasted four days; but having the misfortune to strike upon the Gallipper sand, his crew forced him to yield to the enemy. After remaining in Holland for some months, he was permitted to return to England, where he spent the remainder of his days in retirement.—Campbell's Lives of the Admirals.

AZARIAH or UZZIAH, king of Judah, succeeded Amaziah about 810 B. C. He began his reign with great reputation, but at the close of it turned idolator, and died a leper.—SS.

AZARIAS, a Jewish rabbi and historian of the 16th century, published at Mantua, in 1574, a Hebrew book, entitled, The Light of the Eyes, in which he treats of many historical and miscellaneous subjects. It also contains a Hebrew translation of the letter of Aristas on the Septuagint.—Buxtorf's Bibl.

AZEVEDO (Ignatius), a Portuguese jesuit, was born in 1527. Although heir to a large fortune, he resigned it for a religious life, and went to India as a missionary. On a second voyage thither in 1570, the ship was taken by pirates, who put all the missionaries, amounting to 40, to death.—Moreri.

AZORIUS (John), a Spanish jesuit in the 16th century. He wrote Institutionum Moraliū; Incanticum, &c. 3 vols. folio. He died at Rome in 1603.—Ibid.

AZPILCUETA (Martin), surnamed Navarre, a Spanish lawyer, was born in 1494, at Verafoa, near Pampeluna. He was professor in several universities, and died at Rome in 1586. His works were printed at Lyons, in six vols. folio, in 1597.—Moreri.

AZZO (Portius), an Italian lawyer, was a native of Bologna, where he was chosen professor of jurisprudence in 1190. He wrote an esteemed work, entitled, A Summary of the Code and the Institutes. He died about 1220.—Tiraboschi.

B

BAAHIDIN (Mahomet Gëbet Amali), a Persian doctor, who wrote a summary of civil and canon law, under the name of Abbas the Great, by whose command it was written.—Moreri.

BAAN (John de), a Dutch portrait painter; was born in 1639, and died in 1702. He was in England for some time under the patronage of Charles II. His son James was a good artist, and came to England with William prince of Orange. He died in 1700, at the age of 27.—Moreri.

BAARDORP (Cornelius), physician and chamberlain to the emperor Charles V., was the author of a work in 5 vols. folio, entitled Methodus Univerſe Artis Medicæ, printed at Bruges, in 1598.—Moreri.

BAART (Peter), a Flemish poet and physician. He wrote a poem entitled Flemish Georgics, and another called Le Triton de Frise.—Ibid.

BABA, an impostor among the Turks, appeared in 1240. He held, that there is but one God, and that he was his messenger; and he found means to procure a number of followers, with whom he overran Naxos. Being defeated, his sect disappeared.—Ibid.

BABROT (Francis Noel), one of the actors of the French revolution, was at first a footman, then a lawyer's clerk, and afterwards an attorney. He assumed the revolutionary name of Gracchus, and conducted an incendiary journal called the Tribune of the People; engaged in a conspiracy, and was condemned to be guillotined, but prevented the execution by killing himself in prison in 1797.—Anecdotes of Founders of the French Republic.

BABACOUSCHI, mufti of the city of Cassa, in Mauris, whose real name was Abdalrahman Mosthafa. He wrote a book called The Friend of Princes. He died in the year 783 of the Hegira.—D'Herbelot.

BABIN (Francis), a French divine, was born in 1651 at Angers, where he became professor of divinity at the age of 25. He published the conferences of the diocese of Angers in 18 vols. 12mo. and died in 1734.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BABINGTON (Gervase), an English prelate, was a native of Devonshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He was successively bishop of Landaff, Exeter, and Worcester, and died in 1610. His works were printed in 1 vol. folio, in 1615.—Biog. Brit.

BABINGTON (Anthony), a gentleman of Derbyshire, who associated with some other zealous Roman Catholics to assassinate queen Elizabeth, and to deliver Mary queen of Scots. Babington was stimulated to this enterprize also, in the hopes that Mary, out of gratitude, would take him for her husband. This scheme was discovered by Walsingham, and the conspirators executed in 1586.—Rapin. Camden's Elizabeth.

BABYLAS, bishop of Antioch, who was put to death in the persecution of Decius, A.D. 251.—Moreri.

BABYLONIA. The first account of this country is in scripture, where we read of Amraphel, king of Babylon, fighting under the king of Elam B.C. 1912. [Gen. xiv.] In 681 After Haddon, king of Assyria, took possession of this territory. In 730 Nabonassar, conjectured to be the son of Pul, founded the kingdom of Babylon, and in 625 Nabopolassar revolted from the Assyrians. Under Nebuchadnezzar this empire became famous; but in 538 Babylon was taken by Cyrus, and from that time it suffered the same changes as Persia. However, Bagdad on the Tigris continued subject in some degree to the Saracens till A.D. 1258, when it was taken by Hulaku, the Tartar, who put an end to the caliphate. It was taken by the Turks in 1534, conquered by the Persians in 1613, and recovered by the former in 1637.—Univ. Hist.

BACAI, the surname of Ibrahim Ben Omar, who wrote on the musliman law, and the lives of eminent men. He died in the year of the Hegira 885.—D'Herbelot.

BACCALAR Y SANNA (Vincent), marquis of St. Vincent, in Sardinia, and an eminent commander under Charles II. and Philip V. of Spain. He wrote the Monarchy of the Hebrews, and Memoirs of Philip V. He died in 1726.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BACCALINI (Benedict), a benedictine monk, born in 1651, and educated at Parma. He published a literary journal, for which he was obliged to quit Parma, and removed to Modena, where the duke made him his historiographer and librarian. Here he made ample collections for a history of the house of Este, which he left to Muratori. He afterwards became professor of ecclesiastical history at Modena, and died there in 1721. He published several learned works.—Moreri.

BACCHYLIDES, a Greek poet, was born in the isle of Ceos, and flourished 452 B.C. Horace is said to have imitated him in some of his odes.—Voss. de Poet. Græc.

BACCHYLUS, a christian writer of the 2d century, and bishop of Corinth, who wrote a letter on the time of celebrating Easter, which is lost.—Eusebius. Dupin.

BACCIO (Andrew), an Italian physician of the 16th century, was a native of Ancona, and medical professor at Rome. He wrote on gems and precious stones, on poisons and antidotes, on hot springs, &c.—Moreri.

BACCIO (Francis Bartholomew), an historical and portrait painter, was born near Florence in 1469, and died in 1517. His figures have great grace, and his colouring is admirable.—Pilkington.

BACH (John Sebastian), an eminent German musician, was born at Eisenach in 1685. In 1708 he became musician to the duke of Saxe Weimar, and obtained a victory at Dresden over a famous French organist, who had challenged all the German musicians. He is reckoned to have been equal to Handel on the organ, and his compositions are in the first style of excellence. He died at Leipzig in 1754. His sons Charles and John were also greatly celebrated as performers and composers in music; the former was living at Hamburg in 1773, and the other was in England in 1763.—Burney's Hist. Mus.

BACHAUMONT (Francois le Coigneux de), a French poet, was counsellor to the parliament, which profession he renounced for a life of ease and pleasure. He was the intimate friend of Chapelle, in conjunction with whom he wrote "A Journey to Montpelier," which is a lively piece. He was also the author of some other works of the humorous kind. He died at Paris in 1702, aged 78.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BACHAUMONT (Louis-Petit), a French author, born at Paris. He wrote Secret Memoirs towards a History of the Republic of Letters in France, 36 vols. 12mo. and other works. He died in 1771.—Ibid.

BACHELIER (Nicholas), an eminent French sculptor and architect, was the pupil of Michael Angelo. He ornamented the churches of his native city, Thoulouse, with his productions. He died about 1554.—Moreri.

BACICI (John Baptist Gaudi), a celebrated Italian painter, was born at Genoa in 1639, and died in 1709. He excelled in portraits and scriptural representations.—D'Argenville's Vies des Peintres.

BACHOVIVS (Reinier), a German civilian, born at Cologne in 1544. On turning calvinist he was so much persecuted by the lutherans as to be obliged to remove into the palatinate, where he was patronized by the elector. He wrote a catechism in defence of calvinism. His son Reinier was professor of civil law at Heidelberg, and turned Roman catholic. His works are, Exercitationes ad Partem posteriorem Chiliodis Fabri, 1624; De Actionibus, 1626; De Pignoribus et Hypothecis, 1627; Disputationes de variis Juris civilis Materiis, 1604; In Institutionum Juris Justiniani Libros quatuor Commentarii, 1628.—Bayle. Moreri.

BACKER (James), an historical painter of great merit, was born at Antwerp in 1590, and died in 1560.—Pilkington.

BACKER (Jacob), a portrait and historical painter, was born at Harlingen in 1609, and died in 1651. His pieces are held in great esteem.—Ibid.

BACKHOUSE (William), an English astrologer and alchemist, was born in Berkshire, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, which he left without a degree, and settled on his estate, where he devoted himself to his favourite studies. He published, 1. The pleasant Fountain of Knowledge, translated from the French, 8vo. 1644. 2. The Complaint of Nature. 3. The Golden Fleece. He was also the inventor of an instrument called the way-wiser. Elias Ashmole was his disciple, and used to call him father. He died in 1662.—Wood A. O.

BACKHUYSEN (Ludolph), an eminent painter, was born at Embden in 1631, and died in 1709. His favourite subjects were shipping and sea pieces.—Pilkington.

BACON (Robert), an English friar, was born about 1168, and became divinity lecturer at Oxford. In 1233 he was made treasurer of Salisbury. He wrote the Life of St. Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury, and other works. He died in 1248.—Pittes of illust. Scr. Angl.

BACON (Roger), an English philosopher, was born at Ilchester, in Somersetshire, in 1214, and educated at Oxford, under the auspices of Robert Grossthead, bishop of Lincoln, who was through life his great patron. Bacon was also encouraged and instructed in learning by Edmund Rich, archbishop of Canterbury, William Shirwood, chancellor of Lincoln and an excellent mathematician, and Richard Fishacre, an able professor at Oxford and Paris. The last-mentioned university being at that time greatly frequented by students on account of the learned lectures there delivered, Bacon, after laying in a good store of knowledge at home, went thither, and studied with so much diligence and success as to obtain the degree of D.D. On quitting France he retired to Oxford, and about the same time, A. D. 1240, entered into the order of St. Francis. He now devoted himself principally to chemistry, natural philosophy, and mathematics, and so ardent was he in making experiments as to spend in the course of twenty years 2000*l.* entirely on these pursuits, which, considering the time he lived in, was a prodigious sum. The discoveries he made, and the celebrity he obtained, excited the envy and malice of the monks. It was reported, and believed, that he had recourse to the agency of evil spirits, and that all his knowledge consisted in his profound skill as a magician. In consequence of this, he was forbidden to read lectures in the university, and was even confined to his cell without being allowed to see his friends, or to have a proper supply of food. This bigoted and cruel conduct of the monks seems only to have extended his reputation, for while he was under persecution by the monks he received a letter from the cardinal bishop of Sabina, the pope's legate in England, requesting a copy of his works, which Bacon at first declined; but when that prelate was raised to the papal chair by the name of Clement IV. he collected his writings into a volume, entitled Opus Majus, or the Greater Work, and sent them to his holiness, who promised him his protection. This tranquillity, however, did not long continue, for on the death of that pope he was exposed to new and more severe persecutions. His works were prohibited, and he was sentenced to close imprisonment, in which he remained above ten years. On being released he retired to Oxford, where he died June 11, 1292.—The uncommon attainments of Bacon obtained for him, according to the custom of that age, the appellation of "the wonderful doctor," and it must be allowed that no man ever deserved it better. Bishop Bale mentions above eighty treatises written by this great man, of which he had himself seen near forty; and Dr. Jebb, the learned editor of his Opus Majus, in 1 vol. folio, 1733, classes his writings under these heads: grammar, mathematics, physics, optics, geography, astronomy, chronology, chemistry, magic, medicine, logic, metaphysics, ethics, theology, philology, and miscellanies. It must, however, be confessed, that one and the same work by him has in other copies borne another title. His chemical tracts are in the Thesaurus Chemicus, printed at Franckfort, in 8vo. 1620. His treatise on the "Means of avoiding the Infirmities of old Age," was first printed at Oxford in 1590; and an English translation of it, by Dr. Browne, appeared in 1683. Several pieces by him yet remain in MS. particularly one on chronology, entitled Computus Rogeri Baconis; another, called Liber Naturalium, and the Compendium of Theology, are in the king's library. Bacon was a considerable mathematician, and from some of his pieces in MS. it appears that he had a knowledge of the nature of convex and concave glasses, and some consider him as the inventor of the telescope. He also gives descriptions which correspond with the camera obscura and burning glass. His acquaintance with astronomy and geography was likewise very extensive and accurate. He detected the errors in the calendar, and suggested that reformation in it which was long afterwards adopted by Gregory XIII. In chemistry he appears to have been misled by the delusion which imposed upon other great men in more enlightened times than the one he lived in, that it was possible to transmute metals into gold. Yet this delusion has been the friend of experimental science, and Bacon in pursuing it discovered many secrets which modern philosophers have arrogated to themselves. In particular, he gives such a description of a certain composition and its powerful effects as proves he was not unacquainted with gunpowder.—Jebb's Pref. to Opus Majus. Piss. Bale. Biog. Br.

great seal, was born at Chislehurst, in Kent, in 1510. He studied at Bene's college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Gray's-inn, where he became so eminent in the law that he was appointed attorney in the court of wards. He obtained from Henry VIII. various manors in Suffolk on the dissolution of the monastery of St. Edmund's Bury. At the accession of queen Elizabeth he was made keeper of the great seal, and a privy counsellor. He was a man of great industry, prudent and cautious in his conduct, making it his study never to entangle himself with any party. When the queen came to visit him at his new house at Redgrave, she observed, alluding to his corpulency, that he had built his house too little for him: "Not so, madam," answered he, "but your majesty has made me too big for my house." He died in 1579. He left several manuscripts, none of which have been printed. He was twice married; by his first wife he had three sons and three daughters; and by his second he had two sons, Anthony and Francis.—Biog. Brit.

BACON (Anne), second wife of sir Nicholas, was daughter of sir Anthony Cooke, tutor to Edward VI. and born about 1528. She was educated in the ancient and modern languages, and translated from the Italian, Ochinus's Sermons, and from the Latin, bishop Jewel's Apology for the Church of England. She died about 1600.—Ibid.

BACON (Francis), an illustrious philosopher and eminent statesman, was the son of sir Nicholas Bacon by his second wife, and born in London in 1561. When a child he gave such early indications of future eminence, that queen Elizabeth used to call him her "young chancellor." He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and while a student discovered the futility of the peripatetic philosophy, which then prevailed. At the age of sixteen he went to France in the suit of sir Amias Pawlet, ambassador to that court. During his residence there he wrote an acute piece, On the State of Europe, which displayed great observation, though he was then but nineteen years of age. On his return to England he entered of Gray's-inn, and at the age of twenty-eight was appointed one of the queen's counsellors. But by his attachment to the earl of Essex, who was at enmity with Cecil, Bacon lost those advantages at court which he might otherwise have expected. That generous but unfortunate earl, however, feeling the value of his attachment, presented him with a valuable estate; an act of friendship which Bacon ill requited by appearing against him at his trial. In 1593 he was chosen member of parliament for Middlesex, and had the courage to oppose several arbitrary measures of the court, for which he incurred the queen's displeasure. On the accession of James I. he obtained the honour of knighthood, and in 1604 was appointed one of the king's counsel, with a pension. The next year he published a great work, entitled The Advancement and Proficiency of Learning, for which he was made solicitor-general. About this time he married a daughter of Mr. Barnham, a rich alderman of London. In 1611 he was appointed judge of the marshalsea court, and obtained the place of register of the star chamber, the reversion of which had been granted him twenty years before. In 1613 he was made attorney-general; and in 1616 sworn of the privy council. At this time he contracted a close intimacy with the favourite George Villiers, to whom he wrote an admirable letter of advice. In 1617 he was made lord keeper of the great seal, and two years after constituted high chancellor of Great Britain, at which time he was advanced to the peerage by the title of baron of Verulam, and the year following was created viscount St. Alban's. In 1620 he published the most elaborate of all his works, the Novum Organum Scientiarum, shewing a perfect method of exercising the faculty of reason. The year following he was accused in parliament of bribery and corruption in his high office, which heavy charge being admitted by his own confession, he was sentenced to pay a fine of 40,000*l.* to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and for ever rendered incapable of holding any public office. He was soon restored to liberty, had his fine remitted, and was summoned to the first parliament of king Charles. It must not be omitted, that the greatest part of the blame attaches to his servants, and of this he was sensible; for during his trial, as he passed through the room where his domestics were sitting, they all rose up at his entrance, on which he said, "Sit down, my masters, your rise hath been my fall." After this disgrace he went into retirement, where he devoted himself to his studies. Notwithstanding his pension of 1800*l.* a year, and his paternal estate, which was worth 700*l.* a year, his liberality was so great, that at his death, in 1626, his debts amounted to 22,000*l.* His remains were interred in St. Michael's church, at St. Alban's, where his secretary, sir Thomas Meautys, erected a monument to his memory. His writings are an inestimable treasure of sound wisdom, and were published in an elegant form in 1778, 5 vols. 4to. and lately in 10 vols. 8vo. Bacon has justly been called the father of experimental philosophy.—Biog. Br.

BACON (Anthony), elder brother to the chancellor, was eminent for his skill in politics, but being very lame he could not move about the room, and therefore did not enter on public life. The earl of Essex having a great value for him, took him into his house, and settled a handsome income upon him. He maintained a strict

BACON (Nathaniel), half brother to the chancellor, had a taste for painting, and executed some fine pieces, which are at Culford, where he lived, and at Gorhambury, his father's seat. He excelled in landscape and subjects of still life.—Granger.

BACON (Phanuel), an English divine of Magdalen college, Oxford, where he proceeded D.D. He was the author of some trifling dramatic pieces, and a poem called the Artificial Kite. He died in 1783.—Gen. B. D.

BACON (John), an ingenious English sculptor was born in Southwark, Nov, 24, 1740. When young he discovered an inclination for drawing, and in 1755 was bound apprentice to a manufacturer of china at Lambeth, where he was employed, among other things, in painting on porcelain. Here he so greatly improved himself in forming shepherds, shepherdesses, and such small ornamental pieces, that in less than two years he formed all the models for the manufactory. While here, he had an opportunity of observing the models of different sculptors, which were sent to the pottery to be burnt, and from the sight of them he conceived a strong inclination for his future profession. He applied himself to this pursuit with unremitting diligence, and his progress was so rapid that he obtained no less than nine premiums from the society for the encouragement of the arts; the first of these was in the year 1758, being a small figure of Peace, after the manner of the antique. During his apprenticeship he formed a design of making statues in artificial stone, which he afterwards perfected, and the same is now successfully carried on in a manufactory at Lambeth. It was about 1763 that he first began to work in marble, and having seen that operation performed, he invented an instrument for transferring the form of the model to the marble (technically called getting out the points), which instrument has since been adopted by other sculptors. In 1769 he obtained from the royal academy the first gold medal given by that society, and the year following was chosen an associate. The reputation acquired by the exhibition of his statue of Mars induced Dr. Markham, since archbishop of York, to employ him in making a bust of his majesty, to be placed in the hall of Christ church college, Oxford. While he was modelling this bust the king asked him, "if he had ever been out of the kingdom;" and on being answered in the negative, "I am glad of it (said his majesty) you will be the greater honour to it." His execution of this work gained him the royal patronage, and he was employed in forming another bust for the university of Göttingen, which was followed by several others. In 1777 he was employed to prepare a model of a monument, to be erected in Guy's hospital to the memory of the founder, which recommended him to the execution of lord Chatham's monument at Guildhall. The year following he became a royal academician, and completed a beautiful monument to the memory of Mrs. Draper, which is in Bristol cathedral. After this his works are too numerous to be all specified; suffice it to mention the principal, which are two groups for the top of Somerset-house; a statue of Judge Blackstone for All Soul's college, Oxford; another of Henry VI. for Eton college; the monument of lord Chatham in Westminster abbey; and Dr. Johnson's and Mr. Howard's in St. Paul's cathedral. This great artist and excellent man died of an inflammation in his bowels August 4, 1799, leaving a widow and eight children. Mr. Bacon was an estimable private character, and of distinguished piety, as the inscription which he ordered to be placed over his grave evinces: viz. "What I was as an artist seemed to me of some importance while I lived; but what I really was as a believer in Christ Jesus is the only thing of importance to me now." He also possessed respectable literary talents, of which the article Sculpture, in Rees's edition of Chamber's Cyclopædia, written by him, is a favourable specimen.—Euse of John Bacon by Cecil, 1801.

BACONTHORPE, or BACON (John), an English monk in the 13th century, was born in Norfolk. He was called the resolute doctor, and wrote Commentaries on the Four Books of Sentences; a Compendium of the Law of Christ, &c. He died in London in 1346.—Biog. Br.

BACQUE (Leo), a French divine, was at first a protestant, but on turning Roman catholic and a Franciscan, he was made bishop of Pamiers. He wrote a Latin poem on the education of a prince, and died in 1694, aged 94.—Moreri BACQUERRE (Benedict de), a physician of the 17th century, who wrote a book, entitled Senum Medicus, printed at Cologne in 1673.—Ibid.

BACQUET, advocate to the king of France. He wrote some learned pieces on the law, which were published at Lyons, in 2 vols. folio, 1744. He died in 1597.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BACTISHUA (George Ebn), a christian physician, was very eminent at the court of the caliph Almanzor, who understanding that he had an old woman for his wife sent him three beautiful girls and 3000 dinars as a present. Bactishua sent back the girls, and told the caliph that his religion prohibited his having more than one wife at a time; which so pleased Almanzor that he loaded him with presents, and permitted him to return to his own country of Khorasan. His son Gabriel was physician to Haroun al Raschid, and held in great estimation by that caliph.—D'Herbelot.

BADAKSCH, a Persian poet, who lived under the caliph Moctafi. A collection of moral poems by him is still extant.—D'Herbelot.

BADASCH, an Arabian grammarian, died in the year of the Hegira 528.—Ibid.

BADCOCK (Samuel), an English divine, was born at South Molton, in Devonshire, in 1747. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters at St. Mary Ottery, in that county, after which he officiated to a congregation at Winbourne, in Dorsetshire, from whence he removed to Barnstaple in 1769, where he cultivated polite literature, and shook off the prejudices of calvinism. In consequence of a disagreement between him and his congregation he returned to his native place, where he officiated to the dissenters till 1787, when he was ordained in Exeter cathedral by the bishop of that church. After serving a curacy in Devonshire for a little time he went to Bath, and became assistant to Dr. Gabriel at the octagon chapel. He died at London in May 1788. Mr. Badcock is best known by his Critiques in the Monthly Review on Madan's Thelyphthora, Dr. Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity, &c. and by the considerable share which he had in Dr. White's Bamptonian Lectures. He was a man of great liveliness, taste, and learning.—Europ. Mag. Sept. 1792.

BADENS (Francis), an historical and portrait painter, was born at Antwerp in 1571, and died in 1603.—Pilkington.

BADREW (Richard de), the original founder of Clare hall, Cambridge, was born at Badow, in Essex. In 1326 he was chancellor of Cambridge, and the same year laid the foundation of a building to which he gave the name of University-hall, which being burnt down was rebuilt by the daughter of sir Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, who named it Clare-hall.—Biog. Br.

BADILE (Antony), an Italian painter, was born at Verona in 1480, and died in 1560. His portraits bore a great resemblance to real life.—Pilkington.

BADUEL (Claude), a French protestant divine, was born at Nîmes. In 1557 he went to Switzerland, taught philosophy and mathematics, and exercised his ministry till his death in 1561. His works are chiefly theological.—Bayle.

BAERSIUS, or VEKENSTIL (Henry), a printer and mathematician of Louvain in the 16th century, who published Tables of the Longitudes and Latitudes of the Planets, 1528, and other works.—Moreri.

BAERSTRAT, a Dutch painter of sea pieces and fish, died in 1687. His pieces are held in great esteem.—Houbraken.

BAP-KARAKAH, or Abu Zohal, an Arabian commentator on Euclid.—Gen. B. D.

BAGDEDIN (Mohammed), an Arabian mathematician of the 10th century, who wrote a treatise on the Division of Superficies, a Latin version of which was published by John Dee.—Voss. de Math.

BAGFORD (John), an antiquary, was a shoemaker in London, but afterwards turned bookfeller, and became a great collector of curiosities. He was employed by Dr. Moore, bishop of Norwich, and the earl of Oxford, to enrich their libraries with scarce books and MSS. for which the former placed him in the Charter-house. He died in 1716, aged 65. Several of his letters are in the British Museum.—Gen. B. D.

BAGGER (John), bishop of Copenhagen, was born at Lunden, in Denmark, in 1646. His reputation was so high for oriental and theological learning, that at the age of 29 he was raised to the episcopal dignity. He revised the Danish liturgy, and published some learned Discourses in Latin and Danish. He died in 1693.—Moreri.

BAGI ZADEH, a Mohammedan writer, who commented on the book Escharat u al nadhair. He died in the year of the Hegira 1013.—D'Herbelot.

BAGLIONI (John Paul), a warlike Italian of the 16th century, was a native of Perugia, where he exercised a kind of sovereignty, till he was driven from it by Cæsar Borgia. Afterwards he served with reputation in the armies of different Italian states, particularly the Venetian. Pope Leo X. artfully drew him to Rome, and caused him to be beheaded in 1520.—Moreri.

BAGLIVI (George), an eminent physician, was born at Ragusa, and educated at Padua. He became professor of anatomy at Rome, and died there in 1706, aged 38. His works were collected and printed in 1 vol. 4to. 1710.—Haller Bibl. Med. Præf.

BAGNIOLI (Julius Cæsar), an Italian poet, was a native of Bagna Cabano, and died in 1600. He wrote the tragedy of Aragonois, and a poem on the Judgment of Paris.—Moreri.

BAGOAS, an eunuch (as the word implies), was an Egyptian, and governed a long time under Artaxerxes Ochus, king of Persia, whom he poisoned to avenge the death of Apis, which was worshipped by his countrymen, and slain by that prince. He afterwards poisoned the son of Ochus, and was himself put to death by Darius Codomanus, B. C. 356.—Diod. Siculus.

BAGSHAW (William), an English divine, was born in 1628, and educated in Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, after which he obtained the living of Gleslop, in Derbyshire, which he held till 1662, when he was ejected for nonconformity. He then officiated to a congregation of dissenters, and died in 1708. He wrote some good books on practical divinity.—Life by Ashe. Calamy.

BAGSHAW (Edward), a violent nonconformist, was student of Christ church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. He was for some time assistant to Dr. Busby, in Westminster school, and was ordained by Dr. Brownrigg, bishop of Exeter. He was a man of abilities, but of extreme quick passions, and was sent to Newgate for refusing to take the oath of allegiance and supre-mary, in which he died in 1671. He wrote, 1. Dissertationes duæ Antifocinianæ, 4to. 2. De Momarchia absoluta dissertatio politica, &c.—Cademy.

BARA AL HAKA U ALDIN, the title given to Omar Nakhshbendi, and which signifies "the ornament of justice and religion." He was a Mohammedan saint, to whom the muslulmans attribute many miracles. He died in the year of the Hegira 857.—D'Herbelot.

BARALI, an Arabian, who wrote a book on the etymologies of names. He died in the year of the Hegira 220. There was another of the same name, who wrote on the differences of the muslulman doctors.—Ibid.

BAHAR AL HEYDH, or The Sea of Memory, is the surname of Abû Othman ben Amrû, who wrote a book on the manners of princes. He died in the year of the Hegira 255.—Ibid.

BAHIER (John), a French Latin poet, was a native of Châtillon, and priest of the Oratory. He died in 1707. His pieces are in the collection of de Brienne.—Novæ Diss. Hist.

BAHRAM, surnamed Giubin, a Persian general and usurper, was an eminent commander in the army of Chosroes I. or Nushirvan, and his son Hormouz. He caused the latter prince to be deposed, and ascended the throne, from which he was driven by Chosroes, the son of Hormouz. He then fled to the great khan, who, after employing him for some time, put him to death.—Univ. Hist.

BAHRDT (Charles Frederic), a German writer, was born at Bischofswerda in 1741. He studied at Leipic, where he took the degree of M.A. and became deputy to his father, who was professor of divinity there. Being forced to quit Leipic on account of an amour, he became professor of biblical antiquities at Erfurt, and published An Essay towards a System of the Doctrines contained in the Bible, 1769, in which he broached several heterodox opinions. From Erfurt he removed to Gießen, in Hesse, where he published a number of theological works, filled with the boldest extravagancies. He left Gießen in 1774, and went to Durkheim, where he became preacher to the count Von Leiningen Dachsburg, who gave him his house for a seminary of education, to be called the Philanthropinum, which was opened in 1777. Bahrdt went to Holland and England to get pupils, and in the latter country obtained four; but on his return he found that a prosecution had been commenced against him at Vienna, in consequence of which he was obliged to fly to Prussia. He afterwards settled at Halle, where he became an avowed deist, and turned tavernkeeper and farmer. There also he instituted a new society of freemasons, for which he was imprisoned twelve months. On his enlargement he returned to his business as a landlord, and having turned off his wife, kept his servant girl as a mistress. He died in 1792. He wrote many pieces, most of which are extravagant and licentious.—Schlichtegroll's Necrology.

BAIAN, or BAION (Andrew), an Indian convert, born at Goa, and on becoming christian went to Rome, where he was ordained priest about the year 1690. He wrote several ingenious pieces; and translated the Æneid into Greek verse, and the Laïad of Camoens into Latin.—Moreri.

BAJAZET I. sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father Amurath I. in 1389, and soon after put his younger brother to death. He pushed his conquests far into Asia and Europe, and in 1396 gained a great victory over the christian army under Sigismund, king of Hungary; but in 1402 he experienced a terrible defeat from the famous Timur, or Tamerlane, on the plains of Angora. Bajazet was taken prisoner. Different accounts are given of his treatment by the Persian and Turkish historians. The former assert that he was entertained in a liberal manner; while the others maintain, that Timur shut him in an iron cage, and exposed him to the gaping crowd. He died at Antioch of Pisidia in 1403.—Univ. Hist.

BAJAZET II. sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father, Mohammed II. in 1481. He was opposed by his brother Zizim, whom he defeated. Zizim escaped to Rhodes, from whence the grand master sent him to Italy, where Bajazet caused him to be assassinated. He obtained several signal advantages over the Venetians and other christian powers. His son Selim rebelled against him, and though defeated, Bajazet, instead of punishing him, resigned to him his crown, which the ungrateful monster repaid by causing his father to be poisoned in 1512.—Ibid.

BAIER (John William), a learned German divine, was born at Nuremberg in 1647. After receiving several academical honours, he became the first rector and professor of divinity at Hall, in Saxony, where he died in 1694. He wrote a Compendium of Theology, and other works.—Moreri.

BAIER (John James), a German physician, was born at Jena in 1677. He was at first professor of physiology and surgery at Altdorf, and afterwards president of the college of physicians, and director of the botanical garden. He died in 1795. He wrote, 1. Gemmarum affabre sculptarum Thesaurus. 2. De Hortis celebrioribus Germaniæ, et Horti medici Academici Altdorfii Hist. 3. Orationes varii Argumenti. 4. Biographia Professorum Med. in Acad. Altd. &c. &c.—Moreri.

BAIR (Lazarus), abbot of Charoux and of Grenetiere, and counsellor to the parliament of Paris, was a native of La Flèche, and employed in various embassies. He wrote De re Vestitaria, and De re Navali, printed at Basle in 1541. His son John Anson was the author of several poems, and died in 1592.—Moreri.

BAIE (Louis), a learned French divine of the 17th century, who wrote a Summary of Councils, printed at Paris in 2 vols. folio, 1672, and an Account of celebrated Preachers.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BAILLES (William), physician to Frederick II. king of Prussia, and member of the colleges of London and Edinburgh. He wrote an Essay on the Bath Waters in 1757.—Gen. B. D.

BAILLET (Adrian), a French writer, was born in 1649 near Beauvais. In 1676 he entered into orders, and obtained a living of 30l. a year, on which he supported his brother and himself. He died in 1706. His great work is his Jugemens des Savans, sur les principaux Ouvrages des Auteurs; or Judgment of the Learned on the principal Works of Authors, in 9 vols. He wrote a great number of books on theological and historical subjects, particularly the Life of Des Cartes, in 2 vols. 4to. 1691, and the Lives of Saints, 4 vol. fol.—Moreri.

BAILLI (Roche), better known by the name of La Riviere, was first physician to Henry IV. and pretended to great skill in astrology. He was a great admirer of Paracelsus, and wrote a summary of his doctrine. He died in 1605.—Ibid.

BAILLIE (Robert), a Scotch divine, was born in 1595 at Glasgow, where he took his degree of M.A. received episcopal orders, and became regent of philosophy. He afterwards obtained the living of Kilwinning; but at the commencement of the civil war he joined the covenanters, renounced episcopacy, and was sent to London to draw up the charge against archbishop Laud. While there he was chosen one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, and returned to his own country in 1646. He was one of the commissioners sent by the general assembly of Scotland to Charles II. at the Hague. At the restoration he was made principal of his college, and might have had a bishopric if he would have conformed. He died in 1662. His letters, and journal of his transactions while in England, were published at Edinburgh, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1775, from which it appears, that though a man of learning he was an intolerant bigot.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BAILLON (William de), an eminent French physician, was born in 1538, and died in 1616. He wrote Conciliorum Medicinatum, libri duo, Paris, 1635, 4to. All his works were printed at Geneva in 1762, 4 vols. 4to.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BAILLY (David), a painter, was born at Leyden, where his father, who was a good painter, encouraged his inclination, and placed him under de Geyn, an engraver. He afterwards studied painting in Holland and Italy, and attained considerable eminence as a portrait painter. In 1613 he settled at Leyden, where he died about 1630. He also distinguished himself as a writer.—Houbraken.

BAILLY (John Sylvain), a French astronomer, was born at Paris in 1736. He early shewed a strong inclination to scientific pursuits, which was encouraged by his friends. When young he communicated some valuable papers to the royal academy of sciences, and in 1773 wrote a letter to Bernoulli on some discoveries respecting the satellites of Jupiter. In 1768 he published the eloge of Leibnitz, for which he received a gold medal from the academy of Berlin. This was followed by the elogies of Charles V. La Caille, and Corneille, which, with the former, were collected together. In 1775 appeared the first volume of his History of Astronomy, the third and last volume of which was published in 1779. Besides these works he published several historical disquisitions and astronomical observations. He was elected a member of the French academy in 1763. How is it to be lamented that the phrenzy of revolutionary politics should seize on such a mind as that of Bailly! He entered eagerly into the convulsions of his native country, and was president of the first national assembly. On the 14th of July, 1789, he was chosen mayor of Paris, but soon lost his popularity, owing to the liberal sentiments which he expressed for the royal family, and his enforcing obedience to the standing laws. In consequence of this he resigned his office in 1791, and went into that philosophical retirement from whence it would have been prudent for him not to have issued at first. In the sanguinary period which followed he was apprehended, and after a mock and summary process, condemned to be guillotined. He suffered with firmness, November 12, 1793.—Anecd. of Founders of French Republic, Novo. Dict. Hist.

BAINBRIDGE (John), an English physician and astronomer, was born at Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, in 1582. He was bred at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and then practised physic in his native town, and taught school. He settled afterwards in London, where he gained so great a reputation for his mathematical knowledge, that sir Henry Savile appointed him his first astronomical professor at Oxford, whither he removed, and was entered of Merton college. He published 1. An Astronomical Description of the late Comet, 1618, 4to. 2. Procli Sphæra, et Ptolomæi de Hypothesibus Planetarum liber singularis; to which was added Ptolemy's Canon Regnorum, 1620, 4to. He left also several mathematical MSS.—Biog. Ar.

BAITHOSUS, a jew, who with his fellow disciple Sadoc, founded a sect which denied a future state and resurrection. At first this sect was called both Baithosæi and Sadducees, but in process of time it was only distinguished by the latter.—Lights-foot.

BAIUS (Michael), a divine, was born at Melun in 1513. He became professor of divinity at Louvain, which appointed him its deputy at the council of Trent. His partiality to Augustine, however, brought upon him the charge of siding too much with Calvin, and several of his opinions were condemned by his college and the pope. He died in 1589. His works were printed at Cologne in 1696, 4to.—Moreri.

BAKER (David), an English benedictine monk, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards studied law at the Temple. On turning Roman catholic he went to Italy, where he entered among the benedictines, and was sent a missionary to England in the reign of Charles I. He died in London in 1641. He was of a mystical turn, and published in that way an exposition of Walter Hylton's book, entitled, The Scale of Perfection.—Wood, A. O.

BAKER (Sir Richard), an English historical writer, was born at Sissinghurst in Kent, and educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to one of the inns of court, after which he travelled abroad for improvement. In 1608 he was knighted by James I. and in 1620 was high-sheriff of Oxfordshire. An unfortunate marriage reduced him to poverty, and he was thrown into the Fleet prison, where he wrote several books, the chief of which is a Chronicle of the Kings of England, which went through several editions; the last in 1730 fol. He died in 1645.—Biog. Br.

BAKER (Thomas), a learned mathematician and divine, was born in Somersetshire in 1625, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, after which he obtained the living of Bishop's Nymmet in Devonshire. He published the Geometrical Key, or the Gate of Equations unlocked, 1684, 4to. The royal society sent him some questions, which he solved in so satisfactory a manner that they presented him with a medal. He died at his vicarage in 1690.—Wood, A. O.

BAKER (Thomas), a learned antiquary, was born at Lanchester, in the county of Durham, in 1656. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and was elected fellow. On entering into orders he had the living of Long Newton, which he resigned in 1690, because he could not take the oaths to king William, and in 1717 lost his fellowship, but still continued to reside in the college; and Mathew Prior, who was fellow of the same society, retained the place on purpose that he might give the profits of it to Mr. Baker. He kept up a correspondence with many learned men, and greatly assisted them in their works. He died at his chambers in 1740, and was buried in St. John's chapel, to which college he bequeathed his collection of books and MSS. He wrote, 1. Reflexions on Lear- ing, 1710, 8vo. 2. The Preface to Bishop Fisher's Funeral Sermon for Margaret, Countess of Richmond and Derby, 1708. He also compiled the History of St. John's college, which is in MS. 8vo.—Life by Grey.

BAKER (Henry), an eminent naturalist, was born in London and brought up to the business of a bookseller, which profession he quitted, and undertook to teach deaf and dumb persons to speak, by which he acquired a handsome fortune. He married a daughter of Daniel de Foe, by whom he had two sons. He was chosen fellow of the antiquarian and royal societies, and obtained from the latter in 1740 the gold medal for his microscopical experiments on saline particles. He died in 1774, aged 70. He published the Microscope made easy, 8vo. 1742, and Employment for the Microscope, 8vo. 1764. He also wrote Original Poems, serious and humorous, published in 8vo. 1725. His poem entitled The Universe possesses considerable merit. Several of his papers are in the Philosophical Transactions. He left 100l. to the royal society for an anatomical or chemical lecture.—Biog. Br.

BAKER (David Erskine), eldest son of the preceding, was adopted by an uncle, who was a silk throwster in Spital-fields, and succeeded him in the business; but being fond of theatrical entertainments, he squandered his property and joined some low strolling companies. He was the author of "a Companion to the Play-house," 2 vols. 12mo 1764, since considerably improved and enlarged under the title of Biographia Dramatica, 2 vols. 8vo.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BAKEWELL (Robert), a celebrated grazier, was born in 1726, at his paternal estate of Dishley, in Leicestershire. He conducted the farm for several years before his father's death, and turned his attention to the improvement of the breed of his cattle, for which purpose he travelled over England, and into Ireland and Holland. His endeavours were so successful that the Dishley sheep were distinguished above all others, and he has let one of his rams for the enormous sum of 400 guineas! One in particular produced in one season the sum of 800 guineas, independent of ewes of Mr. Bakewell's own stock, which, at the same rate, would have made a total, the produce of a single ram, of 1200 guineas! The race of Dishley sheep are known by the fineness of their bone and flesh, the lightness of the ossal, the disposition to quietness, and consequently to mature and fatten with less food than other sheep of equal weight. He also greatly improved his black cattle, and frequently let his bulls at 50 guineas a season each! Mr. Bakewell died in 1795. —Annual Necrology, 1798.

BALIOI, or BALLIOI (sir John de), the founder of a college called by his name at Oxford, was born at Barnard Castle in Durham. In 1248 he was made governor of Carlisle; and on the marriage of Margaret, daughter of Henry III. to Alexander III. king of Scotland, the guardianship of the royal pair, as well as of the kingdom, was committed to him and another lord; but in about three years they were charged with abusing their trust, and the king of England marched towards Scotland to punish them. However, by advancing a considerable sum of money Baliol made his peace. In 1269 he laid the foundation of Baliol college, which was completed by his widow. In the contest between Henry III. and the barons he sided with the king, for which the barons seized his lands. He died in 1269, leaving three sons.—Biog. Br.

BALIOI (John de), king of Scotland, was son of the above, and being at the head of the English interest in Scotland, on the death of queen Margaret in her passage from Norway, he laid claim to the vacant throne by virtue of his descent from David earl of Huntingdon, brother to William the Lion, king of Scotland. His principal competitor for the crown was Robert Bruce. Edward I. being declared arbitrator, he declared in favour of Baliol, who did homage to him for the kingdom, Nov. 12, 1292. But he did not hold the sceptre long, for remonstrating against the power assumed by Edward over Scotland, he was summoned to his tribunal as a vassal. Ba-liol, provoked at this, concluded a treaty with France, the consequence of which was a war with England. The battle of Dunbar decided the fate of Baliol, who surrendered his crown into the hands of Edward, who sent him and his son to England, where they were committed to the tower. At the intercession of the pope they were released and delivered to his legate in 1299. Baliol then went to France, where he resided upon his own estate, and died there in 1314. His son Edward afterwards set up a claim to the kingdom of Scotland, invaded and recovered it, but held it not long, and dying afterwards without issue, the family became extinct.—Ibid.

BALTHAZARINI, an Italian musician, who was much admired at the court of Henry III. of France. In 1531 he composed a ballet for the nuptials of the duke de Joyeuse with mademoiselle de Vaudemont, sister to the queen, called Ceres and her Nymphs, which is supposed to be the origin of the ballet heroique in France.—Nouv. Dict. Hist. Berny.

BALTUS (John Francis), a French jesuit, was born at Metz in 1667; he became librarian at Rheims, and died there in 1743. His principal work is an Answer to Fontenelle's History of Oracles, Straßburg, 8vo.—Moreri.

BALUE (John), a Roman cardinal, was born in France about 1420, of mean parents. He gained several rich preferments by his servility and art, particularly the see of Angers, after the deposition of his old patron the bishop of that diocese. Paul II. gave him a cardinal's hat. He engaged in correspondence with the dukes of Burgundy and Bern, to the disadvantage of Louis, which being discovered, he was imprisoned in an iron cage 11 years. On regaining his liberty he went to Rome, and was sent to France as legate by Sixtus V. He died in 1491.—Ibid.

BALUZE (Stephen), a French writer, was born in 1631, and educated at Thoulouze, where he was patronized by the archbishop, on whose death he became librarian to Colbert. The king made him professor of the canon law in the royal college, and granted him a pension, both which places he lost by inserting some obnoxious remarks in his Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne. He died in 1718. Besides the above history he wrote the Lives of the Popes of Avignon, and the History of Tulle, his native place.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BALZAC (John Lewis Guez de), a noble French writer, was born at Angoulême in 1594. Cardinal Richelieu granted him a pension, and gave him the places of councillor of state, and historiographer royal. He gained great popularity by his Letters, which were first published in 1624. His style is rather bombastic, but his sentiments are good. At the close of life, Balzac, who had indulged in all the elegancies of a dissipated court, became very devout, had apartments fitted up for him in a convent, and bestowed considerable sums on the poor. He died in 1654. Besides his Letters, he wrote 1. Le Prince; 2. Le Socrate Chretien; 3. L'Aristippe; 4. Entretiens; 5. Christ Victorieux.—Bayle. Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BAMBROCCIO, an eminent painter, whose real name was Peter Van Laer; but he is better known by the nick-name of Bamboccio, on account of his singular deformity. He was born at Laerden near Narden, in 1613. He lived at Rome 16 years, and improved himself by a close application to his profession. He painted inns, farriers shops, cattle, and conversations, with great effect. His style is sweet and true, and his touch delicate, with great transparency of colouring. He died in 1678.—Pill.

BAMBRIDGE (Christopher), archbishop of York, to which see he was translated from Durham in 1508. He was a native of Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. Henry VIII. sent him ambassador to pope Julius II. who gave him a cardinal's hat. He was poisoned by his servant, in revenge for some blows he had given him, in 1514.—Biog. Brit.

BAMFIELD (Francis), a nonconformist divine, was born of a genteel family in Devonshire, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. In 1641 he obtained a prebend in Exeter cathedral, and was also minister of Sherborn in Dorsetshire, but was deprived as the restoration for nonconformity. He was imprisoned in Newgate, London, for holding conventicles, and died there in 1684. He wrote a book in vindication of the observation of the seventh day sabbath, &c.—Calamy.

BANCHI (Seraphin), a dominican of Florence, to whom, in 1593, Peter Barriere, a hot-headed fanatic, communicated his intention of murdering the king; which the priest prudently communicated to a nobleman, whereby the horrid design was prevented. The king gave him as a reward the archbishopric of Angoulême, which he afterwards resigned, and retired to the monastery of St. James at Paris, where he died.—Moreri.

BANCK (Lawrence), a Swedish lawyer, was professor at Norkoping, his native place. He wrote several books against the papal usurpations, and died in 1662.—Bayle.

BANCROFT (Richard), archbishop of Canterbury, was born in Lancashire in 1544, and educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. He distinguished himself with so much learning and eloquence against the puritans, that in 1597 he was made bishop of London. He bore a principal part in the famous conference at Hampton-court, and on the death of archbishop Whitgift, in 1604, he was translated to Canterbury, where he exerted himself with great vigilance in behalf of the anglican church. He died in 1610.—Biog. Brit.

BANCROFT (John), nephew of the above, was born in Oxfordshire, and entered of Christ-church, Oxford, in 1592. In 1609 he was elected master of University college, where he continued above twenty years; and was at great pains and expence to recover the ancient lands belonging to that foundation. In 1622 he was made bishop of Oxford, for which see he built the palace of Cuddefsden. He died in 1640, and was buried in the church of Cuddefsden.—Wood's A. O. Biog. Brit.

BANDARRA (Gonzales), a Portuguese fanatic, who set up for a prophet in the 16th century, and narrowly escaped being burnt as an heretic by the inquisition in 1541. He died in 1556.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BANDELLO (Mathew), a dominican monk, who wrote novels in the manner of Boccace. He was born at Castlenovo, in the Milanese, about the end of the 15th century. On the invasion of that country by the Spaniards, Bandello went to France, where he obtained the bishopric of Agen in 1550, but he resigned it in 1555, and died in 1561. The best edition of his novels is that of London, 1740, 4 vols. 4to.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BANDINELLI (Bacio), was born at Florence in 1487. He distinguished himself by his skill in sculpture and painting; but he excelled in the former line, and his group of the Laocoon is greatly admired. He died in 1559.—D'Argenville's Vies des Sculpteurs.

BANDURI (Anselm), a learned benedictine, was born at Ragusa in Dalmatia. He studied in France, where he applied chiefly to antiquities, and published, 1. The Antiquities of Constantinople, 2 vols. folio;

2. Numismata Imperatorum Romanorum a Trajano Decio ad Paleologos Augustos, 1718. He died at Paris in 1749.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BANGIUS (Peter), a Swedish divine, was born at Helsingberg in 1638. He was professor of theology at Abo 32 years, and in 1682 was made bishop of Wyburg. He died in 1696, and left an ecclesiastical History of Sweden; a treatise on sacred Chronology, and other works.—Moreri.

BANGIUS (Thomas), professor of divinity, philosophy, and Hebrew, at Copenhagen. He died in 1661, aged 61. He wrote an exercitation on the origin of diversity of languages; a Hebrew lexicon, &c.—Bayle.

BANIER (Anthony), a French writer, was born in 1673. He studied at Paris, and then became tutor to the sons of M. de Metz. He wrote an historical Explanation of the Fables of Antiquity, 2 vols. 12mo., which was afterwards published under the title of Mythology, or the Fables explained by History. He died in 1741. He had a hand in Picart's Religious Ceremonies, and other esteemed works. An English translation of his Mythology was printed in 1741, in 4 vols. 8vo.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BANISTER (John), an English physician of the 16th century, was educated at Oxford, where he was graduated in physic. He settled in Nottingham, where he obtained great practice, chiefly in surgery. His works on chirurgical subjects were formerly in considerable esteem.—There was another physician named Richard Banister, who wrote a treatise of diseases of the eyes. He resided at Stamford, and was esteemed a great oculist. He died about 1624.—Biog. Brit.

BANKES (Sir John), an English judge, was born at Keswick in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Gray's-inn, and in due course was called to the bar. In 1630 he was made attorney-general to the prince of Wales, and in 1640 chief justice of the common pleas. He displayed his loyalty and courage at the beginning of the rebellion; and his lady defended Corff castle, the family seat, against the parliament forces, till it was relieved by the earl of Carnarvon. Sir John continued with the king at Oxford, and died there in 1644.—Biog. Br.

BANKS (John), an English writer, was born at Sunning in Berkshire, in 1709, and bred a weaver at Reading; after which he came to London, and turned bookseller; but not meeting with success, he had recourse to his pen, and published several works, one of which, a Critical Review of the Life of Oliver Cromwell, was well received. He died in 1751.—Gen. B. D.

BANKS (John), an English play writer of the 18th century, was bred a lawyer, but quitted the dry practice of the courts for the train of the tragic muse. He produced several pieces which were once very popular, particularly the earl of Essex. When he died is uncertain, but his remains were deposited in the church of St. James, Westminster.—Bigg. Dram.

BANNIER (John), a Swedish general, was born in 1601, and served under Gustavus Adolphus, on whose death he became commander-in-chief, and obtained several victories, and took many important places. Afterwards his good fortune failed, and the imperialists succeeded in driving him into Bohemia. He died on his retreat from the German dominions in 1641.—Moreri.

BANQUO, or BANCHIO, a Scotch general of royal extraction, obtained several splendid victories over the highlanders and the Danes, in the reign of Donald VII. He tarnished his glory by aiding Macbeth in the conspiracy against that monarch; but was afterwards put to death by the usurper.—Buchanan.

BAPTIST (John), surnamed MONNOYER, a Flemish painter, was born at Lille in 1635. He was at first an historical painter, but afterwards applied to flower-painting. King William employed him in decorating Kensington-palace, Montague-house, and other edifices. He died in 1699. His son Anthony shone in the same line with his father. There was another painter of the same name, who came from Antwerp to England, and distinguished himself in portraits. He died in 1691.—Pilkington.

BAPTISTIN (John Baptiste Struk), a musician, born at Florence, and who died about 1740. He first brought the violoncello into fashion in France. He was besides a good composer.—Burney.

BARACH, 4th judge of the Hebrews, after delivering them from bondage to Jabin, king of Canaan, and defeating Sifera. He ruled 33 years, and flourished about 1240 B. C.—SS.

BARADEUS, also called ZANZALUS JACOBUS, a monk of the 6th century. He revived the sect of the monophysites, who maintained that there is but one nature in Christ. His party made him bishop of Edeffa. He died in 588, and from him the sect took the name of Jacobites.—Mosheim.

BARANZANO (Redemptus), a barnabite monk, born in 1590, in Piedmont. He was professor of philosophy and mathematics at Auneci, and was the correspondent of lord Bacon, who had a great esteem for him. He died at Montargis, in 1622. His works are: Uranoscopia, seu Univerſa Doctrina de Cælo, 1617, fol.; Campus Philosophicus, 1620, 8vo.; De novis Opinionibus Physicis, 8vo. 1617.—Bayle.

BARATHIER (Barthelemy), an Italian lawyer of the 15th century. He was born at Placentia, and became a professor at Pavia and Ferrara. He published a New Digest of the Feudal Law at Paris, in 1611.—Moreri.

BARATHIER (John Philip), an extraordinary youth, born at Schwobach, near Nuremberg, in 1721. At five years old he understood Greek, Latin, German, and French. He next studied Hebrew; and at nine years of age was able to translate any part of the scripture into Latin. In 1751, he was entered in the university of Altdorf, and the same year wrote a letter to M. le Maitre, on a new edition of the Bible, Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Rabbinical, which is inserted in the Bibliothèque Germanique. The year following he published the Travels of Benjamin of Tudela, translated from the Hebrew into French. In 1784 the margrave of Anspach gave him a pension of 50 florins a year, and the use of his library. The year following he submitted a plan, for finding the longitude, to the royal society, which, however, proved to be an old exploded scheme. He was the same year admitted a member of the academy at Berlin, and created M. A. by the university of Halle. He died of a decline in 1740, aged little more than 19. Besides the above works, he wrote critical dissertations upon points of ecclesiastical history, in the Bibliothèque Germanique, and a treatise against the socinians, called Anti-Artemonius.—Life by Dr. Johnson.

BARBA (Alvarez Alonzo), curate of St. Bernard de Potosi in the 11th century. He wrote a curious book on metallurgy, printed at Madrid in 1620, 4to. and abridged, in French, 1 vol. 12mo. 1730.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARBADILLO (Alphonſus Jerom de Salas), a Spanish dramatic writer, born at Madrid, who died about 1630. He wrote several comedies, and the Adventures of Don Diego de Noche, 1624, 8vo.—Ibid.

BARBADINO, a learned Portuguese, who published at Paris, in 1746, a piece in his native language, On the present State of Literature in Portugal, which was severely attacked by a Portuguese jesuit, and defended by Don Joseph de Maymo.—Gen. Biog.

BARBARO (Francis), a learned Venetian, was born in 1598. He was governor of several places; but distinguished himself chiefly by his literary works, particularly translations of some of Plutarch's Lives. He wrote De Re Uxorâ; on the Choice of a Wife, and the Duties of Women, printed at Paris in 1515. He died in 1454. His letters were printed in 1743.—Bayle. M. r.

BARBARO (Ermolao) the elder, nephew of the preceding. He was learned in the Greek language, and translated some of Æſop's Fables into Latin, at the age of 12. He became successively bishop of Trevisa and Verona, where he died in 1470.—Tirabſchi.

BARBARO (Ermolao), grandson of Francis, born in 1454. He gave lectures on the Greek language gratuitously. The emperor Frederic, to whom he went ambassador, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and pope Innocent VIII. made him patriarch of Aquileia, for which the Venetians expelled him their republic. He then went to Rome, where he died in 1493. He translated the Rhetoric of Aristotle, and other works; and published critical elucidations of Pliny.—Tiraboschi.

BARBARO (Daniel), nephew of the last mentioned. He was born in 1518, and became joint patriarch of Aquileia. He died in 1570. He wrote a Treatise of Eloquence, Venice, 1557, 4to.; Practice of Perspective, 1568, folio; and a translation of Vitruvius, in 1584.—Ibid.

BARBAROSSA (Aruch), a famous pirate. Being called in to assist Selim Entemi, prince of Algiers, against the Spaniards, he murdered that monarch, and took possession of his throne. He next defeated the king of Tunis, and having taken that capital, caused himself to be proclaimed king; after which he marched to Tremecen, the inhabitants of which put to death their own monarch. The heir to the kingdom of Tremecen applied to the marquis of Gomares, governor of Oran, who besieged Barbarossa in the citadel, and reduced him to the greatest distress. He escaped from thence by a subterraneous passage, but was overtaken with a small number of Turks, the whole of whom died sword in hand, in 1518. Barbarossa was then in the 44th year of his age.—Univ. Hist.

BARBAROSSA (Heyradin), succeeded his brother in the kingdom of Algiers, and became commander of the naval forces of Selim II. emperor of the Turks. He made himself master of Tunis, but was driven from it by Charles V. in 1536. After this, he ravaged several parts of Italy, and reduced Yemen in Arabia Felix, to the Turkish government. He died in 1547, aged 80.—Ibid.

BARBAROUX (Charles), a native of Marfeilles, and member of the national assembly. He was a vehement enemy to Robespierre and Tallien, and repeatedly brought charges against them. He also proposed the trial of Louis XVI. and family. When the party of the Girondists were overthrown he was arrested, but made his escape. He was afterwards taken and guillotined at Bourdeaux, June 25, 1794.—Dict. des Hommes Marq. de la fin du 18me. Siecle.

BARBASAN (Stephen), a French writer, born in 1696, and who died in 1770. He is known as the editor of old French books, particularly of Tales and Fables of the 12th and 13th centuries, 1760, 3 vols. 12mo. He also wrote Instructions from a Father to a Son, 1760, 8vo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARBATELLI (Bernardino), an eminent Italian painter. He was the disciple of Ghirlandaio, at Florence. He afterwards went to Rome, where he studied with so much assiduity, as frequently to forget the refreshments of food and sleep. He excelled in painting history, fruit, animals, and flowers. He died in 1612, aged 70.—Pilkington.

BARBEAU DE LA BRUYERE (John Lewis), a French writer, was the son of a wood-monger at Paris, and born in 1710. He published an historic map of the world, which combines geography, chronology, and history in one view. He edited, and for the most part compiled, the Chronological Tables of the Abbé Lenglet; the Modern Geography of La Croix; and the two last volumes of the Bibliothéque de France. He also translated into French Strahlemberg's Description of Russia, &c. He died in 1781.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARBERINO (Francis), an Italian poet, born at Barberino, in Tuscany, in 1264. He wrote an excellent poem, entitled, The Precepts of Love, printed at Rome in 1610. He died at Florence in 1348.—Tiraboschi.

BARBERINO (Francis), a Roman cardinal, nephew of pope Urban VIII. and legate in France and Spain. He was the father of the poor, and patron of the learned. He died in 1679. His brother Anthony was also a cardinal, but on the election of Innocent X. who was the enemy of his family, he retired to France, where he was made archbishop of Rheims, and died in 1671.—Moreri.

BARBEU DUBOURG (James), a physician, was borne at Mayenne, in 1709. He published, 1. A Journal of Medicine, in 1761; 2. A System of Botany, 2 vol. 1767; 3. Aphorisms of Medicine, 1780, 12mo. He died in 1779.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARBEYRAC (Charles), an eminent physician, was born at Ceresse, in Provence, and studied at Montpellier, where he settled. Locke, who was intimate with him, compared him to Sydenham. He died in 1699, aged 70. He wrote only two works, Traité nouveau de Médecine, &c. 1654, 12mo.; and Questions Médicæ Duodecim, 4to. 1658.—Moreri.

BARBEYRAC (John), nephew of the above, was born in 1674, at Beziers. He was professor of law and history, first at Lausanne, and afterwards at Groningen. He translated into French Puffendorff's Law of Nature and Nations; his treatise on the Duties of Man, and Grotius's treatise of the Rights of War and Peace, with learned notes of his own. He also wrote a treatise on the Morality of the Fathers, 4to. 1728; another on Gaming, 2 vols. 8vo. 1709, &c. He died about 1747.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARBIER D'AUCCOUR (John), a counsellor in the parliament of Paris, born at Langres in 1641, and educated at Dijon. He was tutor to the son of the famous Colbert, and in 1683 became member of the French academy. On the death of his patron he returned to the bar, and died at Paris in 1634. He wrote Sentimens de Cleanthe sur les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugene, par le Père Bouhours, Jesuite, 12mo. 2 vols. 1671. He wrote besides several other pieces against the jesuits.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARBIER (Mary Anne), a French dramatic writer, who wrote several tragedies and operas, printed in 1 vol. 12mo. She died in 1745.—Moreri.

BARBIERI (John Francis), an eminent historical painter, born in 1590. He studied under Caracci, but followed the manner of Caravaggio. His taste of design was natural, but not always elegant. Among artists, he goes under the name of Guercino. He died in 1666, aged 76. His brother Paulo Antonio excelled in painting still life and animals. He died in 1640.—D'Argenville.

BARBOSA (Arias), a learned Portuguese, who was Greek professor at Salamanca 20 years. The king of Portugal appointed him preceptor to his sons, Alphonfus and Henry. He wrote some Latin poems, and a treatise on prosody. He died in 1540.—Moreri.

BARBOSA (Peter), born at Viana in Portugal. He was first professor of law at Coimbra, and afterwards chancellor of the kingdom. He died about 1596. His works on the Digests were published in 3 vols. fol. 1613.—Ibid.

BARBOSA (Emanuel), counsellor to the king of Portugal, died in 1638, aged 90. He published a treatise De Potestate Episcopi, and other works.—Ibid.

BARBOSA (Augustin), son of the above. Philip IV. of Spain gave him the bishopric of Ugento, in the territory of Otranto, in 1648, but he died a few months after. He wrote De Officio Episcopi, and other learned works.—Ibid.

BARBOUR (John), a Scotch divine, was born about 1520, and educated in the abbey of Aberbrothick. King David Bruce made him his chaplain, and sent him on several embassies. He wrote in verse the Life and Actions of King Robert Bruce, printed at Glasgow in 1671. He died in 1578.—Gen. Big. Dict.

BARBUD, a Persian musician in the service of Kosru Parviz. His name was adopted to express the master of music in all succeeding times. The Persians also give the name of Barbud to a sort of lyre.—D'Herbelot.

BARCHUSEN, or BARKHAUSEN (John Conrad), an eminent physician and chemist, was born at Herne, in Germany, in 1666. After visiting several countries, he settled at Utrecht, where he read lectures in chemistry till his death in 1717. He wrote Elementa Chemicæ; Historia Medicinæ, and other esteemed works.—Moreri.

BARCLAY (Alexander), a writer of the 16th century, was, according to some, a native of Scotland, but others as strenuously maintain that he was an Englishman, which last is most probable, since he received his education at Oriel college, Oxford. He afterwards travelled through most parts of Europe, and on his return became a monk at Ely; but on the dissolution of his monastery he obtained a living in Essex. He died at Croydon in 1532. Barclay was one of the first refiners of our language by his productions, which are chiefly translations from foreign writers. He rendered into English that curious book entitled Navis Stultifera, or Ship of Fools.—Biog. Brit.

BARCLAY (William), a learned Scotch writer, was born at Aberdeen, but educated in France, where he took his doctor's degree in law, and became professor in that faculty, first at Pontamousson and afterwards at Angers, where he died in 1605. He published some books on the rights of kings and popes.—Bayle. Moreri.

BARCLAY (John), son of the above, was born at Pantamousson in 1582, and received his education among the jesuits, who wanted to engage him among them, but in this they were frustrated by his father, which occasioned their resentment against him. On the death of his father he went to London, and after residing there ten years, returned to Paris, and the year following went to Rome, where he died in 1621. He wrote several ingenious and learned works: the chief of which are, Euphormio, a satire in Latin, and a romance, entitled Argenis. This last has been translated into several languages.—Ibid.

BARCLAY (Robert), a quaker, was born at Edinburgh in 1648, and sent by his father, colonel Barclay, to Paris, under the care of his uncle, who was principal of the Scots' college. He was drawn over to the Romish religion, on which his father sent for him home, and having himself embraced the opinions of the quakers, persuaded his son to do the same. In 1670 he published a defence of his new religion, at Aberdeen; and in 1675 he printed a catechetical discourse, or system of faith, according to the opinions of his sect. But his greatest work is, An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the people called, in scorn, Quakers, printed in Latin, at Amsterdam, in 1676, and translated into English, in 1678. He not only benefited his party by his writings, but travelled through various countries, particularly Germany and Holland, to obtain converts. He spent the latter part of his life on his paternal estate, and died in 1690.—Biog. Brit.

BARCOCHEBAS, or BARCOCHAB, "the son of a star," a famous impostor among the jews, who pretended to be the star predicted by Balaam. He gained a multitude of followers, who overran Judea, and put a number of Romans to the sword. He was at last defeated and slain by Julius Severus, who committed a dreadful massacre on the jewish nation, by way of revenge, A. D. 134.—Moreri.

BARDAS, a nobleman of Constantinople, was uncle and guardian to the emperor Michael III. He endeavoured to assume the supreme power, but after committing several arbitrary acts, was put to death by Basilus the Macedonian, in 866.—Un. Hist.

BARDAS, called Sclerus, general of the army under the emperor John Zimisces, after whose death he prevailed with his troops to invest him with the purple. Bardas Phocas vanquished him in Persia, on which he fled to the caliph of Bagdad, who made him prisoner in 979. After a year's confinement, he obtained his liberty, and joined Phocas, who assumed the imperial dignity. On his death, Bardas submitted to the emperor Basil, who took him into favour.—Ibid.

BARDESANES, a heretic in the 2d century, was a native of Edeffa, in Mesopotamia, and the disciple of Valentinus, part of whose opinions he adopted, with new errors of his own. He held the existence of Æons, and denied the resurrection. He is not to be confounded with an author of the same name, who lived in the 3d century, and wrote a curious book on the Gymnosophists.—Mosheim. Moreri.

BARDIN (Peter), a French writer. He was born at Rouen, and became a member of the French academy. He was drowned in the humane act of endeavouring to save another, in 1637. He wrote, 1. Le grand Chambellan de France, 1623, folio; 2. Pensées Morales sur l'Ecclesiaste, 1629, 8vo; 3. Le Lycée, ou de l'honête Homme, 2 vols. 8vo.—Moreri.

BARDNEY (Richard), an English monk of the benedictine order, was born at Bardney, in Lincolnshire. He wrote the Life of Robert Grossetest, or Grossthead, bishop of Lincoln, in Latin verse, and died in 1504.—Wood.

BAREBONE (Praise God), a rebel and fanatic, was a leatherfeller, and became one of the most active members of the parliament assembled by Cromwell in 1654, which took its denomination from his name. When Monk came to London to restore the king, this man appeared at the head of such a rabble as alarmed even that intrepid general. A petition was presented to the parliament by their leader, for the exclusion of the king and royal family. Monk, in consequence, wrote a letter of complaint to the parliament, for encouraging the furious zealot and his adherents. Mr. Granger says, that he had heard there were three brothers of this family, each of whom had a sentence to his name, viz. Praise God, Barebone; Christ came into the world to save Barebone; and, If Christ had not died thou hadst been damned, Barebone: some are said to have omitted the former part of the sentence, and to have called him only "Damned Barebone."—Granger's Biog. Hist.

BARNT (Dietrick), a Dutch painter of history and portrait, born at Amsterdam in 1534. He studied in the school of Titian, with whom he continued several years, and then returned to his own country, where he died in 1582.—De Piles.

BARETTI (Joseph), an ingenious writer, was the son of an architect at Turin. Of the early part of his life little seems to be known, only that he was a great traveller. In 1750 he came to England, and soon acquired a knowledge of the language, which he wrote with facility and correctness. About 1753 he became acquainted with Dr. Johnson, by whose means he was introduced into Mr. Thrale's family as teacher of the Italian language. In 1760 he returned to Italy, and began a periodical work entitled Frustra Literaria, which was published at Venice, but on account of the freedom of its sentiments, he found it expedient to quit that country, and once more visited England. In 1769 he was tried at the Old Bailey for killing a man, who assaulted him in the Haymarket, and was acquitted. Next year he published his Travels through France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, 4 vols. 8vo. On the establishment of the royal academy, he was appointed foreign secretary, and in lord North's administration he obtained a pension. He died in 1789, aged about 73. He was an ingenious, pleasant, and charitable man. He wrote, A Dissertation on the Italian Poetry; An Introduction to the Italian Language; The Italian Library, 8vo.; A Dictionary, English and Italian, 2 vols. 4to.; A Grammar of the Italian Language, 8vo.; An Account of the Manners and Customs of Italy, 2 vols. 8vo.; An Introduction to the most Useful European Languages, 8vo.; A Dictionary, English and Spanish, 4to.; Tolondron Speeches to John Bowle, about his edition of Don Quixote, 8vo. &c.—Europ. Mag.

BARGRAVE (Isaac), an English divine. He was educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, and became chaplain to James I. and dean of Canterbury, in 1625. At the commencement of the civil war, he was thrown into the Fleet by colonel Sandys, whom he had saved from the gallows. He lay there three weeks, and died soon after, in 1642, aged 56.—Todd's Lives of the Deans of Canterbury.

BARKHAM (John), an English antiquary, born at Exeter about 1572, and educated at Oxford. He was made dean of Bocking in Essex, where he died in 1642. He gave medals and coins to archbishop Laud, who added them to the collection which he had given to the university of Oxford. Dr. Barkham is said to have been the sole author of the Display of Heraldry, which goes under the name of Guillim.—Prince's Worthies of Devon. Biog. Br.

BARKSDALE (Clement), an English divine, was born at Winchcombe, in Gloucestershire, in 1609, and educated first at Abingdon-school, and next at Oxford, where he became master of the grammar-school at Hereford; but when that city was taken by the rebels, he went and kept a school at Hawling in Gloucestershire. At the restoration, he was presented to the living of Naunton, where he died in 1687. He published, 1. Monumenta Literaria: five obitus et Elogia Doctorum virorum, ex Historiis J. A. Thuani, 4to.; 2. Nympha Libethris, or the Coriworld Muse, 1651, 8vo.; 3. Life of Hugo Grotius, 1652, 12mo.; 4. Memoirs of worthy Persons, 1661, 12mo., besides several sermons and tracts.—Wood, A. O.

BARLAAM, a learned divine of the 14th century, was a native of Calabria, but on visiting Constantinople, to study the Greek language, the emperor Andronicus the younger gave him the abbey of St. Saviour, and employed him to negotiate a reunion between the two churches, and to solicit succours from the christian princes against the infidels. Barlaam, on his return, wrote against the Latins; but on being made bishop of Gieraci, in Italy, he changed his principles, and employed his pen against the Greeks. He died in 1348. His letters were printed at Ingolstadt in 1604.—Moreri.

BARLEUS (Gaspard), a modern Latin poet, was born at Antwerp in 1584. He became professor of logic at Leyden, of which place he was deprived for being an arminian. He then taught philosophy at Amsterdam, where he died in 1648. His orations and letters have been printed, but his Latin poems are most esteemed.—Bayle.

BARLEUS (Lambert), professor of Greek at Leyden. He translated, in conjunction with Rivius, the confession of the reformed churches into Greek, and published the Timon of Lucian, with notes, also Annotations on Hesiod's Theogony. He died in 1655.—Moreri.

BARLAND (Adrian), a learned Dutch critic, was professor of eloquence at Louvain, where he died in 1542. He published Notes on Terence, Virgil, Pliny the younger, and Menander; An Abridgment of Universal History; The Chronicle of the Dukes of Brabant; De Literatis urbis Romæ Principibus, &c.—Moreri.

BARLETTA (Gabriel), a whimsical character in the 15th century, was a native of Barletta in the kingdom of Naples. He was born about 1400, and was a dominican. His sermons exhibit such a mixture of religious and comic expressions, sublime and vulgar ideas, the serious and the ridiculous, and, what is more remarkable, the whole written in such a barbarous language, compounded of Greek, Latin, and Italian, as to have rendered them one of the most extraordinary productions in literature. Such, however, was his fame among his contemporaries, as to have occasioned this proverb: nescit predicare qui nescit Barlettare. Owing to this odd and scarce merit, his sermons rapidly went through more than 20 editions; the best is that of Venice, in 1577, 2 vols. 8vo.—Tiraboschi.

BARLOW (Thomas), an English bishop, was born in 1607, at Orton, in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, of which society he successively became fellow and provost. He was also chosen keeper of the Bodleian library and Margaret professor of divinity. In 1675 he was made bishop of Lincoln, and distinguished himself as a zealous writer against popery; but on the accession of James II. he paid his court to him, and vindicated the royal power to dispense with the penal laws. Yet at the revolution he took the oaths, and was forward in depriving the nonjuring clergy in his diocese. Besides his tracts against popery, he wrote Cases of Conscience, and some other books. He died at Buckden, in 1691, aged 85.—Biog. Br.

BARLOW (Francis), an English painter, was born in Lincolnshire, and studied under Shepherd, a portrait painter. He died in 1702. Barlow excelled in painting birds, beasts, and fish, which he imitated very exactly.—Pilkington.

BARLOWE (William), an English prelate, was prior of a monastery at the dissolution of the religious orders in the reign of Henry VIII., after which he was made bishop of St. Asaph, from whence he was translated to St. David's. In 1547 he was made bishop of Bath and Wells, but was deprived by queen Mary for being married, on which he went to Germany. At the accession of Elizabeth to the throne, he returned, and was made bishop of Chichester. He died in 1658. He wrote several books.—Wood, B. Br.

BARLOWE (William), son of the above, was born in Pembrokehire, and educated at Baliol college, Oxford; after which, he travelled abroad, and became well skilled in navigation. On entering into orders, he was made prebendary of Winchester, and at last archdeacon of Sarum. He was the first writer on the properties of the loadstone. He likewise discovered the difference between iron and steel, and their tempers for magnetical uses. To him also are we indebted for the proper way of pointing magnetic needles, and of piecing and cementing loadstones. He died in 1625.—Ibid.

BARNABAS (St.), of the tribe of Levi, born in the isle of Cyprus. On embracing the gospel, he sold his estate, and gave the produce to the apostles. He was sent to Antioch to confirm the new disciples; and was the companion of St. Paul. He was stoned to death by the Jews in Cyprus. There is an epistle extant under his name, which was printed at Amsterdam, with notes, in 1724, by Le Clerc.—Cow's Lives of the Apostles.

BARNARD (Theodore), a Dutch painter, was born at Amsterdam, and afterwards settled in England, where it is said he painted the figures of the kings and bishops for Chichester cathedral.—Houbraken, BARNARD, or BERNARD (John), an English divine, was born in Lincolnshire, and educated partly at Cambridge and partly at Oxford, where he became fellow of Lincoln college. At the restoration he was made prebendary of Lincoln, and, in 1669, took his degree of D.D. He died in 1683. He wrote a Life of Dr. Heylyn, and some other pieces.—Biog. Brit.

BARNARD (Sir John), an eminent magistrate of London, was born at Reading in Berkshire, in 1685, of parents who were quakers. His father was a wine merchant, to whose business he succeeded. In the 19th year of his age he quitted the quakers, and became a member of the established church. He was first brought into notice by being appointed by the body of wine-merchants to state before the house of lords their objections to a bill then pending in that house, affecting their trade. In consequence of the abilities he displayed on this occasion he was nominated in 1721 candidate for the city of London, and the year following was elected. He continued to represent the city in parliament near forty years, and he discharged that trust with such fidelity as to gain the veneration of his fellow-citizens, who erected his statue in the exchange. In 1732 he received the honour of knighthood from George II. whom he attended with an address. In 1737 he served the office of lord mayor, in which situation he considerably reformed the police. He died at Clapham in 1764, leaving one son and two daughters. Sir John Barnard was a worthy magistrate, an upright senator, a good speaker, and a religious man.—Ibid.

BARNAVE (Anthony), one of the actors and victims of the French revolution. He was a member of the national assembly, where he distinguished himself by his vehemence. When the king was stopped at Varennes he was nominated to conduct his majesty and family to Paris, in which mission he behaved with great respect to his illustrious captives. He was guillotined at Paris as a royalist in 1794, aged 32.—Dict. des Hommes Marquans de la fin du 18me. Siecle.

BARNES (Juliana), born at Roding in Essex, at the beginning of the 15th century. Her singular accomplishments procured her the place of prioress of Sopewell nunnery, a place belonging to St. Alban's. She was living in 1486. She wrote on heraldry, hunting, and hawking, which treatises were printed at the monastery of St. Alban's.—Biog. Brit.

BARNES (Robert), an English divine and D.D. He was chaplain to Henry VIII. who sent him to Germany to confer with the divines of that country on the legality of his divorce. Here he became a Lutheran, and on his return propagated his new opinions with such zeal that he was taken up, and in 1540 burnt in Smithfield. He wrote a treatise on Justification, and some other books.—Fox's Martyrology.

BARNES (Joshua), a learned divine. He was born in London in 1654, and educated at Christ's hospital, from whence he removed to Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow in 1675. The year following he published a poem on the History of Esther, and in 1688 the Life of Edward III. In 1694 he printed his edition of Euripides. In 1700 he married a widow lady of fortune. In 1705 he published his Anacreon, and the next year his Homer. Dr. Bentley used to say that he understood as much Greek as a Greek cobbler; yet his edition of Anacreon is deservedly in high esteem. He died in 1712.—Biog. Brit.

BARNEVELDT (John d'Olden), a celebrated Dutch statesman, who rose by his merit to the first dignities in the government. He was sent ambassador to queen Elizabeth of England, and Henry IV. of France. On his return to Holland he endeavoured to limit the authority of Maurice prince of Orange, which, added to his being the patron of the arminians, made him obnoxious to the prince, who got him tried on the absurd charge of plotting to deliver up his country to the Spanish monarch. Of this he was found guilty, and beheaded in 1619. His sons, William and René, formed a conspiracy against Maurice to revenge their father's death, which was discovered. William escaped, but René was taken prisoner and executed.—Brandt's Hist. Reform. in the Low Countries.

BARO (Peter), a French protestant divine, who came to England on account of his religion, and in 1574 was chosen lady Margaret's professor of divinity at Cambridge, where he brought himself into trouble by opposing the calvinistical notion of predestination. He died in London at the beginning of the 17th century, and was buried in the church of St. Olave, Hart-street. He published some polemical books in Latin.—Biog. Br.

BAROCHE (Frederic), an Italian painter, was a native of Urbino, and died there in 1612, aged 84. He chiefly excelled on religious subjects, and his pictures are held in high esteem.—De Piles.

BARON (Bonaventure), a Franciscan monk, whose true name was Fitzgerald, was born at Clonmell in Ireland. He died at Rome in 1696. He wrote a body of divinity in 6 vols. and three books of Latin poetry.—Biog. Br.

BARON (Michael), a famous French actor, was the son of a merchant at Moudun. Although his merit in his profession was very great, yet his vanity was insufferable; this will appear from a saying of his; "that once in a century we might see a Cæsar, but that 2000 years were not sufficient to produce a Baron." He was about to refuse the pension granted him by Louis XIV. because the order for it was worded thus, "Pay to the within-named Michael Boyrun, called Baron," &c. He died at Paris in 1729, aged 77. Three volumes of his comedies were printed after his death.—Moreri.

BARON (Hyacinth Theodore), professor of medicine at Paris, who had a considerable hand in the Pharmacopœia, printed there in 1732, 4to. He also wrote a Discours on Chocolate. He died in 1758, aged 72.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARONI (Leonora), a famous singer, was born at Naples, but resided the greater part of her life at Rome. She was the daughter of the fair Adriana of Mantua, on whose beauty and accomplishments numerous panegyrics were printed. Leonora possessed eminent talents, and a volume of poems in different languages was printed in 1639 in her praise. She also wrote several poetical fables of merit.—Bayle.

BARONIUS (Cæsar), a learned Roman cardinal, was born in 1538 at Sora, in the kingdom of Naples. In 1560 he entered into the congregation of the Oratory, and was for some time employed in the instruction of youth. In 1583 he was elected superior-general of his order. Clement VIII. made him his confessor, and in 1596 raised him to the cardinalship. He afterwards became librarian of the Vatican, and on the death of that pontiff would have been elected pope if the Spanish party had not prevailed. He died in 1607. His Ecclesiastical Annals, in 12 vols. folio, have been often printed.—Moreri.

BAROZZI (James), a famous architect, better known by the name of Vignola from the place of his birth in the duchy of Modena, was born in 1507. He first studied painting, which he quitted for architecture, and became a member of the academy of design at Rome. In 1537 he visited France, where he resided two years. He built several palaces in and near Bologna, and constructed the famous canal which goes from thence to Ferrara. He was also employed to build some churches at Rome, and succeeded Michael Angelo as architect of St. Peter's. He died in 1577. He wrote a celebrated book, entitled Rules for the five Orders of Architecture, which has gone through sixteen editions; also a Treatise on practical Perspective.—D'Argenville's Les des Archit.

BARRAL (Peter), a French abbé, born at Grenoble, and who died in Paris in 1772; he compiled an historical Dictionary, 6 vols. 8vo. 1759, and a Dictionary of Roman Antiquities, 2 vols. 8vo.

BARRE (Lewis Francis Joseph de la), an ingenious writer, was born at Tournay in 1638. He was educated in the college of St. Barbe, at Paris, where he assisted Anselm Banduri in his great work, the Imperium Orientale, and the collection of medals of Roman emperors from the emperor Decius, for which he had a pension given him by the grand duke of Tuscany. He also published Memoirs for the History of France and Burgundy, and several other esteemed works. He died in 1738.—Moreri.

BARRE (Joseph), a learned and industrious French writer, was born in 1692. He was canon of St. Genevieve, and chancellor of the university of Paris. His principal works are, Vindiciæ librorum deutero-canoniconum veteris testamenti; a general History of Germany, 11 vols. 4to.; Life of Marthal de Fabert, 2 vols. 12mo.; History of the Laws and the Tribunals of Justice, 4to. He died in 1764.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARRELIER (James), an eminent botanist of the order of preaching friars, who died in 1673, aged 67. A posthumous work of his, entitled Plantæ per Galliam, Hispaniam, et Italian observatæ, et Iconibus Æneis exhibitæ, was printed at Paris, 1714, folio.—Moreri.

BARRETE (Peter), a physician of Perpignan, who died in 1755. He wrote Relation et Essai sur l'Histoire de la France Equinoxiale, 1748, 12mo. Dissertation sur la Couleur des Negres, 1741, 4to. Observations sur l'Origine des Pierres figurées, 1746, 4to.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARRETT (George), an eminent landscape painter, was born in Dublin about 1732. He was self-taught, and obtained when young the premium of 50l. offered by the Dublin society for the best landscape in oil. In 1762 he came to London, and the year after his arrival he gained the premium of 50l. given by the society for the encouragement of arts, &c. for the best landscape. He was one of the first who planned the royal academy, of which he became a member. His best pieces are in the possession of the dukes of Portland and Buccleugh, and of Mr. Locke. He died in 1784.—Pilkington.

BARRETT (William), an English topographical author. He was born in Somersetshire, and settled in Bristol as a surgeon, in which line he was very eminent. He employed above twenty years in collecting materials for a history of that city, which he published in 1788, in 1 vol. 4to. He was the early patron of the eccentric Chatterton. Mr. Barrett died in 1789.—Gent. Mag.

BARRINGTON (John Shute lord viscount), a learned English nobleman, was the son of Mr. Shute, a merchant, and born at Theobald's, in Hertfordshire, in 1678. He was educated at Utrecht, and on his return to England entered of the Inner Temple. In 1701 he published a tract on the toleration of protestant dissenters, which was followed by another, entitled The Rights of Protestant Dissenters, in two parts. In 1708 he was made a commissioner of the customs, but was dismissed in 1711. In the reign of queen Anne he was adopted by Mr. Wildman, a gentleman of large fortune in Berkshire, who left him his estate, as did Mr. Barrington, who had married his first cou-fin; in compliment to whom he took his arms and name. In 1720 he was created an Irish peer, being then member for Berwick upon Tweed. In 1723 he published his Miscellanea Sacra, in 2 vols. 8vo. which was reprinted in 1770, in 3 vols. He also wrote An Essay on the several Dispensations of God to Mankind, and other works. He died in 1734. His lordship married the daughter of sir William Daines, by whom he left six sons and three daughters.—Biog. Br.

BARRINGTON (Daines), fourth son of lord Barrington, was brought up to the law, and in 1737 was made a Welsh judge, after which he was appointed second justice of Chester. He resigned these offices long before his death, and lived in a retired way in the Temple, amusing himself chiefly in antiquarian pursuits. He wrote Observations on the Statutes, 4to.; Tracts on the Probability of reaching the North Pole, 4to.; and a number of curious papers in the transactions of the royal and antiquarian societies, of both which he was a member, and of the latter vice-president. He died March 14, 1800, and was buried in the Temple church.—Gent. Mag. Europ. Mag. 1800.

BARRINGTON (Samuel), fifth son of lord Barrington, was born in 1729, and entering into the navy, was made post captain in 1747. In 1778 he was created rear-admiral of the white, and sent to the West Indies, where his valour and prudence gained him the highest reputation; he distinguished himself particularly in the taking of St. Lucia. In 1782 he served under lord Howe, and bore a part in the memorable relief of Gibraltar. He died August 16, 1800.—Ibid.

BARROS, or DE BARROS (John), a learned Portuguese, born at Viseo in 1496. He became preceptor to the sons of king Emanuel, and when his pupil Don Juan came to the throne he made him governor of a settlement on the coast of Guinea, and afterwards treasurer of the Indies. He died in 1570. He wrote a History of Asia and the Indies, in four decades; the last edition was that of Lisbon, in 1736, 3 vols. folio.—Merr.

BARROW (Isaac), an English prelate, was born at Spiney abbey, in Cambridgeshire, and educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, but was ejected by the presbyterians about 1643. He then went to Oxford, and was appointed one of the chaplains of New College. He suffered considerably in the rebellion, and at the restoration was consecrated bishop of Sodor and Man, from whence he was afterwards translated to St. Asaph. He was a great benefactor to both bishoprics, but particularly the former. He died in 1690, and was buried in the cathedral of St. Asaph.—Wood's A. G. Biog. Brit.

BARROW (Wile), a learned English divine and mathematician, was born in London in 1630. He was first placed in the Charter-house, and afterwards removed to Felsted school, in Essex, from whence he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he was chosen scholar in 1647, and subscribed the engagement; but repenting of what he had done, he went back and struck out his name from the list. In 1649 he was chosen fellow of his college, and studied physic, with a view of making it his profession; but by the advice of his uncle, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph, he forsook it, and devoted himself to theology. In 1655 he went on his travels, and at Constantinople read over all the works of St. Chrysostom. On his return he was episcopally ordained, and in 1660 was chosen Greek professor at Cambridge. In 1662 he was appointed Gresham professor of geometry; and the year following was elected fellow of the royal society. In 1664 he gave up the Gresham professorship, on being appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge, which chair he resigned in 1669 to his pupil Mr. Isaac Newton. In 1670 he was created D.D. and two years afterwards appointed master of Trinity college; on which occasion the king said, "that he had given it to the most learned man in England." In 1675 he served the office of vice-chancellor. He died in 1677, and was interred in Westminster-abbey. His works are numerous. Those in English were published by doctor Tillotson, in 3 vols. folio, 1682. King Charles II. used to say that he was an unfair preacher, because he exhausted every subject on which he discoursed. His sermons are inestimable. His mathematical works are, Euclid's Elements; Euclid's Data; Lectures Geometricæ; Archimedis Opera; Apollonii Conicorum, lib. iv.; Theodosii Sphericorum, lib. iii.; Nova Methodo illustrata, et succincte Demonstrata. After his death appeared Lectio in qua Theoremata Archimedis de Sphæra et Cylindro, &c. Mathematicæ Lectiones habitæ in Scholis publicis Academiæ Cantab. Dr. Barrow was a man of courage and pleasantry, as appears by the following anecdotes. In his voyage between Leghorn and Smyrna the ship was attacked by a corsair, which, after a stout resistance, was obliged to sheer off, Barrow standing to his gun to the last.—Being on a visit at a gentleman's house in the country, where the necessary was at the end of a garden, as he was going to it before day, a fierce mastiff which used to be chained up all day and let loose at night, set on him with great fury. The doctor caught him by the throat, and throwing him down, lay upon him; once he had a mind to kill him, but he altered his resolution, on recollecting that this would be unjust, as the dog only did his duty. At length he was heard by some of the family, who came out and freed both from their disagreeable situation.—As a proof of his wit we are told the following story: Meeting lord Rochester at court, his lordship, by way of banter, thus accosted him: "Doctor, I am yours to my shoe-tie." Barrow, seeing his aim, returned his salute obsequiously, with "My lord, I am yours to the ground." Rochester, improving his blow, quickly returned it, with "Doctor, I am yours to the centre;" which was as smartly followed by Barrow, with "My lord, I am yours to the antipodes." Upon which Rochester, scorning to be foiled by a musty old piece of divinity, as he used to call him, exclaimed, "Doctor, I am yours to the lowest pit of hell." On which Barrow, turning on his heel, answered, "There, my lord, I leave you."—Biog. Brit. Hutton's Math. Dict.

BARRY (Girald), commonly called Giraldus Cambrensis, a writer of the 12th century, was born in Pembrokeshire of a noble family. He received a liberal education, and obtained several ecclesiastical preferments. He had the care of the church of St. David's for some time, and was chosen bishop of that diocese by the chapter, but his election was declared void by the pope. In 1215 he was offered the same bishopric, but refused it. When he died is unknown. He wrote the History of the Conquest of Ireland, and Topographia Hibernica, both edited by Camden in 1602. His Itinerarium Cambrie was published by David Powel. He also wrote a curious book against the monks, entitled Ecclesie Speculum.—Biog. Br.

BARRY (Spranger), a celebrated actor. He was born at Dublin in 1719, and bred a silversmith, which profession he abandoned for the theatre, and made his first attempt in the character of Othello in 1744. In 1747 he came to England, and was engaged at Drury-lane, which he soon quitted for Covent-garden, and proved a formidable rival to Garrick, who was the leader of the other house. In 1758 he went to Ireland, and was concerned in two new play-houses, one at Dublin and the other at Cork; but these failing, he returned to England, where he and his wife were engaged by Mr. Foote, at the Haymarket; but in 1766 he accepted the proposals of Garrick, and removed to Drury-lane. About 1773 Barry left Drury-lane for Covent-garden; but he did not live long after, being worn out by an hereditary gout. He excelled in tragedy.—Biog. Dram.

BARRY (James), lord of Santry, and chief justice of the king's bench in Ireland, was born in Dublin, which city his father represented in parliament. He studied the law, and in 1629 was made king's serjeant, and in 1634 one of the barons of the exchequer, with the honour of knighthood. He was a great friend to the earl of Strafford, and at the restoration was advanced to the office of chief justice and the peerage. He died in 1673, and was buried in Christ church, Dublin. He wrote The Case of Tenures upon the Commission of defective Titles, Dublin, 1637, folio, and in 1725. 12mo.—Biog. Br.

BARSUMA, or BARSOMA, metropolitan of Nisibis, who revived the notions of Nestorius in the time of the emperor Justin. There are several discourses and letters of his extant in the Syriac language.—Meibom.

BARTAS (Guillaume de Sallust du), a French poet, born in 1544. He was sent by Henry IV. on several embassies. Bartas was of the protestant communion, and died in 1590. He wrote a poem, entitled The Week of the Creation, in 7 books, translated into English by Sylvester.—Moreri.

BARTH (John), a French naval commander. He was born at Dunkirk, where his father was a poor fisherman. Barth distinguished himself by his daring exploits. In 1692 he had the command of a squadron of frigates and a fire-ship, with which he destroyed 86 sail of English merchant ships, landed near Newcastle, where he burnt 200 houses, and returned to Dunkirk with prizes valued at 500,000 crowns. In 1694 he was sent with a squadron of six ships to convoy a fleet laden with corn. This fleet had been captured, when Barth fell in with it, by a Dutch squadron of eight men of war, but though he was so much inferior, he retook the prizes and their captors. For this he obtained a patent of nobility. He died at Dunkirk in 1702, aged 51.—Ibid.

BARTHE (Nicholas Thomas), an ingenious French writer, was born at Marseilles in 1733. He wrote several dramatic pieces, and translated Ovid's Art of Love into French verse. He died at Paris in 1785.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BARTHELEMI (Nicholas), a benedictine monk of the 15th century, who wrote some Latin poems on religious subjects, and a book in prose on the Active and Contemplative Life, 1523.—Ibid.

BARTHELEMY (Jean Jacques), a learned French writer. He was born at Calais, in Provence, in 1716. He received his education first in the college of the oratory at Marseilles, from whence he removed to that of the jesuits, where he acquired a vast store of learning, particularly in the Greek and oriental languages. In 1744 he visited Paris, where he was nominated associate in the care of the cabinet of medals, and afterwards became secretary to the academy of inscriptions. On the death of M. de Boze, in 1753, Barthelemy was nominated keeper of the cabinet of medals. In 1755 he visited Naples, then rendered peculiarly interesting to an antiquary by the discovery of the treasures of Herculaneum. He wished much to have a specimen of the ancient writing in the Greek manuscripts; but he was told by those who had the care of the curiosities that they could not grant his request. On this he only asked to see a manuscript page for a few minutes. It contained twenty-eight lines, which Barthemy read over attentively, and going aside, transcribed the whole, and sent the facsimile to the academy of belles-lettres. In 1758 the duke de Choiseul, minister for foreign affairs, gave him a pension of 250*l.* a year; to which, in 1765, he added the treasurership of St. Martin de Tours, and in 1768 the place of secretary-general to the Swiss guards. In 1788 he published his great work, entitled, The Voyage of the younger Anacharsis in Greece, upon which he had been employed thirty years. In 1789 he was chosen a member of the French academy. In August, 1793, this respectable man was arrested on the charge of being an aristocrat, and hurried to prison, from whence, however, he was released the same night by order of the government. He died April 30th, 1795. The abbé was a member of the most distinguished societies abroad, as well as of those in his own country. He united with his profound learning an equal portion of modesty, simplicity, and good nature. Besides his Anacharsis he wrote a great number of papers, chiefly on medallic subjects, in the collection of the academy of inscriptions, and in the Journal des Savans.—Life by the Duke d'Nivernois.

BARTHUIS (Gaspard), a learned writer. He was born at Custrin, in Brandenburg, in 1587. At the age of 12 he translated David's Psalms into Latin verse. After finishing his studies in his own country he went through a principal part of Europe. On his return he settled at Leipzig, where he devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits, and published a prodigious number of books, the chief of which are his Adversaria, in folio; and his Commentaries on Statius and Claudian, 4to. He died in 1658.—Bayle. Moreri.

BARTHOLINE (Gaspard), a Danish physician and divine, was born at Malmoe, in Schonen, 1585. He studied at different universities, and took his degree of M.D. at Basil in 1610. After filling the medical chair at Copenhagen eleven years, he applied to the study of divinity. He was afterwards appointed professor of theology, and had the canonry of Roschild. He died in 1629. He wrote Institutiones Anatomicæ, and various other works.—Moreri.

BARTHOLINE (Thomas), son of the preceding. He was born at Copenhagen in 1616, and studied physic at Leyden, but took his doctor's degree at Basil in 1645. The year following he was appointed professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and in 1648 he obtained the anatomical chair. In 1661 he retired into the country in consequence of his infirmities, and died in 1680. His anatomical and medical works are universally known. His son Gaspard succeeded him in the anatomical professorship, and his other sons were all men of learning and eminence. Thomas was counsellor to the king, and professor in antiquities; Christopher was professor of mathematics; and John was professor in theology. His daughter Margaret distinguished herself by several ingenious poems in the Danish language.—Moreri.

BARTHOLOMEW (St.), one of the twelve apostles. He preached the gospel in the Indies, in Ethiopia, and Lycaonia, and is said to have been flayed alive in Armenia, but the assertion is not well founded.—Cave.

BARTHOLOMEW (of the martyrs), archbishop of Braga, was born at Lisbon in 1514. He assisted at the council of Trent, where he strenuously urged the necessity of a reform among the clergy. He was the father of his flock, and in a time when the pestilence raged amongst them he remained on his post doing good. He resigned the archbishopric, and retired to a monastery, where he died in 1590. His works are in 2 vols. folio.—Moreri.

BARTLEIT (John), an English nonconformist divine. He was for many years minister of St. Thomas, near Exeter; from whence he was ejected in 1662, on which he removed to that city, where he officiated to a small congregation of dissenters, and died very old. He wrote a volume of pious meditations. His brother William, a violent independent, was ejected from the rectory of Bideford, in that county. He wrote a Model of Church Government, 4to. He died in 1682.—Calamy.

BARTOLI (Daniel), a learned jesuit, born at Ferrara in 1608. He published a great number of works, the chief of which is the history of his society, in 6 vols. folio. He died at Rome in 1685.—Nov. Dict. Hist.

BARTOLI (Cosimo), an Italian writer of the 16th century, was born at Florence. He was sent by the great duke Cosmo as his resident to Venice, where he lived five years. He wrote the life of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa in Italian, and other works.—Gen. Biog.

BARTOLO, an eminent lawyer of the 14th century, was born in the marche of Ancona. He took his doctor's degree with great reputation at Bologna, and was appointed professor of laws at Pisa, from whence he removed to Perugia. The emperor Charles IV. conferred on him the title of counsellor, and other marks of distinction. He died in 1359, at the age of 46. His works make 10 vols. folio.—Moreri.

BARTOLOCCI (Julius), a cistercian monk. He was born at Celano in 1613, and died at Rome in 1687. He published a Bibliotheca Rabbinnica, in 4 vols. folio, which was continued by a disciple of his in another volume.—Moreri.

BARTON (Elizabeth), commonly called "the Holy Maid of Kent," a religious impostor in the reign of Henry VII. She was a servant at Alington, and under the management of the priests was enabled to distort her limbs and face in a surprising manner. She pretended to be honoured with divine illuminations, and delivered the messages with which she was favoured to the crowds who followed her, exhorting them to a strict obedience of the Roman church, and to avoid all innovations. She was executed, with her associates, in 1534, at Tyburn, where she confessed the imposture, and threw all the blame upon her employers.—Biog. Br. Burnet's Hist. Reform.

BARUCH, the prophet, was of a noble family, and attached himself to Jeremiah, whom he followed into Egypt. The book which bears his name is not received as canonical either by the Jews or protestants.—Jeremiah, xxxiii. &c. Baruch. Usher.

BARWICK (John), an English divine, was born at Witherlack, in Westmoreland, in 1612, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He exerted himself with singular dexterity in behalf of the royal cause during the civil war, for which he was committed to the Tower, where he remained a long time. At the restoration, in producing which he had a considerable concern, he obtained the deanry of Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for that of St. Paul's. He died in 1664.—Life by Dr. Peter Barwick, 8vo.

BARWICK (Peter), an eminent physician. He was brother to the dean, whose life he wrote in elegant Latin. He also defended the right of king Charles to the Eikon Basilike, and doctor Harvey's doctrine of the circulation of the blood. He died in 1705.—Biog. Brit.

BAS (le), a French engraver, whose landscapes and sea pieces are held in great esteem. He died about 1765.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BASEDOW (John Bernard), a modern author, was the son of a barber at Hamburg, where he was born in 1723. He studied under Reimarus, and afterwards at Leipzig. In 1753 he was chosen professor of moral philosophy and the belles lettres at Soroe, in Denmark, from whence he was afterwards removed for expressing opinions in religion very different from lutheranism. He next formed a plan of reformed education, for the perfecting of which he collected large sums of money; but the plan, after being partially tried, came to nothing. He died in consequence of intemperate living, in 1790. His works are ingenious, but full of dogmatical assertions and fanciful notions.—Schlichtegroll's Necrology.

BASHUYSEN (Henry James Van), a learned divine, was born at Hanau in 1679. He became professor of the oriental languages and ecclesiastical history at Hanau; afterwards professor of divinity, and member of the royal society at Berlin. He had a printing-press in his house, from which he sent out several curious works, chiefly on rabbinical learning. He died in 1758.—Gen. Biog.

BASIL (St.), was born in 326, and ordained by Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, whom he succeeded in 370. He was persecuted by Valens, because he would not embrace arianism. He died in 379. His works are in 9 vol. folio.—Dupin.

BASIL, bishop of Ancyra, was placed in that see by Eusebius and the arian party, on the deposition of Marcellus in 336; but he was excommunicated and deprived by the council of Constantinople.—Mosheim.

BASIL, a physician and heretic. He asserted that God had another son besides Jesus Christ, called Sathanael, who having revolted against his father, was cast down from heaven to earth, with the angels whom he had drawn over to him, and that Jesus Christ was afterwards sent to destroy his power, who shut him up in hell, and altered his name by cutting off the last syllable. He permitted his followers to have every thing, even their wives, in common. The emperor Alexius Comnenus caused him to be burnt alive in 1118.—Moreri.

BASILIDES, the founder of a sect at Alexandria in the second century. He enjoined his disciples to observe a five years' silence.—Mosheim.

BASILISCUS, emperor of the east, was brother to Verina, wife of Leo the elder, by whose means he was appointed to the command of a fleet sent against Genferic. By his mismanagement the greatest part of the fleet and army perished, and he fell into disgrace. At the instigation of his sister he conspired against the emperor Zeno, and having succeeded, placed himself on the throne in 475; but his conduct proving offensive, Zeno entered Constantinople without any opposition from the people, and Basiliscus was obliged to fly to the great church for protection, where he resigned the crown. He died in confinement in 477.—Univ. Hist.

BASILIVS I. called the Macedonian emperor of the east. He was born at Adrianople of poor parents, and became a common soldier. His conduct recommended him to the emperor Michael, who made him his equerry and chamberlain. In 867 he murdered that prince, and took possession of the throne. He defeated the Saracens at Cæsarea, and was killed by a stag in hunting in 886.—Univ. Hist.

BASILIVS II. succeeded John Zimisces in 976. He was the son of Romanus the younger, and was associated in the government with his brother Constantine. He suppressed two insurrections; afterwards he turned his arms against the Bulgarians, over whom he obtained a great victory in 1014. He treated his prisoners with horrid barbarity, dividing them into hundreds, and then putting out the eyes of 99, gave them the hundredth for a leader. In this condition they were sent to their king, who took two days to view them. He died in 1025, aged 70.—Univ. Hist.

BASILIVS, an impostor, was born in Macedonia, and excited a revolt in the eastern empire in 934, by pretending to be Constantine.

line Ducas, who had been dead for some years. The emperor Romanus caused his right hand to be cut off; on which Basilius is said to have contrived an artificial hand, the use of which he acquired to great perfection. He then collected his partizans, and obtained several advantages over the imperial troops, but was at last taken prisoner, and burnt alive at Constantinople.—Moreri.

BASILOWITZ (John), emperor of Russia, which country he recovered from the dominion of the Tartars, and thus laid the foundation of the Russian empire. He was the first who assumed the title of czar, and added Astracan to his territories. He died in 1584, and was succeeded by Feodor.—Univ. Hist.

BASINGSTOKE, or BASINGE (John de), a learned man of the 13th century, was born at Basingstoke, in Hampshire, and educated at Oxford, from whence he went to Paris, where he remained many years. He travelled to Athens, where he obtained a great knowledge of the Greek language. On his return home he was made archdeacon of Leicester. He died in 1252. He wrote some sermons, and translated a few Greek books into Latin.—Biog. Brit.

BASIRE (Isaac), a learned divine, was born in the isle of Jersey, and educated at Cambridge, where he took his degree of D.D. In 1646 he went abroad, and travelled through Syria and Palestine. On his return he was made professor of divinity in Transylvania; but after the restoration he was recalled by the king, and recovered the preferments he had lost, of which the prebend of Durham was the principal. He died in 1676. He wrote some religious pieces, and an account of his travels, addressed to sir Richard Browne.—Ibid.

BASKERVILLE (sir Simon), an English physician. He was born at Exeter in 1573, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he studied physic. He afterwards became physician to James I. and Charles I. the latter of whom conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He died in 1641, and left an immense fortune behind him, which gained him the name of "Sir Simon Baskerville the rich."—Prince's Worthies of Devon. Biog. Brit.

BASKERVILLE (John), a celebrated printer. He was born at Wolverley, in Worcestershire, in 1706. In 1726 he kept a writing-school in Birmingham. In 1745 we find him engaged in the japanning business on an extensive scale, and possessed of considerable property. In 1750 he turned printer and letter-founder in which he was at first unsuccessful. At length the productions of his press grew into esteem. He printed in a superb, but not very correct, manner, Paradise Lost, several of the Latin classics, the New Testament in Greek, and other works. He died in 1775, aged 69. His types were purchased by a society at Paris in 1779, who made use of them in printing an edition of Voltaire's works.—Biog. Brit.

BASNAGE (Benjamin), a French protestant divine, was born in 1580. He succeeded his father as minister of the church of Carentan, and assisted at the national synod of Charenton. He was also deputy from the French national churches to James VI. of Scotland. A work by him, entitled A Treatise on the Church, has been much esteemed. He died in 1652.—Bayle.

BASNAGE (Anthony), eldest son of the above, was minister of Bayeux, and imprisoned on account of his religion at Havre de Grace. On being liberated he went to Holland, and died there in 1691, aged 81.—Ibid.

BASNAGE (Henry du Fraquenay), younger son of Benjamin, was bred a lawyer, and became an advocate in the parliament of Normandy. He published the Coutume de Normandie, and a Treatise on Mortgages. He died in 1695, aged 80.—Ibid.

BASNAGE (Samuel de Flottemanville), the son of Antony, was assistant to his father, and a man of considerable learning, as appears from his continuation of Casaubon's Criticisms on the Annals of Baronius, and his Annales Ecclesiastici, 3 vols. folio. He died in 1721.—Ibid.

BASNAGE (James), a French protestant divine. He was born at Rouen in 1653, and was educated first at Saumur, and then at Geneva, after which he became minister of the reformed church at Rouen, but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Rotterdam. In 1709 he was chosen one of the pastors of the Walloon church at the Hague; and he was also employed in state affairs, which he managed with great address. The French ministers at the Hague were directed to apply to him for his counsel, and in return for his services he obtained the restoration of all his property in France. He was held in great esteem by men of all parties. Mr. Basnage died in 1723. He wrote several valuable books, particularly the History of the Jews since the time of Jesus Christ, 1716, 15 vols. 12mo.—Moreri.

BASNAGE (Henry), sieur de Beauval. He was brother of the above, and admitted advocate in the parliament of Rouen in 1679. In 1687 he retired to Holland, where he succeeded Bayle in writing the History of the Works of the Learned. He published several other works.—Ibid.

BASNET (Edward), dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, was born in Denbighshire, in Wales, and about 1537 obtained the above preferment. He was a friend of the reformation, and in the rebellion of O'Neal in 1539 laid aside the sacerdotal habit, and served in a military capacity under the lord deputy. On account of his good services he was made a privy counsellor, and obtained a grant from the crown of the lands of Kilternan, near Dublin, and other fa-years. He died in the reign of Edward VI.—Biog. Brit.

BASSANO (James), an Italian painter, was born at Venice in 1510, and died in 1592. He excelled in landscape, and his pieces are held in high estimation. Three of his sons were eminent artists. Francis put an end to himself in 1594. Leander was knighted. John Baptist imitated the manner of his father. Jerome, another son, was bred a physician, but quitted that line, and became a painter also.—De Piles.

BASSANDYNE (Thomas), a printer of the 16th century. He learnt the art of printing at London, and then returned to Edinburgh, where he produced several books, which are now scarce. He died in 1591.—Gen. B. D.

His brother Sigismund was a distinguished divine of the Lutheran church, and professor of theology at Halle. He died in 1757.—Ibid.

BAUR (John William), a painter and engraver, of Strasburg. He died in 1640, aged 30. His pictures of buildings and landscapes are very excellent.—De Piles.

BAUR (Frederic William, von), a Russian general, was born in the county of Hessian Hannau. He entered early on a military life, and in 1755 was in the British service, as an officer in the Hessian artillery. In 1757 he obtained the rank of general and engineer. Frederic II. of Prussia ennobled him. In 1769 he entered into the service of Catherine II. empress of Russia, who named him director of the salt works in Novogorod. He was also employed in two great works, the supplying of Moscow with water; and in deepening the canal near Peterburgh, at the end of which he constructed a large harbour. He died in 1783. He published Memoires Historiques et Geographiques sur la Valachie, &c. 8vo.; Carte de la Moldavie, pour servir de la Guerre entre les Russes et les Turcs, in seven sheets.—Gen. Biog.

BAUSCH, the author of a book, called Eknas fil corat Sebaa, or on the seven different ways of reading the Koran. He died in the 546th year of the Hegira.—D'Herbelot.

BAUSSURI, the author of a poem, entitled Kaukab al Derriat, or the Brilliant Star, in praise of Mahomet.—Ibid.

BAUTRU, William, member of the French academy. He was born at Paris in 1588, and died there in 1661. He was a man of wit, and many of his bon mots are preserved. When in Spain, he went to see the library of the Escorial, the keeper of which was exceedingly ignorant. The king asking his opinion of the library, he answered that "it was a very fine one; but your majesty," adds he, "ought to make the librarian treasurer of your finances."—"Why so?" said the king. "Because," says Bautru, "he never meddles with what he is entrusted with."—Novv. Dig. Hist.

BAXTER (Richard), an English nonconformist divine. He was born in Shropshire in 1615, and was rather unlucky in his tutors, who were either men of little ability, or who paid little attention to their duty. He was, therefore, left principally to his own diligence. In 1638 he was ordained, and in 1640 he became minister at Kidderminster, which he quitted on the commencement of the troubles, being inclined to the parliament side. He then went to Coventry, where he officiated to the garriſon. Afterwards he was chaplain to the army, which he left in 1657, and returned to Kidderminster. In a conference with Cromwell he had the honesty to speak boldly in defence of monarchy. At the restoration he was appointed one of the king's chaplains, and was a leading man at the Savoy conference. He was offered the bishopric of Hereford, which he refused. In 1685 he was committed to the king's bench, for some passages in his paraphrase on the New Testament, and being declared guilty, was sentenced to be confined two years; but soon obtained his discharge. He died in 1691, and was interred in Christ church, his funeral being attended by a great number of persons, and many dignitaries of the established church. His works are numerous, and several of them have been useful, particularly his Saint's Everlasting Rest.—Biog. Br. Life by Calamy.

BAXTER (William), nephew of the above, was born in 1650, at Lanugany, in Shropshire. He published a grammar of the Latin tongue in 1679; an edition of Anacreon in 1695; an edition of Horace in 1710; and a dictionary of British antiquities in 1719. His glossary of Roman antiquities was not printed till 1726. He kept for several years a school at Tottenham High-croft, and was afterwards appointed master of the mercers' school in London. He died in 1723.—Biog. Br.

BAXTER (Andrew), an ingenious writer, was born in 1687, at Aberdeen, and educated in King's college there. He became tutor to some young gentlemen, with whom he travelled, and on his return settled at Whittingham, in East Lothian, where he died in 1750. Mr. Baxter is known by two good works; 1. An Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul, wherein its immateriality is evinced from the Principles of Reason and Philosophy, 3 vols. 8vo. 2. Matho: five Cosmotheoria puerilis, Dialogus In quo prima Elementa de Mundi ordinis et ornatu Proponuntur, &c. This work was translated into English, in 2 vols. 8vo.—Ibid.

BAYARD (Peter chevalier de), a celebrated captain of the 16th century, was born in Dauphiné, and slain in an action with the imperialists in Italy, in 1524. He was at the taking of Breſcia, where he performed a noble act of generosity in returning to the daughter of his hostess 2000 pistoles, which the mother had given him to save her house from plunder. When mortally wounded, he turned himself towards the enemy, saying, "As in life I always faced the enemy, so in death I will not turn my back upon them."—Novv. Dig. Hist.

BAYER (John), a German astronomer, who published, in 1603, an excellent work, entitled, Uranometria, being a celestial atlas, or folio charts of all the constellations; he first distinguished the stars by the letters of the Greek alphabet, and according to the order of the magnitude of the stars in each constellation. This work was republished, with great improvements by the author, in 1697, under a new title, viz. Cosmum Stellatum Christianum.—Hutton.

BAYER (Theophilus Sigfred), a learned philologist, was born at Königsberg in 1694. He acquired a great knowledge of the eastern languages, particularly the Chinese. In 1717 he was appointed librarian at Königsberg, and in 1726 was invited to Peterburg, where he was made professor of Greek and Roman antiquities, and died there in 1738. His Museum Sinicum, printed in 1730, in 2 vols. 8vo. is a very curious and learned work.—Moreri.

BAYEUX (N.), an advocate at Caen, who obtained from the academy at Rouen the prize for a poem on Filial Piety. He translated the Fasts of Ovid, to which he added curious notes, printed in 4 vols. 8vo. He wrote also, Reflections on the Reign of Trajan, 4to. He was sent to prison at Orleans, and fell in the massacre there in 1792.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BAYLE (Peter), a celebrated French writer, was born at Carla, in the country of Poix, in 1647. He was educated for the ministry among the protestants, but while attending the jesuits' college turned Roman catholic, to the great grief of his father, who was a minister among the reformed. However he did not long continue in that persuasion, but returned to his former communion, and went to Geneva, where he formed an intimacy with Basnage. He was for some years professor of philosophy at Sedan, but when that academy was suppressed by the king in 1681, he removed to Rotterdam, and was chosen professor of philosophy and history there. In 1684 he began a literary journal, entitled Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, which obtained great celebrity. In 1693 he was deprived of his professorship, on suspicion of being in the pay of France. The first volume of his greatest work, The Historical and Critical Dictionary, appeared in 1695, and quickly reached a second edition. It was, however, attacked by some writers, particularly by M. Jurieu, with whom he had before a bitter controversy, respecting an anonymous book written against Jurieu's prophetic opinions, and which was generally and truly attributed to Bayle. This learned, industrious, and ingenious writer, died of a decline in 1706. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote, Thoughts on Comets; a Criticism on Maimbourg's History of Calvinism; a Philosophical Comment on the Words of Christ, 'Compel them to come in,' &c. It must be owned, however, that his writings betray no small portion of scepticism on religious subjects.—Life by Des Maiseaux.

BAYLE (Lewis), an eminent prelate, was born at Caermarthen, in South Wales, and educated at Oxford. In 1616 he was made bishop of Bangor, and died in 1632. He wrote that well known book, The Practice of Piety.—Wood's A. O.

BAZLY (Thomas), son of the preceding, was educated at Cambridge, and became subdean of Wells in 1638. He afterwards turned Roman catholic, and published some books in vindication of his new faith, for which he was imprisoned in Newgate, but effected his escape, and went abroad, where he died about 1657.—Ibid.

BAYNARD (Anne), an ingenious English lady, was the daughter of Dr. Edward Baynard, an eminent physician, and born at Preston in Lancashire in 1672. Her father gave her a very liberal education, and under his instructions she acquired an extensive knowledge of philosophy, astronomy, and mathematics, as well as of the Latin and Greek languages. She died in the prime of life in 1697, and was buried at Barnes in Surry. She wrote Latin with great fluency and elegance.—Collier's Hist. Dict.

BAYNES (John), an English lawyer, was born in 1758, at Middleham, in Yorkshire, and educated first at Richmond school, and afterwards at Trinity college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Gray's-inn. He was a member of the constitutional society, and wrote a number of pieces in prose and verse in the public papers; but being political, they are sunk into oblivion. He intended to have published a correct edition of lord Coke's tracts, but was prevented by death in 1787.—Europ. Mag.

BAYNES (sir Thomas), an English physician, and professor of music at Gresham college, was born about 1632, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he applied to the study of physic. He accompanied sir John Finch to Italy and Constantinople, receiving at the same time the honour of knighthood. He died at Constantinople in 1681, to the great grief of sir John Finch, who did not long survive him. They left in conjunction 4000*l.* to Christ's college.—Biog. Br.

BAZZAZ, the author of the Adab al Mofredat, or a Treatise on the particular Conditions and Properties of Traditions, and some other works on the mohammedan theology.—D'Herbelot.

BZ (William le), a French engraver and letter-founder, was born at Troyes in 1525, and died at Paris in 1598. His sons and grandsons were very famous as founders and printers.—Moreri.

BEACON (Thomas), an English divine of the 16th century. On the accession of queen Mary, he fled to Germany, where he wrote several books against popery. In the reign of Elizabeth he returned to England, and was made prebendary of Canterbury. His works were printed in 3 vols. folio.

BEALE (Mary), an English portrait painter. She was the daughter of Mr. Cradock, minister of Walton upon-Thames, and compared with great exactness the works of sir Peter Lely and Vandyke. Her colouring.

was clear and strong, with a great look of nature. She had also a poetical turn, and paraphrased some of David's psalms. Her husband was an artist, as were two of her sons, but one of them relinquished that profession, and after studying under the great Sydenham, became a physician at Coventry. Mrs. Beale died in 1697, aged 66.—Biog. Brit. Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting.

BEARD (John), an English actor and singer, was brought up a sizer in the king's chapel. His first appearance on the stage was in the character of sir John Loverule, in the Devil to Pay, in 1737, at Drury-lane. In 1739 he married lady Henrietta Herbert, daughter of the earl of Waldegrave, and widow of lord Edward Herbert, who brought him little fortune. After quitting the stage some years, he returned to it in 1744, and continued engaged at Covent Garden till 1758, in which year he joined with Mr. Rich, whose daughter he married, on the death of his wife. He died in 1768, aged 74.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BEATON (David), a cardinal, and archbishop of St. Andrew's in Scotland, was born in 1494. In 1519 he was appointed resident at the court of France; and in 1523 he obtained the rich abbacy of Arbroath. In 1528 he was made lord privy seal. He negotiated the marriage of James V. with princess Magdalen of France, and afterwards with princess Mary. Paul III. raised him to the cardinalate in 1538, about which time he was made primate of Scotland. On the death of the king, the lords of the council sent the cardinal to prison, from whence he was released not long after by the regent, and made chancellor. He now persecuted the protestants with great fury, and among others caused the celebrated Wishart to be burnt before his own palace. Shortly afterwards he was assassinated in his house by Lesley and other protestants, in 1546.—Biog. Br.

BEATON (James), a nephew of the cardinal, was born at Balfour in 1530, and raised to the archbishopric of Glasgow at the age of 25. In 1560 he collected the sacred vessels and records of his cathedral, and went to France, where he died in 1603. He wrote a history of Scotland, which was never printed.—Ibid.

BEATUS RHEMANUS, a learned man of the 15th century. His father's name was Anthony Bilde, which he altered to Rheanus, from the place of his nativity, Rhennach. He was a profound scholar, and was the first who published the history of Velleius Paterculus. He also edited the works of Tertullian, to which he added valuable notes. He died at Strasburg in 1547. He wrote annotations on several classical works, epistles, and other learned pieces.—Gen. Biog.

BEATTIE (James), a distinguished modern writer, was born in Kincardineshire in Scotland, in 1755. His father was a farmer in moderate circumstances, who after giving him a good education, sent him to the university of Aberdeen, where he pursued his studies in such a manner as to gain the particular esteem of his superiors, and became a burfar, that is, obtained what in the English universities is called an exhibition or scholarship. He afterwards acted as a schoolmaster at Alloa in Fifeshire, from whence he removed to Aberdeen, where he became assistant in the grammar school, and married the master's daughter. About this time he applied to poetry, and in 1760 published a small volume of original poems and translations. In 1765 appeared his Judgment of Paris. But his greatest performance was a prose work, published in 1770, entitled, An Essay on the Nature and Immutability of Truth, in opposition to Sophistry and Scepticism. This was avowedly an attack upon the philosophy of David Hume, who was so much affected by the strength of its arguments and its popularity, as never afterwards to bear the name of Beattie mentioned without betraying emotions of uneasiness. In 1771 our author brought out the first book of his beautiful poem, the Minstrel, which was completed in 1774, and soon ran through several editions. This production recommended Mr. Beattie to the friendship and patronage of the earl of Errol, by whose interest he was elected professor of moral philosophy and logic in the Marischal college of Aberdeen, which honourable situation he filled with high reputation till his death. He also obtained a pension from the king of 200l. per annum. About this time he was created LL.D. and visited London, where he was kindly received by the most eminent literary characters, particularly Dr. Johnson and Dr. Porteus, the present bishop of London. In 1783 he presented the world with Dissertations moral and critical, 1 vol. 4to. In 1786, at the recommendation of the bishop of London, he published two small volumes on the Evidences of the Christian Religion. Besides these works he published the Elements of Moral Science, being a summary of his lectures. This very excellent man, all of whose labours tended to enlighten and benefit mankind, died in October 1803.—Month. Mag.

BEATTIE (James Hay), eldest son of the above, was born at Aberdeen Nov. 6, 1768. His mildness and docility were such, that his father had never occasion to reprove him above three or four times in his life. The first rules of morality taught him by this affectionate parent were to "speak truth and keep a secret;" and "I never found," says he, "that in a single instance he transgressed either." At the age of 13 he was entered a student of the Marischal college, and in 1786 took the degree of M.A. To a young man so qualified and educated in a great measure within its own walls, the university of Aberdeen was eager to exhibit some mark of its regard, and the professor accordingly recommended him to his majesty as a proper person to be assistant professor of moral philosophy and logic to his father, which was granted when he was not quite nineteen. He applied himself also to the study of theology, and was so deeply impressed with a sense of the importance of religion as to carry about with him a pocket Bible and the Greek New Testament; yet his piety was cheerful and active. He studied music as a science, and performed well upon the organ and violin; and contrived to build an organ for himself. This amiable and promising young man died of a nervous atrophy, Nov. 19, 1790. His father published a small volume of his son's poetical performances in 1799, with a sketch of the life and character of the author, from whence this article is extracted. In 1796 the doctor lost another son named Montague Beattie.

BEAU (John Lewis le), professor of rhetoric in the college of the Grassins, and member of the academy of inscriptions. He was born at Paris in 1721, and died in 1766. He published an edition of Homer in Greek and Latin, 2 vols. 1746, and the Orations of Cicero, 3 vols. 1750. He also wrote a discourse on the poverty of the learned.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BEAU (Charles le), brother of the preceding. He was professor in the royal college, and secretary of the academy of inscriptions. He was born in 1701, and died at Paris in 1778. His History of the Lower Empire, in 29 vols. 12mo. is a judicious performance. His Opera Latina were published at Paris in 1783, 3 vols. 12mo.—Ibid.

BEAUCAIRE DE PEGUILLON (Francis), archbishop of Metz, was at the council of Trent, where he pleaded with great eloquence for a reformation. He resigned his bishopric, and went into retirement, in which he wrote his Rerum Gallicarum Commentaria ab anno 1461 ad annum 1562, Lyons, 1625, fol. He died in 1591.—Moreri.

BEAUCAMP (Richard), earl of Warwick, was born in 1381, and died at Rouen in Normandy, in 1439; he was at the council of Constance, and obtained several victories over the French. His remains were conveyed to England and interred with his ancestors at Warwick.—Biog. Br.

BEAUCAMPS (Peter Francis Godard), a French writer, died at Paris in 1761, aged 72; he wrote Recherches sur les Theatres de France, 4to, and translated the Greek romances of Ilinene and Ilinenias, by Eustathius; and Rhodantes, and Doricles, by Theodorus Prodromus; he also gave a poetical version of the letters of Abelard and Eloisa.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BEAUCAMPEAU (Francis Matthew Chateaux), a French poet. He was born at Paris in 1645. While a child his poetical talents introduced him to court; at the age of 12 he published a collection of poems, entitled La Lyre de jeune Apollon. He went into the east, where it is supposed he died, but when is unknown.

BEAVER (John), a benedictine monk of Westminster in the 14th century, who wrote a Chronicle of British affairs from Brutus to his own time, and a book de Rebus canobii Westmonasteriensis.—Pitts. Bala.

BEAUFILS (William), a jesuit, was born in Auvergne in 1674 and died at Toulouse in 1758. He published several funeral discourses, and other works.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BEAUFORT (Henry), brother of Henry IV. king of England, was made bishop of Lincoln, from whence he was translated to Winchester: he was also chancellor of the kingdom, and sent ambassador to France. In 1426 he was made cardinal and appointed legate in Germany. In 1431 he crowned Henry VI. in the great church of Paris. He was a proud, turbulent prelate, and his last scene, as described by Shakespeare, appears to have been not merely a poetical, but a true picture of the man. He died at Winchester in 1447.—Biog. Brit.

BEAUFORT (Margaret), countess of Richmond and Derby, was the daughter and heiress of John duke of Somerset; and born in 1441; she married Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, by whom she had a son afterwards Henry VII. Her first husband dying in 1456, she married first Henry Stafford, by whom she had no issue, and on his death she became the wife of Thomas lord Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby. She founded the colleges of Christ and St. John in Cambridge, and died in 1509. Her remains were interred in Westminster abbey.—Ibid.

BEAUFORT (Francis de Vendome, duke of), was the son of Caesar, duke of Vendome, and born in 1616; he was imprisoned on the charge of conspiring against the life of cardinal Mazarin, but escaped, and began a civil war, which soon subsided. On making his peace at court he was made admiral of France, and in 1665 defeated the Turkish fleet near Tunis. He was killed at the siege of Candy in 1662.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BEAUFORT (Louis de), a learned writer, who died at Maestricht in 1795; he was chosen fellow of the royal society of London, and distinguished himself in the republic of letters by some excellent works, as the History of Germanicus; Dissertation upon the Uncertainty of the Five First Ages of the Roman Republic; History of the Roman Republic, or Plan of the ancient Government of Rome.—Ibid.

BEAULIEU (Lewis le Blanc), professor of divinity at Sedan, was born in 1611 at Plessis-Marli. His Theses Sedanenses were published in 1683, folio. He died in 1675.—Moreri.

BEAULIEU (Sebastian Pontault de), a French engineer, died in 1674. His views and plans of the sieges and battles of Lewis XIV. are in 2 vols. folio.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BEAUMARCHAIS (Peter Augustin Caron de), was the son of a clock-maker at Paris, and born there in 1732. He applied with diligence to his father's profession, and invented a new escapement, the honour of which was contested by another person, but determined in favour of young Beaumarchais by the academy of sciences. He also distinguished himself by his musical skill, and particularly by his taste in playing on the harp. This recommended him to the notice of the sisters of Louis XV. who admitted him to their concerts and private parties. He was engaged in three public causes, on which he exercised his literary talents to such advantage, as to obtain a considerable post under government. He was an active, intelligent, and enterprising man. On the revolution he went to Holland and England, and was proscribed; but returning he was sent to prison, in which he died, in 1799. His principal works are, 1. Memoires contre les Sieurs de Goëssman, la Blache, Marin, d'Arnaud, 1774. 2. Memoir in answer to William Kornmann, 1787. 3. Eugenie, a play in five acts. 4. The Two Friends, a play. 5. The Barber of Seville, a comedy. 6. The Marriage of Figaro, a comedy, &c.—Ibid.

BEAUMELLE (Laurence), a French writer, was born in the diocese of Allais in 1727, and died at Paris in 1773; for some time he was professor of belles-lettres in Denmark. He was twice imprisoned in the bastille for some libels and satires, but in 1772 was appointed librarian to the king. He wrote a Defence of the Spirit of Laws, Letters to Voltaire, Thoughts of Seneca, a Commentary upon the Henriade, a Life of Mad. Maintenon, &c.—Ibid.

BEAUMONT (sir John), son of Francis Beaumont, a judge of the common pleas, was born at Grace-Dieu, in Leicestershire, in 1582, and educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to one of the inns of court. In 1626 he was knighted by king Charles I. and died in 1628. He wrote, 1. The Crown of Thorns, a poem. 2. Bosworth Field, a poem, and other pieces, which were collected and published after his death by his son, sir John Beaumont, bart.—Wood's A. O.

BEAUMONT (Francis), a relation of the above, was educated at Cambridge, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. He died in 1615, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote a number of plays in conjunction with Fletcher, which possess great merit.—Biog. Brit.

BEAUMONT (Joseph), an English divine, who was master of Peter-house, Cambridge, and regius professor of divinity. He died in 1699, aged 84. He wrote a religious poem, entitled Psyche, or Love's Mystery. A collection of his poems was published in 1749, in 4to.—Gen. B. D.

BEAUMONT DE PEREFIX (Hardouin), a French historian, who was preceptor to Louis XIV. by whom he was made archbishop of Paris. He wrote the History of Henry IV. and died in 1670.—Moreri.

BEAUMONT (Elie d'), a French advocate, was born at Carentan in 1732; he distinguished himself by his affecting memoir in favour of the unfortunate family of Calas, which produced a powerful effect upon the nation. He was also the author of several other esteemed pieces. He died in 1785. His wife was the author of an excellent novel, entitled Letters of the Marquis de Roselle, 12mo. She died in 1783.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BEAUNE (James de), baron of Samblançai, and superintendant of the finances under Francis I. When Lautrec was sent to the defence of the Milanese, he stipulated that 300,000 crowns should be sent to pay the troops. This money, however, the queen mother obtained of the superintendant for herself, with threats of ruining him if he did not comply. The expedition having failed for want of the promised supply, complaints were laid before the king against Samblançai, who alleged the real cause in justification of himself. The queen mother bribed his secretary to deliver to her the receipts she had given, which being the only testimonies poor Samblançai had, he was accused of having applied the money to his own use, and was hanged in 1527. Gentil, his secretary, was afterwards executed for another crime.—Moreri.

BEAUNE (Floriment de), a French mathematician, who discovered a method of determining the nature of curves by the properties of their triangles. He died in 1652.

BEAURAIN (John de), geographer to Louis XV. was born at Aix in 1697, and died in 1771. He constructed a number of charts, and published a topographical and military Description of the Campaigns of Luxembourg from 1690 to 1694, 3 vols. fol.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BEAUKIEU (Gaspard-Guillard de), an ingenious French philosopher, and author of the excellent work, L'Esprit de la Nature, the Pupil of Nature, 2 vols. and of many other publications. He was born in the county of Artois in 1727. To the eternal disgrace of the revolution, this respectable man died in an hospital in 1795.—Ibid.

BEAUSOBRE (Isaac de), a French protestant divine, was born at Mort in 1659. On leaving his own country he went to Holland, and from thence to Berlin, where he was made chaplain to the king of Prussia; and died in 1738. His works are; 1. Defence de la Doctrine des Reformés; 2. A Translation of the New Testament, with notes, in conjunction with L'Enfant; 3. Differtation sur les Adamites de Bohême. 4. Histoire critique de Manichée et du Manichéisme, 2 tom. which has been praised by Gibbon; 5. Sermons.—Moreri.

BEAUSOBRE (Lewis), counsellor to the king of Prussia, was born at Berlin in 1730, and died in 1783. He wrote Philosophical Differtations on the Nature of Fire; Le Pyrrhonisme du Sage; Les Songes d'Epicure.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BEAUVAIS (William), of the academy of Cortona, and of the literary society of Orleans, born in 1698, and died in 1773. He wrote a History of the Roman Emperors by Medals, 3 vols. 12mo. 1767.—Ibid.

BEAUVAIS (Charles Nicholas), a physician, born at Orleans in 1745, and died at Montpellier in 1794. He was a member of the convention, and a man of turbulent character. He wrote Essais Historiques sur Orleans; Description topographique du Mont Olivet, &c.—Ibid.

BEAUVILLIERS (Francis de), duke of St. Aignan and member of the French academy. He was born in 1607; wrote several poems, and died in 1687. His eldest son Paul, duke of Beauvilliers, was preceptor to the duke of Burgundy, father of Louis XIV. The bishop of Beauvais, his brother, was an ornament to the mitre, and died in 1732: he wrote some religious books. Paul Hippolytus, third son of the duke of Beauvilliers, was born in 1684, and died in 1776: he wrote a book, entitled, Amusemens litteraires.—Ibid.

BEAUZEE (Nicholas), a French writer and member of the academy, professor of grammar in the military school, was born at Verdun in 1717, and died in 1789. He wrote the articles relating to grammar in the Encyclopedie; but though thus allied with infidels, he was himself a sincere christian. Beausée once asked Diderot how they came to elect him a member of the academy, since he was a christian? "Because," answered the other, "we had not a grammarian among us, and we knew you to be an honest man." He wrote a Universal Grammar, or an Exposition of the Elements of Languages, 2 vols. 8vo.; an Exposition of the Historical Proofs of Religion, and other works.—Ibid.

BEBEL (Henry), professor of eloquence in the university of Tubingen. He published a collection of Latin poems at Strasburg in 1512, 4to.—Moreri.

BECAN (Martin), a learned jesuit and confessor to the emperor Ferdinand II.; he was born in Brabant, and died at Vienna in 1694. He wrote a Sum of Theology in French. Some of his pieces were condemned by the parliament of Paris and by the court of Rome.—Ibid.

BECCADELLI (Lewis), an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Bologna; he assisted at the council of Trent, and was rewarded with the archbishopric of Ragusa, which preferment he resigned on being appointed preceptor to prince Ferdinand of Tuscany; for this he only received the provostship of the cathedral of Prato. He died in 1572. He wrote the lives of cardinals Pole and Bembo.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BECCADELLI (Antonio), commonly called Antony of Palermo, where he was born in 1374; he became professor of belles lettres and rhetoric at Pavia, where he received the poetic laurel from the emperor Sigismund in 1432. He accompanied Alphonso, king of Naples, who created him a nobleman, and gave him several honourable employments. He had so great a love for Livy as to sell a farm to purchase a copy. He died at Naples in 1471. He wrote a book on the sayings and actions of Alphonso, king of Arragon; and a collection of his epistles and other pieces was printed at Venice in 1453. But he is known chiefly as the author of an obscene work, entitled Hermaphroditus.—Moreri.

BECCAFUMI (Dominico), an historical painter, was born at Sienna in 1484, and studied the works of Raphael and Michael Angelo Buonaroti. He died in 1549.—De Ples.

BECCARI (Augustine), an Italian poet, was born at Ferrara: his poems are wholly pastoral. He died in 1520.—Tiraboschi.

BECCARI (James Bartholomew), a physician of Bologna, born in 1682, and died in 1766: he was professor of chemistry at his native place many years, and published a Dissertation on the Impurity of the Air, and Maladies which raged at Bologna in 1729 and 1730; a Treatise on the Internal Motion of Fluids, and other works.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BECCARIA (John Baptist), a philosopher and ecclesiastic, was a native of Mondovi in Piedmont: he became professor of philosophy at Palermo, and afterwards at Rome, from whence he removed to Turin. He was greatly respected by the king of Sardinia, to whose sons he was tutor. He made several interesting discoveries in electricity, and published some valuable works on that and other philosophical subjects. He died in 1781.—Ibid.

BECCARIA (Cæsar Bonesana, marquis), was born about 1730, and discovered from his childhood an inclination to philosophy, which he studied under Genovesi at Naples. His first performance was a Treatise on Crimes and Punishments, for which he narrowly escaped a prosecution: his next work was entitled Disquisitions on the Nature of Style. He died in 1795.—Monthly Mag. 1796.

BRECCUTI (Francis), an Italian poet, surnamed il Cappita, was born at Perugia in 1509, and died at the age of 44. He was professor of law, but is best known by his burlesque poetry in the manner of Berni.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BRECHERA (Gaspard), a celebrated Spanish sculptor, was the pupil of Raphael; his chief work is a statue of the Virgin, made by order of the queen Isabella de Valois: he also painted well in fresco. He died at Madrid in 1570.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BECHER (John Joachim), an eminent chemist, was born in 1645 at Spire, where he became professor of medicine, and afterwards was appointed first physician to the elector of Mentz and Bavaria. He resided for some time at Vienna, and assisted in a variety of manufactures. We next find him at Hierlem, where he invented a machine for throwing silk. At last he visited England, and died there in 1685. His principal works are Physica Subterranea; Institutiones Chymicæ; and Epistolæ Chymicæ.—Moreri.

BECKER (Daniel), physician to the elector of Brandenburg, was a native of Königsburg, and died there in 1670, aged 43. He published, 1. Commentarius de Thesauris. &c. London, 1660, 8vo.; 2. De Cultivo Prussico. Leyden, 8vo.—Ibid.

BECKET (Thomas à), archbishop of Canterbury, was born in London in 1119, and educated at Oxford and Paris. Henry II. appointed him, in 1158, high chancellor and preceptor to the prince. The year following he attended the king to Toulouse, having, at his own charge, 1200 horse and a train of 700 knights. In 1160 he was sent to Paris to negotiate a marriage between prince Henry and the king of France's eldest daughter, with whom he returned to England. In 1162 he was elected archbishop of Canterbury, on which he resigned the chancellorship, and assuming all the arrogance of a sovereign pontiff, soon came to hostilities with the king, who endeavoured to effect a reform among the clergy. In a convention held at Clarendon, certain laws were passed respecting the privileges of the church, to which Becket assented at first, but afterwards retracted, and endeavoured to leave the kingdom in order to communicate his grievances to the pope. This occasioned a parliament to be called at Northampton in 1165, when the archbishop was sentenced to forfeit all his goods to the king. On this he left the kingdom, and Henry seized upon the revenues of his see. Becket was kindly received by the French king, and resigned his archbishopric into the hands of the pope at Sens, who returned it to him with assurances of support. The archbishop now fulminated his anathemas against several bishops and noblemen, which so irritated the king, that he banished all his relations. In 1167 an interview took place between Henry and Becket in Champagne, which ended without producing any effect. In 1169 another attempt was made to bring about a reconciliation, which also failed through the obstinacy of the archbishop, and Henry was so exasperated, that he obliged his subjects to renounce, by oath, all obedience to Becket and the pope. He also caused his son to be crowned at Westminster by the archbishop of York, which office belonged to the see of Canterbury. For this the pope suspended that prelate, and excommunicated those who assisted him. An accommodation was at last concluded, but Becket refusing to withdraw his excommunication of the bishops, they went and laid their complaints before Henry, then in Normandy. In a fit of passion the king exclaimed how unhappy he was, that out of so many attendants, none had gratitude enough to rid him of an insolent prelate, who caused him so much disturbance. Hearing this, four knights set out for Canterbury, and assassinated the archbishop at the altar in his cathedral. Dec. 29 1171. For this the king was obliged by the pope to do penance at Becket's tomb, where he was scourged by the monks, and passed all the day and night fasting upon the bare stones. The murderers were sent on penance to the holy land, where they died. Becket was canonized two years after, and his pretended miracles were so numerous, that his shrine soon became richer than that of any saint in Europe.—Lytelton's Hen. II.

BECKINGHAM (Charles), an English dramatic writer, who wrote two plays of merit, viz. Henry IV. of France, and Scipio Africanus. He also wrote some poems, and died in 1790, aged 32.—Biog. Dram.

BECKINGTON (Thomas), bishop of Bath and Wells in the 15th century. He was a great benefactor to New college, Oxford, in which he had been educated. He wrote a Latin book on the claim of the kings of England to France.—Wood's A. G.

BECKET (Anthony), a celestine monk, who wrote a history of the congregation of his order in France, 4to. 1721. He died at Paris in 1730, aged 76.—Moreri.

BECTASH (Culi), a muselman writer of the Persian sect, who wrote a book, called Bostan al Khial, or the Garden of Thoughts.—D'Herbelot.

BECHTOLZ (Claude de), a learned French lady, and abbess of St. Honoré de l'Arascon in the 16th century. She died in 1547, and left several works in Latin and French.—Moreri.

BEDA (Noel), a French divine, who violently attacked Erasmus on account of his paraphrases. Being of a persecuting spirit, he reflected on the court for not exercising more rigour against heretics, for which he was banished to the abbey of Mont St. Michael, where he died in 1537. He wrote several polemical treatises.—Moreri.

BEDA, or BEDE, called the Venerable, an ancient English writer, was born in 672, at Wearmouth in the bishopric of Durham, educated in the monastery of St. Peter, and ordained by John of Beverly, bishop of Hexham. His fame for learning was so great, that pope Sergius wrote to his abbot to send him to Rome, but Bede declined the honour. He devoted the whole of his life to the writing his ecclesiastical history and other works, and in instructing the young monks. The best edition of his history is that in 1729, folio. He died in 735. An English council directed his works to be publicly read in churches.—Biog. Br.

BEDALL (William), an excellent prelate, was born in 1570, at Black Notley in Essex, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; where he obtained a fellowship in 1593. He was minister of St. Edmund's Bury some years, and in 1604 went with sir Henry Wotton to Venice, as chaplain. During his residence there he became intimate with father Paul Sarpi, who entrusted him with the MS. of his history of the council of Trent. He also became acquainted with the famous Antonio de Dominis, archbishop of Spalato, whom he assisted in his book de Republica Ecclesiastica. In 1627 he was elected provost of Trinity college in Dublin; and two years afterwards was preferred to the united sees of Kilmore and Ardagh, the latter of which he resigned. He obtained a translation of the common prayer into Irish, and had the New Testament rendered into the same language; but, owing to the troubles, the last was not published in his time. It was afterwards, however, printed at the expence of Mr. Boyle. So great was the reverence of the Irish for him, that when the rebellion in 1641 broke out, he was unmolested, and thereby was enabled to shelter several protestants in his house. At last the pretended council at Kilkenny sent him orders to dismiss those people, and on his refusal, he was seized, with his family, and conveyed to the castle of Cloughboughter. After remaining there some time, they were removed to the house of Dennis Sheridan, a protestant minister, where the bishop died February 7, 1641. The Irish rebels attended his remains to the church yard of Kilmore, and fired a salute over his grave, so deeply were they impressed with reverence for his character.—Life by Bp. Burnet.

BEDERIC (Henry), an Augustine monk of the 14th century, who is called de Bury, from his being born at St. Edmund's Bury. He studied at Paris, where he became a doctor of Sorbonne. He wrote some religious pieces, and lived about 1380.—Pitt. Bale.

BEDFORD (John duke of), the third son of Henry IV. king of England. In 1422 he commanded the English army in France, and the same year was named regent of that kingdom for Henry VI. whom he caused to be proclaimed at Paris. He defeated the French fleet near Southampton, made himself master of Cotoi, entered Paris with his troops, and beat the duke of Alençon; thus making himself master of France. He died at Rouen, in 1435, where a handsome monument was erected to his memory, which one of the courtiers of Charles VIII. advised him to destroy. "Let him rest in peace," answered he, "who, when living, made all the French tremble."—Moreri.

BEDFORD (Hilkiah), an English divine, was born in London, in 1663, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and obtained a living in Lincolnshire, but was deprived of it for refusing the oaths. In 1714 he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment and a heavy fine for writing the Hereditary Right of the Crown of England asserted, folio; the real author of which was George Harbin, a clergyman. He translated an Answer to Fontenelle's History of Oracles, and Dr. Barwick's Life, from the Latin into English. He died in 1724.—Gen. Biog. Diet.

BEDFORD (Thomas), son of the above, was educated at Westminster school, from whence he removed to St. John's college, Cambridge. He took orders among the non-jurors, and published, in 1732, Simonis monachi Dunelmensis libellus de exordio atque procurfus Dunelmensis ecclesie. He also wrote an historical Catechism. He died after 1742.—Ibid.

BEDLOE (Capt. William), an infamous character, who pretended to give evidence respecting the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, for which he was rewarded by the commons with 500*l.* He died in 1680.—Granger's Biog. Hist.

BEDOS DE CELLES (Francis), a benedictine monk, and member of the academy at Bourdeaux, born in 1726, and died in 1779. He published an esteemed treatise on Dialling, and another on the construction of Organs.—Novw. Diet. Hist.

BEDREDDIN (Baalbeki), a Syriac physician, who wrote a book called Mosarreh al nefs. He lived in the 7th century of the Hegira.—D'Herbelot.

BEGA (Cornelius), a Dutch painter. He was born at Haerlem in 1620, and died of the plague in 1664. He excelled in landscape, cattle, and conversations, and his pictures are held in great esteem.—Houbraeken.

BEGER (Laurence), a German writer, who was born at Heidelberg in 1653, and died at Berlin in 1705. He wrote, 1. The-saurus ex Thesaurio Palatino selectus, seu Gemmæ, folio; 2. Spicilegium Antiquitatis, folio; 3. Thesaurus. five Gemmæ, Numismata, &c., 3 vols. folio; and several other learned works, one of which is in defence of polygamy.—Moreri.

BEGERN (Abraham), principal painter to the king of Prussia, was born in Holland in 1650. He painted some fine landscapes for the royal palaces, and several good pictures by him are at the Hague.—Pilkington.

BEGON (Michael), born at Blois in 1638, became intendant of the French West-India islands, and died in 1710. He collected a noble library, and a cabinet of antiques and curiosities. He also had engraved, portraits of the illustrious men of the 17th century.—Moreri.

BEGUILLET (Edme), advocate to the parliament of Dijon, and correspondent of the academy of Belles Lettres, died in 1786. He wrote the Principles of Vegetation and Architecture, 8vo. and several other good works, on similar subjects.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BEHAIM (Martin), a geographer and navigator of the 16th century, was a native of Nuremberg. He is said to have discovered the isle of Payal and the Brazils, and to have sailed as far as the straits of Magellan. John II. of Portugal created him a chevalier. There is at Nuremberg a globe made by him, on which he has traced his discoveries. He died at Lisbon in 1506.—American Transactions.

BEHN (Aphra), a female English writer. Her maiden-name was Johnson; and her father was appointed lieutenant-general of Surinam, but died on his passage. His family, however, proceeded to that settlement, where our author became acquainted with prince Oroonoko, whose story she afterwards gave to the public. On her return to England she married Mr. Behn, a merchant of London. She was at Antwerp in 1666, where she was employed as a spy by the English government; and, it is said, she discovered, by means of a lover, the design of the Dutch to send a fleet up the Thames, which she communicated to the English court, but the intelligence was treated with contempt. Not long after this, she returned to London, and devoted herself to pleasure and the muses. Her adventures in the former pursuit we shall not detail; and her productions in the service of the latter appeared in 3 vols. 8vo. She also wrote several plays, histories, and novels, which evince a lively imagination, but marked by extreme licentiousness. She died in 1689, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster-abbey.—Biog. Brit.

BEICH (Joachim Francis), an eminent painter, was born at Ravensberg, in Swabia, in 1665. He excelled in painting landscapes and battles. He died in 1748.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BEINASCHI (John Baptist), an historical painter, was a native of Piedmont, and studied at Rome under Lanfranc. He gained so great a reputation that the honour of knighthood was conferred on him. He died in 1688, aged 54.—Pitt.

BEITHAR, an African botanist, who died in the 646th of the Hegira. He wrote a history of plants, arranged alphabetically, and other works.—D'Herbelot.

BEK (David), a Dutch portrait painter, was born at Arnheim in 1621, and became a disciple of Vandyke. He was appointed portrait painter to queen Christina of Sweden, by whose recommendation he was employed to paint the most illustrious persons in Europe. He died in 1656.—Houbraken. Pilkington.

BEEKER (Balthasar), a Dutch divine; was born in 1634, at Warthuisen, in the province of Groningen. In 1679 he was chosen minister at Amsterdam, where he published a book entitled The World bewitched, in which he opposed the popular superstitions respecting witchcraft, incantations, &c. This work made a great noise, and brought upon the author the sentence of suspension and deposition. The magistrates of Amsterdam, however, continued to him his salary. He died in 1698.—Moreri.

BEL (John James), a native of Bourdeaux, and counsellor of that city. He died at Paris in 1738, aged 45. He compiled the Dictionnaire Néologique; and wrote critical Letters on the Mariamne of Voltaire, and some other pieces.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BEL (Mathias), an Hungarian divine, was born at Orlova in 1684. He at first studied physic at Halle, but quitted that profession for theology, and became rector of the school at Preiburg, and minister of a congregation there. He died in 1749. He wrote two capital works, The Apparatus ad Historiam Hungarie, & Notitiæ Hungariæ nova; for which the emperor Charles VI. made him imperial historiographer. Even the pope, Clement XII., sent him a present for his works, and the king of Prussia and the empress of Russia distinguished him by marks of their esteem.—Gen. Biog.

BEL (Charles Andrew), son of the above, was born at Preiburg in 1717. In 1741 he was appointed professor extraordinary of philosophy at Leipsic, and in 1756 professor of poetry and librarian to the university, with the title of counsellor of state. He died in 1782. He wrote De Vera Origine et Epocha Hunnorum, &c. 4to. He likewise conducted the Acta Eruditorum, from 1754 to 1781.—Ibid.

BELCAMP (John Van), a Dutch painter. He was employed in copying pictures in the royal collection of England, which he executed with great exactness. He died in 1653.—Houbraken.

BELCHIER (John), an English surgeon; was born in 1706, at Kingston in Surrey. He served as an apprentice to Mr. Chefelden, under whom he made a great proficiency. In 1736 he became surgeon to Guy's hospital; and about the same time was elected fellow of the royal society, to whom he communicated several papers and cases, inserted in their Transactions. He died in 1785.—Europ. Mag.

BELGRADO (James), an Italian jesuit, was born in 1704, at Udina, and died in 1789. He was an eminent mathematician, antiquary, and poet. The work by which he is best known is a treatise on the Existence of God, demonstrated by geometrical theorems.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BELESTIS, a Chaldean, who raised Arbaces to the throne of Media, for which he was rewarded with the government of Babylon, 770 B. C. When Sardanapalus was burnt in his palace with his gold and silver, Belestis obtained leave to take away the ashes, from whence he extracted immense treasures.—Univ. Hist.

BELINOR (Bernard Forest de), a French engineer well known by his Dictionnaire portatif de l'ingenieur, his Course of Mathematics, Hydraulics, Architecture, &c. He died in 1761.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

BELLING (Richard), an Irish writer, was born at Belinstown in the county of Dublin, in 1613; he joined in the rebellion of 1641, and became an officer, and ambassador from the council of Kilkenny to the pope in 1645. On his return he went over to the marquis of Ormond, to whom he was of great service. At the restoration he recovered his estates, and died in Dublin in 1677. He wrote, in Latin, Vindictiarum Catholicorum Hibernie.

BELISARIUS, general of the armies of the emperor Justinian. He ended the war in which that prince was engaged with Cabades, king of Persia, by a treaty of peace in 531. The year after he took Carthage, and made prisoner Gelimor, who had usurped the throne of the Vandals. Belisarius entered Constantinople in triumph in 533. He was next sent against the Goths in Italy, and arriving on the coasts of Sicily, he took Catania, Syracuse, Palermo, and other places. He then proceeded to Naples, which he took, and marched to Rome. After this he conquered Vitiges, king of the Goths, and sent him to Constantinople, at the same time refusing the crown, which was offered him. For these great exploits he was regarded as the saviour of the empire, and medals are yet extant which bear this inscription, Belisarius gloria Romanorum. He was soon obliged to go into the east against Chosroes I. king of Persia, and having succeeded, he returned into Italy, from whence he expelled the Huns in 558. Three years afterwards this great man was accused, by the nobles about the emperor, of a design upon the throne; and Justinian, with the jealousy of an old man, was persuaded to confiscate his estates. The story of his being deprived of sight and obliged to beg for bread, is a modern fiction.—Univ. Hist. Gibbon.

BELL (Beaupre), an English antiquary, was educated at Westminster school, from whence he removed, in 1723, to Trinity college, Cambridge. He died young, and left his library and medals to the college where he had received his education. He assisted Dr. Stukely and other ingenious men in their publications.—Gen. Big. Diss.

BELLARMIN (Robert), a Roman cardinal, was born in Tuscany in 1542. He entered into the society of Jesuits. In 1599 pope Sixtus V. in reward of his services and learning, made him a cardinal. He died in 1621. His writings are very numerous, but they are chiefly polemical.—Moreri.

BELLAY (William du), lord of Langey, a celebrated French general, and negotiator. He wrote a history of his own times, in Latin, the greatest part of which is lost. He died in 1543.—Ibid.

BELLAY (John du), archbishop of Paris, was born in 1492; and employed as ambassador at Rome and in England. Paul III. made him a cardinal. When Charles V. entered Provence, in 1536, Francis I. left du Bellay in charge of Paris, as lieutenant-general. On the accession of Henry II. du Bellay went to Rome, where he died in 1560. His writings are: Several Harangues; An Apology for Francis I.; Elegies, Epigrams, and Odes, collected in 1 vol. 8vo. 1549. His brother, Martin, was a good general and statesman. His memoirs were published with those of William.—Moreri.

BELLAY (Joachim du), a French poet, was born at Lire, near Angers, in 1524, and died in 1560. His Latin poems were printed at Paris in 1569, 4to. and those in French in 1561. The last are elegant.—Ibid.

BELLE (Stephen de la), an Italian engraver, born at Florence in 1610, and died in 1664. His pieces are in estimation.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BELLE (Alexis Simon), a French portrait painter. He was a disciple of Francis de Troy, and died in 1734, aged 60. He was employed by the king of France and various other sovereigns.—Ibid.

BELLEAU (Renis), a French poet, born in 1528, and died in 1577. His pastorals are held in great esteem.—Ibid.

BELLEFOREST (Francis de), a French historian, was born in 1530, of poor parents; but he received a good education at Toulouse. He died in 1583. He wrote the History of the World, and a universal Cosmography; but his chief work is his Annals, or General History of France.—Moreri.

BELLEGARDE (John Baptist Morvan de), a French writer. He became a jesuit, from which society he was expelled for being a Cartesian. He died in 1734, aged 86. He translated St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, St. Ambrose, Thomas à Kempis, &c. He also rendered into French the book of Las Casas, on the destruction of the Indies, and wrote several moral treatises, which make 14 volumes.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

BELLENDEN (William), a learned Scotch writer of the 16th century. He was humanity professor at Paris in 1602, where he published his first work, entitled, Cicero's Princesps, in 1608; his next was Cicero's Consul, 1612: both these pieces were inscribed to Henry prince of Wales. In 1616 he published a second edition, with the addition of Liber de Statu Prisci Orbis, dedicated to prince Charles. These treatises sices were edited at London, in 1787, by Dr. Samuel Parr.—Preface to his works.

BELLANGER (Francis), doctor of the Sorbonne; he was born in the diocese of Lisieux, and died at Paris in 1749. He translated Dionysius of Halicarnensis, 1723, 2 vols. 4to. and wrote a critical essay on the works of Rollin.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BELLIEVRE (Pomponius de), a French statesman, born at Lyons in 1529. He was employed in several embassies, which he discharged so well, that Henry IV. made him chancellor: but afterwards the seals were taken from him, though he was suffered to retain the title; on which he said, a chancellor without seals, is a body without a soul. He died at Paris in 1607.—Moreri. Novo. Dict. Hist.

BELLIN (James Nicholas), an ingenious French geographer, died at Paris in 1772, aged 69. He was member of the royal society of London, and published the Hydrographie Française; Essais géographiques, sur les Isles Britanniques, and other valuable works.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BELLINI (Gentile), a Venetian painter, was born in 1421, and employed by the republic in painting the pieces which adorn the council hall. It is said that he was engaged by Mahomet II. emperor of the Turks, for whom he painted the beheading of St. John the Baptist. The emperor was greatly pleased with the picture, but discovered a fault in the skin of the neck, and to prove his observation caused the head of a slave to be struck off in his presence. This sight so shocked the painter, that he could not be easy till he got leave to return to his own country, which he did, after receiving considerable presents from the grand seignior. He died in 1501.—Pilkington.

BELLINI (John), brother of the above, whom he assisted in painting the pictures in the council chamber at Venice. He died in 1512, aged 90.—Ibid.

BELLINI (Laurence), an Italian physician, was born at Florence in 1643, and graduated at Padua. He afterwards became professor of philosophy at Pisa, which he exchanged for that of anatomy. He died in 1703. He wrote several anatomical and medical works in the Latin language, of great merit.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BELLOCQ (Peter), a French writer, and valet-de-chambre to Lewis XIV. He wrote BELLOI (Peter Lawrence Buyrette du), a French dramatist, was born at St. Fleur, in Auvergne, in 1727. He was for some time an advocate, which profession he quitted for the stage, and went to Russia, where he exercised his talents in that line with great applause. In 1768 he returned to Paris, and produced his tragedy of Titus, which was followed by Zelmira, the Siege of Calais, and other pieces. The king made him a present of a gold medal, and the magistrates of Calais gave him the freedom of their town in a gold box. He died in 1775. His works were printed in 6 vols. 8vo. in 1779.—Ibid.

BELLONI (Jerome), a celebrated banker at Rome, was honoured for his probity and talents by pope Benedict XIV. with the title of marquis. His Essay on Commerce was printed first in 1750, and several times since. He died in 1760.—Ibid.

BELLORI (John Peter), an Italian antiquary, born at Rome, and died in 1696, aged 80. He wrote, 1. Explication des Médailles le plus rares du Cabinet du Cardinal Campegne, 4to.; 2. Les Vies des Peintres, Architectes, et Sculpteurs modernes, 1672, 4to.; 3. Description des Tableaux peints par Raphael au Vatican, 1695, folio, and several other works, which shew great learning and taste.—Ibid.

BELLOTTI (Peter), an Italian painter, born at Venice in 1625, and died in 1700. He sometimes painted historical subjects, but his portraits are best.—Pilkington.

BELOT (John), de Blois, advocate to the privy council of Louis XIV. He is known as the author of an Apologie de la Langue Latine, Paris, 1697, 8vo.: his object in this publication is to proscribe the use of the French language in works of science.—Moreri.

BELSUNCE (Henry Francis Xavier de), a French prelate, was born in Guienne, of a noble family, and made bishop of Marseilles in 1769. He has gained immortality by his conduct to his flock, when Mar-feilias was visited by the plague in 1720. He was magistrate, almoner, physician, and priest to his people, when those whose duty it was to attend them had fled. He was offered, in 1723, the bishopric of Laon, but refused it; saying, "he would not leave a church for which he had devoted his life." He died in 1755. He wrote, L'Histoire des Evêques de Marseille; Des Instructions pastorales; and La Vie de Mademoiselle de Foix Candale. He founded a college at Marseilles.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BALUS, the founder of the Babylonian empire, flourished 1829 years B. C. His son and successor, Ninus, ordered divine honours to be paid to his memory.—Univ. Hist.

BRYLYN, son of Cynvelyn, a British prince, and chief of one of the three splendid retinues of Britain, because they embodied their troops at their own expence. He served under Caradog or Caractacus till that king was delivered to the Romans.—Owen's Cambrian Biog.

BRYLYN o LAYN, another British chief, and head of one of the golden-banded tribes, a term which they received for binding themselves together with the fetters of their horses in resisting the attack of Edwin about 620; in reward for which, they were distinguished with the golden band, an emblem of sovereignty.—Ibid.

BEMBO (Peter), a Roman cardinal, and poet, was born at Venice in 1470. Pope Leo X. appointed him his secretary in 1513, and Paul III. made him bishop of Bergamo, and a cardinal. He died in 1547. His works are in Latin and Italian; the former are public and private Letters; the Life of Gin Ubaldo de Montefeltro, duke of Arobino; Speeches; and the History of Venice. His Italian pieces are wholly poetical.—Moreri.

BENAVIDIO (Marcus Mantua), an Italian writer, was born at Padua, where he became professor of jurisprudence, and was created a chevalier. He died in 1582, aged 93. He wrote Collectanea super Jus Cæsarum, Venice, 1543, folio; Vite virorum illustrium, Paris, 1564, 4to.—Ibid.

BENBOW (John), a brave English admiral, born about 1650. He was brought up in the merchant service, and in 1680 commanded a ship in the Mediterranean trade, with which he beat off a Sallee rover. The gallantry of this action being reported to Charles II. of Spain, he invited the captain to court, and dismissed him with a letter of recommendation to king James, who gave him an appointment in the navy. King William sent him to the West Indies, where he relieved the British colonies. On his return home the greatest respect was paid to him, though the house of commons passed severe censure upon those who sent out the squadron. He was again dispatched to that quarter, and soon after his arrival fell in with the French admiral, du Casse, near St. Martha, on the Spanish coast, when a skirmishing action commenced, which continued three or four days. In the last the admiral was singly engaged with the French, his other ships having fallen astern. Though a chain shot had shattered his leg, he would not be removed from the quarter-deck, but continued the fight till morning, when the French bore away. The admiral made signal for his ships to follow, but his orders were disobeyed; in consequence of which he was obliged to return to Jamaica, and on his arrival ordered those officers, who had behaved so ill, to be confined, and brought to a court-martial, when the most culpable of them suffered according to their deserts. This gallant man died soon after, from the effects of his wound, and the disappointment he had experienced, November 4, 1702.—Biog. Br.

BENBOW (John), son of the preceding. He was bred to the sea, and the same year that his father died in the West Indies, suffered shipwreck on the island of Madagascar, in which he resided many years, and was at last brought away by a Dutch captain.—Ibid.

BENCI or BENCIO (Francis), a learned Italian jesuit, was a disciple of the celebrated Muretus. He died at Rome in 1594. He wrote Latin poems and orations, and a poem on the death of the five martyrs of the society in India.—Moreri.

BENDA (George), a musician, was born about 1721 at Altenbatky, in Bohemia. His three brothers were all musicians, and his sister was married to one of that profession. In 1748 he was appointed master of the chapel of the duke of Saxe Gotha, who sent him, in 1763, to Italy. His compositions for the stage possess great merit, particularly his Ariadne in the Island of Naxos. In 1778 he retired to Hamburgh, from whence he removed to Vienna. He afterwards returned to Gotha, where he obtained a pension, and published some pieces for the harpsichord by subscription. He died at Gotha in 1795.—Annual Necrology, 1798.

BENDISH (Bridget), grand-daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and daughter of General Ireton, married Thomas Bendish, esq. She greatly resembled her grandfather, and on some occasions would appear with the dignity of a princess, and at others stoop to the lowest drudgery. She lived at Southtown in Norfolk, and, after a day of hard labour in the management of her salt-works, would go in the evening to the assembly at Yarmouth, where she was always treated with great respect. She affected uncommon piety, and pretended to revelation, yet her word was not always to be trusted. Though she was proud and arrogant, she could fawn, prevaricate, and deceive. With such qualifications no wonder that she revered the memory of her grandfather as a hero and a saint, to whom her own character had so near a resemblance. She died about 1737.—Duncombe's Letters in the Appendix. Granger.

BENDLOWES (Edward), an English writer, was born in 1613, and educated in St. John's college, Cambridge; but squandered away a handsome fortune in a very indiscreet manner, and died poor at Oxford in 1686. He was looked upon by the needy poets as the Macenas of the age, and hence many books were dedicated to him with the most fulsome compliments. He wrote some poetical pieces of no merit.

BENEDDETTO (le), or Benedict Castiglione, an Italian painter, born at Genoa in 1616, and died at Mantua in 1670. His chief excellence lay in pastoral scenes, markets, and animals. He was also a good engraver.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

BENEDICT (St.), the founder of a religious order, was born in Italy about 480, and early embraced the ascetic life. He was followed by a number of persons to whom he gave rules, and in a short time had 12 monasteries under his direction. About 528 he retired to Mount Cassino, where he founded a monastery. He died between 540 and 550. His Regula Monachorum has been printed several times.—Moreri.

BENEDICT, a famous English abbot, was born in Northumberland, of a noble family. He made frequent tours to France and Italy, and brought over several artists, who were eminent in architecture, painting, and music. He introduced chanting in choirs in 678, and founded two monasteries. He died in 703, and was canonized.—Pitts.

BENEDICT I. pope, surnamed Bonifacius. He succeeded John III. in 574, and died in 578.—BENEDICT II. came to the pontificate on the death of Leo II. and died in 685.—BENEDICT III. was elected in 855, and opposed by an antipope called Anastasius. He died in 858.—BENEDICT IV. successor of John IX. came to the pontifical chair in 900, and held it only three years.—BENEDICT V. was chosen in 964, and opposed by Leo VIII. who was supported by the emperor Otho. The Roman people were obliged to abandon the cause of Benedict, who died in 965.—BENEDICT VI. was elected in 972, and was murdered in prison by the antipope Boniface in 974.—BENEDICT VII. succeeded Donus II. in 975, and died in 983.—BENEDICT VIII. obtained the tiara in 1012. He crowned the emperor Henry II. and his wife, in the church of St. Peter, on which occasion the pope presented the emperor with an apple of gold, surrounded with two circles of precious stones crossed, and surmounted with a cross of gold. This pope united the warrior with the ecclesiastic, and defeated the Saracens and Greeks who invaded his territories. He died in 1024.—BENEDICT IX. successor of John XIX. ascended the pontifical chair at the age of 12 years, his father Alberic, count of Tusculum, having purchased his election. The Roman people obliged him to renounce the papal dignity, and retire to a monastery, where he died in 1054.—BENEDICT X. antipope. He was elected by some factious persons in 1058, but was driven out by the Romans, who elected Nicholas II. in his room: he died in 1059.—BENEDICT XI. was the son of a shepherd; and in 1303 was raised to the papedom, on the death of Boniface VIII. He was poisoned by some ambitious cardinals a short time after his election.—BENEDICT XII. was the son of a baker, and became doctor of the university of Paris, and cardinal priest. In 1334 he was elected to the papal chair on the death of John XXII. On this occasion he said to the cardinals, "You have chosen an ass." He corrected several abuses in the church, and died in 1342, at Avignon.—BENEDICT XIII. was born at Rome in 1649, of an illustrious family, and took the religious habit among the dominicans at Venice. In 1672 he was made cardinal, and obtained also the archbishopric of Benevento; where, in 1688, his palace was shattered by an earthquake, and the cardinal narrowly escaped with his life. In 1724 he was chosen pope, and the year after he called a council at Rome, in which the bull Unigenitus was confirmed. He died in 1730.—BENEDICT XIV. was born at Bologna in 1675, of the noble family of Lambertini. In 1728 he received a cardinal's hat, and in 1731 was nominated archbishop of Bologna. On the death of Clement XII. the cardinals were a long time deliberating on the choice of a successor. Lambertini, by way of quickening them, said, "Why do you waste your time in discussions? If you wish for a saint, elect Gotti—a politician, choose Aldrovandus—a good companion, take me." This fully pleased them so much, that they elected him at once. He reformed many abuses, introduced good regulations, cultivated letters, encouraged men of learning, and was a liberal patron of the fine arts. He died in 1758. His works were printed in 6 vols. folio.—Platina. Rycant. Bower. Moreri. Novo. Diss. Hist.

BENEDICTUS (Alexander), an Italian anatomist of the 15th century. He is known by his Historia Corporis humani, printed at Basil, 1527, 8vo. All his works were printed at Venice in 1535, 1 vol. folio, and afterwards at Basil.—Moreri.

BENEFIELD (Sebastian), an English divine, was born at Prestbury in Gloucestershire in 1559, and educated in Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1606 he was appointed Margaret professor of divinity, which office he held 14 years, and then retired to his living of Meysey Hampton, in Gloucestershire, where he died in 1630. He wrote several theological works.—Wood: A. O.

B E N

BENEZET (Anthony), an American philanthropist, was bred a cooper, which business he forsook, and followed the occupation of a schoolmaster. In 1767 he wrote a Caution to Great Britain and her Colonies, in a short representation of the calamitous state of the enslaved negroes in the British dominions, 8vo. In 1772 he published Historical Accounts of Guinea; with an enquiry into the rise and progress of the slave-trade, its nature, and lamentable effects, 8vo. This amiable man seemed to have nothing else at heart but the good of his fellow-creatures, and the last act of his life was taking from his desk six dollars for a poor widow. A fine eulogium was pronounced over his remains by an American officer. "I would rather," says he "be Anthony Benezet in that coffin, than George Washington with all his fame."—Gen. B. D.

BENHADAD I. king of Syria or Damascus, began his reign B.C. 940. At the instigation of Aza, king of Judah, he made war on Israel, and took Dan and Naphthali.—SS.

BENHADAD II. generally accounted the son and successor of the above, began his reign about 900. He laid siege to Samaria, but was routed. The year following he returned and was defeated, on which he submitted to the mercy of Ahab, who treated him with liberality. The war, however, was renewed, in which Ahab was slain. In his old age Benhadad fell sick, and sent Hazael, his minister, to the prophet Elisha, to enquire whether he should recover. The treacherous messenger on his return stifled his master, and ascended the throne.—SS.

BENHADAD III. son of Hazael, succeeded his father, B.C. 836. He was defeated by Joash king of Israel, and lost all his father's conquests.—SS.

BENI (Paul), a philologist of great merit, was born in the isle of Candia when it was under the power of the Venetians. He became professor of the belles lettres in the university of Padua, and died in 1627. He wrote, 1. Anticrusca, tending to shew the inferiority of Petrarca as a writer. 2. Remarks on Ariosto and Tasso, and many other works, collected in 5 vols. folio, 1622, Venice.—Nov. Dict. Hist.

BENJAMIN, the 12th son of Jacob and Rachael, was born about the year 1738 B.C. His brother Joseph had a tender regard for him, and the description of their interview given by Moses is peculiarly touching. Benjamin was head of the tribe called by his name, which was exterminated by the others out of revenge for a violence done to the wife of a Levite of the city of Gibeon.—SS.

BENJAMIN of Tudela, born at Tudela in Navarre, and died in 1173. He visited all the synagogues of the Jews in different parts of the world, to observe their customs, and wrote a lying account of his travels in Hebrew, which was printed at Constantinople in 1543, and translated into French by John Philip Barattier, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1794, and into English by Mr. Gerrans.—Moreri.

BENINI (Vincent), a learned physician, born at Cologne in 1713, and died in 1764. He resided at Padua, where he had a printing-press in his house, from whence he issued some good editions of classical authors. He wrote Latin notes on Celsus; Observations, in Italian, upon the Poem of Alamanzi, entitled Culture; and a Translation of the Syphilis of Fracastorius.—Nov. Dict. Hist.

BENVIVENTI (Jerome), an Italian poet, born at Florence, and died in 1542, aged 89. His Canzone dell' Amore celeste e divino, is in great esteem. His works were printed at Florence, 1519, 8vo.—Tiraboschi.

BENNET (Henry), earl of Arlington, and an eminent statesman, was the son of Sir John Bennet, of Arlington in Middlesex, where he was born in 1618. He was educated at Christ church, Oxford, and in the rebellion served in the royal army. In 1658 he received the honour of knighthood at Bruges, from Charles II. who sent him as his minister to Madrid. At the restoration he was made secretary of state, and created lord Arlington. He was an acute politician, and was one of the cabinet council known by the name of the Cabal; which word was formed from the initials of the noblemen who composed it, viz. Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, Lauderdale. In 1672 he was created an earl, and about the same time invested with the order of the garter. In 1674 he resigned the office of secretary, and was appointed lord chamberlain. He died in 1685, and left one daughter, who married Henry earl of Euston, son to Charles II. by the duchess of Cleveland, and who was afterwards created duke of Grafton.—Biog. Br.

BENNET (Christopher), an English physician, was born in Somersetshire about 1617, and educated at Lincoln college, Oxford. He was afterwards chosen a fellow of the college of physicians in London, and died in 1655. He wrote Tabidorum Theatrum seu Phthicos, Atrophias, et Hecticas Xenodochium, which was translated into English in 1720.—Ibid.

BENNET (Robert), an English nonconformist divine, who was ejected from the rectory of Waddesden, in Buckinghamshire, in 1662, and died at Reading in 1681. He compiled a concordance of the synonymous words in scripture.

BENNET (Thomas), an English divine, was born at Salisbury in 1673, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and became fellow. In 1700 he obtained the rectory of St. James, Colchester; and about 1716 the vicarage of St. Giles, Cripplegate. He died in 1728. Dr. Bennet was a man of great learning, and an acute controversialist. His books are chiefly polemical, against the pagists and dissenters. His essay on the thirty-nine articles is a good book, and his Hebrew grammar shews his knowledge of that language to advantage.—Biog. Br.

BENOIT (Elias), a French protestant divine, was born at Paris in 1640, and retired to Holland on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He then became pastor of the church of Delft, and died there in 1728. He wrote a History of the Edict of Nantes, 5 vols 4to. 1693, and some other pieces. Benoit was blessed with a wife, in comparison of whom that of Socrates was an angel.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

BENOIT (father), a learned maronite, born at Gusa, in Phenicia, in 1663. At the age of nine years he was sent to Rome, and was placed in the college of maronites, where he applied to the learned languages and sciences with great success. He returned to his own country, but was recalled by the grand duke of Tuscany, who made him professor of Hebrew at Florence. He became a jesuit, and died at Rome in 1742. He edited the works of Ephrem Syrus, 3 vols. folio.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

BENSERADE (Isaac de), a French poet, was born at Lyons, near Rouen. His wit and poetical talents introduced him to court, where he obtained the patronage of cardinal Richelieu. He died in 1690.—Moreri.

BENSON (George), an eminent dissenting minister. He was born at Great Salkeld, in Cumberland, in 1699, and educated first at an academy in Whitehaven, and lastly at Glasgow. About 1721 he was chosen pastor of a congregation at Abingdon in Berkshire, from whence he removed in 1729 to a congregation in Southwark. In 1740 he succeeded Dr. Harris at Crutched Friars. About this time he received the degree of D.D. from one of the universities in Scotland. He died in 1762. His writings are: 1. A Defence of the Reasonableness of Prayer. 2. An Illustration of some of St. Paul's Epistles. 3. History of the first planting of Christianity, 3 vols. 4to. 4. Tracts on Persecution. 5. The Life of Christ. 6. Sermons. 7. His posthumous works were published in 1764, 4to.—Biog. Brit.

BENT (John van der), a Dutch landscape painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1650, and died in 1690. His masters were Vandervelde and Wouvermans.—Houbraken.

BENTHAM (Thomas), an English prelate, was born in Yorkshire, and admitted fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, in 1546. In the reign of queen Mary he was turned out of his fellowship, on which he ministered privately to the protestants in London till the accession of queen Elizabeth, when he was made bishop of Litchfield and Coventry. He died in 1578. He wrote An Exposition of the Acts of the Apostles, and translated into English some parts of the Old Testament.—Wood's A. O.

BENTHAM (Edward), an English divine, was born at Ely in 1707, and educated at the school of Chrich church, Oxford, from whence, in 1723, he was removed to Corpus Christi college. In 1731 he was chosen fellow of Oriel college, and the year following took his degree of M.A. In 1743 he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Hereford, of which church he was afterwards treasurer. On the death of Dr. Farnshawe he was nominated regius professor of divinity. He died in 1776. Dr. Bentham published some single sermons, and tracts on religious subjects.—Gen. Biog. Diâ.

BENTHAM (James), an English divine, was brother of the above, and received his education first at Ely, and then at Trinity college, Cambridge. In 1774 he was presented to the rectory of Northwold, which he exchanged in 1779 for a prebend of Ely. In 1783 he obtained the rectory of Bowbrick-hill, and when the dean and chapter of Ely resolved on a general repair of that church, he was appointed clerk of the works. He published the History and Antiquities of the Church of Ely, with plates, in 1 vol. 4to. 1771. Mr. Bentham died in 1794, aged 86.—Ibid.

BENTINCK (William), first earl of Portland, was born in Holland of a noble family, and came to England with the prince of Orange, to whom he had endeared himself by a singular act of affection and courage. When the prince was ill of the small pox, it was deemed necessary by the physicians that he should receive the natural warmth of a young person in the same bed with him. Bentinck, though he never had the disorder, immediately proposed himself for this hazardous service. He caught the disease in a dangerous manner, but recovered, and his master had the most affectionate esteem for him ever after. On the prince's accession to the English crown he was created earl of Portland, and obtained the grant of several lordships in Denbighshire, which occasioned some discontent in parliament, and the grant was revoked; but the earl afterwards received a compensation elsewhere. He was employed in several high offices, military and civil, and attended his master on his death-bed. He died in 1709, and was buried in Westminster abbey.—Biog. Br. Collins's Peerage.

BENTIVOGLIO (Guy), a cardinal, was born at Ferrara in 1579. Pope Paul V. made him a cardinal in 1621, at which time he was legate at the court of France. His works are; 1. A History of the Civil Wars of Flanders. 2. An Account of Flanders. 3. Letters and Memoirs. He died in 1644, just as he was about to be elected pope.—Moreri.

BENTIVOGLIO (Hercules), an Italian poet. He was born in 1507 at Bologna, and died at Venice in 1583. He was nephew to the duke of Ferrara.—Ibid.

BENTLEY (Richard), a celebrated divine and critic, was born at Oulton, in Yorkshire, in 1691. From Wakefield school he removed, at the age of 15, to St. John's college, Cambridge; but he took the degree of M. A. at Oxford, where he accompanied the son of bishop Stillingfleet as private tutor. He was also chaplain to that prelate, who gave him a prebend in his cathedral. In 1691 he published a Latin epistle to Dr. Mill, containing critical Observations on the Chronology of John Malala. He was the first who preached the lecture founded by Mr. Boyle, on which occasion he delivered eight admirable discourses in confutation of atheism. In 1693 he was appointed keeper of the royal library. In 1697 commenced his famous controversy with the hon. Mr. Boyle on the genuineness of the epistles of Phalaris, in which much personal abuse passed on both sides; but though some of the greatest wits of the age aided Boyle on this occasion, impartial posterity have determined the case in favour of Bentley. About this time he was presented to the mastership of Trinity college, Cambridge, with which he held the archdeaconry of Ely. Here, however, he was soon brought into trouble; for, in consequence of some encroachments made by him in the college for his own emolument, a charge was laid against him, which never came to a determination; but afterwards when he was regius professor of divinity, having exacted an exorbitant fee from persons who were admitted to the degree of D.D. by mandate, he was suspended from all his degrees, rights, and offices, in the vice chancellor's court. This arbitrary decree, however, was reversed by the court of king's bench, and the doctor restored to his privileges. He died in 1742. Dr. Bentley is advantageously known as a critic by his editions of Horace, Terence, and Phaedrus. His intended edition of the Greek Testament never appeared, in consequence of an attack made on the prospectus by Dr. Middleton. He was also the author of an excellent answer to Collins's Discourse on Free-thinking, and published an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost.—Biog. Br.

BENTLEY (Richard), a dramatic writer, was son of the preceding, and died in 1782. He wrote a comedy, called The Wishes, acted at Drury-lane in 1761 and in 1782; also Philodamus, a tragedy; and Patriotism, a satirical poem.—Biog. Dram.

BENVENUTI (Charles), a learned jesuit, born at Leghorn in 1716, and died in 1789. He was professor of mathematics at Rome, but on the extinction of his order retired to Warlaw. He wrote, An Abridgment of Philosophy; Dissertation upon Light; Reflections on Jesuitism, &c.—Novo. Dig. Hist.

BENYOWSKY (count Mauritius Augustus de), an extraordinary adventurer, was born of a noble family in Hungary in 1741. He served with reputation in the imperial army, which he quitted, and entered into the service of the Poles, who had formed a conspiracy against Russia. He was twice taken prisoner; the first time he was ransomed, and the second was sent prisoner to Caran, from whence he effected his escape, but was retaken, and thrown into a dungeon at Petersburg. In 1769 he was sent to Kamtschatka, where at first he was employed in servile occupations, but after a little while his title and abilities recommended him to the notice of the governor, who committed to his care the education of his son and three daughters. The youngest of the last fell in love with him, and her parents consented to the match. Benyowsky, however, had other objects in view, and infamously formed a conspiracy against the generous governor, who in defending the fort when attacked by the insurgents was slain. The count and his companions then quitted Kamtschatka in a small vessel, and after traversing the Pacific Ocean arrived at Macao, in China, where he entered into the service of the French East India Company. He afterwards formed a settlement in the island of Madagascar, where he assumed the sovereignty, and was acknowledged by the inhabitants. After a variety of adventures he was slain in an action with the French, May 23, 1786.—Preface to his Memoirs and Travels.

BENZELIUS (Eric), archbishop of Upsal, and chancellor of the university there, was born of mean parents in Westro Gothland. Having received a liberal education he became tutor to the son of the chancellor of Sweden, by whose means he was made a bishop and afterwards archbishop of Upsal. He wrote lives of the patriarchs, and translated the Bible into the Swedish language.—Moreri.

BENZIO (Trifone), an Italian poet of the 16th century, who was secretary to several popes. He was very deformed in person, yet the pleasantness of his conversation counterbalanced this defect; his disposition to oblige gained him many friends, and his rigid probity obtained him the name of the Socrates of Rome. His Latin and Italian poems are in the collections of Pallavicini, Gruter, and Vacchi.—Novo. Dig. Hist.

BEROLCO (Angelo), surnamed Ruzzante, was born at Padua, and died in 1542. His farces are greatly esteemed by the Italians. They were printed in 1584, in 12mo.—Moreri.

BERAULT (Nicholas), a French writer, was born at Orleans, and died about 1540. He compiled a Greco-Latin Dictionary, and published several learned books. His son Francis was a good Grecian; and turning protestant, became principal of the colleges of Montargis and Rochelle.—Moreri.

BERCHET (Peter), a French historical painter, was born in 1659, and died in 1720. He painted the ceiling of the chapel in Trinity college, Oxford, and pieces for several of the nobility.—Pilkington.

BERENGARIUS (Jacobus), an eminent anatomist of Carpo, was the first who cured the lues venerea with a mercurial ointment, which brought him great riches. He died about 1537.—Tiraboschi.

BERENGER I. king of Italy, was the son of Eberard duke of Friuli, and assumed the sovereignty on the death of Charles the first in 888. He was opposed by Guy, duke of Spoleto, who twice defeated him; but by the assistance of Arnolph, king of Germany, Berenger recovered his throne, from whence he was again driven by Lambert, son of Guy, and restored by the Italian nobles in 898. Lewis Boson, king of Arles, next opposed Berenger, but being made prisoner was deprived of his eyes. Berenger now enjoyed his kingdom peaceably twenty years, when it was dreadfully ravaged by the Hungarians. In 915 he was crowned emperor, but a faction being raised against him in favour of Rodolph, king of Burgundy, a battle was fought at Placentia in 922, in which Berenger was defeated, and afterwards assassinated.—Univ. Hist.

BERENGER II. was the son of Albert, marquis of Yvre, by a daughter of the preceding. By means of Otho, emperor of Germany, he was crowned king of Italy in 950, but his conduct was so arbitrary that the same emperor deposed him, and sent him prisoner to Germany, where he died.—Ibid.

BERENGER, a French divine of the 11th century. He denied transubstantiation, and his opinions were condemned at the council of Paris in 1050, and at Rome in 1079. He died in 1088.—Moreri. Moheim.

BERENGER (Peter), the disciple and advocate of Abelard, whom he defended with great spirit in an apology inserted in the works of that celebrated man.—Bayle.

BERENICE, daughter of Agrippa the elder, and sister of Agrippa the younger, kings of the Jews. She was married to Herod, her uncle, after whose death she became the wife of Polemon, king of Cilicia; but she afterwards left her husband, and went to live in an incestuous manner with her brother Agrippa. Titus fell in love with her, and would have declared her empress, but for fear of the Roman people. There were several of the same name, who were queens of Egypt, one of whom (the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes) gave name to a celestial constellation, in consequence of consecrating her hair in the temple of Venus.—Univ. Hist.

BERENICIUS, a strange character, who appeared in Holland in 1670. He was conjectured to be an expelled jesuit, and got his livelihood by sweeping chimnies and grinding knives. It is reported of him that he would turn into extempore verses what was said to him in prose; translate the gazettes from Flemish into Greek or Latin verse, standing on one foot; that modern and ancient languages were quite familiar to him, and that he knew by heart Horace, Virgil, Homer, Aristophanes, and several parts of Cicero and Pliny. He was suffocated in a bog, into which he fell in a fit of intoxication. The Georgarchonimachia is attributed to him.—Morri.

BERETTINI (Peter), an eminent Italian painter, was born at Cortona, in Tuscany, in 1596, and died in 1669. His pictures display wonderful grace and beauty. He was also an excellent architect.—D'Argenville's Vie des Peintres.

BERO (Mathias van den), a Flemish painter, was born at Ypres in 1615, and became a disciple of Rubens. He died in 1687.—Pilkington.

BEROEN (Dirk van den), a celebrated landscape and portrait painter. He was born at Haerlem, and died in 1689. His master was Adrian Vandervelde.—Houbraken.

BERGHEM (Nicholas), a Dutch painter. He was born at Haerlem in 1624, and died there about 1683. His landscapes are very beautiful. He engraved some with his own hand.—D'Argenville.

BERGHIER (Nicholas), historiographer of France. He wrote a learned and curious history of the great roads of the Roman empire, printed first in 1622, and again in 1729, 2 vols. 4to. He died in 1623.—Moreri.

BERGIER (Nicholas Sylvester), a French divine, was born at Darnay, in Franche Comte, and died at Paris in 1790. He was principal of the college of Besançon, and canon of the cathedral of Paris. He might have obtained several preferments, but contented himself with a moderate pension. When offered an abbey, he said "I am already rich." He wrote, 1. A Refutation of the System of Nature, 2 vols. 12mo. Deism self-confuted, 2 vols. 12mo. 3. Evidences of Christianity, 2 vols. and other works full of erudition, and in an excellent style.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BERGLER (Stephen), a learned but eccentric man of the 18th century. He spent his life in rambling about from one country to another, and at last went to Turkey, where he abjured the christian religion, and died miserably. He wrote several papers in the Journal of Leipzig, but is chiefly known by his versions of ancient authors, and commentaries. His notes on Aristophanes were inserted in an edition of that poet at Leyden in 1760.—Ibid.

BERGMAN (Torbern), a celebrated chemist, was born in 1735 at Catherineberg, in Sweden, and educated at Upsal, where he devoted himself to the medical science and those which are most nearly connected with it. Here he gained the friendship of Linnæus, to whom he communicated a collection of non-descript insects, to one of which Linnæus gave the name of Bergman. In 1761 he was appointed professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Upsal, and we find his name in the list of those who observed the transit of Venus in 1761. In 1767 he obtained the chemical professor-Ship. We are indebted to him for the knowledge of the nature of fixed air, and he made a number of experiments on the regulus of manganese, the terra magnesia, the terra ponderosa, and other substances. Before his death, which happened in 1784, he was appointed rector of the university. Some of his last literary employments were, a Treatise on Elective Attractions, and a Theory of the Earth.—Acad. Paris.

BERIGARD (Claude), professor of philosophy at Padua, was born at Moulins in 1578, and died in 1663. He was the author of, 1. Circulus Pifanus, Florence, 1641, 4to. 2. Dubitaciones in Dialogum Galilæi pro Terræ immobilitate, 1632, 4to.—Moneri.

BERING (Vitus), professor of poetry at Copenhagen, and historiographer to the king of Denmark in the middle of the 17th century. He wrote several Latin poems.—Norsk. Diät. Hist.

BERING (Vitus), a Danish navigator of the 18th century. He served in the Russian navy, and became a commodore. Peter I. entrusted to him in 1728 an expedition to explore the northern coast of America. He made no discovery in this voyage, nor in another, but in the third, made in 1741, his ship struck on an island on the coast of Kamtschatka, where he shortly after died. This island still bears his name.—Coxe's Account of Russian Discoveries.

BERKELEY (George earl of), descended from Robert Fitzharding, of the royal house of Denmark. He was one of the privy council to Charles II. and bestowed on Sion college a valuable library. He was the author of a valuable little book, entitled Historical Applications and occasional Meditations upon several Subjects, written by a Person of Honour, 12mo. 1670. He died in 1698.—Walpole's royal and noble Authors.

BERKELEY (sir William), of the same family, was vice-admiral of the white, and led the van in the desperate engagement with the Dutch, June 1, 1666. He steered into the midst of the enemy's fleet, where he was soon overpowered by numbers, and was found dead in his cabin, covered with blood.—Granger.

BERKELEY (George), a celebrated divine, was born at Kilcurn, in Ireland, in 1684. He was educated first at Kilkenny, and then at Trinity college, Dublin, of which he was chosen fellow in 1707. The same year he published Arithmetica absque Algebra aut Euclidæ demonstrata. In 1709 he published his Theory of Vision. In 1710 appeared the Principles of Human Knowledge, and in 1713 the Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, the object of both being to disprove the common notion of the existence of matter, and to establish the hypothesis that material objects have no other existence than in the mind. However singular his opinions were, there was so much beauty in his writings that the greatest men courted his friendship, among whom were Steele and Swift. For the former he wrote several papers in the Guardian, and by his means became intimate with Pope. Swift recommended him to the earl of Peterborough, who took him abroad in quality of his chaplain. In 1714 he returned to England, but soon afterwards set out again for the continent, with a son of Dr. Ashe, bishop of Clogher, and continued on his travels four years; he returned in 1721, and became chaplain to the duke of Grafton, lord lieutenant of Ireland. At this time he took his degree of D.D. and obtained a handsome fortune bequeathed to him by a lady of Dublin. In 1724 he was promoted to the deanry of Derry, and the year following printed a proposal for converting the American Indians, by erecting a college in the isles of Bermuda; his mind was so intent on this scheme, that he obtained a grant of 10,000*l.* from the commons, and set sail for America, where he resided near two years; but the project failed, owing to the minister's applying the money to other purposes. In 1732 he published the Minute Philosopher, in 2 vols. 8vo. which is a masterly attack on infidelity. The next year he was made bishop of Cloyne, and about this time he published the Analyst, in which he endeavoured to prove that the mathematicians admitted mysteries, and even fallacies in science, particularly instancing the doctrine of fluxions. He was answered by several writers, to whom he replied in 1739, in a Defence of Free-thinking in Mathematics. In 1736 he published the Querist, addressed to magistrates, occasioned by the licentiousness of the times. In 1744 appeared his book on the virtues of tar-water. He died suddenly, January 14, 1753, at Oxford, and was buried in Christ church, where there is a monument erected to his memory. Pope said no less justly than beautifully of him, "To Berkeley every virtue under heaven." He also wrote that curious book, The Adventures of Gaudenzio di Lucca, and a Letter to Dr. Friend on the Tarantula.—Biog. Br.

BERKELEY (George), son of the above, was born in London in 1733; he received his education under his father, and then became student of Christ church, Oxford. After obtaining different livings he settled in that of St. Clement Danes, in London, with which he held the rectory of Tylechurch, in Suffex, the chancellorship of Brecon, and a prebend of Canterbury. He died in 1795, and was interred in the same vault with his father. He printed some occasional sermons, and a volume has been published by his widow.—Gen. Biog. Diät.

BERKENHOUT (John), a miscellaneous writer, was a native of Leeds, in Yorkshire, and intended for the mercantile profession, which he quitted, and entered first into the military service of Prussia, and next in that of England. In 1760 he went to Edinburgh, and studied physic, but took his doctor's degree at Leyden in 1765. While at Edinburgh he published his Clavis Anglica Linguae Botanicae, a book of considerable merit. In 1778 he attended the British commissioners to America, and on his return obtained a pension. He died in 1791, aged 60. Some of his works possess considerable merit; among these are his Pharmacopoeia Medici; Outlines of a Natural History of Great Britain and Ireland, 3 vols. 12mo; Symptomatology; Biographia Literaria; Letters to his Son.—Europ. Mag.

BERKBEYDEN (Job and Gerard), two eminent Dutch painters; the first excelled in landscapes, and died in 1698; the other painted views and pieces of perspective. He fell into a canal and was drowned in 1693.—Houbraken.

BERKLEY (sir William), governor of Virginia, was born of an ancient family near London, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He governed Virginia from 1660 to 1676, when he returned to England, and died the year following. He wrote The Lost Lady, a tragic-comedy; The Description and Laws of Virginia, folio.—Wood's Ath. Oxon.

BERNAERT (Nicolas), an eminent painter, was the disciple of Snyders, whose manner he imitated with success. He died in 1663, aged 70.—Pilkington.

BERNARD of Menthon, the founder of a religious order, was born in Savoy in 923. He embraced the ecclesiastical life when young, and became archdeacon of the church of Aouft, at the foot of the Alps. Here he employed himself chiefly in propagating christianity among the mountaineers, and founded two monasteries in the passage of the Alps for the relief of pilgrims and unfortunate travellers, which still subsist under the names of the great and little St. Bernard.—Novo. Diæ. Hif.

BERNARD (St.), a divine of the Roman church, was born in 1091, in Burgundy, and in 1115 was made abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux, in which situation he acquired so great a name, that hardly any ecclesiastical affair of consequence was transacted without him. Under his direction no less than 160 monasteries were founded. He died in 1153. His works were printed in 2 vols. folio, 1690.—Moreri.

BERNARD (Edward), a learned English astronomer and critic, was born at Paul's Perry, in Northamptonshire, in 1638. After receiving his education at Merchant Taylors' school he was removed to St. John's college, Oxford, where he proceeded B. D. and obtained a fellowship. In 1669 he was appointed deputy to sir Christopher Wren in the Savilian professorship of astronomy, and in 1679 he succeeded that great man. A plan being formed of publishing all the ancient mathematicians at the university press, Mr. Bernard was nominated to the care of it, and he published part of Euclid as a specimen, but the design was never completed. In 1683 he went to Leyden to attend the sale of Heinsius's library. In 1684 he took his degree of D. D. at Oxford, and was presented to the rectory of Brightwell, in Berkshire. He died in 1697. He wrote some astronomical papers in the Philosophical Transactions; A Treatise on ancient Weights and Measures, appended to Pococke's Commentary on Horeæ; Private Devotions, &c. 1689; Orbis Eruditi Literatura a characterè Samaritico deducta; Etymologicum Britannicum; &c. &c.—Biog. Br.

BERNARD (James), a French divine, was born at Nions, in Dauphiné, in 1658, and educated at Geneva; after which he became minister of the church of Vinsobres, but when the persecution commenced he retired first to Switzerland and next to the Hague. He wrote an Historical and Political State of Europe, and succeeded Le Clerc in the management of the Bibliothèque Universelle. In 1699 he began the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres. In 1705 he was chosen one of the ministers of the Walloon church at Leyden, and professor of philosophy and mathematics in that university. He died in 1718.—Moreri.

BERNARD (Catherine), a celebrated French lady, was born at Rouen, and died in 1712. She wrote two tragedies, Brutus and Laodamia, and carried away three times the poetical prizes at the French academy. She was admitted a member of the Académie des Ricoviati at Padua. Two romances, The Count d'Amboise, and Inez de Cordova, are ascribed to her.—Moreri.

BERNARD of Thuringia, a hermit, who announced at the close of the 10th century that the end of the world was approaching. A total eclipse of the sun happening at that time, many people hid themselves in caves, but the return of light dispelled their fears. The hermit retired to his cell, and the world resumed its tranquillity.—Novo. Diæ. Hif.

BERNARD (Peter Joseph), a French poet, was born at Grenoble, in Dauphiné, in 1708, and educated in the Jesuits' college at Lyons. He was patronized by the marshal de Coigny, to whom he was secretary, and by whose interest he was appointed secretary-general to the dragoons. He died in 1776. His light pieces of poetry and operas possess merit.—Ibid.

BERNARD (Francis), an English physician, was a man of learning, and a curious collector of books. He died in 1697, and the year following his library fold for 1600l.—Granger.

BERNARD of Brussels, an eminent painter, is known by his hunting pieces, in which he introduced portraits of Charles V. and the noblemen of his court. He flourished in the middle of the 16th century.—Novo. Diæ. Hif.

BERNARD (Samuel), a French painter. He died in 1687, aged 72. He was professor in the royal academy of painting at Paris, and excelled in miniatures. He also painted some historical pieces, and engraved a fine print of the history of Attila, after a painting by Raphael, in the Vatican.—Novw. Dict. Hist.

BERNARDI (John), an Italian artist. He excelled in cutting grand subjects in crystals for jewellers, and his works are said to rival those of the ancients. He died at Faenza in 1555.—Ibid.

BERNARDIN, a Romish saint, was born in Tuscany, in 1380, and died in 1444. He was a franciscan, and was sent by his order to the Holy Land. On his return to Italy he founded above 300 monasteries, for which he was canonized. His works have been printed in folio and 4to.—Moreri.

BERNAZZANO, an Italian painter of the 16th century. He excelled in landscape.—Novw. Dict. Hist.

BERNIA, or BERNI (Francis), an Italian poet, was a native of Tuscany, and canon of Florence. He died in 1543. He is called the Scarron of the Italians.—Ibid.

BERNIER (Francis), a French traveller and physician, who resided twelve years in the court of Aurengzebe as his physician, whence on his return to France he obtained the name of the Mogul. He died in 1688. His travels were printed in 1699 and 1710.—Moreri.

BERNIER (Nicholas), a French musician, born in 1664, and died in 1734. He was music master of the chapel royal at Paris, and published cantatas and other pieces of great merit.—Novw. Dict. Hist.

BERNIER (John), a French physician, who wrote, 1. A History of Blois, 1682, 4to. 2. Medical Essays, 4to. 3. Anti-Menagiana, 12mo. 4. Critique on the Works of Rabelais, 12mo. He died in 1698.—Ibid.

BERNINI, or BERNIN (John Laurence), a celebrated Italian sculptor and architect, was a native of Naples, but resided chiefly at Rome, which he adorned with several masterpieces of his art. Gregory V. conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and his successor Urban VIII. employed him in decorating the church of St. Peter and in other public works. He executed three busts of Charles I. of England from a picture by Vandyke, on viewing which, he is said to have observed, that it was the most unfortunate looking face he ever beheld. At the age of 68 he visited Paris, in consequence of the pressing invitation of Louis XV. of whom he made a bust. He died at Rome in 1680, aged 82. Bernini had also a fine taste for painting, and several of his pictures are in the Florentine gallery.—D'Argenville Vies des Architectes.

BERNIS (Francis Joachim de Pierre de). a French cardinal, and archbishop of Albi, was born in 1715, of a noble but reduced family, and was indebted to the marchioness of Pompadour for his preferments in church and state. After having been employed as ambassador to different courts, he was made minister of foreign affairs, and obtained from the court of Rome a cardinal's hat. But the ill-succes of the French arms, and the derangement of the finances, occasioned his disgrace and temporary banishment from court. But in 1764 he was recalled and nominated archbishop of Albi. He afterwards became ambassador for France to the pope, and had a considerable share in procuring the destruction of the jesuits. He had the additional title of protector of the French church at Rome, where he lived in great splendour and hospitality till the revolution disordered his finances, on which he obtained a pension from the court of Spain. He died at Rome in 1794. His works, consisting chiefly of poems, were printed in 3 vols. 4to.—Novw. Dict. Hist.

BERNOULLI (James), a famous mathematician, was born at Basil in 1654, where he applied to the study of divinity, in compliance with the wish of his father. His inclination, however, lay to the mathematics, which he studied privately and without any assistance but his books. In 1676 he set out on his travels, and at Geneva devised a method of teaching a blind girl to write. He wrote a treatise on the comet which appeared in 1680, and soon after went to Holland, where he studied the new philosophy. From thence he crossed over to England, where he formed an intimacy with Mr. Boyle and other great men. He returned to Basil in 1682, and read lectures on experimental philosophy and mechanics. About 1684, Leibnitz published, in the Acta Eruditorum at Leipzig, some essays on his new calculus differentiales, but without discovering the method. Bernoulli, however, and his brother, found out the secret, for which they received the applause of Leibnitz. In 1687 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Basil, and in 1699 was chosen member of the royal academy at Paris. He died in 1705. His works were printed in 2 vols. 4to. at Geneva, 1744.—Moreri. Hutton's Math. Dict.

BERNOULLI (John), brother to the foregoing, was born at Basil in 1667. He studied under his brother, and in 1695 was chosen professor of mathematics at Groningen. On the death of his brother he returned to his own country, where he was appointed to succeed him. In 1714 he published a treatise on the management of ships; and in 1730 his memoir on the elliptical figure of the planets gained the prize of the academy of sciences. He was elected member of most of the learned societies in Europe, and after a long life spent in the improvement of the mathematics he died in 1748. His writings were published at Geneva in 1742, in 7 vols. 4to.—Ibid.

BERNOULLI (Daniel), an eminent philosopher, was son of the last-mentioned, and born at Groningen in 1700. After travelling through several parts of Europe, he settled at Basil, where he became successively professor of physic and philosophy.

He gained and divided ten prizes from the academy of sciences, which were contended for by the greatest mathematicians in Europe. In 1734 he divided one with his father, which occasioned a difference between them. In 1748 he succeeded his father in the academy of sciences, who had been preceded by his brother James. He died in 1782.—Nouv. Dict. Hist. Hutton's Dict.

BERNSTORFF (John Hartwig Ernest, count), a celebrated statesman, was born of a noble family at Hanover in 1712. After a very liberal education he travelled into several parts of Europe, and on his return settled at the court of Denmark, at the pressing suit of Christian VI. who sent him as ambassador to different courts. After receiving several marks of distinction from his sovereign, he became prime minister of Denmark, in which situation he distinguished himself by forming institutions of the most benevolent nature, encouraging manufactures and commerce, patronizing men of letters, improving agriculture, and other public works of the greatest utility. To him is Denmark indebted for two excellent institutions, the society of Danish language and fine arts, and the royal agricultural and economical society, both which have been of eminent service to the nation. He also patronized a society, the object of which was to send learned men into the east, and which occasioned the publication of the travels of Niebuhr. This excellent statesman was created a count in 1767, and the year following accompanied the king to England. But in 1770 he was deprived of all his employments, on which he retired with a pension to Hamburg, where he died Feb. 18, 1772.—Gen. Biog.

BERNSTORFF (Andrew Peter, count), nephew of the preceding, was born at Gartow, in Luneburg, Aug. 28, 1735. He studied at Leipzig and Gottingen, after which he travelled through several parts of Europe, and on his return to Denmark became assistant to his uncle. In 1769 he was made a privy counsellor, but was dismissed the next year, and retired to his own country house. However, in 1772, he was recalled, and shortly after appointed minister of state. His first public business in this high office was a successful negotiation with Russia concerning the exchange of the Gottorf part of Holstein for Oldenburg and Delmenhorst. During the American war Bernstorff effected an armed neutrality between Russia, Denmark, Sweden, and Prussia, for the protection of their trade from the belligerent powers. In 1780 he resigned his employments and retired to his estate; but was recalled from thence in 1784 by the prince of Denmark, and it was wholly by his management that peace was maintained when war broke out between Russia and Sweden in 1788. His public conduct was so acceptable on all occasions to the people of Denmark that medals were struck to his honour. He died in 1797, and his funeral was attended by a numerous concourse of sincere mourners.—Ibid.

BERGALDUS (Philip), an Italian writer, was born at Bologna in 1453. He read lectures on eloquence in different universities with applause, and at length settled in his native city, where he died in 1505. His works were printed at Basil in 1513.—Moreri.

BERGALDUS (Philip), an Italian poet, was nephew of the above, and became librarian of the vatican, under Leo X. He died in 1518, aged 40. His poems were published at Rome in 1530.—Ibid.

BEROSUS, priest of the temple of Belus at Babylon. He wrote a history of Chaldaea, of which some fragments are in Josephus; and dealt much in fiction, with a view of extolling his nation above all others. He was cotemporary with Alexander the Great. The antiquities published under his name by Annian in 1545, are a forgery.—Vossius de Hist. Græc.

BERQUIN (Lewis de), a gentleman of Artois, who was burnt for being a protestant at Paris, in 1520. He was a man of a noble family, and distinguished at the French court. He suffered death with great fortitude.—Bayle.

BERQUIN (Arnauld), an ingenious French writer, was born at Bourdeaux. He distinguished himself by his Idylls, which are full of sensibility and sweetness, and have been often printed. But his principal work is his Ami des Enfans (the Children's Friend), in 6 vols. 12mo, presenting for the instruction of the juvenile mind the most important lessons, under the engaging form of dialogues and stories. It has passed through a number of editions, and been translated into several languages. He died in 1791, aged 42.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BERRONI (Nicholas), an eminent painter, was born at Macerata in 1617, and died in 1682. He was a disciple of Carlo Maratti, and excelled in painting historical subjects.—Pilkington.

BERRIMAN (William), an English divine, was born in 1688, and received his education at Merchant Taylors' school, from whence he removed to Oriel college, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of D. D. In 1720 he became domestic chaplain to Dr. Robinson, bishop of London, who gave him the living of St. Andrew Undershaft. In 1727 he was elected fellow of Eton college. He died in 1750. Dr. Berriman is the author of five volumes of excellent sermons, of which the three first were preached at Boyle's and Moyer's lectures, and the two last are posthumous.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BERRUYER (Joseph Isaac), a French jesuit, was born at Rouen in 1682. His writings were condemned by the pope, because they were too liberal in their sentiments. He wrote a History of the People of God, 14 vols. 4to. He died at Paris in 1758.—Novo. Diß. Hiß.

BERRY (Sir John), a brave English commander, was the son of a clergyman, and born at Knowlton, in Devonshire. He distinguished himself at the battle of Southwold-bay, for which he received the honour of knighthood. In 1682 he was captain of the Gloucester frigate, in which he was conveying the duke of York to Scotland, but by the carelessness of the pilot, the ship was lost at the entrance of the Humber. Sir John, however, by his great presence of mind, saved the duke, for which he was promoted to a flag, and commanded under lord Dartmouth at the demolition of Tangier. On his return he was made a commissioner of the navy, which he held with his other appointments after the revolution. In 1691 he was poisoned on board of his ship at Portsmouth, aged 56. His remains were interred at Stepney.—Campbell's Lives of the Admirals.

BERSMANN (George), a learned German. He was born in 1538, at Annaberg, in Misnia; and made a great progress in the languages and sciences. He travelled through France and Italy, and after his return taught with reputation in different places of Germany, till his death, which happened in 1611. He rendered into Latin verse the psalms of David, and wrote notes on several of the classics.—Moreri.

BERTAUT (John), a French poet and divine, was born at Caen in 1552. His wit and talents introduced him to court, where he became chaplain to queen Catharine de Medicis, and secretary of the cabinet to Henry III. He was afterwards made bishop of Soerz, and died in 1611. His poems were printed at Paris in 1620, 8vo. besides which he wrote several theological pieces.—Moreri.

BERTHEAU (Charles), a French protestant divine, was born at Montpellier in 1660, and in 1681 was admitted a minister in the synod of Vigan. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he fled to England, and became minister of the Walloon church. He died in London in 1732. Two volumes of his sermons are in print.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

BERTIER (William Francis), a learned jesuit, was born at Issoudun, in Berry, in 1704. He was one of the editors of the Journal de Trevoux, which he continued till the dissolution of his society. In 1762 he was appointed keeper of the royal library, and assisted in the education of Lewis XVI. and of Monsieur. The affairs of his society obliged him to quit the court; and he went to Offenburg, where he translated the psalms into French, with notes, 8 vols. 12mo. 1785. He died in 1782.—Novo. Diß. Hiß.

BERTI (John Lawrence), an Augustine monk, was born in 1696, at Serravezza, in Tuscany. Being called to Rome by his superiors, he was appointed assistant-general of his order. He wrote De Disciplina

Theologicis in 8 vols. 4to. This work being attacked as favourable to the jansenists, the author by the advice of pope Benedict XIV. wrote a vindication of himself, in 2 vols. 4to. He also published an Ecclesiastical History in Latin, in 7 vols. 4to. He died at Pisa in 1766.—Novo. Diß. Hiß.

BERTHIER (Joseph Stephen), a French philosopher, of the society of the oratory. He wrote 1. Physique des Comètes, 1760, 12mo. 2. Physique des Corps animés, 1755, 12mo. He died in 1783, aged 73.—Novo. Diß. Hiß.

BERTHOLON (N.), a French writer, was a native of Lyons, where he died in 1799. He was professor of philosophy some time at Montpellier, which place he quitted for the history professorship in the central school at Lyons. He published several works on electricity, aerofation, and vegetation; but his principal performance is a memoir on the ancient history of the commerce of Lyons; with judicious remarks on machines and the arts.—Novo. Diß. Hiß.

BERTIN (Exupere-Joseph), a French anatomist and physician, was born at Tremolai, in the diocese of Rennes in 1712. He was for some time first physician to the hospodar of Wallachia, but disliking the country he returned to France, where he died in 1781. He was chosen associate anatomist to the academy at Paris, and published an Osteology in 1754, and several memoirs on anatomy.—Novo. Diß. Hiß.

BERTIN (Nicholas), an eminent painter, was born at Paris in 1664, and obtained a prize at the age of eighteen, from the academy of painting, of which he afterwards became a member. He died at Paris in 1736.—D'Argenville vies des Peintres.

BERTIN (Antony), a French military officer and poet, was born in the isle of Bourbon in 1752. He finished his education in the college of Du Plessis, at Paris, where he acquired a taste for poetry; and published in 1773 a small volume of poems, and in 1782 a collection of elegies, which obtained a great reputation. He died of a fever in 1790, at St. Domingo, just as he was on the eve of marriage with a young lady of whom he was enamoured at Paris. His works have been reprinted in 2 vols. 12mo.—Novo. Diß. Hiß.

BERTIUS (Peter), an eminent geographer, was born in Flanders, and became professor of philosophy at Leyden, which place he lost for being an arminian. He then went to Paris, where he turned roman catholic, and was made cosmographer to the king, and professor extraordinary of the mathematics. He died in 1629, aged 64. His principal works are Theatrum Geographia, Veteris, 2 vols. fol. Illustri virorum Epist. select. &c. 8vo. Commentariorm rerum Germanicarum, 12mo.—M. rer.

BERTRAM (Cornelius Bonaventure), professor of Hebrew at Geneva and Lausanne, was born at Thouars, in Poitou, in 1584, and died at Lausanne in 1594. He published a Dissertation on the Republic of the Hebrews, a Revision of the French Bible of Geneva, a new edition of Pagnin's Thesaurus Linguz Sanctæ, a Parallel of the Hebrew and Syriac Languages, Lucubrationes Frankendalensis.—Moreri.

BERTRAND (John Baptist), a French physician, was born at Martigues in 1670, and died in 1752. He wrote, 1. An historical Account of the Plague at Marseilles, 12mo. 2. Letters to M. Deider on the muscular Motion, 12mo. 3. Dissertations on Seaisir, 4to.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BETTERTON (Thomas), a famous English actor, was born in Westminster, 1635, and served his apprenticeship to a bookseller. In 1656 he made his first appearance in fir William Davenant's company. At the restoration he belonged to the king's company in Drury-lane, and was sent by Charles II. to Paris, to observe the French stage. He excelled in Shakspeare's principal characters, as Hamlet, Othello, Brutus, and Hotspur. In 1695 he opened a new playhouse in Lincoln's-inn-fields, but this scheme did not answer. In 1709 he obtained a benefit, and also the year following, in which he performed himself, but having taken imprudent means to repel the gout from his feet for this purpose, it proved fatal to him April 21, 1710. He was buried in Westminster-abbey. He published some dramatic pieces, chiefly taken from old authors.—Biog. Brit.

BETTINI (Dominico), an eminent Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1644, and died in 1705. He excelled in painting still life, animals, and fruit.—D'Argenville.

BETTS (John), an English physician, was born at Winchester, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he took his doctor's degree in 1654. At the restoration he became physician in ordinary to Charles II. but when he died is unknown. He published, 1. De Ortu et Natura Sanguinis, 1669, 8vo. 2. Anatomia Thomæ Parr, &c.—Wood.

BETRUSI (Joseph), an Italian poet, born at Bassano, about the year 1590. Peter Aretin was his great friend. He wrote some amorous poems, and translated the Latin works of Boccaccio into Italian. He also wrote the life of that author.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BEVERIDGE (William), an excellent prelate, was born at Barrow, in Leicestershire, 1638, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where, at the age of eighteen, he wrote a treatise of the excellence and use of the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Samaritan, with a Syriac grammar. In 1661 he was ordained, and soon after presented to the vicarage of Ealing, in Middlesex, which he resigned on being chosen rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill. He was greatly followed as a preacher, and was called "the restorer and reviver of primitive piety." He was successively prebendary of St. Paul's, archdeacon of Colchester, and prebendary of Canterbury. In 1704 he was preferred to the see of St. Asaph, in which he behaved in a manner becoming an apostolical prelate. He died in 1707, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. Besides the above work, he wrote, 1. Institutionum Chronologicarum Libri duo. 2. Synodicon, five Pandectarum Canonum S.S. Apostolorum et Conciliorum ab Ecclesia Græca receptorum, 1672, 2 vols. fol. 3. Codex Canonum Ecclesiæ primitivæ. 4. The Church Catechism explained. 5. Private Thoughts upon Religion. 6. The great Necessity of frequent Communion. 7. Thesaurus Theologicus, or a complete System of Divinity, 4 vols. 8vo. 8. A Defence of the old Version of Psalms. 9. An Exposition of the 39 Articles of Religion, folio. 10. 150 Sermons, 12 vols. 8vo. and 2 vols. folio.—Biog. Brit.

BEVERLAND (Adrian), a learned Dutch civilian, who prostituted his pen to the composition of obscene books. One of these was an essay on original Sin, which was burnt at the Hague, and the author imprisoned. On being discharged he went to Utrecht, from whence he removed to Leyden; and not long afterwards visited England, where he obtained a pension. In 1698 he published his treatise De Fornicatione Cavenda. He died insane about 1712.—Moreri.

BEVERLY (John of), an English divine, was born at Harpham, in Northumberland, but where educated is not certain. He embraced the monastic life and became abbot of St. Hilda, till Alfred king of Northumberland made him bishop of Hexham, from whence in 687 he was translated to York. He founded a college for secular priests at Beverly, and was a great encourager of learned men. Having filled the see with honour thirty-four years, he retired to a cell and died in 721.—Biog. Br.

BEVERNINGK (Jerom van), a Dutch statesman, who was employed on several important missions which he discharged with great ability. In 1654 he was ambassador to Cromwell, and effected a peace between the two countries. After this he was sent on several other embassies, but the most interesting negociation of all in which he was engaged was at the treaty of Nimeguen, which produced a general peace. He died in 1690, aged 76.—Bayle.

BEVERWICK (John de), a Dutch physician, was born at Dort, in 1594, and took his degree of M. D. at Padua. He then returned to his own country, where he practised with great reputation. He died in 1647. His works were printed in 4to. in 1651.—Moreri.

BEUF (John le), a French antiquary, was born at Auxerre, in 1687; embraced the ecclesiastical life, became member of the academy of belles-letters and inscriptions, and died in 1760. He published a collection of pieces on the History of France; that of Paris; Memoirs of the History of Auxerre; and other works.—Novo. Diæ. Hist.

BEURS (William), a Dutch painter, was born at Dordt, in 1656. He painted portrait, landscape, and flowers.—Houbraken.

BEZZA (Theodore), a learned divine, was born at Vezelai, in Burgundy, in 1519, and educated for the bar at Orleans. Here he imbibed the principles of the reformed religion, on which he retired to Geneva, and shortly after was chosen to the Greek professorship at Lausanne. After residing there about ten years he became assistant to Calvin both in the church and university of Geneva. Some time afterwards he went to Navarre by desire of the king, to assist at a conference held with the catholic divines, where he displayed his eloquence to great advantage. In the civil war, which happened not long after, he accompanied the prince of Condé, and was present at the battle of Dreux. In 1563 he returned to Geneva; and in 1571 he went to France to assist at the synod of Rochelle, where he was chosen moderator. He died in 1605. His polemical pieces are now forgotten, but his Latin poems first printed in 1548 are still read. A Greek MS. of the New Testament which once belonged to Beza is now in the university library at Cambridge, a perfect copy of which has been published by Dr. Kipping.—Bayle.

BEZOUT (Stephen), a French mathematician, was born at Nemours in 1730, and died at Paris in 1783. He was a member of the academy of sciences, and examiner of the marines, and the pupils of artillery. He wrote a course of Mathematics for the use of the marine, with a treatise on Navigation, 6 vols. 8vo.; another course of Mathematics for the corps of artillery, 4 vols. 8vo.; a general Theory of Algebraic Equations, and other esteemed works.—Hutton.

BIANCANI (Joseph), a jesuit and mathematician, was born at Bologna, and died at Parma in 1644. He published an edition of the works of Aristotle; Cosmography demonstrated; a Chronology of eminent Mathematicians; Dissertation on the Nature of Mathematics; and other works.—Novo. Diæ. Hist.

BIANCHI (Francis), an Italian painter, was a native of Modena, and the master of Correggio. He died in 1520.—Depiles.

BLANCHINI (Francis), an Italian mathematician and ecclesiastic, was born at Verona, of a noble family, in 1662, and when young established a mathematical society at his native place. Pope Alexander VIII. made him his librarian. He afterwards obtained several ecclesiastical preferments, and died in 1729. He published Palazzo di Cesari, 1738, fol.; Inscrizioni Sepolcrali della Casa di Augusto, 1727, fol.; Pieces of Poetry and Eloquence; An Universal History in Italian, 1697; but his principal performance is entitled Heperi et Phosphorinova Phenomena sive Observationes circa planetam Veneris. He is not to be confounded with John Fortunatis BIANCHINI, an Italian physician, who died professor in that faculty at Padua, in 1779. He wrote on Medical Electricity; on the Force of Imagination on Pregnant Women; Discourse on Philosophy; and other pieces.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BIARD (Peter), a French sculptor, was born at Paris, and died in 1609, aged 50. He executed many excellent pieces, the chief of which is the equestrian statue of Henry IV.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BIAS, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was a native of Caria, and flourished about 680 B.C. His apophthegms have been recorded by Diogenes Laertius.—Moreri.

BISIENA (Bernardo da), a Roman cardinal, was born of an obscure family in 1470. He entered into the service of the Medici family, and by his address was instrumental in securing the election of Leo X. who made him a cardinal, and employed him on several important missions. At last, it is said, he excited the jealousy of Leo by his ambition, and was poisoned in 1520, but this suspicion does not appear to be well founded. Babienna wrote a famous comedy called Calandria, which is still in repute among the Italians.—Tiraboschi.

BISIENA (Ferdinand Galli), an eminent painter and architect, was born at Bologna, in 1657, and employed by the duke of Parma and the emperor as first painter. He also built several magnificent structures, which shew a great taste. He died in 1743. D'Argenville.

BIBLIANDER (Theodore), a protestant divine, whose true name was Bouchman, was born in Switzerland, and became professor of divinity at Zurich, where he died in 1564, aged 60. He published a version of the Koran, with pieces in refutation of it; he also wrote Commentaries on the Scriptures.—Bayle.

BICHAT (Marie Francois Xavier), professor and physician in the Hotel Dieu at Paris, commenced his studies in the hospital at Lyons, under Mr. Petit. When that city was taken he retired to Paris, where he obtained the patronage of the celebrated surgeon Desault, by whose instructions he greatly profited. He died in 1802, aged 31. Bichat published, 1. Memoirs in the Collection of the Medical Society. 2. A Treatise on the Membranes. 3. Recherches Physiologiques sur la Vie et la Mort, 1799, 8vo. 4. L'Eloge de Desault in the 4th vol. of the Journal de Chirurgie.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BIDDLE (John), a zealous socinian, was born at Wotton Under Edge, in 1615. He took his degree of M. A. at Oxford, in 1641, after which he became master of the grammar-school at Gloucester, but lost that situation on account of his publishing objections to the doctrine of the Trinity. He suffered also imprisonment there for some time; and after his release continuing to propagate his notions, he was summoned before the parliament, who ordered him into close custody. His writings made so much noise as to be the cause of an ordinance of parliament, denouncing death to any who should deny the orthodox faith. During the distractions of public affairs, Biddle escaped a long time, but at last he was sent to St. Mary's Castle for life by Cromwell. From thence he was recalled in 1658; but in 1662 he was taken up at a conventicle, and on process of common law fined 100l. and ordered to be imprisoned till it should be paid. He died in prison Sept. 22, 1662.—Tulmin's life of Biddle.

BIDLOO (Godfrey), a celebrated anatomist, was born at Amsterdam in 1649. He was successively professor of anatomy at the Hague and at Leyden; but was called from the latter place to be physician to king William, at whose death he returned to that university, where he died in 1713. His great work is entitled Anatomia Corporis Humani, published at Amsterdam, fol. 1685. He also wrote Latin poems, printed after his death in 1719.—Moreri.

BIZ (Adrian de), a celebrated painter of portraits and architectural pieces, was born at Liere in 1594, and settled at Rome, where he met with considerable employment.—Depiles.

BIRLFIELD (James Frederic, baron de), a celebrated modern writer. He was born at Hamburgh in 1717, and in 1745 was appointed by the king of Prussia tutor to his brother prince Ferdinand; in 1747 curator of the universities; and the year following a baron and privy counsellor. He died in 1770. His works are, Political Institutions, 3 vols. 8vo.; Progress of the Germans in the Belles-lettres, 8vo.; Dramatic Amusements; Familiar Letters; on Universal Erudition. BIGNE (Marguerin de la), doctor of the Sorbonne, and dean of Mans. He was born in 1546, at Bayeux, and was alive in 1591. He compiled the Bibliotheca Patrum, the first edition of which appeared in 1575, in 3 vols. fol. but since it has been greatly enlarged.—Moreri.

BIGNICOURT (Simon de), a French poet, was born at Rheims, and became a counsellor of that city. His works are; a Collection of Latin and French Poems, 12mo.; Pensées et Réflexions Philosophiques. He died in 1775, aged 66.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BIGNON (Jerome), a French writer and statesman, was born at Paris in 1590, and became page of honour to the dauphin, afterwards Lewis XIII. He is said to have written a description of the Holy Land, at ten years of age; and another book on the election of popes at the age of 14. His father procured for him the post of advocate-general in the grand council, and some time after the king appointed him counsellor of state, and advocate-general in the parliament. The next year he was made king's librarian. He was engaged in several important negotiations, and died in 1656.—Life by Abbé Perault.

BIGOT (Emeric), an eminent encourager of letters, was born at Rouen in 1626. He collected a capital library, and cultivated an acquaintance with learned men, particularly Menage and Nicholas Heinsius. He also assisted in the publication of several works, but printed only one with his own name, which was the life of St. Chrysostom in Greek, by Palladius, discovered by him in the grand duke's library at Florence. To this he subjoined a Latin translation. He died at Rouen in 1689. His library was publicly sold at Paris in 1706.—Bayle.

BILFINGER (George Bernard), a German writer, was born in 1693, and became professor of philosophy at St. Petersburg, and of theology at Tubingen. He died in 1750, and is known by several acute publications, the chief of which is entitled Dilucidationes Philosophicæ de Deo, Anima Humana, Mundo, et Generalibus rerum Affectionibus.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BILLI (James de), a French ecclesiastic, was a native of Guise in Picardy, and died at Paris in 1581, aged 46. He translated several of the Greek fathers into Latin, and wrote Observations on the Scripture. He is not to be confounded with another of both his names, who wrote, Opus Astronomicum, and some other mathematical works, and died in 1679.—Moreri.

BILLINGSLEY (Henry), born at Canterbury and educated at Oxford, after which he was bound apprentice to a haberdasher in London, and setting up for himself acquired great wealth; served the offices of sheriff, alderman, and lord mayor of the city. This last was in 1598, when he was knighted. He received into his house an eminent mathematician called Whitehead, an expelled friar, from whom he learned the mathematics, in which he became remarkably skilled. Sir Henry was the first who published Euclid's Elements in English, with annotations drawn from the MSS. of his master, London, 1570, folio. Dr. John Dee prefixed a learned preface to this work. Sir Henry died in 1606.—Wood's A.O.

BILSON (Thomas), a learned prelate, was born at Winchester in 1536, and educated at the school there, from whence he removed to New college, Oxford. His first preferment was the mastership of Winchester school, after which he was made warden of the college. In 1585 he published a treatise of the difference between christian subjection and unchristian rebellion, dedicated to queen Elizabeth; and in 1593 he printed another on the perpetual Government of Christ's Church, which procured him the bishopric of Worcester, in 1596; from whence he was soon removed to Winchester. In 1604 he published a famous book, on Christ's Descent into Hell; and in the same year was one of the disputants at the Hampton court conference. He had also a share in the present translation of the Bible, and died in 1616. His remains were deposited in Westminster-abbey.—Biog. Br.

BINGHAM (Joseph), a learned divine, was born at Wakefield in Yorkshire, in 1668, and admitted of University college, Oxford, in 1684, of which he was elected fellow. In 1690 he was presented, by Dr. Radcliffe, to the rectory of Headbourne-worthy, in Hampshire, where he began his great work, the Origines Ecclesiasticæ, which was completed in 1772, in 10 vols. 8vo. and 2 vols. folio. In 1713 bishop Trelawny gave him the rectory of Havant, near Portsmouth. He died in 1723, and was buried in the church-yard of Headbourne-worthy. He wrote also a Scholastic History of Lay Baptism, and other works. His second son, Joseph, was educated at the Charter-house, from whence he removed to Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He died at the age of 22; after which was published an edition of the Theban History, prepared by him for the press.—Gen. B. D.

BINNING (Hugh), a Scots divine, was born in Ayrshire in 1625, and educated at Glasgow, where he became professor of moral philosophy. He died in 1654. His sermons and tracts were published in one volume 4to. at Edinburgh, 1735.—Ibid.

BION of Smyrna, a Greek poet, who flourished B.C. 280. Moschus, his disciple, says that he died of poison. His Idylls are very delicate and tender. They are generally published with those of Moschus.—Bayle.

BION, the philosopher, was a native of Scythia, and the disciple of Crates, afterwards turned cynic, then atheist, and at last became a follower of Theophrastus. He appears to have been an ostentatious fellow, possessor of more wit than wisdom. He flourished 246 B.C. There was another Bion who was a follower of Democritus.—Ibid.

BION (Nicholas), a French mathematician and engineer, who died at Paris in 1733, aged 81. He is chiefly known by a good work on the Construction of Mathematical Instruments, which has been translated into English in 1 vol. folio. He also wrote a treatise on the Use of the Globes, 4to.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BIODI (Francis), an elegant historian, was a native of Liefena, an island in Dalmatia, and was recommended by sir Henry Wotton to king James I. who honoured him with knighthood, and gave him an appointment about his person. He wrote the history of the wars between the houses of York and Lancaster in Italian, which was translated into English by Henry earl of Monmouth.—Gen. B. D.

BIONDO (Flavio), in Latin Blondus, an antiquary and historian of the fifteenth century, was a native of Forli, and became secretary to pope Eugenius IV. He served three succeeding pontiffs in the same capacity, and died in 1463. He wrote, Roma Instructa, a work of great labour and learning; Italia Illustrata; De Origine et Gestis Venetorum, and other works of considerable merit.—Tiraboschi.

BIRNSTAHL, a learned Swede, was born at Rotarbo, in Sudermania, in 1731, and became professor of the Oriental and Greek languages at Lunden. He was sent to Turkey by the king of Sweden, and died at Salonica in 1779. His travels were published at Stockholm in 1778, 3 vols. 8vo. and a continuation in 1781; a German translation appeared in 1783, in 6 vols. 8vo.—Gen. Biog.

BIRAGUE (Réne de), a Milanese of a noble family, who escaped to France to avoid the vengeance of Lewis Sforza. Francis I. made him counsellor to the parliament of Paris, and Charles IV. appointed him keeper of the seals in 1570, and chancellor of France in 1573. He was one of the authors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Gregory XIII. made him a cardinal at the instance of Henry III. who, however, deprived him of the seals. He died in 1583, aged 74. He was a time-serving and unprincipled character.—Morri.

BIRAGUE (Clement), an engraver on precious stones, and said to have been the first who discovered the means of engraving on diamonds. The first work he executed of this kind was a portrait of Don Carlos, prince of Spain. Birague was a Milanese, and lived long in the court of Philip II.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BIRCH (Thomas), a miscellaneous writer, was born in London in 1705. His parents, who were quakers, intended him for trade, but the love of learning prevailed, and he was permitted to pursue his inclination on condition that he should provide for himself. He was usher in three schools kept by quakers, which sect. however, he soon quitted, and in 1730 was ordained a minister of the church of England; soon after which he obtained the living of Ulting in Essex. In 1735 his merits procured him the honour of being elected a fellow of the royal and antiquarian societies. He was presented to several church preferments in succession, the last of which was the rectory of Depden in Essex, which he held with the united rectories of St. Margaret Pattens and St. Gabriel, Fenchurch Street. In 1752 he was elected one of the secretaries of the royal society, and the year following the archbishop of Canterbury conferred on him the degree of D.D. He was also appointed one of the trustees of the British museum. He was killed by a fall from his horse in 1766. Dr. Birch had a considerable share in the General Dictionary, historical and critical, 10 vols. folio: and published the lives of Mr. Boyle, archbishop Tillotson, Henry prince of Wales, and other works of a like kind. He also wrote an Enquiry into the share which Charles I. had in the Transactions of the Earl of Glamorgan, 8vo. 1747. A History of the Royal Society, 4 vols. 4to. 1756, &c. Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, 2 vols. 4to. &c. He left his books, MSS. and 500l. to the British museum, the money to go towards increasing the stipend of the two assistant librarians.—Biog. Br.

BIRD (William), an English musician, who belonged to the chapel royal of Edward VI. and in the reign of Elizabeth was organist of the queen's chapel. He died in 1623, aged 80. His compositions were numerous and excellent.—Burney. Hawkins.

BIREN (John Ernest), duke of Courland, was descended from a mean family in that country, and born in 1687. He ingratiated himself into the good graces of Anne, duchess dowager of Courland, who made him her favourite, and when she became empress of Russia, entrusted to him the sole management of affairs. His conduct was arbitrary and cruel in the extreme. Several noble families were reduced to ruin, and above 20,000 persons were exiled by him to Siberia. In 1737 the empress compelled the nobles to chuse him duke of Courland, where he governed in the same despotic manner. On the death of Anne, he assumed the regency by virtue of her will, but in 1740 a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was condemned to death, which sentence was changed to banishment in Siberia. Peter III. recalled him, and Catherine restored him to his former dignity. He resigned the sovereignty of Courland to his son in 1769, and died in 1772.—Coxe's Travels in Russia.

BIRINGOCOCIO, or BIRINGOCUCCI (Vanmuccio), an Italian mathematician of the 16th century, who wrote on the Art of Fusing and Casting Metals, particularly for making Cannon. His work entitled Pirotechnia was printed at Venice in 1540, 4to. and several times reprinted.—Gen. Biog.

BIRKENHEAD (for John), a political writer, was born at Northwich, in Cheshire, in 1615, and educated at Oriel college, Oxford. In the civil war he conducted a periodical work in favour of the court, called Mercurius Aulicus. He also wrote a vast number of keen pamphlets against the men in power, for which he was several times imprisoned. At the restoration he was knighted and made master of requests. He died in 1679.—Wood's A. O.

BIRON (Armand de Gontault, baron de), a celebrated French general, was born of an ancient family of Perigord. He was for some time page to queen Margaret of Navarre; afterwards he entered into the army, and signalized himself in the wars of Piedmont. He displayed great courage and prudence in the civil war, and was present at the battles of Dreux, St. Denys, and Moncontour. In 1577 he was made a marshal of France. He saved several of his friends in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Henry III. sent him into the Pays Bas to succour the duke d'Alençon, but here he was defeated by the duke of Parma. He was slain at the siege of Eprenai, in Champagne, in 1592, aged about 65. He wrote commentaries of his transactions, which are lost.—Moreri.

BIROX (Charles de Gontault, duke of), son of the above, was admiral and marshal of France. He became the favourite of Henry IV. who raised in his favour the barony of Biiron into a dukedom, and sent him ambassador to England and other countries. Notwithstanding these favours, Biiron basely entered into a conspiracy with Spain and Savoy against his sovereign, which being discovered, he was tried and beheaded in 1602. His love of gaming and pleasure seems to have been the main cause of his fall and shameful end.—Ibid.

BISCALINO (Bartholomew), an historical painter, was born at Genoa in 1632, and died in 1657. His designs were so admirable as to give a promise of his becoming one of the greatest painters of his country.—Pilk.

BISCHOP (John de), a Dutch painter of landscape and history, was born at the Hague in 1646, and died in 1686. His drawings are very highly prized, as they are correct and in a fine taste. He is not to be confounded with Cornelius BISCHOP, who painted also in landscape and history. He was the disciple of Dol, and died in 1674.—Ibid.

BISBOP (Samuel) an English divine and poet, was born in London in 1731, and educated first at Merchant Taylors' school, and next at St. John's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and the degree of M.A. He became master of Merchant Taylors' school, rector of St. Martin Outwich, London, and of Ditton in Surrey. He died in 1795. His poems have been published in 2 vols. 4to. and 2 vols.

BISI (Bonaventura), an historical and miniature painter, was born at Bologna, and died in 1662. His works are highly valued.—Pilkington.

BISSER (Charles), a physician; after completing his studies at Edinburgh, he became surgeon in the army, and was abroad some years. On his return he settled at Skelton in Yorkshire. He died in 1791, aged 78. His writings are; 1. An Essay on the Theory and Construction of Fortifications, 8vo. 1753. 2. A Treatise on the Scurvy, 8vo. 1775. 3. An Essay on the Medical Constitution of Great Britain, 8vo. 1762.—*Europ. BIROW, a mathematician, who lived about the year 935 B.C. He wrote a treatise on warlike machines, which is extant in the Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1593, folio.—Moreri.

BIZOT (Peter), a French writer, who is known by a curious book, entitled Histoire Medallique de la Republique de Holland: the best edition of which is that of 1732, 5 vols. folio. He died in 1696, aged 66.—Ibid.

BIZZELLI (John), an historical and portrait painter, who died at Rome in 1612, aged 58. He was the disciple of Bronzino.—Pilkington.

BLACK (Joseph), an eminent chemist, was born at Bourdeaux in France, of British parents, in 1798. He received his education first at Belfast, and afterwards at Glasgow, where he studied physic, and took his doctor's degree in 1754. Soon after he was appointed professor of anatomy, and lecturer on chemistry; but as he did not esteem himself qualified to discharge the duties of the former station, he exchanged it for the professorship of medicine. In 1766 he succeeded his friend Dr. Cullen in the chemical chair at Edinburgh, and from that time devoted himself wholly to that science, and the improvement of his pupils. He died Nov. 26, 1799. He was the author of an inaugural dissertation on taking his doctor's degree de acido à cibis orto; "Experiments on Magnesia and Quick Lime; Observations on the Ready Freezing of Boiled Water;" these in the Philosophical Transactions; an Analysis of some Boiling Water in Iceland, in the Memoirs of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. His Lectures on the Elements of Chemistry were published in 2 vols. 4to. 1803, by Dr. Robison, who prefixed to them a memoir of the author, from which this is taken.

BLACKALL (Offspring), an eminent English prelate, was born in London in 1654, and educated at Catherine-hall, Cambridge. In 1694 he was preferred to the rectory of St. Mary, Aldermary, London; and appointed chaplain to king William. In 1707 he preached the Boyle's lecture; and in 1707 was advanced to the see of Exeter, where he died in 1716. His works were printed in 2 vols. folio, 1723.—Biog. Br.

BLACKBOURN (William), an eminent architect, was born in Southwark in 1750. After serving an apprenticeship to a surveyor, he was admitted a student of the royal academy, and in 1773 obtained a prize medal for a drawing of the inside of St. Stephen's church, Walbrook. In 1782 he gained the premium of 100 guineas for the best plan of penitentiary houses, which occasioned him to be employed in various parts of the kingdom to erect prisons. He died on a journey to Scotland on the same business in 1790.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BLACKBURNE (Francis), an English divine, was born at Richmond in Yorkshire in 1705. He received his education at the schools of Hawkhead, in Lancashire, and Sedburgh, in Yorkshire, and in 1722 was entered of Catherine hall, Cambridge. In 1722 he entered into orders, and about 1739 obtained the rectory of Richmond. He was some time chaplain to Dr. Hutton, archbishop of York, who gave him the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and a prebend in the cathedral. Mr. Blackburne sat very loose to the doctrines and discipline of the church of England, as appears from his writings; the most noted of which is, "The Confessional, or, A full and free Inquiry into the Right, Utility, Edification, and Success of establishing systematical Confessions of Faith and Doctrine in protestant Churches." This work, which was anonymous, appeared first in 1766, and quickly reached a third edition. It is now forgotten. The archdeacon was so partial to the dissenters in this performance, that the dissenting congregation in the Old Jewry, on the death of Dr. Chandler in 1766, invited him to be their minister. Besides the above performance, he wrote a short historical View of the Controversy concerning the intermediate State, &c.; in which he maintained the notion of the soul's sleeping in an unconscious state during the interval between death and the resurrection; and some other pieces. All his works have been lately printed in a collected form, in 6 vols. 8vo. He died at Richmond in 1787.—Gen. Biog. Encyclop. Brit.

BLACKLOCK (Thomas), a Scotch divine and poet, was the son of a poor tradesman at Annan, where he was born in 1721. He lost his sight by the small pox in his infancy. In 1740 he was deprived of his father, who had been particularly attentive to his education. Dr. Stephenson, a physician of Edinburgh, then sent for him, and placed him in the university, where he made a considerable proficiency in the classics and sciences. In 1745 he retired into the country, and published at Glasgow a small collection of his poems; a second edition of which appeared at Edinburgh in 1754. In that year Mr. Spence introduced him to public patronage, by a memoir of him prefixed to a quarto edition of his poems: the profits of this publication placed the author in a desirable situation in the university. About 1760 he entered into the ministry; and in 1766 received the degree of D. D. He died in 1791. Besides his poems, he published, Paraclesis, or Consolations deduced from natural and revealed Religion, 8vo.; Two Discourses on the Spirit and Evidences of Christianity, translated from the French, 8vo.; The Graham, an heroic ballad, in 4 cantos, 4to.; Remarks on civil Liberty, 8vo., and some other pieces.—Life in Anderson's Collection of Poets.

BLACKMORE (Sir Richard), an English physician and poet, was born in Wiltshire, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he removed to Edmund hall, Oxford. On leaving the university he went abroad, and took his degree of M. D. at Padua. At his return he was chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and entered on a good line of practice. King William appointed him physician in ordinary, and conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He died in 1729. His works are very numerous on medical, theological, moral, and poetical subjects; and though it was once fashionable to treat his name with ridicule, he is entitled to respect as a worthy man and a good poet. His Creation, a poem, is deserving of great praise.—Biog. Brit.

BLACKSTONE (Sir William), a learned English judge, was born in London in 1723. Being left an orphan at a very early age, his maternal uncle sent him to the Charterhouse. In 1738 he was entered of Pembroke college, Oxford, and it is observable that, at the age of 20, he composed a treatise on the elements of architecture for his own use. He also cultivated poetry, and obtained Mr. Benson's prize medal for the best verses on Milton. These pursuits, however, were abandoned for the study of the law; on which occasion he wrote a copy of verses called the Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse. In 1740 he was entered of the Middle Temple; and in 1744 chosen fellow of All-souls college. In 1749 he was chosen recorder of Wallingford in Berkshire. The year following he became LL. D. and published an Essay on collateral Consanguinity, occasioned by the exclusive claim to fellowships made by the founder's kindred at All-souls. About 1754 he began to read his lectures on the laws of England; of which, in 1755, he published an analysis. In 1758 he printed Considerations on Copyholders; and the same year was appointed Vinerian professor of the common law; his lectures in which capacity gave rise to his celebrated Commentaries. In 1759 he published Reflections on the Opinions of Messrs. Pratt, Moreton, and Wilbraham, relating to lord Litchfield's disqualification; his lordship being then candidate for the chancellorship. The same year appeared his edition of the Great Charter, and Charter of the Forest; and about the same time, a small treatise on the Law of Descents in Fee-simple. In 1761 he was made king's counsel, and chosen member of parliament for Hindon in Wilts. The same year he vacated his fellowship by marriage, and was appointed principal of New-inn-hall. In 1762 he published 2 vols. under the title of Law Tracts. In 1763 he was appointed solicitor-general to the queen, and benchet of the Middle Temple. The next year appeared the first volume of his Commentaries, which was followed by three others. In 1766 he resigned his places at Oxford, and in 1768 was chosen member for Westbury in Wiltshire. In 1770 he became one of the judges in the court of king's bench; from whence, shortly after, he removed to the common pleas. He now fixed his residence in London, and attended to the duties of his office with great application. He also employed himself in projecting various schemes for the public good. He died in 1780, aged 56. After his death were published two vols. of his Reports.—Life prefixed to his Reports.

BLACKSTONE (John), a botanical writer, was an apothecary in London, and died in 1753. He wrote, 1. Fasciculus Plantarum circa Harefield sponte nascentium; with an Appendix containing some short Notes relating to Harefield, 12mo. 1737; 2. Specimen Botanicum quo Plantarum plurimum rariorum Angliæ indigenarum Loci natales illustrantur, 8vo. 1746.—Pulleney's Sketches of Botany.

BLACKWALL (Anthony), a learned English divine, was a native of Derbyshire, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. After taking the degree of M. A. he became master of the free-school at Derby, from whence, in 1722, he removed to Market-Bosworth in Leicestershire, on being appointed master of the grammar-school there. In 1726 he was presented to the rectory of Clapham, in Surrey, which he resigned in 1729, and died the year following at Market-Bosworth. He published a translation of Theognis, in Latin; an Introduction to the Classics, 12mo.; [a very excellent work] Sacred Classics defended, 2 vols.; a Latin Grammar.—Biog. Brit.

BLACKWELL (Thomas), a learned writer, was born in 1701 at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college, where he took his degree of M. A. and was appointed Greek professor. In 1737 he published, anonymously, an Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer, 8vo., to which he afterwards added a Supplement. His Letters concerning Mythology were printed in 1748, but without his name. The same year he was made principal of the Marischal college. In 1752 he published the first volume of his Memoirs of the Court of Augustus, 4to.; the second volume appeared in 1755; but the last was not published till after his death, which happened at Edinburgh in 1757.—Biog. Brit.

BLACKWELL (Alexander), a Scotch physician, was born at Aberdeen, and studied under Boerhaave at Leyden. He settled at first in his native place; but meeting with little encouragement, he went to London, and was employed for some time as corrector of the press. Afterwards he set up as printer, but failed. About 1740 he went to Sweden, where he got considerable practice, and was employed in some public works, particularly in draining the fens and marshes according to his own plan. Being suspected of having a share in count Tessin's plot, he was put to the torture, and then beheaded in 1748.—Gent. Mag.

BLACKWELL (Elizabeth), wife of the preceding, was the daughter of a merchant near Aberdeen. When her husband was in prison in London, she executed a number of botanical plates, all drawn, engraved, and coloured by herself; the profits of which enabled her to procure the doctor's liberty. The first volume was published in 1737, with the testimonial of the college of physicians, and is entitled, A curious Herbal; containing 500 of the most useful plants which are now used in the practice of physic, &c. The second volume appeared in 1739.—Pulleney's Sketches of Botany.

BLACKWOOD (Adam), a Scotch writer, was born at Dunfermline in 1539, and died in 1613. In 1587 he published the Martyrdom of Mary Stuart, in French, written, with great asperity of language. His writings were published at Paris in 1644.—Moreri.

BLADEN (Martin), a lieutenant-colonel under the duke of Marlborough, to whom he dedicated a translation of Cæsar's Commentaries. He sat in five parliaments. In 1715 he was made comptroller of the mint, and in 1717 a commissioner of trade and plantations. He died in 1746. He wrote Orpheus and Eurydice, a masque; and Solon, a tragi-comedy.—Biog. Dramat.

BLAEU or JANSSEN (William), a celebrated geographer, was the disciple of Wylcho Brahe; and carried on a considerable trade in Holland by his atlases. He died at Amsterdam in 1638, aged 67. His son, John and Cornelius, published their father's atlas in 14 vols. folio, in 1663.—Moreri.

BLAGRAVE (John), an English mathematician, was born at Reading, in Berkshire, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford; after which he devoted himself to a retired life at his family seat, and died there in 1611. His remains were interred in the church of St. Lawrence, Reading; where there is a handsome monument to his memory. He wrote some books on practical mathematics. He is not to be confounded with J. J. Blagrave, a noted astrologer, who was also a native of Reading, and probably a son of the former. 216 wrote a Supplement to Cuspepper's Herbal, and an astrological Practice of Physic, &c. He died about 1688.—Biog. Br. Grainger.

BLAIR (John), a Scotch divine and poet in the 14th century. He wrote an elegant Latin poem on the death of Wallace.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

BLAIR (James), an eminent divine of the Scotch episcopal church, who was sent to Virginia in 1685 by Compton, bishop of London, as missionary. He was appointed commissary for that province in 1689, and was the first president of the college of Williamsburg. He died in 1743. Four volumes of his sermons were printed at London in 1742.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

BLAIR (Patrick), an ingenious botanist and physician, was originally a surgeon at Dundee. While there, he had an opportunity of dissecting an elephant, which had been carried about for a show. His account of this animal appeared in the Philosophical Transactions, and was also printed separately. Being attached to the Stuart family, Dr. Blair was imprisoned in 1715, but was soon released. He then visited London, where he distinguished himself as a member of the royal society by several valuable discourses, the principal of which was on the sexes of plants. This he afterwards published under the title of Botanic Essays. From London he removed to Boston, in Lincolnshire, where he practised as a physician, and printed a work, entitled Pharmacobotanologia, or an alphabetical and classical Dissertation on all the British indigenous and Garden Plants of the New Dispensatory, 4to. This came down only as far as letter H, and the remainder was never published. Some other papers by him are in the Philosophical Transactions.—Pulteney's Sketches of Botany.

BLAIR (John), a learned chronologist. He was a native of Edinburgh, and came to London, where he was employed as an usher in a small school. In 1754 he published his Chronological Tables, folio, which were well received, and reached a second edition in 1768. The author was then in orders, doctor of laws, and fellow of the royal society, and the reputation he acquired by this work recommended him to the princess dowager of Wales, who appointed him mathematical tutor to the duke of York. In consequence he obtained several church preferments, the principal of which was a prebend of Westminster. He died in 1782. Since his death have been published his Lectures on the Canon of the Old Testament.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

BLAIR (Hugh), an eminent divine, was the son of a merchant at Edinburgh, and born there April 7, 1718. He received his grammatical education at the high school, from which he removed to the university of Edinburgh in 1730. While a student there he formed a comprehensive scheme of chronological tables for his own use, which being communicated to his learned friend, afterwards Dr. John Blair, mentioned in the preceding article, he improved and extended the plan into a work of great labour and value. In 1739 he took the degree of M. A. and in 1741 was licensed to preach the gospel. The year following he was ordained to the parish of Coleslie, in Fife, from whence he was soon after recalled to the second charge of the Canon-gate church, at Edinburgh, where he officiated till 1758, when he was removed to the high church, which is the most important ecclesiastical charge in Scotland. The university of St. Andrews conferred on him the degree of D. D. in 1757, a circumstance rather unusual from one university there to another. In 1759 he began a course of lectures on rhetoric and belles lettres, which were so much applauded that the king erected and endowed, in 1762, a professorship in favour of Dr. Blair, at Edinburgh, with a salary of 70l. a year. In 1763 he wrote a Dissertation on the Poems of Ossian, in which he urges many ingenious observations in behalf of their authenticity. In 1777 appeared a volume of sermons by him, which attained so rapid and extensive a sale as to induce the author to publish another volume in 1779, which was as well received as the former, and these have been followed by three volumes more. In 1780 he obtained a pension of 200l. a year by the particular interest of her majesty. About 1783 he quitted his professorship through infirmities, but his salary was continued for life, and an addition was made of 100l. a year to his pension. In that year he published his lectures, which have had a circulation little short of his sermons, and like them have been translated into various languages. In 1796 he published a sermon preached before the society instituted for the benefit of the sons of the clergy in Scotland. This excellent man and ingenious writer died at Edinburgh, Dec. 27, 1800.—Life by Dr. Finlayson, appended to Vol. V. of Dr. Blair's Sermons.

BLAIR (Robert), an ingenious poet, was the eldest son of the rev. David Blair, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, where he was born. He received his education at the school and university of his native city, after which he became minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was a good botanist and florist, and had an extensive acquaintance with optical and microscopical knowledge. He was very assiduous in the discharge of his ministerial duties, and as a preacher was serious and warm. He married the daughter of Mr. Law, professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh, by whom he had five sons and a daughter. He died February 4, 1746, in the 47th year of his age. Mr. Blair is universally and deservedly known by his admirable poem, entitled The Grave.—Life by Dr. Anderson.

BLAKE (Robert), a gallant English admiral, was born at Bridgewater, in Somersetshire, in 1599, and educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1617. Being of a grave and severe temper he joined with the puritans, by whose influence he was chosen to represent his native town in the parliament which met in 1640, but lost his election for the next. At the beginning of the rebellion he took the part of the parliament, and served under colonel Fiennes, at Bristol, when it was taken by prince Rupert. He next assisted in taking Taunton by surprize, of which place he was made governor, and defended it against Goring with such bravery that he was publicly thanked and rewarded by parliament. In 1649 he was appointed commander of the fleet, in conjunction with Deane and Popham; and soon afterwards failed in quest of prince Rupert, whom he blocked up in Kinsale harbour. The prince afterwards escaped to Lisbon, whither he was followed by Blake, who demanded leave of the king of Portugal to attack him, and being refused he took several Brazil ships. When he was gone, prince Rupert failed into the Mediterranean, whither he was followed by Blake, who attacked him in the harbour of Malaga, and destroyed nearly the whole of his fleet. He then returned to England with several prizes, and received the thanks of parliament, by whom he was made warden of the cinque ports. Soon after this he reduced the Scilly isles and Guernsey, for which he was made one of the council of state. On the prospect of a Dutch war in 1652 he was appointed sole admiral, and was attacked in the Downs by Tromp, who had 45 sail, and Blake only 23. However, he fought so bravely, that the Dutch admiral was glad to retreat. In November following Tromp failed into the Downs, with above 80 sail of men-of-war, where, after an obstinate battle, he obtained a partial victory at a dear rate. But so elated was he with it that he passed through the channel with a broom at his maintop, signifying that he had swept the sea of the English ships. In February 1653 Blake put to sea with 60 men of war, and soon after met with the Dutch admiral, who had 70 sail, and 300 merchantmen under convoy. A most bloody engagement ensued, that lasted three days, in which the Dutch lost 11 men of war, and 30 merchant vessels. The loss of the English was only one ship. In June following the fleets of the two republics fought again off the Foreland; and if the Dutch had not saved themselves on Calais sands all their ships must have been taken. In 1654 he failed into the Mediterranean, where he demolished the castle of Tunis because the dey refused to deliver up the English captives. A squadron of his ships, under the command of captain Stayner, intercepted a Spanish plate fleet, and took the admiral, vice-admiral, and two galleons. Blake having received information that another plate fleet lay at Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe, failed thither, and notwithstanding the strength of the place he boldly went in, burnt the ships, and came out without any loss. Finding his health declining fast he resolved to return to England, but died as the fleet was entering Plymouth, August 27, 1658. His body was interred in Henry the VIIIth's chapel, Westminster-abbey, from whence it was removed at the restoration, and buried in St. Margaret's church-yard.—Campbell's Lives of the Admirals.

BLAKE (John Bradley), was born in London in 1745, and educated at Westminster-school. In 1766 he was employed as one of the supercargoes of the India company at Canton, where he began to collect such seeds and vegetables as are applied in China to useful purposes, of which he sent home a great variety. He died, to the great loss of science, in 1773.—Biog. Brit.

BLAMPIN (Thomas), a benedictine monk, who published a splendid edition of the works of St. Augustine. He died in 1710.—Moreri.

BLANC (Thomas le), a French jesuit, was provincial of his order, and died at Rheims in 1669. There are several works by him, some on the Duties of persons in different callings; and a Commentary on the Psalms, in 6 vols. folio.—Ibid.

BLANC (John Bernard le), a French writer, was born at Dijon in 1707, and became member of the academy Della Crusca, and died in 1781. His best work is Letters on the English Nation, in 3 vols. 12mo.—New. Dict. Hist.

BLANC (Antony de Guillet de), a French dramatist, born at Marseilles in 1730, and died at Paris in 1799. He was for some time a member of the congregation of the oratory, where he was professor of rhetoric, but at last quitted that society, and repaired to Paris, where he was appointed professor of ancient languages in one of the central schools, and member of the national institute. He wrote, 1. Manco Capac, a tragedy, which met with indifferent success. 2. The Druids, a tragedy, for some free sentiments in which the clergy procured it to be proscribed. Besides these pieces he was the author of some comedies and romances.—Ibid.

BLANCA (Francis le), a French writer, who was employed by Lewis XIV. to draw up a general account of the monies of France. It was published in 1690, 4to. with figures. He also wrote a treatise on the coins of Charlemagne and his successors struck at Rome. He died in 1693.—Moreri.

BLANCHARD (John Baptist), a jesuit, was born at Tourteron, in the Ardennes, in 1731, and died in 1797. He was professor of rhetoric in the college of Jesuits at Metz and Verdun, but after the destruction of his order he went and resided near Namur.

He wrote, 1. The Temple of the Muses, a collection of fables, with remarks. 2. The School of Manners, consisting of moral reflections and historical facts.—Novv. Di&. Hift.

BLANCHARD (James), an eminent painter, born in 1600, and died in 1638. He excelled on religious subjects.—Depile.

BLANCHARD (William), a French lawyer and advocate in the parliament of Paris. He published a Chronological Table of the Ordinances of the French Kings of the third Race, 2 vols. folio, 1717. It is held in great esteem, and the author was preparing a supplement to it when he died, in 1724.—Moreri.

BLANCHE of Castille, queen of France, was the daughter of Alphonso IX. king of Castille, and married Lewis VIII. of France in 1200, by whom she had nine sons and two daughters, whom she educated with the greatest care in the principles of virtue and piety. On the death of her husband in 1226 she became regent, her son Lewis being only twelve years old. In this station she behaved with great firmness and prudence, and kept down the aspiring spirit of the great lords of the kingdom. She paid particular attention to the education of the young king, and married him early to the daughter of the count of Provence. During his romantic expedition to the Holy Land she governed the kingdom with great discretion, but the news of his defeat and imprisonment so affected her spirits, that she died in 1252, to the regret of the whole nation.—Moreri.

BLANCHET (Thomas), a professor of painting in the academy of Paris, was born in 1617, and died in 1689. His manner was good, his design correct, and his colouring excellent.—D'Argenville.

BLANCHET (abbé), keeper of the books in the French king's cabinet. He is known by his Variétés Morales et Amusantes, 1784; and Apologues et Contes Orientaux, 1785, 8vo. which are sentimental and amusing. He died in 1784.—Novv. Di&. Hift.

BLAND (Elizabeth), eminent for her knowledge of the Hebrew language, was born in Longacre, London, about 1660. Her maiden name was Fisher, and in 1681 she married Mr. Nathaniel Bland, of Boston, in Yorkshire. She wrote the Hebrew language with great elegance, and the royal society have preserved a phylactery of her writing among their curiosities. She was living in 1712.—Ballard's Lives of British Ladies.

BLANDRATA (George), an Italian physician of the 16th century, who having broached the arian doctrine, the inquisition of Pavia was desirous of roasting him, to avoid which he fled to Geneva, from whence he was obliged to fly to Poland in 1558. He became physician to Stephen Battori, king of Poland, who also made him privy counsellor. At first he wished to make the king a profelyte to his notions, but finding that he could not succeed he relaxed in his zeal, and paid his court to the jesuits. He was strangled by his nephew, whom he had made his heir, about the year 1593.—Bayle.

BLANKOF (John Teuniz), a Dutch painter of landscapes and sea pieces. He was born at Alkmaar 1628, and died in 1670.—Houbraken.

BLEDYDYN, a British prince, who reigned in conjunction with his brother Rhiwallon in North Wales till 1068, when he ruled alone. He was slain in battle in 1072. Bledyn was an active and patriotic prince, and framed a code of good laws.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

BLEDYDYN, a British bard, who flourished in the 13th century. Many of his pieces are in the Welsh Archaeology.—Ibid.

BLEDRI, bishop of Landaff, who died in 1023, and of whom an historian of that period gives this character, that he was the greatest scholar among the Welsh, and thence called Bledri the Wise. He greatly encouraged learning in his diocese.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

BLEECK (Peter Van), an eminent painter, who died in London in 1764. The celebrated picture of Johnson and Griffin, two famous comedians, in the characters of Ananias and Tribulation in the Alchymist, was by him.—Gen. Biog. Di&.

BLEGWRYN, chancellor of Landaff, under his brother Morgan, prince of Glamorgan. He was a learned man, and accompanied Howell the good to Rome, to consult about the revision of the laws of Wales in 926.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

BLEONY (Nicholas de), a French surgeon, who established in his house at Paris a society which he called an academy of new discoveries. Here he gave lectures on various branches of the medical profession. He also conducted a periodical journal, entitled, New Discoveries in all Departments of Medicine. Besides this, he published various works in physic and surgery. He died at the close of the 17th century.—Haller Bibl. Med. Pract.

BLESS (Henry), an historical and landscape painter, was born at Bovine, near Dinant, in 1480, and died in 1550. His pieces are called owl pictures, because he drew that bird in them as a mark.—Pilkington.

BLETERIE (John Philip Rene de la), an ingenious French writer. He was professor of eloquence in the royal college at Paris, and a member of the academy of belles-lettres. He died in 1772. His principal works are, The Life of the Emperor Julian, 12mo. The History of the Emperor Jovian, 2 vols. 12mo. A Translation of some works of Tacitus, 2 vols. 12mo.—Novv. Di&. Hift.

BLOCK (Marie Eliezer), an ingenious naturalist, was born at Anspach, of mean parentage. Entering into the service of a surgeon he studied anatomy, and afterwards physic and natural history. His first researches were into the intestinal vermes, on which he wrote a treatise. Many of his memoirs on fishes are in the memoirs of the society of the friends of nature at Berlin, and he published in the years 1783 and 1799 a capital work, entitled, A general and particular History of Fishes, 6 vols. folio, with coloured plates. He died August 6, 1799.—L'Esuy Diß. Univ.

BLOCK (Daniel), an eminent portrait painter, was born in Pomerania in 1580, and died in 1661. There were two others of the same name, Jacob and Benjamin; the one painted architecture and perspective, and the other portrait and history.—Houbraken.

BLOCKLAND (Anthony de Montfort), an historical and portrait painter, was born in 1532, and died in 1583. His pictures are very elegant. He had two brothers, Peter and Herbert, who both studied under him. The first painted battles and markets, and the other portraits and conversations.—Ibid.

BLOEMART (Abraham), a Dutch painter, born in 1567, and died in 1647. Several prints have been engraved after his works. His sons Henry and Adrian followed his profession, but not with equal reputation.—Dopier.

BLOEMEN (John Francis), a Flemish painter of eminence, who died at Rome in 1740, aged 84. His landscapes are in the first style of excellence.—Pilkington.

BLOND (James Christopher le), a miniature painter, born at Frankfort on the Maine in 1670, and died in 1741. He invented a method of engraving in colours, on which he wrote a treatise.—Nouv. Diß. Hist.

BLONDEL (David), a French protestant divine, was born at Chalons in 1591. He wrote a defence of the reformed churches of France, in answer to the bishop of Lucon, afterwards cardinal Richelieu, which gained him great reputation. The national synod of Charenton chose him honorary professor in 1645. He succeeded Vossius at Amsterdam as professor of history, and died there in 1655. His principal works are, Explications on the Eucharist; of the Primacy of the Church; on the Sybils; and on Bishops and Presbyters. Blondel offended many zealous protestants by refuting the story of pope Joan.—Bayle.

BLONDÉL (Francis), a French architect. He obtained several distinguished situations in the army and navy, and instructed the dauphin in mathematics. He was a director of the academy of architecture, member of that of sciences, and died in 1680. He wrote some books on architecture; the Art of throwing Bombs; History of the Roman Calendar; a new Manner of fortifying Places.—D'Argenville.

BLONDÉL (John Francis), of the same family with the above, was born at Rouen in 1705, and became eminent in architecture, of which he was elected professor at Paris. He died in 1774. His works are, A Course of Architecture, 6 vols. 8vo.; Of the Decoration of Edifices, 2 vols. 4to.; Discourse on Architecture, 12mo. He also wrote the articles on that science in the Encyclopedie.—Nouv. Diß. Hist.

BLONDIN (Peter), a botanist, was born in Picardy in 1682. He studied under Tournefort, and in 1712 was admitted into the French academy. He died in 1713. Though he left several valuable collections none have been printed.—Eloge par Fontenelle.

BLOOD (Thomas), an extraordinary character, who rendered himself famous by two daring exploits. The first was, the seizing the duke of Ormond with an intent to hang him at Tyburn, from which his grace was delivered by his servants; and the other was that of stealing the crown and other regalia from the Tower. Blood was taken in the last enterprise, disguised as a clergyman. Charles II. caused him to be brought into his presence, where he confessed that he had once formed a design against his life, but that the sight of his majesty awed him from the execution of it. The king granted him a pardon, and gave him an estate of 500l. a year in Ireland. He died in 1680.—Biog. Brit.

BLOOT (Peter), a Flemish painter of conversations in low life. He died in 1667.—Pilkington.

BLOSTUS, or DE BLOIS (Lewis), a learned benedictine and abbot of the monastery of Liefies in Hainault. He refused the archbishopric of Cambrai, and died in 1566. He wrote Speculum Religiosorum, which has been translated into French.—Moreri.

BLOUNT (Charles), lord Mountjoy and earl of Devonshire, was the second son of James lord Mountjoy, and born in 1563. The elegance of his person and other accomplishments recommended him to the notice of queen Elizabeth, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In 1594 he was made governor of Portsmouth, and the same year succeeded his brother in the peerage. After this he formed a troop, with which he served in the Low Countries and in Brittany, but the queen was displeased with his absence, and ordered him to remain at court. She made him a knight of the garter in 1597, and gave him a military appointment in Ireland, where he succeeded in quelling a rebellion. In 1603 he returned to England, bringing with him the earl of Tyrone, the famous rebel chieftain. James I. created him lord Mountjoy earl of Devonshire, and made him master of the ordnance. At the close of life he fell into disgrace by marrying the divorced lady Rich, daughter of the earl of Essex. He died in 1606.—Biog. Brit.

BLOUNT (Thomas), an English writer, was born in Worcestershire in 1619, and died in 1679. He wrote, Boscobel, or the History of the King's Escape after the Battle of Worcester, 1681, 8vo.; Fragmenta Antiquitatis, or ancient Tenures of Land; and Jocular Customs of some Manors, 1679. The last is a curious book.—Biog. Brit.

BLPUNT (Sir Henry), an ingenious writer, was born in 1602, in Hertfordshire, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Gray's-inn, and after some time spent there, set out on his travels in 1634. He went as far as Grand Cairo, and returned to England, where in 1636 he published his Voyage into the Levant, which went through several editions. He was knighted by Charles I. and served him some time, but at last went over to the parliament, by whom he was nominated a commissioner of trade. He died in 1682.—Ibid.

BLOUNT (Sir Thomas Pope), the eldest son of the above, was born in 1649, and created a baronet in 1679. He served in several parliaments, and at the revolution was appointed by the house of commons commissioner of accounts. He died in 1697. He wrote, Censura Celebriorum Authorum, &c. 1. 4, folio; Essays on different Subjects, 8vo.; a Natural History, 1693, 12mo.; Remarks upon Poetry.—Ibid.

BLOUNT (Charles), a deistical writer, was the youngest son of Sir Henry Blount, and born in 1654. A pamphlet of his, in which he grounded King William's claim on the right of conquest, was burnt by the hangman; and another, containing the Life of Apollonius Tyaneus, gave great offence as an attack on christianity. On the death of his wife, he fell in love with her sister, and because he could not marry her shot himself in 1693. His miscellaneous works were published by Gildon.—Ibid.

BLOW (John), an English musician, was born at Collingham in Nottinghamshire. He became successively teacher of the children of the chapel royal, composer to the king, and master of the choristers in St. Paul's cathedral. Archbishop Sancroft gave him the degree of doctor in music. He became organist of Westminster-abbey on the death of Purcell, and died in 1708.—Hawkins. Burney. Biog. Br.

BLOM (Joachim Christian), a German poet, was born at Rathenau in 1739. He was educated at Brandenburg and Berlin, where he applied chiefly to the study of the belles lettres. Afterwards he removed to Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he studied under Baumgarten, and then repaired to his patrimonial estate, where he led a philosophical life, and cultivated an intimacy with the muses. He died in 1790. He wrote, Lyric Poems and Idyls; a drama called Rathenau Delivered, acted at Berlin with applause. Besides poems, he also wrote orations, and a collection of German proverbs.—Schlichtegroll's Necrology.

BLUTEAU (Dom. Raphael), a Roman catholic divine, was born in London of French parents, and studied at Paris. He afterwards went to Lisbon, where he published a dictionary, Portuguese and Latin, in 10 vols. folio, of great merit. He died in 1734, aged 96.—Moreri.

BOADICEA, or BONDUCA, a British heroine, was the wife of Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, who, for the security of his family, made the Roman emperor coheir with his daughters. The Roman officers on this took possession of his palace, exposed the princesses to the brutality of the soldiers, and scourged the queen in public. Boadicea, roused to revenge by this abominable usage, assembled her countrymen and stormed Camalodunum (now Colchester), the garrison of which were put to the sword. Suetonius Paulinus at length defeated the Britons, and Boadicea fell either among the slain or poisoned herself, A. D. 60.—Biog. Br. Tacitus.

BOATE (Gerhard), was a Dutch physician, but settled in Ireland, of which country he wrote the natural history, published by Samuel Hartlib in 1652, 12mo. Part of this work treats on agriculture.—Pulteney's Sketches on Botany.

BOBART (Jacob), a German gardener and botanist, who had the care of the physic garden at Oxford, where he died in 1679, aged 81. He wrote Catalogus Plantarum horti Medici Oxoniensis scil. Latino-Anglicus et Anglico-Latinus, 1648, 8vo. Of his son Jacob, who also belonged to the physic garden, the following curious story is told: Finding a dead rat in the garden, he made it to resemble the common figure of dragons, by altering its head and tail, and thrusting in taper sharp sticks which distended the skin on each side till it mimicked wings. He let it dry as hard as possible. The learned immediately pronounced it a dragon, and one of them gave an accurate description of it to Dr. Magliabechi, librarian to the grand duke of Tuscany; several fine copies of verses were wrote on so rare a subject; but at last Mr. Bobart discovered the cheat; however it was looked upon as a masterpiece of art; and as such deposited in the museum or anatomy school.—Wood's A. O. Grey's Notes to Hudibras.

BOCCAGE (Maria Anne le Page), an ingenious French lady, was born at Rouen in 1710, and at the age of 16 married Peter Joseph du Boccage. She displayed a taste for poetry at an early period, and acquired the friendship of several eminent literary characters, as Voltaire, Henault, Montequieu, and others. In 1746 she obtained a prize from the academy at Rouen; and contended for another given by the French academy for an eulogium on Lewis XV. Her competitor on this occasion was Marmontel, who succeeded. She published a poem entitled Paradis Terrestre, taken from Milton, and translated the Death of Abel. She died in 1802. Her works are in 3 vols. 8vo.—L'Esuy Dict. Univ.

BOCCACCIO (John), a celebrated Italian writer, was born at Certaldo in Tuscany, in 1313, and, when young, became intimate with Petrarcha. He resided a considerable time at Naples, where he fell in love with a natural daughter of the king. At the close of life he returned to his native place, and died there in 1375. His Decameron, or Collection of Novels, is the most esteemed of his works; but the stories are rather licentious.—Tiraboschi.

BOCCACCI, or BOCCACCINO (Camillo), an Italian painter of history and portrait, born at Cremona, and died in 1546, aged 35.—Pilkington.

BOCCALINI (Trajan), an Italian satirist, was born at Rome, and became very famous for his wit, which in the end proved his destruction; for, having made too free with the court of Spain, he was murdered in his bed by four assassins. This happened at Venice in 1613. His writings are, News from Parnassus, which has been translated into many languages; La Secretaria di Apollo; and, the Political Touchstone, written against the Spaniards.—Tiraboschi.

BODICUS, king of Mauritania, who leagued with Jugurtha, his father-in-law, against the Romans, but being defeated by Marius, he sought the favour of his conquerors by delivering Jugurtha into their hands. The traitor then obtained part of the kingdom, about 100 B. C.—Univ. Hist.

BOCCIARDI (Clemente), among painters goes under the name of Clementone. He was born at Genoa in 1620, and died in 1658.—D'Argenville.

BODCOLD (John), commonly called John of Leyden, a famous fanatic, was a taylor of that city, in the beginning of the 16th century. He associated himself with John Mathias, a baker of Haerlem, and these two, at the head of a rabble of anabaptists, made themselves masters of the city of Munster. The place was besieged by the bishop, and Mathias, in a frantic sally, being slain, Bodcold succeeded him, and assumed the regal as well as prophetic character. He set up a government modelled according to a perversion of scriptural declarations, and called himself king of Sion. He taught a plurality of wives, and had 14 himself: one of whom he put to death with his own hand, for questioning his divine authority. When the city was taken, Bodcold was put to a cruel and lingering death, having attained only the 26th year of his age.—Mosheim. Moreri.

BOCCONE (Paul), an Italian naturalist, was born at Palermo in Sicily, in 1633. His turn for natural history was so great, that he travelled through most parts of Europe, to acquire a knowledge of their productions; but attached himself principally to botany. He wrote, Icones et Descriptions rariorum plantarum Siciliae, Melitae, Galliae, et Italiae, Lyons and Oxford, 1674; but his greatest work is entitled Musea di

Plante rare, Venice, 1697. He died at Palermo in 1704.—Haller Bibl. Bot.

BOCCORIS, king of Egypt. Troguus Pompeius and Tacitus relate that this prince having consulted the oracle of Ammon, respecting the leprosy which raged in his country, was advised to drive out the Jews as a people of no service, and odious to the divinity. The history of Moses confutes this fable.

BOCHART (Samuel), a French protestant divine, was born at Rouen in 1599, and studied at different universities both in his own country and abroad; after which, he was chosen minister of Caen. In 1646 he published Geographia Sacra, which added to his reputation. In 1652 he went to Stockholm at the invitation of the queen of Sweden, who honoured him with several marks of her esteem. At his return he became member of the academy of Caen, where he died suddenly in 1667. He wrote, besides the work above mentioned, Hierozoicon, London, folio, 1675, which treats of the animals mentioned in scripture; a treatise on the Terrestrial Paradise; and some other curious pieces. His works appeared at Leyden in 1712, 3 vols. folio.—Bayle.

BODICIVS (John), a modern Latin poet, was born at Brussels in 1555, and studied divinity under Bellarmine. Afterwards he became secretary of Antwerp. He died in 1609. His poems were printed at Cologne, in 1655.—Moreri.

BOCKHORST (John van), an historical and portrait painter, was born about 1610, and studied under Jordaens.—Houbraken.

BODQUILLON (Lazarus Andrew), a French writer, was born at Avalon, became an advocate, and lastly an ecclesiastic. He was made canon of Avalon, where he died in 1728, aged 80. He wrote, Sermons; a Treatise on the Liturgy; the Life of the Chevalier Bayard. &c.—Moreri.

BODIN (John), a French lawyer, was born at Angers in 1530, and studied at Toulouse. Not meeting with success at the bar, he applied himself to writing. His treatise De Republica was printed several times, and lectures were read upon it at Cambridge. His book on Demonology was a sort of text book for those who were employed in prosecuting sorcerers. He obtained several employments in France, and died of the plague at Laon in 1596. Besides the above, he wrote several other works.—Moreri.

BODLEY (sir Thomas), a celebrated encourager of learning, was born at Exeter in 1544. He received the first part of his education at Geneva, and on his return to England entered of Magdalen college, Oxford. In 1564 he was chosen fellow of Merton college, and the year following read lectures in Greek, and served the offices of public orator and proctor. Elizabeth employed him in several embassies;

but in 1597 he determined to retire from public life, and the same year began to restore the university library of Oxford. He almost rebuilt that noble fabric, furnished it with a prodigious number of books collected at a great expence, and at his death bequeathed nearly his whole property for the support and augmentation of it. By this means the Bodleian library is unquestionably the first of its kind in the world. At the accession of James I. Mr. Bodley received the honour of knighthood. He died in 1612, and was buried in the chapel of Merton college.—Prince's Worthies of Devon. Biog. Brit.

BODLER (John Henry), historiographer of Sweden, and professor of eloquence at Strasburg, born in 1611, and died in 1692. He wrote, Commentaries on Pliny; a History of Tamerlane; a Commentary upon Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis; and other works.—Moreri.

BOECE, Boetius Lat. (Hector), a Scottish historian, was born at Dundee in 1470, and studied at Aberdeen and Paris. On the foundation of King's college, Aberdeen, by archbishop Elphinstone, he was appointed the first principal; in gratitude for which Boece, at the death of that prelate, wrote his life, together with those of his predecessors of that see. But his greatest work is the History of Scotland in Latin, of which the best edition is that of Paris in 1574, folio. It is written in an elegant style, but full of legendary tales and perverted facts.—Biog. Lit.

BOEHMEN (Jacob), a famous visionary, was born near Goerlitz in Germany, in 1575, and brought up a shoemaker. He went on for some years in a close application to business, and a devout attention to religious exercises. At last he began to be visited with spiritual illuminations, which overpowered him with extasy. These manifestations he put down in writing, and in 1612 communicated them to the world in a book entitled Aurora. For this he was persecuted by a furious divine named Richter, and forbidden to write by the magistrates. After obeying the injunction some time, his illuminations became too powerful to be withheld, and he sent forth a number of books equally wonderful and unintelligible with the former. Boehmen died very piously, and in communion with the Lutheran church, 1624. His writings have found numerous admirers in many countries, particularly in England, where a translation appeared some years ago in 3 vols. 4to. Dr. More says that the Quakers took a good part of their system from Boehmen.—Moreri.

BOEL (Peter), a Flemish painter of still life and animals, born in 1625, and died in 1680. He studied under Cornelius de Waal, and afterwards at Rome.—Pilgrington.

BOERHAAVE (Herman), a celebrated physician, was born in 1668, at Voorhoot, near Leyden, and educated at that university with a view to the ministry, but falling under the false accusation of spinosism while a student, he abandoned that line, and turned his attention entirely to physic, and the branches of science connected with it. In 1701 he read lectures upon the institutes of physic; and in 1709 was appointed professor of medicine and botany. In 1714 he was chosen rector of the university, and displayed so much spirit against cartesianism as to rouse the resentment of the friends of that system against him; particularly a theological professor at Franeker, who charged Boerhaave with being a deist; for which the furious divine was obliged, by his own university, to make an apology. In 1718 he was nominated professor of chemistry, a science which he greatly improved. His fame was spread throughout the world: he was chosen a member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of the royal society of London; and a Chinese mandarin is said to have written him a letter with this direction only, to "the illustrious Boerhaave, physician in Europe." He died after a lingering illness, which he bore with christian fortitude and resignation, September 23, 1738. His writings are universally known; we need not, therefore, enumerate them.—Moreri.

BOETIUS (Stephen de la), a French writer. He was counsellor of the parliament at Bourdeaux, and died in 1563, aged 32. He translated some pieces of Plutarch and Xenophon; and wrote besides some poems in Latin and French.—Ibid.

BOETHIUS, or BOETIUS (Anitius Manlius Torquatus Severinus), a Roman philosopher, was descended of a patrician family, and in 510 was advanced to the consulship. He was a profound scholar, and well versed in mathematical learning. He also defended the catholic faith against the Arians, in a treatise de Unitate et Uno. For his zeal in defending Albinus the senator, Theodoric, king of Italy, sent him prisoner to the tower of Pavia, where he wrote his immortal book De Consolatione Philosophiæ, which has passed through numerous editions, and was translated into Anglo Saxon by the illustrious Alfred. Boethius was put to death, but how is not clearly ascertained, in 524.—Gibbon. Moreri.

BOFFRAND (Germain), a French architect, was born at Nantes in 1667. He built several superb edifices, and constructed a number of bridges, canals, and other works. He died at Paris in 1755. He wrote a book on the principles of architecture.—D'Argenville.

BOGAN (Zachary), an English divine, was born at Little Hempstone, in Devonshire, and educated first at St. Alban hall, and afterwards at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He became noted for his skill in the languages, and wrote additions to Rous's Archæologia Atticæ; a View of the Theatre.

and Punishments recorded in Scripture, 8vo. Meditations of the Mirth of a Christian Life, 8vo.; Comparatio Homerici cum Scriptoris Sacris quoad Normam loquendi, 8vo.; Help to Prayer, 12mo.; the last was posthumous. He died in 1659, and was buried in the chapel of his college.—Wood's A. O.

BOGARIS, the first christian king of Bulgaria. He declared war in 845 against Theodora the empress, who however conciliated his esteem by sending back his sister, who had been taken prisoner on the frontiers, and she was the means of converting him to christianity.—Univ. Hist.

BOHADIN, an Arabian historian of the 12th century, wrote the life of Saladin, with whom he was a great favourite. An edition of it appeared at Leyden in 1755.—Moreri.

BOHEMOND, the first prince of Antioch, accompanied his father Robert Guiscard duke of Apulia in his attempt on the eastern empire in 1081. On the return of Robert to Italy he left the command to his son, who defeated the emperor Alexius in two battles. After his father's death he became prince of Tarentum, and distinguished himself in the first crusade. In 1098 he took Antioch, of which he became prince. He afterwards took Laodicea, but was himself taken prisoner by surprise, and on gaining his liberty went to Europe, where he married the daughter of Philip king of France. He then returned to Greece with a large army, but met with little success. He died in Apulia in 1111. Six princes of his name succeeded him in the sovereignty of Antioch.—Moreri.

BORN (John), a learned physician and professor in that faculty at Leipzig, was born there in 1640, and died in 1719. He wrote several valuable works on medical science and chemistry. One, on the duties of a physician, is entitled to great praise; it was published at Leipzig in 1704, 4to. with this title, De Officio Medici duplici, clinico & forensi.—Haller Bibl. Anat.

BOIARDO (Matthæo-Maria), count of Scandiano, and governor of the city of Reggio, is known by some good Italian and Latin poems. The principal is entitled Orlando Innamorato, in imitation of the Iliad. This poem was completed by Ariosto, whose Orlando Furioso is in fact only a continuation of it. The best edition is that of Venice in 1544, 4to.—Tiraboschi.

BOILEAU (Giles), a member of the French academy. He published a translation of Epictetus, two disputations against Menage and Castor, and other works. He died in 1669, aged 38.—Moreri.

BOILEAU (James), brother of the above, and doctor of Sorbonne, was born at Paris in 1635, and became dean of the faculty of divinity, and canon of the holy chapel. He died in 1706, and left some learned works on ecclesiastical history.—Ibid.

BOILEAU (sieur Despreaux, Nicholas), a famous French poet, was born at Paris in 1636, and was bred to the law, in which, however, he made little progress. His productions, especially his satires, gained him great reputation. Lewis XIV. was highly pleased with his works, and distinguished him by several marks of his favour. In 1684 he was chosen member of the French academy, and in 1701 he was elected pensionary of the academy of inscriptions and medals, which he held till 1705, when his growing infirmities obliged him to resign. He died in 1711. The best edition of his works is that of Durand in 1747, 8 vols. 8vo.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BOILEAU (John James), a French divine, was canon of the church of St. Honoré at Paris, and died there in 1735, aged 86. He wrote, 1. Letters on Morality and Devotion, 2 vols. 12mo. 2. The Lives of the Dukes of Liancourt and Madame Combe.—Ibid.

BOINDIN (Nicholas), a French dramatic writer, was at first a soldier, which profession he abandoned for that of literature. In 1706 he became a member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres. He died in 1751, aged 51, and was interred without any religious ceremony, owing to his avowal of atheism. His works, which are all comic, were printed in 2 vols. 12mo. 1753.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BOIS (John du), or Johannes a Bosco, a French monk of the celestine order. He quitted his religious profession for some time, and served with great credit in the army of Henry III. who used to call him the Emperor of Monks. He afterwards returned to his order, and obtained the abbey of Beaulieu. He hated mortally the jesuits, and accused them as accessory to the death of Henry IV. for which he was confined in the castle of St. Angelo at Rome, where he died in 1626. He printed a collection of fragments of ancient ecclesiastical authors.—Moreri.

BOIS (Gerard du), a priest of the oratory, was born at Orleans, and died in 1696, aged 67. He completed the Ecclesiastical Annals of France, of père le Comte; and wrote a History of the Church of Paris, 2 vols. folio, 1690, Latin.—Ibid.

BOIS (Philip du), a French divine, and doctor of the Sorbonne. He died in 1703, and left, 1. An edition of Tibullus, Catullus et Propertius, ad Usum Delphini, 2 vols. 8vo.; and an edition of the works of Maldonat the jesuit.—Ibid.

BOISMORAND (the abbé Chiron de), a French satirist, who died in 1740. He was bred under the jesuits, whom he afterwards severely lashed, and then published a refutation of himself. He also wrote several memoirs, which are written in a style of elegance.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BOISROBERT (Francis le Metel de), a celebrated French wit, born at Caen in 1592, and died in 1662. He was greatly esteemed by cardinal Richelieu, who made him abbot of Chailon-sur-Seine. He wrote several Poems, Letters, Tragedies, Comedies, and Tales, Nouvelles Héroïques, &c.—Moréri.

BOISSARD (John James), a French antiquary, was born at Befançon in 1528, and died in 1602: he travelled through Italy, the Greek islands, the Morea, and Germany. His great works De Romanæ urbis Topographiæ et Antiquitate, 4 vols. folio. He also published a collection of lives of eminent persons, under the title of Theatrum Vitæ Humanæ, 1599, Frankfurt, 4to. After his death appeared his Treatise de Divinatione et Magicis Præstigiis—Bayle. Moréri.

BOISSAT (Peter de), a native of Vienne in Dauphiny, who took in succession the band and the sword, and at last quitted both. Taking a fanatical turn, he let his hair and beard grow, clothed himself wretchedly, and went on pilgrimage. He died in 1662, aged 68. He was a member of the French academy, and wrote l'Histoire Négropon-tique, ou les Amours d'Alexandre Castriot, 1691, 8vo.—Moréri.

BOISSY (Lewis de), a celebrated French comic writer. While all Paris was delighted with his performances, the poor author, with his wife and child, were starving. In this condition, without a morsel of bread, and speechless through hunger, a friend stepped in and found them. When this affair became known the marchioness de Pompadour made him a liberal present, and got him the place of comptroller de Mercur de France, with a pension for his family. He was a member of the French academy, and died in 1758. His works were printed in 3 vols 8vo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOIVIN (Francis de), a French historian. He was secretary to marshal de Brissac; and wrote the History of the Wars of Picdmont, 2 vols. 8vo. He died in 1619.—Moréri.

BOI IN (Lewis), advocate in parliament and an eminent scholar, was born at Montreuil in upper Normandy. He wrote some indifferent poetry, and learned dissertations on historical subjects. He died in 1724, aged 75.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOIVIN (John), brother of the above, became professor of Greek in the royal college at Paris, member of the French academy, of that of belles lettres, and keeper of the king's library. He died in 1726, aged 64. He wrote, 1. The Apology for Homer, and the Shield of Achilles, 12mo. 2. Translation of the Batrachomyomachia of Homer. 3. The Oedipus of Sophocles and the Birds of Aristophanes, translated into French. 4. An edition of the Mathematici Veteres, 1693, folio. 5. A Life of Claude la Peletier, in Latin, &c.—Ibid.

BOKHART, a celebrated musfulman doctor, who maintained absolute predestination, and died at Bokharah, in the 256th year of the Hegira. His great work is a collection of traditions, called Tektirtch, or the Sincere.—D'Herbelot.

Boz (Ferdinand), a Dutch painter of history and portrait, born in 1611, and died in 1681. He studied under Rembrandt, and his pictures have great merit.—Houbraken.

Boz (John), an admirable painter of landscapes and towns; born at Mechlin in 1534, and died in 1593.—Ibid.

BOLANGER (John), a disciple of Guido, whose manner he imitated. His subjects were taken from sacred and profane history. He died in 1660, aged 54.—D'Argenville.

BOLES LAUS I. king of Poland, who succeeded his father Micislaus in 999. The emperor Otho III. gave him the title of king, Poland being only a dukedom before. Boleslaus conquered Moravia, and made that country tributary. He was a prince of great qualities; and died in 1025.—Univ. Hist.

BOLES LAUS II. surnamed the bold and the cruel, born in 1043, was elected king of Poland on the death of his father Casimir I. in 1059. He was a warlike prince, and restored Bela to the throne of Hungary, and afterwards invaded Russia, where he remained so long that the wives of the Polish soldiers in revenge took their slaves to their beds. When the news reached the army, the soldiers immediately hastened home without leave, and the women persuaded their paramours to take up arms in defence of the fortresses. Bloody actions ensued, in which the women took a part; in the mean time Boleslaus arrived with a fresh army, and falling upon both parties made an immense slaughter. He prevailed, and treated the survivors with great rigour. He had afterwards a sharp contest with the clergy; and being excommunicated by the pope, was abandoned by his subjects. On this he fled into Hungary, where he died about 1080.—Ibid.

BOLEYN (Anne), wife of Henry VIII. king of England, and mother of queen Elizabeth, was the daughter of sir Thomas Boleyn, and born in 1507. Her early years were spent at the French court, where she attended the sister of Henry VIII. wife of Lewis XII. on whose death she returned to England, and became maid of honour to queen Catharine, which occasioning her to be often in the company of Henry, the monarch became enamoured of her charms, but not being able to succeed on other than honourable terms he resolved to procure a divorce from his wife. This design he carried into execution, and married Anne privately, but when she proved with child, he publicly acknowledged her as queen, and she so continued till the tyrant conceived a passion for Jane Seymour. He then caused her to be tried for high treason, in having been unchaste with her brother, and four other persons. She suffered decapitation with great resolution, May 19th, 1536. The Romanists have taken every method to vilify the character of this unfortunate woman, out of malice against queen Elizabeth, and the reformation, of which she was a great promoter. She was doubt-lets gay and thoughtless, but the charge of incontinence never could be substantiated.—Biog. Brit.

BOLEYN (George), brother of the above, was educated at Oxford, where he applied himself to poetry. On leaving the university he went to court, and was much admired there for his mental and personal accomplishments. In 1529 he became viscount Rochford, and on the marriage of Henry VIII. to his sister he was employed in several embassies, made constable of Dover castle, and warden of the cinque ports. But when that tyrant became jealous of his consort, the charge of incest was brought against his lordship, and he was beheaded on Tower-hill, May 17, 1536. He wrote several poems, songs, and sonnets.—Wood.

BOLOGNESE (Francisco), an eminent painter, born at Bologna, whose true name was Francis Grimaldi. He studied under Annibal Caracci. His landscapes are excellent. He died in 1680, aged 74. His son Alexander was also a good painter.—Pilk.

BOLSEC (Jerom), a carmelite of Paris, who having embraced some opinions not approved of by his order, quitted it and went to Ferrara, where he practised as a physician. He next removed to Geneva, and attached himself to Calvin, but avowing the notions of Pelagius, he was banished the city, at the instigation of that reformer. He then retired to Bern, from whence also he was expelled. At last he returned to France and his old religion, and to shew the sincerity of his conversion, wrote the lives of Theodore Beza and John Calvin, filled with the blackest falsehoods. He lived in a profligate manner, and died about 1582.—Bayle. Moreri.

BOLSWERD (Scheldt), a celebrated engraver, who executed several good plates after Rubens, Vandyke, and Jordano. There were two others of the same name and profession, Adam and Bortius.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BOLTON (Edmund), an English antiquary, who flourished at the beginning of the 17th century. His works are: Nero Cæsar, or Monarchie depraved, 1624, folio. 2. Elements of Armories, 1610, 4to. 3. Hypercritica, or a Rule of Judgment for writing or reading our Histories.—Biog. Brit.

BOLTON (Robert), a puritan divine, was born in 1571, and died in 1631. He was reader of natural philosophy at Oxford. He wrote treatises on Happiness, and the Four last Things.—Wood's A. O.

BOLTON (Robert), an English divine, was born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, after which he became chaplain to sir Joseph Jekyll, master of the rolls, and in 1735 was promoted to the deanry of Carlisle. In 1738 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Mary's, Reading. He died in London in 1763, and was buried in the church porch of St. Mary, Reading, where there is a monument to his memory. Dr. Bolton wrote some tracts on the prevailing follies of the day, and a good piece on the Employment of Time.—Europ. Mag.

BOLZANI (Urbano Valeriano), a learned monk of the 15th century, was born at Belluno, and entered into the order of minorites, after which he travelled into several countries, particularly Greece, Egypt, and Palestine. He twice ascended Mount Etna for the purpose of surveying its crater. He fixed his residence at Venice, where he taught the Greek, and was the first who composed a grammar of that language in Latin. He died in 1524, aged 84.—Tiraboschi.

BOMBELLI (Sebastian), an eminent historical and portrait painter; born at Bologna in 1635, and died in 1685. His works are in great repute.—Pilkington.

BOMBERSO (Daniel), a celebrated printer, who gained a great reputation by his Hebrew Bibles. He was a native of Antwerp, and settled at Venice. His Bible in 4 vols. folio, and the Talmud, in 11 vols. are greatly esteemed. He died in 1549.—Moreri.

BON ST. HILARY (Francis Xavier), a learned Frenchman, honorary president of the chamber of accounts at Montpellier, member of the academy of inscriptions, Paris, and of the royal society of London. He died in 1761, and left, 1. Mémoire sur les Marrones d'Inde, 12mo. 2. Dissertation sur l'Utilité de la Soie des arraignées.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BONA (John), a Roman cardinal, was born at Mondovì in Piedmont in 1609. At the age of 15 he entered among the friars mendicant, and in 1651 was made general of the order, which office he afterwards resigned. Clement IX. gave him a cardinal's hat, which if ever man adorned he did. Bona died in 1674. His works are entirely devotional.—Moreri.

BONAMY (Peter Nicholas), a French writer, was born in 1694. He took the ecclesiastic habit, which he afterwards quitted for literature, and became under librarian to St. Victor, and historiographer of Paris. He was also a member of the academy of inscriptions, to the memoirs of which he largely contributed. He conducted the Journal of Verdun, a periodical work of great merit. He died at Paris in 1770.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BONANNI (Philip), a learned jesuit, who died at Rome in 1725, aged 87. He wrote, 1. Recreatio Mentis et Oculi in Observatione Animalium Testaceorum, Romæ, 1694, 4to. 2. History of the Church of the Vatican, 1696, fol. 3. Collection of the Medals of the Popes, 1699, 2 vols. fol. 4. Catalogue of the Orders military and equestrian, 4 vols. 4to. 5. Observationes circa Viventia in non Viventibus, 1691, 4to. 6. Musæum Collegii Romani Kircherianum, 1709, fol. &c.—Moreri.

BONARELLI (Guy Ubaldò), an Italian poet, was born at Urbino in 1563, and died in 1608. The duke of Ferrara employed him on several embassies. His Filli de Sciro, the best edition of which is that of Glasgow, in 1763, 8vo. has been compared to the Pastor Fido.—Tiraboschi.

BONAVENTURE (John Fidanza), a Roman cardinal and saint, was born in Tuscany in 1221, and studied at Paris with great reputation. In 1255 he was created doctor, and the next year made general of the order of franciscans. So great was his character, that on the death of Clement IV. the cardinals left the choice of a pope to him, when he nominated Theobald, archdeacon of Liege, who took the title of Gregory X. and made Bonaventure a cardinal. He died at Lyons in 1274, and was canonized in 1482. His works were printed at Rome, in 8 vols. fol. in 1588.—Moreri.

BONAVENTURE of Padua, a Roman cardinal, was born in 1332, and studied at Paris. Urban VI. made him cardinal in 1378. He was shot in 1386 by an assassin employed by Francis de Carrario of Padua, for having defended the rights of the church against him. He wrote several religious pieces, and was the intimate friend of Petrarch.—Moreri.

BOND (John), a famous critic, was born in Somersetshire in 1550, and educated first at Winchester school, and lastly at New college Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. He was master of the grammar-school at Taunton many years, after which he practised as a physician. He died at Taunton in 1612. He published annotations on several of the Latin classics, particularly Horace and Persius.—Wood's A. O.

BONIFACIO (Venetiano), an Italian painter of eminence. He was the disciple of Palma, and imitated his manner with great exactness. He died in 1630, aged 62.

BONET (Theophilus), a celebrated physician, was born at Geneva in 1620, and died in 1689. He left a great number of learned works.—Haller Bibl. Anat.

BONFADIUS (James), an Italian writer of the 16th century, and historiographer of Genoa, of which republic he wrote the annals, but some free remarks made in the work gave great offence to many noble families, who it is said out of revenge charged him with an unnatural crime, for which he was beheaded in 1550.—Tiraboschi.

BONFINIUS (Anthony), an historian of the 15th century, was born at Ascoli in Italy, but settled at the court of Hungary, where he died in 1502. He wrote the history of that country, printed by Sambucus in 1568.—Bayle. Moreri.

BONFRERIUS (James), a French jesuit, born at Dinan in 1573, and died at Tournay in 1643. He compiled an Onomasticon of the places mentioned in Scripture, and a commentary on the Pentateuch.—Ibid.

BONGARS (James), a learned Frenchman, was born at Orleans in 1554, and studied at Straßburg. He edited some ancient authors, and published many learned pieces of his own. His Letters, written while he was engaged in state affairs, are greatly esteemed. He died at Paris, 1612.—Bayle.

BONIFACE (St.), one of the saints in the Roman calendar, was a native of England, and sent by Gregory II. to convert the Germans. Gregory III. made him archbishop. He was slain by some peasants in Friesland in 754. His Letters were printed in 1616.—Dupin.

BONIFACE I. pope and saint, succeeded Zozimus in 418, and was maintained in the pontifical chair by the emperor Honorius, against his rival Eulalius. He died in 422.—BONIFACE II. succeeded Felix IV, in 530. He was born at Rome, but his father was a Goth. He compelled the bishops in a council to allow him to nominate his successor, and accordingly he pitched upon Vigil; but another council disavowed the proceedings of the first. He died in 532.—BONIFACE III. He succeeded Sabinus in 606, and died a few months after his election.—BONIFACE IV. was the son of a physician, and came to the tiara in 607. He converted the pantheon into a church. He died in 614.—BONIFACE V. He was a Neapolitan, and succeeded Adeodatus in 617, and died in 625.—BONIFACE VI. came to the chair on the death of Formosus in 896, but held it only 15 days; for being elected by a popular faction, he was deposed.—BONIFACE VII. whose surname was Francon. He assumed the chair after murdering Benedict VI. and John XIV. Notwithstanding this, he was acknowledged sovereign pontiff, 984, and died a few months after. His corpse was exposed in the public streets and trodden under foot.—BONIFACE VIII. is said to have frightened his predecessor Celestin into a resignation, by denouncing to him at midnight eternal damnation if he did not quit the pontifical chair. The credulous pope, thinking this was a supernatural voice, obeyed the command next day, and the crafty cardinal was elected. This happened in 1294. He commenced his pontificate by imprisoning his predecessor, and laying Denmark under an interdict. He also behaved in a haughty manner against the Colonnas, who in return protested against his election, and called a council to examine the charge. Boniface excommunicated them as heretics, and preached up a crusade against them. He excited the princes of Germany to revolt against Albert. He also issued a bull, in which he pretended that "God had set him over kings and kingdoms." Philip the Fair caused this bull to be burnt at Paris; on which Boniface laid France under an interdict. Philip appealed to a general council, and sent his army into Italy, under Nogaret, who took Boniface prisoner. The pontiff's behaviour on this occasion was bold enough, for putting on the tiara, and taking the keys and the crozier in his hands, he said,

"I am a pope, and a pope I will die." He died at Rome a few months afterwards. He wrote several works.—BONIFACE IX. was a Neapolitan by birth, and of a noble family. He was made cardinal in 1381, and pope in 1386. He died in 1404.—Platina. Bower. Moreri.

BONIFACE, count of the Roman empire in the 5th century, was the intimate friend of St. Augustine, who dissuaded him from embracing the monastic state, from the conviction that he could be of more service by employing his talents in public life. He defended Africa against the emperor John, and obliged Ataulphus to raise the siege of Marfeilles. He revolted in Africa at the instigation of Aetius, who plotted his ruin. Boniface, however, discovered his treachery, and returned to his allegiance and the imperial favour. The armies of Aetius and Boniface had a desperate contest, in which the latter was slain in 432.—Moreri.

BONIFACE (Hyacinth), a celebrated advocate in the parliament of Aix, was born in 1612, and died in 1695. There is a work by him, entitled, Arrêts Notables du Parlement de Provence, Lyons, 1708, 8 vols. fol.—Moreri.

BONIFACIO (Balthazar), a learned Venetian. From being professor of law at Padua, he became bishop of Capo d'Istria, and died in 1659, aged 75. He wrote, 1. Latin Poems, 1619. 2. Historia Trevigiana, 4to. 3. Historia Ludicia, 1656, 4to.—Moreri.

BONJOUR (William), a French monk of the order of St. Augustine, was born at Toulouse in 1670. Pope Clement XI. sent him as a missionary to China, where he died in 1714. He published, 1. Dissertations on the Scripture. 2. Dissertations on the Coptic Monuments in the Library of the Vatican.—Moreri.

BONNEFONS (John), a Latin poet, was born in 1554 at Clermont in Auvergne, and died in 1614. His poems are appended to those of Beza, printed by Barbou at Paris in 1757, 12mo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BONNELL (James), a man of eminent virtue and piety, was the son of an English merchant who resided at Genoa, where this son was born in 1653, and brought to England by his father in 1655. The fortune of the family having suffered considerably by their attachment to the royal cause, Mr. Bonnell at the restoration received as a compensation a patent, to be accountant-general of Ireland, in which his son's life was included with his own. The subject of the present notice was educated first at Dublin and afterwards at Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and then became tutor in a gentleman's family. On his father's death he succeeded him as accountant-general for the sake of his family, though his own inclination was strongly to the church. In the troublesome reign of James II. he remained firm at his post, discharging the duties of his office with remarkable firmness and integrity. He was a man of most amiable manners, devout without enthusiasm, and learned without ostentation. He died at Dublin in 1699. Bishop Wettenhall preached his funeral sermon. Some of his meditations are to be found in his Life, written by archdeacon Hamilton, 12mo. 1703, from whence this is taken.

BONNER (Edmund), an English prelate, was a peasant's son in Worcestershire, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards entered into the service of Wolfey, who bestowed upon him several benefices. Henry VIII. to whom he was chaplain, sent him to Rome to get the sentence of divorce from his queen Catherine of Arragon confirmed, and his behaviour was so bold, that the pope threatened to throw him into a cauldron of boiling lead. In 1538 he was nominated bishop of Hereford, being then ambassador at Paris; but before his consecration he was translated to London. In the reign of Edward VI. he scrupled the oath of supremacy, for which he was sent to prison, but on making his submission obtained his discharge. His negligence, however, in complying with the laws occasioned him a second imprisonment, and the loss of his bishopric. On the accession of Mary he was restored to his episcopal function, and through the whole of her reign shewed a most sanguinary spirit, by bringing numbers of protestants to the stake. When queen Elizabeth came to the throne he was deprived, and sent to the marshalsea prison, where he died in 1569. His body was interred privately in St. George's churchyard, Southwark. Bonner was a man of furious disposition, but well versed in the canon law.—Biog. Br.

BONNET (Charles), a naturalist and metaphysician, was born at Geneva in 1720. He was intended for the law, but accidentally meeting with the Spectacle de Nature of Le Pluche, and Reaumur's Memoirs on Insects, he resolved to devote himself to the study of nature. At the age of 20 he had made several discoveries in entomology, and at 27 he formed his system of vegetable physics. About this time he appeared as a writer in a treatise on psychology, which was followed by his analytical essay on the mental powers. In 1762 and 1764 he published Considerations on organized Bodies, and Contemplations of Nature. His last work was Palingenesis, or Thoughts on the past and future State of Animal Beings. He was a member of the royal society of London, and of several other learned bodies. Bonnet was a firm believer in christianity, and died at Geneva, May 20, 1793.—Life of Bonnet published at Bern, 1794.

BONNEVAL (Claude Alexander de, count), known also by the name of Osman Bashaw, was descended from an illustrious family in France, and married the daughter of the marshal de Biran. He left the French army to serve under the prince Eugene; but having a quarrel with that general, for which he was imprisoned, he entered into the service of the Turks. The grand seignior gave him a military command, with the rank of bashaw. He obtained a great victory over the imperial army on the banks of the Danube. He died in 1747, and left memoirs of his own life, printed in London in 1755.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BONOSUS, bishop of Naissus in Dacia, or according to others of Sardica, was condemned in the council of Capua for heresy, in maintaining that the Virgin Mary had other children besides Jesus Christ. He died in 410.—Mosheim.

BONTEMS (madame), an ingenious French lady, born at Paris in 1718, and died in 1769. She translated into her native language Thomson's Seasons with great fidelity and elegance.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BONTEMPI (George Andrea Angelini), a musical writer, was born at Perugia, and became master of the chapel to the elector of Saxony. He wrote Nova quatuor vocibus componendi Methodus, 1660; but his great work is the History of Music in Italian, printed at Perugia in 1695, folio.—Hawkins. Burney.

BONTIUS (James), a Dutch physician, who lived at Batavia in the middle of the 17th century. He wrote some good works on the diseases of India, and observations on the botany and natural history of those parts. The last is entitled De Medicina Indorum, printed at Leyden in 1642, and at Amsterdam 1658. He is not to be confounded with Gerard Bontius, who invented a nostrum, called Piliule tartaræ Bontii, and died at Leyden in 1599.—Halleri Bibl. Med. Præf.

BONVINCINO (Alexander), an Italian painter, born in 1514, and died in 1564. He was the disciple of Titian, and his works fetch a high price.—Pilkington.

BONWICK (Ambrose), an English divine, was born in 1652, and educated at Merchant Taylors' school, from whence he removed to St. John's college, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of B.D. In 1686 he was appointed master of Merchant Taylors' school, but was dismissed in 1691 for not taking the oath of allegiance. He afterwards kept a school at Headly in Surrey, and brought up many excellent scholars.—Anecdotes of Bowyer.

BOODT (Anselm von), physician, died about 1660. He is known by a scarce piece, entitled, The complete Jeweller, or the History of Precious Stones, Leyden, 1646.—Moreri.

BOOKER (John), an English astrologer, who is said by Lilly "to have had a curious fancy in judging of thefts, and as being successful in resolving love questions." Another adept, George Wharton, published a book against him, entitled, Mercurio-cælico Mafix; or an Anticaveat to all such as have had the Misfortune to be cheated and deluded by that great and treacherous Impostor, John Booker, 1664. He wrote some pieces in astrology, and was made licenser of mathematical books. He died in 1667.—Granger.

BOONE (Daniel), a Dutch painter, who died in England in 1698. His subjects were low, but his characters express much humour.—Pilkington.

BOONEN (Arnold), an eminent Dutch painter, was born at Dordt in 1669, and became one of the best portrait painters of his age. He was the disciple of Schalken, and died in 1729.—Houbraken.

BOOT (Arnold), a learned Dutch physician, who defended the integrity of the Hebrew text of scripture against Morin and Cappel, in a work, entitled Animadversiones ad textum Hebraicum. He also wrote medical observations, and died at Paris in 1653.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOOTH (Barton), an English actor, was a native of Lancashire, and educated at Westminster school, where he distinguished himself in the plays which were occasionally performed. At the age of 17 he eloped from school, and entered into a strolling company, with which he went to Ireland. His reputation was so great that Betterton engaged him for the English stage, on which he gained uncommon applause. When Cato was performed he was selected to take upon him the principal character, which he sustained so well that one night a subscription of 50 guineas was collected in the boxes and sent to him. He afterwards became manager of the house, but continued to perform nearly to his death, which happened in 1733, at the age of 52.—Biog. Brit.

BOOTH (Henry), earl of Warrington, was born in the county of Chester, which he represented in several parliaments, in the reign of Charles II. He was zealous against the papists and the duke of York, which made him very obnoxious at court. In 1684 he succeeded to the title of lord Delamer, and was committed to the Tower, where he remained some time. At the accession of James II. he was tried on a charge of high treason, but acquitted. He assisted in bringing about the revolution, for which king William made him privy counsellor, and chancellor of the exchequer. He lost the favour of that prince afterwards by opposing some of his measures; however he was created earl of Warrington, with a pension of 2000*l.* a year. He died in 1694. His works, consisting chiefly of speeches in parliament, were printed in 1 vol. 8vo. His son and successor George earl of Warrington, who died in 1758, wrote a piece, entitled, Considerations upon the Institution of the Marriage Contract, wherein is considered how far Divorces may or ought to be allowed, 1739.—Biog. Brit.

BORONIUS (Nicholas), a French Latin poet of the 16th century. He was highly esteemed by the most learned men of his time. His poems were printed in 1540.—Moreri.

BORDA (John Charles), a French mathematician, was born in 1733. He entered early into the navy, and became lieutenant, in which capacity he was employed on a voyage of discovery on the coasts of Europe and Africa, with a view of improving navigation and geography. The result of this expedition was published in 2 vols. 4to. 1778. In the American war he served under D'Estaing, with the rank of rear-admiral. Before this he had introduced an uniformity into the architecture of the French ships of war, which has been found of great importance. He contributed numerous papers to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, chiefly relating to the construction of vessels and hydraulics. In 1787 he published the Description and Use of the Circle of Reflection, in which he reviewed and recommended the use of the specular-circles invented by Tobias Mayer. He also invented the mensuration-rod for ascertaining the station lines. One of his last labours was the accurate determination of the length of the pendulum vibrating seconds at Paris. He died in 1799.—Novo. Did. Hist.

BORDE (Andrew), an English physician, was born at Pevensey in Sussex, about 1500; and after studying at Oxford entered among the carthusians. He then travelled through a good part of Europe and Africa. On his return he settled at Winchester as a physician. He died in the Fleet, where he was confined for debt. He wrote the Breviary of Health, and some other pieces.—Wood's A. O.

BORDE (John Benjamin), an ingenious French writer, was born at Paris in 1734. He became first valet to Lewis XV. and on the death of that monarch was appointed farmer-general. He employed his leisure hours in cultivating a fine taste for music and the belles lettres. His collection of airs, in 4 vols. 8vo. and his essays on music, ancient and modern, in 4 vols. quarto, are abundant proofs of his skill in the first, and in the second he distinguished himself by the Memoirs of Coucy, 2 vols. 8vo; Interesting Pieces towards a History of the Reigns of Lewis XIII. and of Lewis XIV.; Letters upon Switzerland; a History of the South Sea, and other works. He was guillotined in the bloody reign of Robespierre, July 22, 1794.—Novo. Did. Hist.

BORDELON (Laurence), a French writer of plays and romances, who died at Paris in 1790, aged 77. He is chiefly known by a work, entitled, The History of the Extravagancies of M. Ouffie, which has been translated into English, 8vo. In this performance he ridicules those persons who are fond of reading books on witchcraft, sorcery, magic, &c.—Ibid.

BORDENAVE (Touffaint), professor and director of the academy of surgery at Paris, born in 1728, and died in 1782. He wrote: Elements of Physiology, 2 vols. 12mo.—Ibid.

BORDES (Charles), a French writer, was the son of an ingenious mechanic at Lyons, and distinguished himself by several good poems, and some dramatic pieces, printed at Lyons, in 4 vols. 8vo. He also detended the sciences against Rousseau. He died in 1781.—Ibid.

BORDEU (Theophilus de), an eminent physician, was the son of Antoine de Bordeu, physician to the king, and born in 1722 at Nêste, in Bearn. He received his education at Montpellier, and when young settled at Paris, where he acquired great reputation. He died in 1770. He wrote several esteemed works in the line of his profession.—Ibid.

BORDINGIUS (Andrew), a famous Danish poet. His works were printed at Copenhagen in 1736, and are greatly valued in Denmark.—Ibid.

BORDONE (Paris), an Italian painter, was born at Trevi in 1512, and became a disciple of Titian. Francis I. of France conferred several favours on him. He died in 1587.—Depiles.

BOREL (Peter), physician to the king of France, and member of the academy of sciences for chemistry, died in 1689, aged 48. He wrote the Antiquities of Castres, his native town; a Treasury of old Words and Phrases; a Treatise on the Inventor of the Telescope, and other works.—Moreri.

BORELLI (John Alphonfus), a celebrated mathematician, was born at Naples in 1608. He was for some time professor of philosophy and mathematics at Florence and Pisa; after which he settled at Rome, and taught mathematics in a convent in that city. He died in 1679. He wrote many valuable works on mathematical subjects.—Tiraboschi.

BORGARUTIUS (Prosper), an Italian physician of the 16th century. He is the author of a treatise of anatomy, and some other works.—Moreri.

BORGHESE (Paul Guidotto), an Italian painter and poet, was born at Lucca, and died through want in 1626, aged 60. His vanity led him to rival Tasso, and to write a piece entitled Jerusalem ruined.—Tiraboschi.

BORGHINI (Vincent), a benedictine monk, born at Florence in 1515, and died at Pisa in 1580. He wrote a Discourse on the History of Florence, which possesses merit. It was reprinted in 1755.—Moreri.

BORGIA (Cæsar), a son of pope Alexander VI. On the accession of his father he was made archbishop of Valenza and cardinal; but being jealous that his brother Francis was most in favour, he contrived to have him drowned. He also dispatched a number of other persons to gratify his avarice and revenge. Having renounced the cardinalate he was made a duke by Lewis XII. of France, with whom he entered into a league for the conquest of the Milanese. On the death of his father he was sent prisoner to Spain, but made his escape, and died fighting under the walls of Viana in 1607.—Gordon's Lives of Alexander and Borgia.

BORGIANI (Orazio), an historical and portrait painter, was born at Rome in 1630, and died in 1681.—Pilkington.

BORIS GUDENOV, great duke of Muscovy. He obtained this dignity by murdering the two princes, Demetrius and Feodor, while he was regent. Afterwards a young monk, called Griska, pretending to be Demetrius, got himself acknowledged by the vaivode of Sandomir, who declared war against Boris, and entered Muscovy with his army. Many of the officers of the usurper went over to the invaders, in consequence of which he died in 1605. The Boyards then elected Feodor Borisowicz, the son of Boris, in his room; but the false Demetrius still continued his pretensions, and being joined by a number of people took the young grand duke prisoner with his mother. The unfortunate captives were put to death in 1605, and the pretended Demetrius at the same time.—Univ. Hist.

BORLASE (Edmund), a physician and historian, was the son of sir John Borlase, one of the lords justices of Ireland, and educated in the university of Dublin, but took his degree of M.D. at Leyden. Afterwards he settled at Chester, where he died in 1682. His principal work is a history of the Irish rebellion, 1680, folio.—Gen. B. D.

BORLASE (William), an ingenious antiquary, was born at St. Just in Cornwall, in 1696, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1790 he entered into orders, and in 1722 obtained the rectory of Ludgvan, and afterwards that of St. Just. He was elected a fellow of the royal society, and having presented a variety of fossils and pieces of antiquity to the university of Oxford, he received the thanks of that learned body, and the degree of LL.D. He also communicated many curious ores and fossils to Mr. Pope for his grotto. He died in 1772. He wrote an essay on Cornish crystals in the Philosophical Transactions; Antiquities, historical and monumental, of the County of Cornwall, folio, two editions; Observations on the Scilly Islands, 4to; The Natural History of Cornwall, folio; all of them exceedingly valuable.—Biog. Br.

BORN (Ignatius), a German baron, and eminent as a mineralogist, was born at Carlsburg in 1742, and died in 1791. He resided chiefly at Prague, and devoted himself to the study of natural history and mineralogy, on which he wrote several valuable works. He also was the author of a curious satire on the monks, in which they are whimsically classed in the manner of the Linnæan system.—Townson's Travels in Hungary.

BORRI (Joseph Francis), a jesuit and enthusiast, or rather impostor, was a native of Milan, and studied at Rome, where he began to promulgate revelations which he pretended to have received, and for which he was expelled the city. He then retired to Milan, and gained some followers, to whom he ministered an oath of secrecy, and it seems as if he had some thoughts of forming a peculiar government. His designs being suspected, the inquisition began to prepare its engines for him, on which he fled to Straßburg, and afterwards to Amsterdam, where he turned quack, and made a great deal of money by a universal medicine. His next remove was to Hamburg, where he cheated Christina queen of Sweden, by pretending to discover the philosopher's stone. After a variety of adventures, Borri was delivered up to the pope's nuncio at Vienna, and sent to Rome, where he was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He died in 1695. He wrote some books on alchemy.—Moreri.

BORRICHIVS (Olaus), a Danish physician, was born in 1626, and educated at the university of Copenhagen, where, in 1666, he became professor of medicine. He was also made counsellor of the royal chancery. He died in 1690. His principal works are, 1. De Poëtis Græcis et Latinis; 2. Antiquæ Romæ Imago; 3. De Somno Somniferis, 1680; 4. De Ufu Plantarum indigenarum, 1688.—Moreri.

BORROMEO (Charles), a cardinal, was born in 1538. His uncle, Pius IV. made him archbishop of Milan and cardinal, in 1560. Notwithstanding his youth, he governed his church with great discretion, and liberally encouraged learning and scholars. At the council of Trent, while the other prelates were deliberating on the reformation of the clergy, he set about it in his own person and family, discharging numerous servants, leaving off gaudy apparel, and submitting to a weekly fast. He also encouraged works of public utility, particularly such as had charity for their object, and began to reform some of the orders, for which an attempt was made to assassinate him, but he escaped with a slight wound. He died in 1594, and was canonized in 1610 by Paul V. His works were printed at Milan, in 5 vols. folio, 1747.—Moreri.

BORROMEO (Frederic), cardinal and archbishop of Milan. He was cousin-german of the preceding, and imitated him in his good works. He founded the Ambrosian library at Milan, and died in 1632. His writings are all theological.—Ibid.

BORROMINI (Francis), an eminent architect, was born in 1599. The reputation and fame of Bernini excited his envy and turned his brain, so that in a fit of madness he stabbed himself in 1667. He built a great number of edifices at Rome, which deviate from the rules of science, but are still noble and elegant.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

BORZONI (Lucian), an Italian painter, born at Genoa in 1690, and died in 1645. He painted history and portrait with grace.

and elegance. He had three sons, John Baptist, Charles, and Francis, all eminent in the same line; but the last excelled also in landscape and sea views.—D'Argenville.

Bos (Jerom), a Flemish painter, who delighted in representing spectres, devils, and incantations, so that his pictures, though well executed, are calculated to excite horror. He died in 1500.—Ibid.

Bos (Lambert), professor of Greek in the university of Franeker, born in 1670, and died in 1717. He published an edition of the Septuagint, Observations on the New Testament, and the Antiquities of Greece.—Moreri.

Bos (Lewis Janssen), a celebrated painter of flowers, on the leaves of which he represented drops of dew with uncommon transparency. He died in 1507.—Pilkington.

Bosc (Peter du), a French protestant divine, was born at Bayeux in 1623, and became minister at Caen, in 1645. In 1666 he waited on the king in behalf of the persecuted churches of Normandy, and gained some favour for them. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to Rotterdam, where he officiated till his death in 1692. We have by him 4 vols. of sermons, in French, and some tracts in 2 vols.—Bayle.

BOSCAGER (John), an eminent lawyer, was born at Beziers in 1601. He studied at Paris under his uncle La Forêt, a celebrated teacher of the law, whom he succeeded. He wrote an Institute of the Roman and French law, 4to.; and after his death was published a work of his, De Justitia et Jure, 12mo. He died at the age of 83.—Moreri.

BOSCAN (John), a Spanish poet, who died about 1543. His pieces are, 1. Medina, 1544, 4to.; 2. Salamanca, 1547, 8vo. His style is majestic, his thoughts excellent, and his expressions very elegant.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOSCAWEN (Edward), a brave English admiral, was the second son of Hugh, viscount Falmouth, and born at the family seat in Cornwall. Having entered into the navy, he was, in 1740, made captain of the Shoreham. He particularly distinguished himself at the taking of Porto Bello, and the siege of Carthagea. At the latter place he attacked and took, with a party of seamen, a Spanish battery, though exposed to a tremendous fire. On his return to England, he married the daughter of William Glanville, esq. and was chosen member of parliament for Truro. In 1744 he was made captain of the Dreadnought, of 60 guns, and soon after took the Media, commanded by M. Hoquart, the first French ship of war captured that year. In 1747 he signalized himself under Anson, and was in an engagement with the French fleet off Cape Finisterre, on which occasion M. Hoquart again became his prisoner. The same year he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and commander of the land and sea forces employed in an expedition to the East Indies. On his arrival there he laid siege to Pondicherry, but was obliged to quit it on account of the monsoon. However he took Madras, and the peace being concluded, he returned to England, where he was appointed one of the lords commissioners of the admiralty. In April 1755 he failed to intercept a French squadron bound to North America, of which he took two ships, and Hoquart became his prisoner a third time. In 1758 he was sent out to Cape Breton, which island and Louisbourg he took, in conjunction with general Amherst. The year following he commanded in the Mediterranean, and while lying at Gibraltar, hearing that M. De La Clue had passed the Straits, he instantly refitted his ships, and overtook the French fleet, of which he took three and burnt two in Lagos bay. In 1760 he was appointed general of the marines, with a salary of 3000*l.* a year. He died in 1761.—Lives of the Admirals.

BOSCH (Balthasar van den), a celebrated Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1675, and died in 1715. His conversation pieces and portraits possess considerable merit. He must not be confounded with Jacob Bosch, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1636, and died in 1675. He excelled in painting fruits.—Pilkington. Houbraken.

BOSCHAERTS (Thomas Willeborts), a Flemish painter, was born in 1613, and became painter to the prince of Orange; he was fond of allegorical subjects. He died in 1667.—Pilkington.

BOSCOLI (Andrew), an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1553, and became the disciple of Santa di Titi: he distinguished himself by the correctness of his designs and the force of his colouring.—Ibid.

BOSCOVICH (Joseph Roger), a celebrated mathematician, was born at Ragusa in 1711. He entered among the jesuits, and became successively professor of mathematics at Rome, Pavia, and Milan. When his order was suppressed he was invited to Paris, where he was appointed director of the optical instruments of the marine; which led him to improve the theory of achromatic glasses. In 1783 he quitted France and retired to Milan, where he died in 1787. He was employed by the emperor in measuring a degree in Italy. His philosophical works are profound, accurate, and elegant; but particularly his Latin poem on eclipses, entitled De Solis ac Lunæ Defectibus.—Eloge by Dr. Bajamonti, Naples, 1790.

BOSIUS (James), an Italian monk of the 17th century, who wrote a history of the order of Malta, Rome, 3 vols. folio, 1684.—Moreri.

BOSIUS (Anthony), nephew of the above, and agent of the order of Malta. He wrote a description of the christian catacombs in Italy, under the title of Roma Subterranea, 1642, folio.—Morri.

BOSQUET (Francis), bishop of Montpellier, was born at Narbonne in 1605, and died in 1676. He published the Lives of the Popes of Avignon, and the History of the Gallikan church.—Ibid.

BOSSE (Abraham), a French engraver, who gave the first lessons of perspective in the academy of painting at Paris. He died in 1660, and left tracts on the Manner of Drawing the Orders of Architecture, folio; on the Art of Engraving, 8vo; on Perspective, 8vo; Representations of divers Human Figures, taken from the Antiques at Rome, 1656.—Ibid.

BOSSU (René), a French writer, born at Paris in 1631, and died in 1680. He was a canon in the abbey of St. Genevieve, and became a teacher of the belles lettres. His best piece is on epic poetry, which Boileau commends in high terms.—Ibid.

BOSSUET (James), a celebrated French divine, was born at Dijon in 1627, and having gone through his academical studies, entered into orders. He soon became a famous preacher, and in 1669 was made bishop of Condom, at which time he was also appointed tutor to the dauphin, to whom he addressed his Discourse on Universal History, which was printed in 1681. The same year he was made bishop of Meaux. In 1697 he was appointed counsellor of state. Bossuet distinguished himself as a controversialist against the protestants, and his Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church upon Matters of Controversy was written with such subtlety as to draw many persons over to popery. It was translated into several languages, and procured the author the thanks of the pope. Several able protestants attacked the bishop, who answered them with spirit, if not with strength. He died in 1704, and was buried at Meaux. His funeral orations are peculiarly splendid, affecting, and eloquent. His works were published at Paris in 1743, 12 vols. 4to.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BOSTON (Thomas), a Scotch presbyterian divine, was born at Dunfermline in 1676, and educated at Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.A. In 1706 he became minister of Etterick. He died in 1732. His book on Human Nature in its fourfold State, has been praised by many writers as exhibiting a good view of practical divinity. He also wrote some other pieces.—Life by himself, 8vo.

BOSWELL (James), an ingenious Scottish writer, was the son of Alexander Boswell, of Auchinleck, one of the justices of session, and born at Edinburgh in 1740. He received his education at the school and university of his native city; and early distinguished himself by his love of poetry and the belles lettres. He was, however, rather fond of pleasure, and wished to enter into the army, but his father, who designed him for his own profession, kept him from a military life, partly by threats and partly by promises. At his request he went to London, where he contracted an intimacy with Dr. Johnson, and other men of literary eminence. From thence he went to Utrecht and studied the civil law; after which he travelled through Germany and Switzerland. In the latter country he was introduced to Rousseau, and at Ferney visited Voltaire, which occasioned his friend Johnson, at his return, to make some very sarcastic remarks upon him for the company he had kept. He next went to Italy, and passed over to Corsica, where he formed an intimacy with general Paoli. On his return he published an account of Corsica, written in a pleasant style, and which became for a time very popular. About this time he was admitted an advocate at the Scottish bar, and distinguished himself greatly in the famous Douglas cause. But his disposition was rather indolent, and he was fond of pleasure, which were powerful impediments to his progress in the legal profession. In 1773 he accompanied Dr. Johnson in a tour through the Highlands and the western isles of Scotland, of which tour he wrote a most entertaining account, published in 1784. Shortly after the death of his father he removed to London, and was admitted at the English bar, but never attained any considerable practice. By the favour of lord Londale, however, he was appointed recorder of Carlisle. In 1790 he published a book of high value in biographical literature, The Memoirs of Dr. Johnson, in 2 vols. 4to. and since reprinted in 3 vols. 8vo. Mr. Boswell died in 1795, leaving by his lady, who died before him, two sons and three daughters. He was a man of amiable manners, and, though fond of convivial society, virtuous in his principles, and a christian.—Monthly Mag. July 1803.

BOTAL (Leonard), physician to Henry III. of France. He introduced frequent bleeding in fevers, which was condemned by the rest of the faculty. His works were printed at Leyden in 1660, 8vo.—Bayle.

BOTERO (John), surnamed Benéfius. He was a native of Piedmont, secretary to cardinal St. Borromeo, and preceptor to the children of Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy. He died in 1608. He wrote, 1. Della ragione di Stato, 8vo. 2. I Principi, 8vo.—Ib.

BOTH (John), an eminent landscape painter, was born at Utrecht in 1610, and was the disciple of Abraham Bloemart at the same time with his brother Andrew. The two brothers went to Rome, where John adopted the manner of Claude Lorraine, and attained an uncommon degree of excellence. He was unfortunately drowned in a canal at Venice in 1650. Andrew returned to Utrecht, where he died in 1656.—D'Argenville Vie des Peintres.

BOTHLAN, a christian physician of Bagdad, and the rival of Ibn Rodhwan. Their disputes were carried on with much abuse. Rodhwan had an indifferent countenance, on which Bothlan called him the crocodile of the devil; and Rodhwan wrote a book to prove that it is not necessary a physician should be handsome. Bothlan died at Constantinople about 1084. He wrote some medical tracts.—D'Herbelot.

BOTHWELL (James Hepburn, earl), remarkable in the History of Scotland for his connexion with queen Mary, and his supposed share, at least, in the murder of Henry Darnley, her husband. When that unfortunate prince was blown up in the house where he slept, suspicion fell strongly upon Bothwell and the queen. Bothwell was tried, but nothing could be fixed upon him, and he was acquitted. After this he seized Mary near Edinburgh, and carried her prisoner to Dunbar castle, where he first endeavoured, by soothing speeches, and protestations of love, to prevail on her to marry him. That she did so at last is certain; but it is said, and seemingly with justice, that she was forced to it, by the worst of advantages being taken of her. During these iniquitous proceedings Bothwell pronounced a divorce between him and his wife, who was his cousin in the 4th degree. Mary soon after this created him earl of Orkney. His behaviour now was brutal in the extreme, and a confederacy among the lords being formed against him, which he could not withstand, he retired to the Orkneys, and from thence to Denmark, where he died in 1577, confessing his own guilt and the queen's innocence of the king's murder.—Robertson's Scotland. Whitaker's Vindication of Mary Queen of Scots. Buchanan.

BOTICELLI (Alexander), an Italian painter, born at Florence in 1437, and died in 1515. His Venus rising from the sea, and Venus adored by the Graces, possess extraordinary merit.—Depiles.

BOTT (John de), an architect, was born in France, but being a protestant, went into the service of William prince of Orange whom he accompanied to England. After the death of that prince, he went to Brandenburg, where the elector made him captain of the guards; he built several structures, particularly the arsenal of Berlin. He was also made major-general, and shewed his military skill in the fortifications of Wesel. In 1728 he went into the service of the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, as lieutenant-general, and chief of the engineers. He died at Dresden in 1745.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOTT (Thomas), an English divine, was born at Derby in 1688. He was at first a dissenting teacher, but quitted that way for the church of England, in which he was ordained, and obtained the rectories of Winburg and Edgefield in Norfolk. He died in 1754. He published some sermons and religious tracts.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BOVADILLA, or BOBADILLA (don Francisco de), a Spanish commander. In 1500 he was sent out governor-general to St. Domingo, where he put the great Columbus and his brothers in irons, and sent them to Spain. This conduct offended the court so much that all the proceedings against the prisoners were annulled, and Bovadilla recalled; in his passage home, in 1502, himself and the whole fleet, laden with gold, foundered at sea.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOUCHARDON (Edmund), a French sculptor and architect, born in 1698, and died in 1762. He adorned Paris with several handsome structures, a list of which is given in his Life by count de Caylus.

BOUCHAUD (Matthew-Autony), a French writer, born at Paris in 1719. He was advocate in the parliament of that city, but quitted that profession for the professorship of the law of nature in the college of France. He wrote numerous articles in the Encyclopedie, and translated the dramas of Apollonius Zeno; the English novel of Juliet Mandevel, and other works. He also wrote a Commentary on the Law of the Twelve Tables, enriched with curious notes; poetical Antiquities, &c. He died in 1804.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOUCHER D'ARCOIS (Anthony Gaspard), a French writer, was born at Paris in 1708, admitted advocate in 1727, and counsellor of Dombes in 1753. He published some pieces on jurisprudence, and wrote all the articles on that subject in the Encyclopedie.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOUCHER (Francis), an eminent French painter. His landscapes are very rich and natural, and his figures graceful and elegant. He was called the Anacreon of painting, and died in 1770.—Ibid.

BOUCHER (John), a French divine and doctor of the Sorbonne, who exerted himself at the time of the league on the side of the insurgents, and boldly recommended in his preachings and writings, the deposition of Henry III. and Henry IV. He obtained a canonry at Tournay, and was dean of the chapter. He died there very old.—Moreri.

BOUCHET (John), a French lawyer, was born at Poitiers in 1476, and died in 1550. His Annals of Aquitaine were printed at Paris in 1644, folio. It is a very curious work. He also wrote some poems. He is not to be confounded with one of both his names, who was maitre du hotel to the king of France, and died in 1684. He wrote several genealogies of illustrious families.—Moreri.

BOUCHIER (Thomas), archbishop of Canterbury, died in 1486. He introduced the art of printing into England in 1464 by bringing over a compositor from Haerlem at his own expence.—Godwin de Praef.

BOUCICANT, or John le Maigne, marshal of France and viscount Turenne, became a foldier at the age of ten years. He was in numerous battles, in which he distinguished himself by his skill and valour. In 1396 he accompanied count Nevers in a crusade against Bajazet emperor of the Turks, but was taken prisoner at the battle of Nicopolis, and ransomed. He afterwards became governor of Genoa, where he quelled some popular commotions. He next seized upon Milan, and in his absence all the French in Genoa were massacred. On his march from Milan he was defeated, and escaped with difficulty across the Alps. In 1415 he was taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and carried to England, where he died in 1421. Boucicant was a man of letters, and had a taste for music. Some of his ballads are extant.—Moreri.

BOUDEWINS (Michael), a physician of Antwerp, who published a good work, entitled Ventilabrum Medico Theologicum, 1666. 4to. He died in 1681.—Moreri.

BOVEY (Catherine), an accomplished English lady, whose maiden name was Riches. She was married at the age of 15 to William Bovey, esq. a gentleman of large fortune in Gloucestershire, who left her a widow. Her person was uncommonly handsome, and her talents various; but she was particularly distinguished by the benevolence of her disposition and her numerous charities. Sir Richard Steele, in the dedication of the 2d volume of his Ladies' Library to her, speaks of her virtues in the highest terms. She died at Haxley in Gloucestershire in 1726, aged 57.—Ballard's British Ladies.

BOUFFLERS (Lewis Francis de), marshal of France, was born in 1644, and entered early into the army. In 1669 he became colonel of a regiment of dragoons, and distinguished himself in several actions. In 1708 he defended Lille with great bravery against prince Eugene, for which he was created a peer. At the battle of Malplaquet, he effected his retreat without losing any of his artillery or soldiers. When king William took Namur, he kept Boufflers prisoner, contrary to the capitulation; the marshal asking the reason of this conduct, was told it was on account of the French having kept the garrison of Dixmude: "Then," said he, "mine ought to be detained rather than myself." "Sir," it was replied, "you are of more value than 10,000 men." He died at Fontenbleau in 1711.—Moreri. New. Dict. Hist.

BOUGAINVILLE (John Peter de), a French writer, was born at Paris in 1732, and died in 1763. He was member of the French academy, and of several learned societies in other countries. He also obtained several honourable appointments. We have by him, 1. A Translation of the Anti Lucretius of Polignac, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. Parallel between the Expedition of Thamas Kouli Khan and Alexander.—New. Dict. Hist.

BOUGRANT (William Hyacinth), a learned jesuit, born at Quimper in 1690, and died at Paris in 1743. He wrote several books, the most noted of which is entitled Philosophical Amusements on the Language of Brutes, in which he holds that they are animated by demons. His History of the Treaty of Westphalia, however, is a solid and judicious work.—New. Dict. Hist.

BOUVIER (Peter), a French mathematician, was born at Croisc in 1698, and became a member of the academy of sciences in 1731. He went with Mess. Godin and la Condamine to measure a degree in Peru for the purpose of ascertaining the figure of the earth. He died in 1758. His works are; La Construction du Navire, 4to. La Figure de la Terre, 4to. Traité d'Optique, 4to. La Manœuvre des Vaisseaux, 4to.—Ibid.

BOUVIER (John), president of the parliament of Dijon, where he was born in 1673. His talents for literature were so eminent that he obtained a seat in the French academy. He died in 1746. He translated part of the works of Petronius, Ovid, and Virgil, the Tusculan disputations of Cicero. He likewise wrote some ingenious dissertations on classical subjects.—New. Dict. Hist.

BOUVOURS (Dominic), a learned jesuit, was born at Paris in 1628. His Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugene, recommended him to the great Colbert, who committed to his instruction his son, the marquis of Seguehai. His Remarks and Doubts on the French Language is an excellent book. He wrote also a number of biographical, religious, and miscellaneous treatises. He died at Paris in 1702.—Moreri.

BOUILLAUD (Ismael), a French mathematician, was bred a protestant, but renounced that religion, and took orders in the Roman church. He died in 1694, aged 80. He wrote Opus novum ad Arithmeticum infinitorum, 1682, folio; A Discourse on the Reformation of some Religious Orders; an edition of the History of Ducas, in Greek and Latin, 1649, folio.—Moreri.

BOUVILLE (M. le marquis de), a French general, was descended from an ancient and noble family. During the American war he served in the West Indies, and was appointed commandant of the French islands there: he was also advanced to the rank of lieutenant-general, and received the order of knighthood called the Holy Ghost. On the breaking out of the revolution he opposed the projects of the innovators, particularly of Necker, with great zeal. He was then governor of Metz, in which station he acted with peculiar firmness and prudence. In August 1790 the garrison of that city commenced a dangerous insurrection, which was with difficulty, and not without considerable slaughter, suppressed. For this he was attacked by the jacobin faction, which was increased in consequence of the part he bore in the king's unsuccessful attempt to escape from France. On that occasion he wrote an energetic letter to the assembly, acknowledging himself the sole adviser and contriver of that affair; for which his estates were confiscated, and a reward offered for his head. In 1791 he accepted a commission in the Swedish service, which he afterwards quitted, and became a volunteer under the prince of Conde. In 1797 he published his Memoirs of the French Revolution, a work of considerable interest and impartiality. He died at London, Nov. 14, 1800.—British Magazine.

BOUVILLET (John), a French physician, born at Servian in 1690, and died in 1777. His works are, Elements de Medecine pratique (Elements of practical Physic), 2 vols. 4to.; Observations sur l'Analarque, &c. (Observations on the Dropsy), 4to.; Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire de l'Academie Sciences de Beziers, 4to.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BOULAI (Cesar Egasse du), a French writer, who published a History of the university of Paris, in 6 vols. folio, 1665, which was censured by the theological faculty, and defended by the author. He died in 1678.—Moreri.

BOULAINVILLIERS (Henry de), lord of Saife, a celebrated French writer. He was born in 1658, and received a liberal education. We have by him a great number of books, the principal of which is the Life of Mohammed. He died in 1722.—Moreri.

BOULANGER (Nicholas Anthony), a French philosopher. He was born at Paris in 1722, and died in 1759. His progress in the mathematics and architecture, although without a tutor, was so great, that he became engineer to the baron of Thiers; he was afterwards appointed superintendant of the highways and bridges. He wrote, Traité du Despotisme oriental, 2 vols. 12mo. L'Antiquité dévoilée, par ses Usages, 3 vols. 12mo. A Dissertation on Elifha and Enoch. He also wrote some articles in the Encyclopedie. But all his writings are full of enmity to the christian religion.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BOULAY (Edmund du), a French writer of the 16th century. He was herald at arms to the dukes of Lorraine. He wrote the Journey of Duke Anthony to Charles V. and some other books.—Moreri.

BOULLENGER (Claude Francis Felix), a French writer and advocate, born in 1724, and died in 1758. He wrote, 1. Traité de la Cause et des Phénomènes de l'Electricité, 8vo. 2. Recherches historiques et Critiques sur quelques anciens Spectacles, &c. 12mo. 3. Fables et Conte François.—Ibid.

BOULLIER (David Renauld), an eminent protestant divine, was born in 1669, and died in 1759. He wrote a Dissertation on the Existence of God. 1716. Letters on the True Principles of Religion, 1741, 2 vols. 12mo. A Translation of bishop Berkeley's book on Tar-water; and other pieces.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BOULLONGNE (Lewis), a French historical painter of the 17th century. His picture of Augustus shutting the temple of Janus is a grand piece, and shews great judgment and taste. He died in 1674.—His two sons Bon and Lewis Boullongne were also esteemed artists. The first from his various talents was called the Proteus of painters. He died in 1697. The last became president of the academy of painting and first painter to the king. He died in 1733.—D'Argenville vies des Peintres.

BOULTER (Hugh), an exemplary prelate, was born in London in 1671, and educated at Merchant Taylors' school, from whence he removed to Christ-church college, Oxford, and afterwards became fellow of Magdalen. About 1700 he obtained the living of St. Olaves, Southwark, and the archdeaconry of Surrey. When George I. came to the throne, he was appointed one of his chaplains in ordinary, and attended him to Hanover in 1719; he also taught prince Frederic English, for which he was rewarded first with the deanry of Christ church, and then with the bishopric of Bristol. The king nominated him unexpectedly to the see of Armagh in Ireland, which he accepted with reluctance. In this high station he proved a great blessing to that part of the kingdom. He attended all public boards, promoted every measure of public utility, and his charity knew no bounds. By his management the scarcity of silver coin was remedied, and he relieved Dublin from the threatened horrors of a famine; it being proved that no less than 2500 persons were daily fed at his own expence. He maintained several sons of poor clergymen at the university, built and endowed many hospitals, enlarged various small livings, and procured the royal charter at his own expence for the incorporated society for promoting the protestant schools in Ireland. He died in London in 1742, and lies in Westminster abbey. A collection of his Letters was printed at Oxford in 1769, 2 vols. 8vo.—Biog. Brit.

BOUQUET (Dom Martin), a benedictine of St. Maur, born in 1685 at Amiens, and died at Paris in 1754. He assisted Montfaucon in his compilations, and published a Collection of the Historians of France.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BOURBON (Charles duke of), constable of France, was the son of Gilbert count of Montpensier, and born in 1489. Embracing a military life he distinguished himself at the famous battle of Marignano. He soon after fell into disgrace through the personal enmity of Louise mother of Francis I. whose offer of marriage he had rejected. On this he associated with the emperor Charles V. and the king of England against his sovereign. The plot however was discovered, and he escaped into Italy, where he became lieutenant-general to the emperor, and afterwards commander in chief. He was killed in an assault upon Rome, May 5, 1527.—Moreri.

BOURBON (Nicholas), a modern Latin poet, was born at Bar-sur-Aube about 1574. He became royal professor of Greek at Paris, canon of Orleans and of Langres. He died in 1644. His Poema, which are highly classical, were printed at Paris in 1651, 12mo.—Moreri.

BOURCHIER (John), lord Berners, in the reign of Edward IV. was equally famous for his valour and learning. By his mother he was nearly allied to the Plantagenets. On leaving Oxford he travelled, and returned to his own country master of several languages. That which first made him known to the world was his valour shewn in quelling the Devonshire and Cornish rebels about 1495. Henry VIII. made him chancellor of the exchequer for life. He also became governor of Calais, where he died in 1532. He wrote, 1. Of the Duties of the Inhabitants of Calais. 2. A Comedy called It in vinum meum, acted in the great church at Calais. He also translated some French romances, and the Chronicle of Froissart, into English.—Wood.

BOURDALOUE (Lewin), a celebrated French jesuit, was born at Bourges in 1632. He became the most celebrated preacher of his time, and was greatly esteemed by Lewis XIV. He died in 1704. His sermons in 16 vols. 8vo. are truly excellent.—Moreri.

BOURDEILLES (Peter de), a singular French character, who is better known by the name of Brantome. He was an abbot and chevalier, besides having several places at court. He died in 1614, aged 87. His Memoirs, printed at the Hague in 15 vols. 12mo. 1741, are very curious. He is not to be confounded with his nephew Claude de Bourdailles count de Montreuil, who also wrote a history of his own time under the title of Memoirs. He died in 1663.—Ibid.

BOURDELOT (John), a French critic of the 17th century. He was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and master of requests to Mary of Medicis. We have by him annotations upon several ancient authors, Greek and Latin. He died in 1638.—Moreri.

BOURDELOT (the abbé), whose true name was Peter Michon, a physician, born at Geneva in 1610. He became physician to the great Condé, and afterwards attended Christina of Sweden, who obtained for him the abbey of Maillay. He died at Paris in 1685. We have by him a treatise on the Viper, 1651, 12mo. another on Mount Aetna, &c.: he also left in MSS. a catalogue of medical books, with lives of authors, and a critique on their works.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOURDON (Sebastian), a celebrated French painter, and first president of the academy of painting and sculpture at Paris, was born at Montpellier in 1610. He left France on account of his religion, and entered into the service of Christina queen of Sweden. His pieces are numerous, but his landscapes are the best. He died in 1662.—D'Argenville.

BOURDON (Amé), a French physician and anatomist, was born at Cambray in 1638, and died in 1706. He published Anatomical Tables, folio, and an Anatomical Description of the Human Body, 12mo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOURDONNATE (Bernard-Francis Mahé de la), born at St. Malo in 1699, was both a merchant and a warrior. He made several voyages in the service of the French East India company, and was made governor of the isles of France and Bourbon. In 1746 he took Madras from the English, and in consideration of a large ransom saved the place from pillage. The fortune he acquired excited the jealousy of the company, and by their contrivance he was on his return imprisoned in the Bastille. An action was also commenced against him which lasted above three years. Though he was declared innocent and was restored to his honours, the chagrin occasioned by the treatment he had received put an end to his life in 1754.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOURO (Anne du), a French protestant, was descended of a noble family, and born in 1521. He was educated for the church and took orders, but embracing the reformed religion, he studied the law and became counsellor-clerk in the parliament of Paris. He approved himself so zealous in defence of the protestants that Henry II. caused him to be tried for heresy, and though several princes endeavoured to save his life, he was hanged and burnt at Paris in 1559.—Moreri.

BOURGELAT (Claude), a French farrier, was one of the first who obtained the establishment of veterinary schools. His writings are wholly upon farriery. He died in 1779.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOURGES (Clementine de), an ingenious French lady, was born of a good family at Lyons. She acquired considerable reputation by her poetical compositions and musical skill; and was presented to two monarchs who passed through Lyons as the greatest ornament of the city. She died of grief for the loss of her lover John de Peyrat, who was killed at the siege of Beaurepaire in 1561.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOURGERT (Dom John), a French antiquary, was born in the diocese of Sees in 1724, and became superior of the abbey of Bec. The society of antiquaries in London chose him a member in 1765. He made collections of the histories and antiquities of the abbeys in Normandy, which still remain in MSS. He died in 1776.—Gen. Bing. Dict.

BOURGNET (Lewis), an ingenious naturalist, was born at Nîmes in 1678. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Switzerland with his family. He became professor of philosophy and mathematics at Neuchâtel, where he died in 1742. His works are; On the Formation of Salts and Crystals, 12mo. La Bibliothèque Italique, 16 vols. 8vo.: this useful journal began to be published at Geneva in 1798, and possessed great merit.—Moreri.

BOURIGNON (Antoinette), a celebrated fanatic, was born in 1616 at Lille. She inherited a considerable fortune from her parents, which she greatly improved. In 1658 she took the habit of St Augustine, and became the head of a religious society at Lille, but some of her nuns being filled with enthusiasm, either believed or pretended that they were possessed, which occasioned so much noise that she removed to Amsterdam, and gained several profelytes, particularly one de Cort, a man of considerable property, who left her an estate. Here she published her book, entitled, The Light of the World, in which she maintained that true christianity does not consist in faith or practice, but in a certain inward feeling and supernatural impulse on the mind. She wrote a prodigious number of books in support of this absurd and pernicious notion, and gained many followers, who gave her considerable trouble. After rambling from one place to another she died at Franeker in 1680. Her disciples in Scotland were once numerous, and a few still exist in that country.—Bayle. Mætem.

BOURN (Samuel), a dissenting divine, was born at Birmingham, and educated at Glasgow. In 1742 he became pastor of a congregation at Rivington in Lancashire; from whence he removed to Norwich, as assistant to Dr. John Taylor; and died there in 1796, aged 83. He published some volumes of Sermons, and had a short dispute with Dr. Chandler on the duration of future punishments.—Monthly Mag.

BOURNE (Vincent), an English poet. He was fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, and usher of Westminster school. His volume of poems in 12mo, reprinted in 1772, 4to. shew a classical taste and a fertile imagination. Mr. Bourne was in orders, and died young.—Gen. B. D.

BOURSAULT (Edmund), a French writer, was born in 1636 in Burgundy, and though destitute of an education, attained to a good style of writing, and produced some dramatic pieces, which are still held in esteem. He also wrote romances, and a collection of letters under the name of Babet. The Théâtre de Boursault was printed in 3 vols. 12mo. 1746. He died in 1701, aged 63.—Moreri.

BOURSIER (Laurence Francis), a doctor of the Sorbonne, was born in 1679, and died in 1749. When Peter the Great was at Paris, this divine recommended to him a union between the two churches. He wrote a famous book on the Action of the Deity upon the Creatures, 2 vols. 4to. and 6 vols. 12mo. which was attacked by Malebranche. He is not to be confounded with Philip Bourcier, a divine at Paris who died in 1768, aged 77. He was the author of Nouvelles Ecclésiastiques.—Moreri. Novv. Diss. Hist.

BOUVART (Michael Philip), a French

physician, was born in 1721 at Chartres, where he learnt the elements of physic, and had the charge of an hospital. Afterwards he removed to Paris, and in 1743 became professor in the royal college. An anecdote related of him does him great honour. A banker having experienced some heavy losses was taken ill. M. Bouvart suspected the cause of his indisposition, but could not get the secret from his patient. The banker's wife, however, told him that he wanted 30,000 livres against a particular day, and that the time of payment was very near. The doctor said nothing, but returning home, sent the exact sum to his patient, which cured him. He died in 1787. He wrote some medical tracts.—Novv. Diss. Hist.

BOWER (Archibald), a Scottish writer, was born at or near Dundee in 1686. He received his education first at Douay, and afterwards at Rome, where he became a jesuit. He was counsellor to the inquisition at Macerata for some time, from whence he removed to Perugia in 1726. Shortly after this, on some account, which was never exactly ascertained, he effected his escape from that place, and after a variety of adventures reached England, where he conformed to the established church, and married. He became tutor in the family of lord Aylmer, and wrote for the booksellers, particularly in correcting the Universal History. His Lives of the Popes, which came out in successive volumes, brought upon him some severe attacks from the Roman catholics, in which his moral character suffered considerably. Bower defended himself with spirit, but his veracity was questioned both by protestants and papists, and he sunk into contempt. The good lord Lyttelton, however, patronized him to the last. He died in 1766. His wife publicly announced his dying in the protestant communion.—Europ. Mag.

BOWLE (John), an English divine, was educated at Oriel college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1750. He was one of the first who detected the forgeries of Lauder. He published a letter to bishop Percy, and a pompous edition of Don Quixote, in Spanish; he also edited Marston's Satires, and some old English poetry. He died in 1788, aged 63.—Gen. B. D.

BOWYER (William), a learned English printer, was born in London in 1699. He received his education at Merchant Taylors' school, from whence he removed to St. John's college, Cambridge. On leaving the university he went into business with his father, and their press acquired a great reputation among the learned on account of the accuracy and elegance with which the works were executed that issued from it. In 1729 he was appointed printer of the votes of the house of commons. In 1736 he was elected fellow of the society of antiquaries. In 1761 he was appointed printer to the royal society; and in 1763 he published the New Testament in Greek, with conjectural emendations collected from the most eminent critics, 2 vols. 12mo. The last have been printed in a separate form. In 1766 he took the worthy and ingenious Mr. John Nichols into partnership, by which he was greatly relieved from the weight of business. The year following he was appointed printer of the journals of the house of lords and rolls of parliament. He died in 1777. Mr. Bowyer wrote several curious tracts, and published improved editions of some scarce and valuable books. He left to the company of stationers 1000*l.* in the 3 per cents. reduced, the produce of which they are to pay yearly to a journeyman compositor, who is of sober life, and versed in the Latin and Greek languages.—Nichols's Anecdotes of Bowyer.

BOXHORNIUS (Marcus Zuernius), professor of eloquence, and afterwards of politics and history, at Leyden. He was born at Bergen-op-Zoom in 1612, and died in 1653. His works are, Historia Universalis, 4to. Obfidio Bredana, folio. Virorum illustrium Elogia, folio. Chronologia Sacra, folio. Poemata, 12mo. Theatrum urbium Hollandiæ, 4to. &c.—Bayle.

BOYCE (William), an eminent English musician, was born in London in 1710, and served as a singing boy in St. Paul's; after which he became apprentice to Dr. Green, organist of that cathedral, who left him at his death all his MSS. and entrusted to him the publication of his collection of anthems. Boyce when young was seized with an incurable deafness, which might be supposed as fatal a malady to a musician as blindness to a painter. Notwithstanding this he continued his profession with surprising perseverance; and in 1749 the university of Cambridge conferred on him the degree of Mus. D. In 1757 he was appointed master of the king's band, which place was followed by those of organist and composer to his majesty. He died in 1779, and was interred in St. Paul's cathedral. Only a few of his numerous compositions have been published. His songs are delicate and lively, and his anthems, symphonies, and oratorios, are very fine.—Monthly Mag. Oct. 1798.

BOYD (Robert, lord), a Scotch nobleman, was the son of sir Thomas Boyd, of Kilmarnock, who was killed in 1439, in revenge for having murdered lord Darnley. The son acquired great popularity both with the king and the people. The former created him a peer by the title of lord Boyd of Kilmarnock. On the death of James II. in 1460 he was appointed justiciary of the kingdom, and one of the lords of the regency during the minority of James III. He and his family engrossed almost all the public offices to themselves; and they went so far as to carry off the young king from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, where lord Boyd got himself declared sole regent. He also effected a marriage between the king's sister and his son sir Thomas Boyd, afterwards earl of Arran. In 1469 the king, at the instigation of some of his nobles, called a parliament for the purpose of examining into the conduct of Boyd, who thereupon fled to England, and died at Alnwick in 1470. The earl of Arran was divorced from his lady, and died in exile at Antwerp in 1474. The unfortunate lord Kilmarnock, who suffered in 1746, was a descendant of this house.—Biog. Br.

BOYD (Mark Alexander), a Scottish poet, was born in Galloway, and educated under his uncle, the archbishop of Glasgow, after which he went abroad, where he resided several years. He died in his native country, in 1601, aged 39. His Epistole Heroïdum, and his Hymns, were printed in the Deliciæ Poëtarum Scotorum, Amsterdam, 1637 2 vols. 12mo.—Ibid.

BOYER (Abel), a lexicographer and grammarian, was born at Castrès in France, in 1664, but left that country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. After finishing his studies at Geneva and Franeker, he visited England, where he subsisted by teaching the French language, and died in 1729. His French and English grammar and dictionary have gone through numerous editions. He also compiled a periodical work, called The Political State of Europe, somewhat after the manner of the Annual Registers; The History of King William, 3 vols. 8vo.; and the Annals of Queen Anne, 11 vols. 8vo. and other works.—Mareri.

BOYER (Claude), a member of the French academy, born at Alby in 1618, and died in 1698. He was an ecclesiastic, which profession he quitted for the stage. He wrote several dramatic pieces, which were condemned as fast as they were produced.—Id.

BOYER (John Baptist du), physician to Lewis XIV. was born at Marseilles in 1698, and his conduct when his native city was ravaged by the plague obtained him a place at court, and a pension. He published a corrected edition of the Codex Medicamentarius; seu Pharmacopœia Parisiensis, 4to. He died in 1768.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BOYLE (Richard), earl of Cork, was born at Canterbury in 1566, and educated at Bene't college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple. In 1588 he went to Ireland, where he gained considerable employment, and married a lady of fortune. He made several large purchases of land in that kingdom, on which he settled English protestants. In 1603 he married a second time, and the same year was knighted. King James made him privy counsellor of Ireland, and in 1616 raised him to the peerage by the title of baron of Youghall, which he afterwards exchanged for the earldom of Cork. In 1631

He was constituted lord high treasurer of Ireland, which office was made hereditary in his family. When the rebellion broke out in 1641 he made great exertion in behalf of the government; and in the battle of Lisfcarrol four of his sons were engaged, the eldest of whom was slain. He died in 1643, aged 78, and caused this motto to be engraved on his tomb, "God's Providence is my inheritance." By his second wife he had seven sons and eight daughters.—Biog. Brit.

BOYLE (Roger), earl of Orrery, fifth son of the preceding, was born in Ireland in 1621, and at the age of seven created lord Broghill. Having finished his education at Trinity college, Dublin, he went abroad, and on his return married the daughter of the earl of Suffolk. After the murder of Charles I. he came to England, and solicited leave to go to the Spa for his health, but his real design was to visit the exiled king, and to consult upon the best means of promoting his interests in Ireland. His intentions being either discovered or suspected, the committee of safety were about to send him to the Tower, but were prevented by Cromwell, who prevailed upon lord Broghill to accept a commission under him in his Irish campaigns. His conduct gave Cromwell so much satisfaction, that when he became protector he made him one of his privy council, and took him into his entire confidence. After the death of Cromwell he served his son Richard for some time; but perceiving the instability of his government he withdrew to Ireland where he took proper measures for the restoration of monarchy. Charles II. on his accession, created him earl of Orrery, and appointed him one of his privy council. Soon after this he was constituted one of the lords justices of Ireland, and commissioned to call a parliament, before the meeting of which he drew up the celebrated act of settlement. On the fall of lord Clarendon he was offered the place of lord chancellor, but refused it. He died in 1679, leaving two sons and five daughters. He wrote several poems and plays, and his state letters were printed in folio in 1742.—Ibid.

BOYLE (Robert), a celebrated philosopher, was the seventh son of Richard, earl of Cork, and was born at Lismore in Ireland, January 25, 1627. Two misfortunes happened to him in his childhood: the first was the loss of his mother, and the second, an incurable habit of stuttering, which he acquired by mocking some other children. In 1635 he was sent to Eton school, and three years afterwards accompanied his brother Francis in his travels. They settled some time at Geneva, where, among other studies, Mr. Boyle applied diligently to the mathematics, of which he had before acquired the rudiments. After a stay of near two years at Geneva they visited Italy, where Mr. Boyle paid particular attention to the discoveries recently made by Galileo. The rebellion in Ireland having embarrassed their father's affairs they were greatly straitened in their circumstances abroad from the want of remittances. After experiencing many difficulties in this respect they returned to England in the summer of 1644, and found that their father was dead. To his son Robert he had bequeathed the manor of Stalbridge, where he chiefly resided; but when in London he lived with his sister, the lady Ranelagh, who had a genius and temper similar to his own. He now devoted himself wholly to philosophical pursuits, for which purpose he made frequent excursions to Oxford, where a philosophical society was held, which afterwards became the famous royal society, of which he was one of the earliest members. In 1654 he fixed his residence at Oxford, for the sake of enjoying the company of his learned friends, Dr. John Wilkins, Dr. John Wallis, Dr. Seth Ward, Dr. Thomas Willis, Mr. Christopher Wren, Dr. Goddard, and Dr. Ralph Bathurst. Here he applied principally to experimental philosophy, and contrived a more perfect air pump than that which had been recently invented. But natural philosophy was not the only subject which engaged his attention when at Oxford. He cultivated an acquaintance with the learned languages, and devoted so much time to the study of theology and sacred criticism, that at the restoration he was pressed to enter into orders, with a view of elevating him to the episcopacy, a rank which no man would have more adorned. But a natural diffidence and humility made him decline this and every other offer of preferment. He was also of opinion, that as a layman what he should write in behalf of religion would make more impression than if he were an ecclesiastic. His labours were so incessant and his fame so great that he continued to enrich the papers of the royal society by the communications of experiments; and as he was one of the first institutors, so he was the principal support and ornament of that establishment. He also exerted himself in other works, particularly in advancing works of charity, and schemes of improvement. As a director of the East India company he was the principal instrument in procuring their charter; for which he only required as a return, that they would do something towards propagating christianity in their settlements, to which end he had printed at Oxford 500 copies of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, in the Malayan tongue. He was also at the expence of translating into Arabic and printing Grotius de Veritate Religionis Christianæ, which was sent to the Levant. In 1678 he published an extraordinary piece, entitled, An Historical Account of a Degradation of Gold made by an Anti-elixir, &c. In the same year the royal society would have chosen him president, which honour he de-elined. About 1681 we find him engaged in promoting the propagation of the gospel among the Indians of North America. In 1689 he was obliged to have recourse to an advertisement to prevent the intrusion of visitors. By this means he gained time to perfect some important works, particularly those on chemistry. He died December 80, 1691, just a week after his beloved sister, lady Ranelagh. His remains were interred in the church of St. Martin in the Fields, where a funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Burnet, bishop of Salisbury. He founded a lecture at St. Paul's in defence of the gospel against unbelievers, without any regard to differences among christians. His works have been printed in 5 vols. folio, and 6 vols. 4to.—Life by Burnet. Biog. Brit.

BOYLE (Charles), earl of Orrery, was the son of Roger, the second earl, and born in 1676. He received his education at Christchurch, Oxford, under Dr. Atterbury, and while there engaged in a famous dispute with Dr. Bentley, on the epistles of Phalaris, a new edition of which had been published by Mr. Boyle in 1695. In this, however, he was materially assisted by his tutor. On leaving the university he was chosen member of parliament for Huntingdon; and, on the death of his brother, he succeeded to the earldom. In 1709 he obtained the rank of major-general, and was sworn of the privy council. During the treaty of Utrecht, he was envoy-extraordinary to the states of Flanders and Brabant, and on his return was created a British peer, by the title of lord Boyle, baron of Marlston in Somersetshire. At the accession of George I. he retired from court, and in 1722 was sent to the Tower on suspicion of high treason. After six months confinement he was discharged. He died in 1731. The astronomical instrument called an Orrery was named after him by the inventor Graham, in gratitude for favours received by him from his lordship.—Biog. Br.

BOYLE (John), earl of Cork and Orrery, and the only son of the last-mentioned, was born in 1707, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he removed to Christchurch, Oxford. In 1728 he married the daughter of the earl of Orkney, who died in 1732 at Cork. The year following he returned to England, and settled at Marlston in Somersetshire. In 1738 he married an Irish lady. The next year he published his great-grandfather's dramatic works in 2 vols. 8vo.; and in 1742 his State Letters. In 1751 appeared his translation of Pliny's Letters in 2 vols. 4to. addressed to his son. This was followed by his Observations on the Life of Swift, 8vo. In 1758 he lost his lady, and the next year his eldest son. He died in 1762. In 1774 appeared his Letters from Italy, with his life, written by the rev. Mr. Daincombe. His lordship also furnished some of the papers in the World and Con-

Boys (John), an English divine, was born in Kent, and educated at Bene's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1599 he obtained the vicarage of Tilmanstone, with which he held the rectory of Bettishanger, both in Kent. After possessing other preferments he was made dean of Canterbury in 1619, where he died suddenly in his study in 1625, aged 54. His works were published in 1 vol. folio. 1629.—Todd's Deans of Canterbury.

BORSZ, or BOIS (John), an English divine, born at Nettlestead in Suffolk, in 1560, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was Greek lecturer there many years, and obtained a fellowship, after which he received the college living of Boxworth. He was one of the translators of the present version of the Bible, and assisted Sir Henry Saville in his edition of St. Chrysostom. All the preferment he received in the church was a prebend of Ely, given him by bishop Andrews. He died in 1643.—Biog. Brit.

BORSZ (Joseph), a dissenting divine, was born at Leeds in Yorkshire, in 1660, and educated at Kendal in Westmoreland. In 1682 he was at Amsterdam, where he officiated among the brownists. At his return he accepted a call from a congregation at Dublin, where he died in 1728. His works were published the same year in 2 vols. folio.—Ibid.

BORSZ (Samuel), an ingenious but unfortunate poet, was the son of the preceding, and born in 1708 at Dublin. After receiving a grammatical education he was sent to Glasgow, where he married a tradesman's daughter before he was twenty. This imprudent step, added to the extravagance of himself and wife, involved him in misery. He published a volume of poems at Edinburgh, addressed to lady Eglintown, who liberally rewarded him; and an elegy on the countess of Stormont procured him from lord Stormont a handsome present. From Edinburgh he came to London, with a recommendatory letter, written by the duchess of Gordon, to Mr. Pope, and another to chancellor King, both of which he neglected to deliver. He loved mean company, and indulged in the grovelling habits of low life. His principal support arose from writing for the Gentleman's Magazine, and other periodical publications. The wretched situation he was in at this time is thus described by one who knew him: "He sat up in bed with the blanket wrapped about him, through which he had cut a hole large enough to receive his arm, and placing the paper on his knee scribbled in the best manner he could the verses he was obliged to make." In 1745 he wrote an historical Review of the Transactions of Europe, which was far from being ill-written. He wrote numerous poems, none of which are now read, except the Deity, which is admitted into many collections, and has been praised by two very different writers, Fielding and Hervey. He died in 1749, in Shoe-lane, and was buried at the expence of the parish.—Biog. Br. Gibber's Lives of the Poets.

Boze (Claude Gros de), a French antiquary, was born at Lyons in 1680, and became member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions and belles lettres, to the last of which he was appointed perpetual secretary. He was also nominated keeper of the royal cabinet of medals. He died in 1754. Boze published the first 15 volumes of the Academy of Inscriptions; the Medallic History of Lewis XIV. and other works of a like kind.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BRACCIOLINI (Francis), an Italian poet, was born at Pistoia in 1566, and at the age of 40 entered into orders. He was secretary to cardinal Anthony Barberini, as he had been to his brother pope Urban VIII. before his advancement to the pontificate. That family had so great an esteem for him as to permit him to take a surname from their arms, which were Bees, and hence he is called Bracciolini dell' Api. His poem, entitled, La Croce Riquadrata, 1605, is esteemed by the Italians as next to Tasso's Jerusalem. He also wrote some other good pieces, and died in 1645.—Tiraboschi.

BRACON (Henry de), an English lawyer of the 15th century, was born in Devonshire, and educated at Oxford. Henry III. made him one of the itinerant judges. His book, De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ, which was first printed in 1569, folio, is a complete and inestimable treatise on the English laws.—Prince's Worthies of Devon. Biog. Br.

BRADBURY (Thomas), an English dissenting minister, was born in London in 1672, educated under a Mr. Row, at Clapham, with Dr. Watts, and became a very popular preacher in the city. Bradley was a high calvinist, and a zealous whig. He was, however, a man of abilities and of great humour. He published two volumes of sermons, entitled, The Mystery of Godliness, and since his death three volumes more have been printed. He died in 1757, aged 85.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BRADFORD (John), an English martyr, was descended from a genteel family at Manchester, and was some time a clerk under sir John Harrington, treasurer of the forces at Boulogne. While he was in this post he yielded to a temptation of overcharging some articles in his account, by which the king was a loser. Some time after he was so affected with hearing a sermon of Latimer's upon restitution that he restored the whole sum of which he had defrauded the king. He now turned his attention to divinity, took the degree of A.M. at Cambridge, and became an eminent preacher of the reformed doctrines. He was imprisoned at the beginning of Mary's reign, and after a long confinement was burnt in Smithfield, July 1, 1555. Se-

BRADFORD (Samuel), a learned prelate, was born in London, and educated at Bene't college, Cambridge. On entering into orders he became chaplain to bishop Compton, and tutor to the children of archbishop Tillotson. He obtained the rectory of St. Mary le Bow, a prebend of Westminster, and the mastership of Bene't college. In 1718 he was made bishop of Carlisle, from whence he was translated to Rochester in 1723. He died in 1731. This bishop was the editor of Tillotson's works, and the author of some occasional sermons.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BRADFORD (John), a Welsh poet, who was admitted a disciple of the bardic chair of Glamorgan in 1730, being then a boy; presided in the same chair in 1760, and died in 1780. He wrote several moral pieces of great merit, some of which are to be found in the Evergreen, a magazine published in the Welsh language.—Owen's Cambrian Biog.

BRADICK (Walter), an English merchant, who escaped from the earthquake at Lisbon, with the loss of all his property. He afterwards was admitted a pensioner of the Charter-house, and wrote a poem, entitled, Chobeath, or the Royal Preacher, 4to. He died in 1794.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BRADLEY (Richard), F.R.S. and the well-known author of various treatises on natural history, husbandry, &c. He was appointed professor of botany in the university of Cambridge in 1724, by means of a pretended verbal recommendation from Dr. Sherard to Dr. Bentley, and pompous assurances that he would procure the university a botanic garden. But his vanity was soon seen, and his total ignorance of the learned languages known; so that as the professor neglected to read lectures himself, the university permitted Mr. John Martyn to do it. Mr. Bradley, however, read a course of lectures on the materia medica, in 1729, at the Bull inn. In 1731 he was grown so scandalous that it was in agitation to turn him out of his professorship, and he died in the end of 1732. He was paid by the booksellers to permit his name to be prefixed to a translation of Xenophon's Oeconomics.—List of Mr. Martyn by his Son, 12mo. 1770.

BRADLEY (James), an eminent astronomer, was born at Shireborn in Gloucestershire, in 1692, and educated at Balliol college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered into orders. In 1719 he obtained the vicarage of Bridflow, in Herefordshire, which, with a small sinecure in the diocese of St. David's, was all the church preferment he ever received. In 1721 he became Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, on which he resigned his livings. In 1730 he was appointed lecturer of experimental philosophy, which he resigned about two years afterwards. In 1741 he succeeded his friend Dr. Halley as astronomer royal, and, at the same, the university of Oxford presented him with the degree of D.D. In 1747 he addressed a letter to the earl of Macclesfield, president of the royal society, on the apparent motion of the fixed stars, for which he was complimented with the gold medal. The year following the king granted the doctor 1000*l.* for the purpose of procuring accurate and improved instruments for the observatory, on which he employed those excellent artists, Graham and Bird. He refused the valuable living of Greenwich, because he thought the charge of a pastor too sacred to be held with his other pursuits, on which he obtained a yearly pension of 250*l.* He died in 1762, and was buried at Minchinhampton in Gloucestershire. His observations are extant in perfect order, contained in 13 vols 4to. in MS. and several of his papers are in the Philosophical Transactions.—Biog. Br. Hutton's Math. Dict.

BRADSHAW (Henry), an English poet of the 14th century. He was a benedictine monk at Chester, and wrote the Life of St. Werburg in verse.—Pitts. Bile.

BRADSHAW (John), a noted English lawyer, was born in Derbyshire in 1586, and brought up to the profession of a clerk; but he must have afterwards entered at one of the inns of court, as he rose to the rank of serjeant at law. What gives him a place in history is neither his talents nor his virtue, but his having had the assurance to sit in judgment upon his sovereign, Charles I. his reward for which was as extraordinary as his crime; as the parliament soon after made him a present of Summer Hill, a seat of the earl of St. Alban's, valued at one thousand pounds a year. He is supposed to have communicated some old evidences to Marchmont Needham, for insertion in his translation of Selden's Mare Clausum. He died in 1659, and at the restoration his body, after being hung up at Tyburn with those of Cromwell and Ireton, was buried under the gallows.—Granger's Biog. Hist.

BRADWARDIN (Thomas), archbishop of Canterbury, and for his great learning called, according to the custom of that age, the profound doctor, was born in Suffex, about the year 1290. He was of Merton college, Oxford, and in 1325 was proctor of the university. He was well versed in the philosophy of Aristotle and Plato, but his chief talent lay in mathematics and theology. Sir H. Savile had in his possession a large MS. vol. of astronomical tables, composed by him. That learned man published in 1618 a work by the archbishop, entitled De Causis Dei, written in refutation of pelagianism. Bradwardin was for some years divinity professor at Oxford, and accompanied Edward III. during his wars in France, and it is said that he often preached to the army with such meekness and power, as to restrain them from those violences which too often attend military success. He was consecrated to the archbishopric at Avignon in 1349, but died at Lambeth a few months after. He lies buried in the cathedral of Canterbury. Besides the above work he wrote Geometrica Speculativa; Arithmetica Speculativa; printed at Paris in 1512; Tractatus Proportionum, Venice, 1505.—Savillii pref. ad l. Et. Bradwardini Oper.

BRADY (Nicholas), a divine and poet, was born at Bandon in Ireland, in 1659; educated first at Westminster school, and next at Christ-church, Oxford, of which college he became student, but took his degree of D.D. at Dublin, where he was chaplain to Wetenhal, bishop of Cork, who gave him a prebend in his cathedral. He died rector of Richmond and lapham, in Surrey, in 1726. Dr. Brady translated the Aeneid of Virgil, and published 3 vols. of sermons, and some poems; but he is best known by his version of the Psalms of David, in conjunction with Mr. Tate, now generally sung in churches.—Biog. Brit.

BRADY (Robert), an English physician and historian was born in Norfolk, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge, of which he was elected master in 1660. In 1670 he was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower. Some time after he became regius professor of physic at Cambridge. He died in 1700. Dr. Brady wrote a letter to Dr. Sydenham, which is inserted in that physician's works; but he is best known by his Complete History of England, 3 vols. folio, in which he exalts the royal prerogative, and represents parliaments as of modern date. He also wrote a Treatise on Burghs, folio.—Biog. Brit.

BRÄHE (Tycho), a famous astronomer, was descended from a noble Swedish family, settled at Knudstorp in Denmark, where he was born in 1546. He studied philosophy and rhetoric, with a view of making the law his profession, at Copenhagen and Leipzig, but the solar eclipse, which happened in 1560, turned his attention to astronomy, which he considered as a divine study, and he applied to it with the greatest avidity under the private tuition of Schultens. In 1565 he returned home, and in a nocturnal quarrel with a Danish nobleman lost his nose, which he supplied with an artificial one, so curiously made that the defect was hardly to be perceived. About this time he applied to the study of chemistry, in hopes of finding the philosopher's stone. After this he travelled for some years, and on his return to Denmark in 1571 resided with his uncle, who furnished him with the means of making celestial observations; and here it was, that in 1573 he discovered a new star in the constellation Cassiopeia. But shortly afterwards he incurred the displeasure of all his relations by an imprudent marriage, and the quarrel was so great that the king was obliged to interfere his authority to effect a reconciliation. At the royal command he read lectures on astronomy at Copenhagen in 1574. The king also gave him the isle of Huen in the Sound, where he laid the foundation of an observatory in 1576, to which he gave the name of Uraniburg. The king added to the donation a pension and some lucrative places. In this situation he resided about 20 years, pursuing his studies, making observations, and receiving visits from the most illustrious personages. On the death of the king he lost his pension, in consequence of which he left Uraniburg and went to Copenhagen, from whence he removed to Prague, where he died in 1601. He left a widow, two sons and four daughters. He was a man of great genius, but excessively superstitious, being addicted to judicial astrology, and very attentive to omens. His temper was also uncommonly irritable, and his vanity disgusting. Of the last no greater proof can be given than his inventing a monstrous system in opposition to the Copernican, and more absurd than that of Ptolemy. His works, however, shew him to have been an accurate observer. The Rudolphin Tables, and the Historia Cœlestis, are the best.—Life by Gassendi.

BRAILLIER (Peter), an apothecary of Lyons, who wrote a curious book on the Abuses and Ignorance of Physicians, against an anonymous author who had ridiculed the apothecaries. He lived at the close of the 16th century.—Moreri.

BRAINT HIR, the nephew of Cadwallon, king of North Wales, who distinguished himself in the war between his uncle and Edwin, about A.D. 620. The result was disastrous to Cadwallon, who was obliged to fly to Ireland, and BRAINT HIR went privately into England, where he gained so many friends as enabled him to recall Cadwallon and oppose Edwin, who was slain in the battle of Hatfield in 633.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

BRANKENBURG (Reinier), an eminent painter of landscapes and conversations; born at Haerlem, and died in 1649. His compositions are lively, natural, and well grouped; but his subjects are always of a low nature.—Houbraken.

BRAMANTE D'URBINO (Lazarus), a celebrated architect, born in 1444, and died in 1514. He executed several great works for the popes, particularly that of joining the Belvedere to the Vatican. He began the church of St. Peter, and left the execution of it at his death to Michael Angelo Buonroti. He was also a musician and a man of letters. His poems were printed at Milan as late as 1756.—Tiraboschi.

BRAMER (Leonard), a Dutch painter; born at Delft in 1596, and a disciple of Rembrandt. One of his best pieces is the raising of Lazarus, which is with others of his painting at Rome, and in great esteem.—Houbraken.

BRAMHALL (John), an eminent prelate, was born at Poutefract in Yorkshire, about 1593, and educated at Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. Afterwards he became chaplain to Mathews, archbishop of York, who gave him a prebend in his church, and the deanry of Rippon. In 1630 he went to Ireland, where he was employed by lord Wentworth in reforming the abuses of the church, for which, in 1634, he was made bishop of Londonderry. In 1641 articles of high treason were exhibited against him by the puritanical party, and he was committed close prisoner at Dublin, but king Charles, at the request of archbishop Usher, directed all proceedings to cease, and he was set at liberty. During the civil war he resided abroad, and at the restoration was made archbishop of Armagh: he procured several advantages for the Irish church, and established some excellent regulations in it. He died in 1663. He wrote several books against the romanists and sectaries, and had a sharp controversy with Hobbes on liberty and necessity.—Biog. Brit.

BRAN, the son of Llyr, and the father of Caradog, or Caractacus, king of Britain, is classed with Prydain and Dynwal, as the three who consolidated the form of elective monarchy in Britain. When his son was treacherously delivered up to the Romans, Bran and his family were carried to Rome, where they embraced the Christian religion, which at their return they introduced among their countrymen. Bran died about the year 80.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

BRANÇAS VILLENEUVE (Andrew Francis), a French abbé and geographer, who wrote several works of merit, though in a bad style. The principal are Letters upon Cosmography; a System of Modern Cosmography, and Philosophy in General; Explanation of the Flux and Reflux of the Sea; Ephemerides Cosmographiques. He died in 1758.—Nouve. Dict. Hist.

BRANCKER (Thomas), an English mathematician, was born in Devonshire in 1636, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts and was elected fellow. Soon after the restoration he entered into orders, and became rector of Tilston in Cheshire, and master of the free-school at Macclesfield. He died in 1676, and was buried in the church at Macclesfield. He wrote, 1. the Doctrine of the Sphere, published in Latin at Oxford in 1662, and, 2. an Introduction to Algebra, 1668.—Wood's A. O.

BRANDER (Peter), an eminent historical and portrait painter, born at Prague in 1660, brought up under Schroeter, and died poor in that city in 1739. He gained considerable sums by his productions, but squandered away the whole in an extravagant manner.—Pilkington.

BRANDI (Hyacinth), an Italian painter, who was a pupil of Lanfranc, and executed several fine paintings for the churches at Rome, where he was knighted. He died in 1691, aged 58.—D'Argenville.

BRANDMULLER (John), a protestant divine, and professor of Hebrew at Basil, where he died in 1596, aged 63. He wrote sermons and other theological pieces. His son James wrote Analysis Typica Librorum veteris & Novi Testamenti, Basle, 3 vols. 4to, 1620. He had a son of his own name, who was professor of law at Basil, where he died in 1677. He wrote some books on law, and some Latin poems.—Moreri.

BRANDMULLER (Gregory), an historical painter, born at Basle in 1661, and died in 1691. He studied in the school of le Brun, and obtained a prize in the royal academy at Paris. He excelled in history and portrait.—Pilkington.

BRANDOLINI (Aurelio), an Italian poet, was born at Florence, and died at Rome in 1497. He was either blind or nearly so, on which account he had the surname of Lippo given him. Notwithstanding this he became an elegant scholar and an excellent writer. Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, invited him to his court, and gave him a place in his new university of Buda. On the death of that monarch he returned to Italy, and entered among the Augustines at Florence. His talents as a preacher were also very great. The most valuable of his works is one entitled De Ratione Scribendi, in which he lays down good precepts for composition.—Tiraboschi.

BRANDON (Charles), duke of Suffolk, and the great and constant favourite of Henry VIII. He signalized himself at the jousts at Tournay in 1511, instituted by Margaret princess of Castile, in compliment to his royal master. He here won the heart of that princess, but fortune reserved him for another. In 1514 he performed amazing deeds of arms at St. Dennis, at the coronation of Mary, sister to Henry, on her marriage with the aged and decrepid Lewis XII. "The good king," says Henaunt, "met with his death in her arms in less than three months. This opened the way to the possession of the beautiful dowager. Her heart was lost to him at the preceding tournament. The French, envious of his prowess, introduced into the lists a gigantic German, in hopes of bringing the English hero into disgrace. He treated his antagonist so roughly, that the French interfered; but in a second trial Suffolk handled him so severely, that they were obliged to convey the fellow away secretly, who had been introduced in disguise, merely on account of his great strength." Mary, on the death of her royal consort, made proposals to Suffolk, which with his master's consent he readily accepted. He married almost as many wives as his master, leaving his fourth to survive him. He died universally lamented in 1545, and was buried by Henry with great magnificence; his loss being one of the few things that touched his hardened heart.—Herbert's Henry VIII.

BRANDT (John), secretary of Antwerp, where he died in 1639, aged 80. We have by him, Elogia Ciceronia Romanorum domus Militiaque Illustrum.—Moreri.

BRANDT (Gerard), a Dutch divine, was the author of the History of the Reformation of the Low Countries, and a Life of De Ruyter, the Dutch admiral. He died in 1685, aged 59.—Ibid.

BRANDT (Sebastian), professor of jurisprudence and chancellor at Strasburg, born in 1454, and died in 1520. He wrote the poem entitled Navis Stultifera Mortalium, 1488, 8vo. He is not to be confounded with Sebastian Brandt, a German chemist, who discovered phosphorus in seeking for the philosopher's stone. He died in 1521.—Ibid.

BRANFOME; see BOURDEILLES.

BRASAVOLA (Antonius Musa), an Italian physician, was born at Ferrara in 1500, and received several marks of favour from different sovereigns. He died at his native place, where he was professor of medicine, in 1555. He wrote Commentaries on Hippocrates and Galen.—Moreri. Haller. Freind.

BRASBRIDGE (Thomas), an English physician, was born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow in 1562. He was in orders though he practised physic; a circumstance not unusual in that age. His works are, 1. The Poor Man's Jewel; viz. a treatise of the pestilence: to which is annexed, a Declaration of the Herbs Cordus benedictus, and Aspeltica, &c. London, 1578, 8vo.; 2. Quæstiones in Officia M. T. Ciceronis, Oxon. 1615, 8vo.—Wood's A. O.

BRASIDAS, a Lacedæmonian general, who, about 424 B. C. defeated the Athenians, took from them several cities, and engaged others in an alliance with Sparta. Being blocked up in Amphipolis by Cleon, he made a sortie, and obtained a complete victory, but died shortly after in consequence of a wound. When the Spartans condoled his mother on his death, which was irreparable, she answered, "My son was brave, but Sparta has braver men left." The Lacedæmonians rendered public honours both to the mother and son.—Plutarch. Univ. Hist.

BRATHWAYTE (Richard), an English poet, was born in Westmoreland, and entered of Oriel college, Oxford, in 1604, from whence he removed to Cambridge. On leaving the university he became captain of a company of foot, deputy lieutenant for Westmoreland, and a justice of peace. He died at Appleton in Yorkshire in 1673. He wrote, 1. Golden Fleece, with other poems, 8vo. 1611; 2. The Poet's Willow, or the passionate Shepherd, 8vo. 1614; 3. The Prodigal's Tears, or his Farewell to Vanity, 1614, 8vo.; 4. Essays upon the five Senses, 8vo. 1630; 5. The English Gentleman, 1630, 4to., this passed through several editions; 6. The English Gentlewoman, 4to. and several other pieces.—Wood: A. O.

BRAUWER (Adrian), a Dutch painter, born at Haarlem in 1608, and died of intemperance in 1638. His pictures are mostly representations of public houses, scenes of merriment, and other droll subjects, which he executed in a masterly manner.—Houbraken.

BRAY (sir Reginald), an eminent statesman, who assisted in placing Henry VII. upon the throne, and with whom he was in great favour. Sir Reginald was not only a politician, but an architect; as Henry the VIIIth's chapel at Westminster, built under his direction, evidently proves. There is another called by his name at Windsor, where he was buried in 1501.—Gen. B. D.

BRAY (Solomon de), a portrait painter, born at Haarlem, and died in 1664, aged 67. His son Jacob was excellent in historical painting; he was living in 1680.—Pitt.

BRAY (Thomas), an English divine, was born in Shropshire, in 1656, and educated at Hart-hall, Oxford. On entering into orders he obtained the rectory of Sheldon in Warwickshire, and bishop Compton made him his commissary at Virginia, where he rendered the poor clergy important services, and established several libraries for their use. At his return to England he formed the scheme of parochial libraries, for which he obtained an act of parliament. He laboured with great zeal in his favourite object of propagating the gospel among the Indians and Negroes, and went to America several times to promote it. In 1696 he took the degree of D.D. and in 1706 accepted the living of St. Botolph, Aldgate. By his exertions he procured considerable relief for poor prisoners, and to his plans or assistance numerous charitable institutions were greatly indebted. He died in London in 1730. He wrote Catechetical Lectures; Bibliotheca Parochialis, and some other religious pieces.—Biog. Br.

BRÉREUF (George de), a French poet, born at Thorigny in Normandy, in 1618, and died in 1661. He is best known by his Lucan Travestied.—Moreri.

BREDA (Peter van), an eminent landscape painter of Antwerp, born in 1631, and died in 1681. His performances are very excellent.—Pilkington.

BREDA (John van), a Flemish painter, who excelled in painting landscapes and fairs and markets; he resided many years in England, where he acquired a good fortune, and then returned to his own country. He died in 1750.—Ibid.

BRENNERO (Bartholomew), a Flemish painter, who is better known by the name of Bartholomew: his landscapes and views of ruins are beautiful. He died in 1660, aged 40.—Ibid.

BRÉVY (Charlotte, countess de), an ingenious French lady, who was niece to the learned Salmasius, and one of the maids of honour to queen Anne of Austria. She died at Paris in 1693, aged 74. A collection of her letters and poems was published in 1688, 12mo.—Moreri.

BREMONT (Francis de), a French writer, born at Paris in 1713, and died there in 1742. He was a member of the academy, and of the royal society of London. He translated the Philosophical Transactions, and other English works, into French.—Novæ Diss. Hist.

BREITINGER (John James), a Swiss writer, was born at Zurich in 1701, and died there in 1776. He was professor of Hebrew, and wrote some esteemed pieces on poetry, painting, and antiquities. He also published an edition of the New Testament from the Septuagint, 4 vols. 4to.—Novæ Diss. Hist.

BREITKOPF (John Gottlieb Immanuel), an ingenious printer and letter founder, was born at Leipzig in 1719. He studied the languages, after which he succeeded his father in the business of a printer and bookseller; and meeting with a book of Albert Durer's, in which the forms of the letters of the alphabet are deduced from mathematical principles, it induced him to improve the shape of printing types, in which he succeeded to admiration. He also devised a method of printing musical notes without engraving. He likewise contrived to print maps and charts with types. This ingenious man wrote a Treatise on the Origin of Printing; and another on the History of Playing Cards, the Invention of Paper made from Linen, and the Invention of Engraving on Wood in Europe. His last literary work was a Treatise on Bibliography. He died in 1794.—Schlichtegroll's Necrology.

BRENNER (Henry), a learned Swede, was born at Kronoby in West Bothnia in 1669. In 1697 he accompanied the Swedish ambassador Fabricius to the court of Persia, and on his return was arrested at Moscow, by orders of the czar Peter I. who was then at war with Sweden. He remained a prisoner till the peace; and in the interval he translated into Latin the History of Armenia, by Moses Armenius Choronensis, printed at Stockholm in 1723. He also wrote Observations on the Cause of the Expedition undertaken by Peter I. against the Persians, in which he gives an exact delineation of the Caspian sea and of the river Daxia. He was appointed keeper of the royal library at Stockholm, where he died in 1732.—Genesius's Biography of learned Swedes.

BRENNUS, general of the Gauls, who passed at the head of a prodigious army into the east, penetrated into Macedonia, slew Sosthenes, general of that country, ravaged Thessaly and Greece, and advanced towards the temple of Delphos, with an intention to plunder it; but he was repulsed and his army routed, on which he put an end to himself, B.C. 278.—Univ. Hist.

BRENNUS, another general of the Gauls, who, after ravaging Lombardy and Tuscany, marched to Rome, which he gave up to be pillaged and burnt. The tribune Sulpitius offered him a thousand pounds weight of gold to spare the capitol, and to quit the territories of the republic. Brennus threw into the scale which held the weights his sword and helmet, and when the Romans complained of the trick, he haughtily exclaimed, 'Woe to the vanquished!' Canillus, irritated at the insolence of the barbarian, put an end to the treaty, gave battle to the Gauls, and constrained them to fly, about 388 B.C.—Ibid.

BRENT (sir Nathaniel), an English civilian. He was born in Warwickshire in 1575, and educated at Merton college, Oxford. Archbishop Abbot sent him to Venice to procure a copy of father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, which he published at his return in English and Latin. In 1621 he obtained the mastership of Merton college, and the archbishop made him his vicar-general. In 1629 he was knighted; and on the breaking out of the civil wars sided with the puritans to preserve his place and estate. He died in 1652.—Wood's A. O.

BRENTIUS (John), a German divine, who at first joined with Luther, but afterwards differed from him on the subject of the Eucharist, and his followers were called ubiquitarians, because they held that the body of Christ was every-where. He died in 1570 at Tübingen. His works are in 8 vols. in folio.—Melch. Adami Vit. Germ. Theol.

BREQUIGNY (Louis-George Edward de), member of the French academy and of that of inscriptions, died in 1795, aged 80. He came to London to search the records in the Tower, for such particulars as might serve to illustrate the history of France. He published a History of the Revolutions of Genoa, 3 vols. 12mo; an edition of Strabo; Lives of the Ancient Greek Orators, with a translation of several of their discourses, 2 vols. 12mo.; Diplomata, Chartæ ad res Francicas Spectantia, 4to.; Chronological Tables, &c. relative to the History of France, 5 vols. folio, &c.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BREWERWOOD (Edward), an English mathematician, was born at Chester, and brought up at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1596 he was chosen Gresham professor of astronomy. He died in London in 1613, aged 48. His two principal works are; 1. De Ponderibus et Pretiis Veterum nummorum, eorumque cum Recentioribus Collatione, 1614, 4to. 2. Enquiries touching the Diversity of Languages and Religion through the chief Parts of the World, 1614, 4to. These were published by Robert Brerewood, his nephew, who became one of the justices of the common pleas in the reign of Charles I. and died in 1654.—Wood's A. O. Lives of the Gresham Professors.

BRET (Antony), a French writer, born at Dijon in 1717, and died at Paris in 1792. He wrote L'Ecole amoureuse et la double Extravagance, 2 vols. 8vo.; Life of Ninon de L'Enclos, 12mo.; The Four Seasons, a poem; The New Cleopatra, a romance, 3 vols.; Eastern Fables; Memoirs of Buffy Rabutin, 2 vols. 12mo; and a Commentary on the Works of Moliere, 1 vol. 8vo.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BRETTON (Nicholas), an English poet in the reign of queen Elizabeth, who wrote ballads and interludes of some merit.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BREUGHEL (Peter), called the Old, a famous painter, born near Breda in 1516, and died at Antwerp in 1570. He was fond of painting droll subjects, but he excelled in landscape. He had two sons, Peter, called Hell Breughel, from his propensity to painting fires, devils, incantations, &c. and John, who from his peculiar mode of dress was named Velvet Breughel. He painted landscapes, fruits, flowers, and sea views, in an admirable style. He died about 1640. There was another of the name, Abraham Breughel, born at Antwerp in 1672. He also excelled in fruit and flower painting.—Houbraken. D'Argenville. Pilkington.

BREUL (James du), a benedictine monk, born in 1598 and died in 1614. He wrote, 1. The Antiquities of Paris, 4to. 1612; 2. Supplementum Antiquitatum Parisiensium, 4to. 1714; 3. Les Fautes de Pierre Bonfons augmentes, a curious work; 4. The Life of the Cardinal Charles de Bourbon, 4to.; 5. A Chronicle of the Abbots of St. Germain.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

BREVAL (John Durant de), an English writer, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow; but in 1707 he quitted the university and entered into the army under the duke of Marlborough, who made him captain. He died in 1739. His travels in 4 vols. are in repute.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BREVINT (Daniel), a learned divine, born at Jersey in 1616, and educated first at Saumur, and then at Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship in Jesus college, and proceeded M.A. In the rebellion he went to France, and at the restoration returned to England, where he was made prebendary of Durham. In 1681 he was promoted to the deanry of Lincoln, and died in 1695. He wrote a Treatise on the Lord's Supper, and some polemical pieces.—Wood's A. O.

BREYNIUS (James), a botanist of Dantzic, who published Plantarum Exoticarum Centuria, 1678, fol. with plates; and Fas- ciculus Plantarum Rarior, 1689,-4to. He died in 1697.—Gen. B. D.

BRIDDAINE (N.), a celebrated French preacher in the diocese of Uzes. He became a kind of itinerant missionary, and preached sometimes to numerous congregations assembled in the open air. M. Maury, in his Principles of Eloquence, has given him a high character, and ranks him even with Bossuet and Demosthenes. He had so fine a voice, says he, as to render credible all the wonders which history relates of the declamation of the ancients, for he was as easily heard by ten thousand people in the open fields, as if he had spoken under the most resounding arch. He died in 1767. He published Cantiques Spirituels, 12mo. 1748.—New. Dict. Hist.

BRIDGE (William), an English puritan divine, born in 1600. He was for some time pastor of an independent congregation at Rotterdam; but in the civil wars he returned to England, and became a member of the assembly of divines at Westminster, and minister at Yarmouth. He died in 1670. His sermons have been several times printed.—Galexy.

BRIDGMAN (John), an English prelate, was born at Exeter, and educated at Cambridge, where he became master of Magdalen college. He was made chaplain to James I. who gave him the rectory of Wigan in Lancashire, and in 1618 promoted him to the bishopric of Chester; of which he was deprived in the rebellion, and otherwise suffered much for the royal cause. He died in 1642 at Morton in Cheshire.—Wood's A. O. Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy.

BRIDGMAN (Sir Orlando), an English lawyer, was the son of the above. At the restoration he was made chief baron of the exchequer, and afterwards lord keeper of the great seal, of which he was deprived in 1672. He wrote a Treatise on Conveyancing.—Granger.

BRIDGEWATER (Francis Egerton, duke of), was born in 1736, and succeeded his brother in the title in 1748. He devoted his time and fortune in pursuits that will for ages perpetuate his memory. He was the first man who countenanced the plan and supported the expence of cutting a navigable canal in this kingdom. This great project he had digested before he was of age, and as soon as he came into possession of his fortune he put it in execution. For this purpose he consulted the ingenious Brindley, who having surveyed the estate at Worsley in Lancashire, pronounced the design practicable. Accordingly an act was passed, though with difficulty, for making a navigable canal from Salford near Manchester to Worsley. This succeeded so well that his grace next obtained another act to enable him to extend the line, and to pass from the river Worsley over the Irwell to Manchester. This canal begins at Worsley mill about 7 miles from Manchester, where the duke cut a basin capable of holding all his boats. The canal enters a hill by a subterraneous passage large enough for the admission of flat-bottomed boats, which are towed along by hand rails near a mile under ground to his coal works; then the passage divides into two, both of which may be continued at pleasure. This passage is in some places cut through the solid rock, and in others is arched with brick. Air funnels are cut in several places to the top of the hill. The arch at the entrance is about six feet in breadth, and widens in some places for the boats to pass each other; the boats are laden from waggons which run on rail-ways. The canal in other places is carried over public roads by arches. But one of the most stupendous works on this canal is the aqueduct over the river Irwell, where the canal runs above forty feet above the river, and where the barges are seen passing on the canal and the vessels in the river in full sail under them. At Barton bridge, three miles from Worsley, this aqueduct begins, and is carried two hundred yards over a valley. The duke afterwards extended his canal to the Mersey. He spent prodigious sums upon these vast projects, but he thereby realized an immense fortune, which he left to his nephew the earl of Bridgewater, to the marquis of Stafford, and other relatives. He died in March, 1803.—Monthly Mag.

BRINNE (Walter de), an illustrious Frenchman, who signalized himself in defence of Acre against the Saracens in 1188. He afterwards became king of Sicily and duke of Pouille by his marriage with Maria Albrico and died of a wound he received in defending the rights of his wife in 1205. Walter the Great, his son, was count of Brienne and of Jaffa; he went to the holy land, where he distinguished himself greatly, but was taken prisoner, and put to a cruel death in 1241.—Id. rer.

BRINNE (John de), elected king of Jerusalem in 1210. The emperor Frederic II. married his daughter, having the kingdom of Jerusalem as a dowry. He was afterwards elected emperor of Constantinople, which he defended with great bravery against the Greeks and Bulgarians, and died in 1237. His avarice disgraced his other qualities, and hastened the ruin of the empire.—Ibid.

BRINNIUS (Philip), a French jesuit, who distinguished himself by his Parallela Geographica Veteris et Nova, 3 vols. 4to. 1648; besides which he published Annales Mundi, 7 vols. 12mo.—Ibid.

BRIGGS (Henry), an English mathematician, was born at Halifax in Yorkshire, in 1556, and educated at St John's college, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1588. In 1596 he was appointed Gresham professor of geometry, which he resigned in 1615, on being made Savilian professor at Oxford. He died there in 1630. He was the first improver of logarithms after the original inventor, whom he visited in Scotland, and he published in 1694 a work of stupendous labour, entitled, Arithmetica Logarithmica, containing logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers. He also wrote some other valuable books on mathematical subjects.—Biog. Brit.

BRIGGS (William), an English physician, was born at Norwich, and educated at Bene't college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1677 he took his degree of M.D. and in 1682 published his Theory of Vision; the year following he was appointed physician to St. Thomas's hospital. He died in 1704.—Biog. Brit.

BRIGHAM (Nicholas), was born in Oxfordshire, and educated at Hartball, after which he removed to one of the inns of court. He applied to poetry as well as to the law, and was so great an admirer of Chaucer that he caused his remains to be removed to the south transept of Westminster abbey, where he erected a monument to his memory. He died in 1559. His works are, 1. De venerationibus rerum memorabilium, or Memoirs of eminent Persons. 2. Memoirs by Way of Diary. 3. Miscellaneous Poems.—Wood.

BRIGHTMAN (Thomas), an English divine, was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, and became rector of Hawnes in Bedfordshire. He wrote Commentaries in Latin on the Canticles and the Apocalypse, the latter of which was translated into English, and made much noise in the world. In this whimsical book he makes the church of England to be the Laodicean church, and the Angel that God loved is the church of Geneva and the kirk of Scotland. He is said to have prayed for sudden death, and to have died as he was travelling in a coach with a book in his hand, 1607.—Granger's B. H.

BRILL (Mathew and Paul), two Flemish painters. The first was employed by pope Gregory XIII. He excelled in landscape and history, and died in 1584. Paul painted in conjunction with his brother at the Vatican. He died in 1626, aged 72.—D'Argenville.

BRINDLEY (James), an eminent English mechanic, was born in the parish of Wormhill in Derbyshire, in 1716, and served his apprenticeship to a millwright. After executing several ingenious mills and engines, he was employed by the duke of Bridgewater on his famous canal from Worsley to Manchester, which he afterwards extended to the Mersey; [see BRIDGWATER]. It is 93 miles long, and has five tunnels, the most remarkable of which is the subterraneous passage of Aircastle-hill. He was next employed to construct a canal from the Grand Trunk near Haywood in Staffordshire, to the river Severn near Bewdley, by which means the port of Bristol obtained a communication with Liverpool. His reputation now stood so high that he was engaged in a variety of similar plans in different parts of the kingdom. He gave the cooperation of Liverpool a plan for clearing their docks from mud, and he invented a method of building walls as a fence against the sea without mortar. His last invention was an improved engine for raising water. Mr. Brindley was a man of ordinary education with little or no reading. When he had any very difficult work in hand he used to lie in bed for a day or two to meditate upon it: and so much was his mind set upon the value of inland navigation, that when he was asked of what use rivers were, by a member of the committee of the house of commons before which he was examined, he replied, "to feed navigable canals." He died in 1772, and was buried at New Chapel in Staffordshire.—Biog. Brit.

BRINVILLIERS (Maria Margaret d'Aubrai, wife of the marquis de), a woman rendered remarkable for her hypocrisy and infamy. She fell violently in love with a young officer belonging to her husband's regiment, which being discovered, her father caused him to be imprisoned in the Bastille, where he remained a year, after which he used to visit the marchioness secretly. She affected in the mean time uncommon sanctity, visiting the hospitals and churches daily, to cover her abominable design of revenge. Having learnt the art of poisoning from an Italian named Exili, she contrived to dispatch her father and two brothers and a sister so secretly that no one suspected her of the fact. Some time afterwards Exili died of the effects of a subtle poison which he was preparing, and no person owning his property the seals were put upon it. Madame Brinvilliers had the imprudence to claim a casket in his possession, which being opened was found full of poisons, and thus created a suspicion of her crime. She fled first to England, and next to Liege, where she was taken, and being conducted to Paris was burnt at stakes, after having been beheaded, July 16, 1676. She confessed her guilt and died penitent.—Nouv. Dict. H^{ist.}

BRASSON (Barnabius), president of the parliament of Paris, was born at Fontenay in Poitou, and attained considerable eminence. Henry III. employed him in several embassies. He was put to death by the leaguers in 1591. He wrote some learned works on Jurisprudence.—Moreri.

BRASSOT (Peter), a French physician, was born at Poitou in 1478, and educated at Paris, where he taught philosophy with success. He set himself to reform physic, which raising against him the whole body of the faculty, he went to Portugal. Brissot wrote in defence of phlebotomy, which his brethren treated as a species of murder. He died in 1532.—Moreri.

BRISSOT (John Peter), a distinguished character in the French revolution, was the son of an innkeeper at Chartres, and born there in 1754. He was bred to the law, which he never followed, and thereby incurred his father's displeasure. An acquaintance with English books is said to have given him a turn for politics, and having a small estate left him, called de Quareville, he chose to spell it de Waville, after the English mode; and by this name he was frequently denominated. Settling at Paris he commenced writer for a newspaper, and published his Theory of Criminal Laws, 2 vols. 8vo. He began also a book, entitled, A Philosophical Library of Criminal Laws; and wrote a volume on Truth; all which performances were marked by a spirit of flippancy and dogmatism, and incidentally conveyed a censure of the government. About this time he married mademoiselle Dupont, who was employed under madame Genlis as reader to the daughter of the duke of Orleans. Finding little encouragement in France he went to Geneva and Neuchâtel, and afterwards to London, where he conducted a periodical journal, on the literature, arts, and politics of England, which met with no success. On his return to Paris in 1784 he was committed to the Bastille, on the charge of having assisted in the publication of a libel. He obtained his release by the interest of the duke of Orleans, on condition of never residing in England. He now published several other works, the principal of which was entitled, The Commerce of America with Europe, particularly with France and Great Britain, stated and explained, translations of which appeared both in America and England. At this time he was in the service and confidence of the unprincipled Orleans, who made use of his talents to further his factious and ambitious projects, to which afterwards they both fell victims. Brissot wrote several pamphlets, tending to prejudice the minds of the people against the established order of things, and on account of them found it expedient to leave France. After residing some time in Holland he went to America, with the romantic view of establishing a republican colony of Frenchmen. This scheme failing he returned to his native country, and published his Travels in America, a work once read, but now forgotten. The revolution opened a desirable field for such a man as Brissot. He engaged in it with ardour, and to his writings most of the sanguinary proceedings which disgraced it may be attributed. He openly supported the republican cause, and became member of the legislative assembly. By his exertions and popularity he created a party called Brissotines and Girondists, from the members of the department of Gironde, of which it chiefly consisted. He was, however, adverse to the execution of the king, which he proposed to be deferred till the perfection of the constitution. On the ascension of Robespierre to power, Brissot and his partisans were denounced and arrested. October 24, 1793, he and 21 others were brought before the revolutionary tribunal, tried, and condemned to be guillotined, which fate he suffered with firmness.—Acc. des Evén. de la France Républic. Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BRITANNICUS, son of the emperor Claudius and Messalina. He was excluded from the empire by the artifices of Agrippina, second wife of Claudius, and mother of Nero, who caused Britannicus to be poisoned A.D. 55.—Univ. Hist.

BRITENNICO (John), an Italian critic, born at Palazzuolo, and died in 1510 at Brescia. He was a man of great learning, and published annotations upon several of the Latin classics.—Bayle.

BRITO (Bernard de), a Portuguese historian, born at Almeida in 1569, and died in 1617. He wrote a History of Portugal in Latin, 7 vols. folio, 1612, and some other pieces on that kingdom.—Moreri.

BRITTON (Thomas), the noted musical small-coal-man, was a native of Northamptonshire, and came to London, where he engaged in this line of business, to which he added the practice of chemistry, and had a moveable laboratory. He had a great taste for music, and held a concert at his house, which was frequented by persons of the first rank. His death was extraordinary: a gentleman, out of joke, brought with him one evening to the concert a ventriloquist, who predicted in a solemn manner the death of Britton in a few hours. This frightened him so much that he took to his bed, and died in a few days in 1714. His collection of music and instruments was sold after his death for a considerable sum.—Hawkins's Hist. Music.

BRIZIO (Francisco), an Italian painter, born at Bologna in 1574, and died in 1623. He excelled in painting landscapes and buildings.—Pilkington.

BROCARDUS (James), a religious enthusiast of the 16th century, was a native of Venice, and having embraced protestantism retired to Holland, where he studied the prophecies, which turned his brain, and he began to foretell future events. In 1580 appeared at Leyden his Commentary on the Revelations, in which he foretold the destruction of Antichrist as very near. He died about 1600.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BROCKLESBY (Richard), an eminent physician, was born at Minehead in Somersetshire in 1722. He studied physic at Edinburgh, from whence he removed to Leyden, where he took his degree of M.D. in 1745. He settled in London, and in 1754 was admitted ad eundem at Cambridge, by virtue of which he became fellow of the college. In 1758 he was appointed physician to the army, and served with it in Germany. He was very intimate with Dr. Johnson, and when the proposal of an enlargement of his pension failed, he generously offered him 100l. a year for life, which he declined. To Mr. Burke he bequeathed in his will 1000l. but finding that his affairs were embarrassed he gave it to him in his lifetime. He died in 1797. He published an essay on the Mortality of the Horned Cattle, 8vo. 1746; & Economical and medical Observations from 1738 to 1763, tending to the Improvement of medical Hospitals, 8vo. 1764; and some papers in the Philosophical Transactions.—Europ. Mag.

BRODEAU (John), a famous critic of the 16th century, was a native of Tours, and educated under Alciat, the celebrated lawyer. He passed his days in a learned seclusion, and died in 1563 leaving several works, some printed and more in MS. chiefly notes on classic authors. He is not to be confounded with Juvin Brodeau of Tours, who published a Life of Charles du Moulin, and died in 1543.—Moreri.

BRONCKHUYST (John), in Latin Broutbuisus, a learned writer of the 17th century, was born at Amsterdam in 1649. He was apprenticed to an apothecary, which profession he disliked, and went to sea, where he rose to be master of a vessel. While in this situation he cultivated a talent for poetry, and learned the Latin language. Afterwards he quitted the sea, and was appointed captain of the Amsterdam militia. He died in 1707. His Latin poems were printed at Amsterdam in 1711, 4to. He published valuable editions of Sannazarius, Propertius, Tibullus, and Aonius Palearius. He also translated into Latin Rapin's Parallel of Homer and Virgil.—Ibid.

BROEK (Elias Vanden), an eminent painter of fruit and flowers, born at Antwerp in 1657, and died in 1711. He introduced into his pictures the figures of reptiles.—Pilk.

BROGLIO (Victor Maurice count de), a famous French general, was born of a good family at Quercy. He served with glory in the wars of Lewis XIV. and was made a marshal of France in 1724. He died in 1727, aged about 80. His son Francis-Mauris was also a marshal of France, and distinguished himself greatly in Italy in the campaigns of 1733 and 1734. He died in 1745. His son, the celebrated marshal de Broglie, commanded with great glory in the seven years' war. He quitted France in 1794, and after residing in England some time, went to Russia, where he obtained a military rank equal to that which he had held in France. His son Claude Victor, prince of Broglie, became active on the side of the popular party at the commencement of the revolution, and was made marshal de camp. He was guillotined June 27, 1794, at the age of 37.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BROKESBY (Francis), an English divine, was born in Leicestershire, and became rector of Rowley in Yorkshire. He wrote a History of the Government of the Primitive Church, 8vo. 1714; the Life of Henry Dodwell; and assisted Mr. Nelson in his Feasts and Fasts of the Church of England. He died about 1718.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BROME (Adam de), an English divine of the 15th century.—He was founder of Oriel college, Oxford, and died in 1332.—Pitts. Bayle. Wood.

BROME (Alexander), an English writer, was an attorney in London in the time of Charles I., and annoyed the republican party by numerous satires in prose and verse. He also published a translation of Horace, and died in 1666.—Granger.

BROME (Richard), a comic writer of the 17th century, who was intimate with Ben Johnson, and other wits of that age. He died in 1652.—Biog. Dram.

BROMPTON (John), an English monk and abbot of Jorevall in Yorkshire, who wrote a Chronicle from 588 to 1198. He lived after the reign of Edward III.—Pitts. Bale.

BRONCHORST (John van), a Flemish painter of the 17th century. In the choir of the new church at Amsterdam, are three of his paintings on glass; and three historical pieces in oil.—Houbraken.

BRONCHORST (John), another eminent painter, born at Leyden in 1648, and died in 1723. He excelled in painting birds and animals of all kinds in water colours.—Ibid.

BRONCHORST (Peter) a celebrated painter, born at Delft in 1588, and died in 1661. There are, at his native place, two fine pictures by him, one representing the judgment of Solomon, and the other Christ driving the money-changers out of the Temple.—Ibid.

BRONGNIART (Augustus-Lewis), a French chemist of eminence, who died at Paris in 1804. He published several papers in the public journals, and an analytical table of the combinations and decompositions of different substances, 8vo. 1778.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BRONZINO (Agnolo), an eminent Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1511, and died in 1580. Among a number of paintings by him at Florence, a nativity is shewn as his master-piece.—Pilkington.

BROOKE (Ralph), an English antiquary, was born in 1552, and died in 1625. He was York-herald, and having discovered several errors in Mr. Camden's Britannica, sent them to him in a letter, for which being rudely treated, he published them. An edition appeared in 1723, with a portrait of the author.

BROOKE (Sir Robert), an English judge, born in Shropshire, and educated at Oxford from whence he removed to the Middle Temple. In 1553 he was made chief justice of the court of common pleas, in which office he behaved with integrity, and died in 1558. He wrote, 1. An Abridgment, containing an Abstract of the Year Books till the time of Queen Mary, folio; 2. Certain Cases adjudged, from 6 Hen. VIII. to 4 Queen Mary; 3. Reading on the Statute of Limitations, 32 Henry VIII. 8vo. He lies buried in Claverly church, Shropshire, where there is a monument to his memory. There was another of the same name, who was recorder of London, and wrote a book entitled Reading upon the Statute of Magna Charta, c. 16, London, 1641.—Wood.

BROOKE (Frances), an ingenious lady, whose maiden name was Moore. She became the wife of a clergyman, who died in 1789, and she survived him but a few weeks.

She wrote, the Old Maid, a periodical paper, in 1755 and 1756; Virginia, a tragedy, with Poems, 1756; the History of Lady Julia Mandeville, a novel, 1768; Letters from Lady Juliet Catesby to Lady Henrietta Campley, 12mo.; Memoirs of the Marquis of St. Porfaix, 4 vols.; the Excursion, 2 vols. 12mo.; Elements of the History of England, translated from Millot, 4 vols. 12mo.; the Siege of Sinope, a tragedy, acted at Covent-garden in 1781; Rosina, a very popular entertainment.—Europ. Mag.

BROOKE (Henry), an excellent writer, was born in 1706, at Rantavan in Ireland, and educated at Trinity college, Dublin, from whence he removed to the Temple, where he formed an intimacy with some of the first wits of the age. He married his cousin when he was but young, and she not fourteen. His first piece was a poem, entitled Universal Beauty, which obtained the approbation of Pope. In 1737 he wrote his tragedy of Gustavus Vasa, which the government would not permit to be acted, on account of the boldness of its language. This opposition increased his fame, and the play had an astonishing sale when published. The prince of Wales was his friend, but though every prospect of advancement was presented to him, he relinquished all and went back to Ireland, where he continued the remainder of his days in a contented privacy. He wrote some pieces for the Irish stage, which were successful. The death of his wife, whom he tenderly loved, shook both his health and his reason; and he never thoroughly recovered either afterwards. Still he continued to write, and his subsequent pieces shew the vigour of his genius, and the excellence of his heart. Among these may be noticed, the beautiful novels of the Fool of Quality, and Juliet Orenville, though tinged with mysticism, to which he was greatly inclined. He died at Dublin in 1783.—Life prefixed to his Works.

BROOME (William), an English poet, was born in Cheshire, and educated at Eton school, from whence he removed to St. John's college, Cambridge, where he proceeded M. A. and entered into holy orders. While at college he was employed by Pope in writing notes on the Iliad, and in translating part of the Odyssey, for which he received 500l. and one hundred copies. Afterwards a difference happened between them, on which Pope ungenerously gave him a place in the Dunciad. In 1728 he was created LL. D. He obtained the rectory of Pulham in Norfolk, and the vicarage of Eye in Suffolk. He died in 1745. A volume of his poems has been printed several times.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BROSCINI (Carlo), better known by the name of Farinelli, a celebrated singer, was born in the kingdom of Naples, in 1705, and suffered emasculation in consequence of an accident. After obtaining great applause on the Italian theatres he came to London, where he added both to his fame and fortune. He then went to Spain, and gained the favour of Philip V. and his successor Ferdinand, the latter of whom made him a knight of Calatrava. His conduct indeed rendered him deserving of the honour, for he never abused the interest he had at court to an improper purpose; rejected several places that were offered him; refused bribes, and exerted himself in behalf of indigent merit. On the death of the king he went to Italy, and died at Bologna in 1782.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BROSSARD (Sebastian de), a French musical writer, was a canon of the church of Meaux, and died in 1730, aged 70. He wrote a Dictionary of Music, 8vo. and some other pieces on that science.—Moreri. Hawkins.

BROSSER (Guy de la), a French botanist, and physician to Lewis XIII. He procured the establishment of the royal physic-garden, of which he was made first director. He published, in 1628, a work entitled De la Nature des Plantes, and Dessin d'un Jardin Royal, 8vo. and in 1634 Avis Defensif du Jardin Royal. He was also the author of a Description of the Medical Plants in the Royal Garden, and other works. When he died is uncertain.—Moreri.

BROSSER (Charles de), a French writer, was born at Dijon in 1709, and died at Paris in 1777. He was president of the parliament of Burgundy, and a member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres. His works are, Letters on the Discovery of Herculaneum; History of Voyages to the Southern Regions; Parallel between the Worship of the Negroes and the ancient Idolators; on the mechanical Formation of Languages; History of the Roman Republic, partly translated from Sallust.—New. Dict. Hist.

BROSSETTE (Claude), a French writer, born at Lyons in 1671. He was an advocate, and published the works of Boileau, and those of Reignier, with notes. He is also the author of a History of Lyons, and died there in 1746.—Ibid.

BROSSIER (Martha), a noted impostor, who pretended to be a demoniac, at the end of the 16th century, and played her part with great dexterity; but being discovered, she went to Rome, and died in an hospital.—Moreri.

BROTIER (Gabriel), a learned French critic, was born at Tournay in the Nivernois, in 1723, and entered into the society of jesuits, where he acquired a great knowledge of the learned languages. On the dissolution of that order he went to live with M. de la Tour, a celebrated printer, and published elaborate editions of ancient authors, as the fables of Phædrus, Pliny's works, and above all Tacitus, in 4 vols. 4to. and 7 vols. 12mo. This last he enriched with notes of inestimable value. He likewise wrote an Examination of the Apology of Prades; a treatise on Roman, Greek, and Hebrew Monies compared with those of France; the Life of Abbe de la Caille; Memoirs of the Levant, &c. He died in 1789. His nephew, Andrew Charles Broder, was a good botanist. He also conducted for a long time a journal called L'Année Littéraire. He was banished to Guyana, and died there in 1798.—Newsp. Dict. Hist.

BROUGHTON (Hugh), a learned English divine, was born at Oldbury in Shropshire, in 1549, and brought up at Cambridge by the liberality of the famous Bernard Gilpin. He distinguished himself principally by his skill in the Hebrew language, and in rabbinical learning. In 1588 he published a system of scripture chronology and genealogy, under the title of the Conspect of Scriptures, which made much noise, and was answered by the learned Dr. John Reynolds. Broughton was a popular preacher, but inclined to puritanism, which induced him to go abroad, where he became minister of the English congregation at Middleburg. In 1611 he returned to England, and died the year following. Besides the above performance, he published a famous discourse on Christ's Descent into Hell, which was answered by bishop Wilton and archbishop Whitgift. His works were published in one vol. folio, 1662.—Biog. Brit.

BROUGHTON (Thomas), an English divine, was born at London in 1704, and educated first at Eton, and then at Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. A. In 1739 he obtained the rectory of Sibington in Huntingdonshire; after which he was presented to the vicarage of Bedminster near Bristol, with the church of St. Mary Redcliff in that city. He died at Bristol in 1774. He assisted in the General Historical Dictionary, and the Biographia Britannica; and wrote an historical Dictionary of all Religions, in two vols. folio; an Answer to Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation, and other works.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BROUNCKER (William viscount), of Castle Lyons in Ireland, was born about 1630. His lordship was the first president of the royal society, of which he was one of the original institutors, at Oxford. He was also master of St. Catherine's near the Tower. Some of his papers on mathematical subjects are in the Philosophical Transactions. Several letters by him, to archbishop Usher, are at the end of that prelate's Life by Dr. Parr. A translation of Des Cartes's Compendium of Music was published without his name. He died in 1684, and was buried in the church of St. Catherine's.—Biog. Brit.

BROUSSON (Claude), a French protestant, born at Nîmes in 1647. He was at first an advocate, and distinguished himself by his pleadings. But a zeal for the reformed religion induced him to commence preacher.

On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Geneva, from whence he went to Holland, and endeavoured to excite several princes to espouse the cause of the persecuted protestants in France. He failed in this design; on which he returned privately and ministered to those of his religion in various provinces. Being arrested at Oleron, he was conveyed to Montpellier, and was broken on the wheel in 1698. The protestants revered his memory as that of a martyr, and the states of Holland settled a pension on his widow. He wrote Remarks on Amulets; Translation of the New Testament; and Letters to the French Protestants.—Newsp. Dict. Hist.

BROWN (Robert), the founder of a sect called by his name, was descended of a good family, and educated at Cambridge. Having formed, about 1580, a religious society at Norwich, he was imprisoned, but by means of lord treasurer Burleigh, to whom he was related, he obtained his liberty. Brown then went to Zealand, and set up a church of independents, having no communion with any other christians. In 1585 he was in England, and under some trouble for a book which he had written against the church. He afterwards made his submission, and was preferred to a living in Northamptonshire, but never officiated, leaving the care of his church to a curate. He was sent to Northampton gaol for an assault, at the age of 80, and died there in 1630.—Biog. Brit.

BROWN (Thomas), a lively English writer, was born in Shropshire, and educated at Christchurch, Oxford, which he was obliged to quit on account of his irregular conduct. He afterwards settled as a schoolmaster at Kingston-upon-Thames, where he did not remain long, but went to London, and earned a livelihood by his pen. He wrote a number of pieces, mostly humorous, and once very popular. He died in 1704, and was interred in the cloister of Westminster abbey.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BROWN (Moses), an English divine and poet, was originally a pen-cutter, and in 1723 published two dramatic pieces, called Polidus, or Distressed Love, a tragedy; and All-bedevelled, a farce. He then took a serious turn, and was patronized by Hervey, the author of Meditations, by whose means he got into orders. Afterwards he obtained the living of Olney, in Buckinghamshire, and the chaplainship of Morden college; and died very old in 1787. Mr. Brown also published Sunday Thoughts in blank verse; PISCATORY Eclogues, and several sermons.—Gen. Mag.

BROWN (John), an ingenious writer, was born at Rothbury, in Northumberland, in 1715, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B. A. and entered into orders. He obtained a canonry at Carlisle, and in the rebellion of 1745 acted as a volunteer against the rebels. Dr. Osbaldiston, bishop of that diocese, made him his chaplain, and the chapter gave him the living of Moreland in Westmoreland. In 1751 appeared his Essays on Shaftsbury's Characteristics, written with elegance and acuteness. Not long after he obtained the living of Great Horkesley in Essex. In 1755 his tragedy of Barbarossa was acted with success, and the year after another, entitled Athelstan. He had then taken his doctor's degree, and in 1757 published his most celebrated book, an Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, 8vo. of which seven editions were printed in one year. The year following appeared a second volume. In that year he was presented to the vicarage of St. Nicholas, in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on which he resigned Great Horkesley. He was also appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to the king. In 1766 he published a letter to Dr. Lowth, who had incidentally alluded to him as one of Dr. Warburton's sycophants. About this time he was engaged to go to Petersburg to assist in the regulation of schools; but while preparations were making for the voyage he cut his throat in a fit of insanity, September 23, 1766. Besides the above works he wrote the History of the Rise and Progress of Poetry and Music; Thoughts on Civil Liberty, Licentiousness and Faction. 8vo.; a volume of sermons, several single discourses, and an elegant poem, entitled, The Cure of Saul.—Biog. Brit.

BROWN (John), an ingenious painter and man of letters, was born in 1752 at Edinburgh, and travelled through Italy to improve himself in the fine arts. He afterwards returned to his native place, where he resided till his death in 1787. His Letters on the Poetry and Music of the Italian Opera, 1 vol. 12mo. were published by lord Monboddo, in 1789.—Europ. Mag.

BROWN (John), a physician and head of a medical sect, was born at Buncle, in Berwickshire, about 1736. He was apprenticed to a weaver, but discovering considerable abilities he was sent to the grammar-school of Dunse, with a view to the ministry. He was for some time tutor in a gentleman's family, and in 1756 entered as a student of divinity in the university of Edinburgh; but a fondness for pleasure led him to renounce the study of theology, and he returned to Dunse, where he served as usher in the school for about a year. He then went to Edinburgh, and became a student of physic, supporting himself by teaching Latin to those who were preparing for their degree, and by assisting them in writing their theses. He was also employed by Dr. Cullen as tutor in his family, and obtained his permission to give evening lectures, by way of illustrating his own which he had given in the morning. At this time he married, and set up a lodging and boarding house for students; but though he had considerable success he failed in consequence of mismanagement, and became a bankrupt. He now endeavoured to procure a medical professorship which was vacant, but being disappointed, his temper was soured, and he became the enemy of his benefactor, Dr. Cullen, and all the regular physicians. About time he devised a new theory of medicine, intended to overthrow all other systems, ancient or modern. This appeared in his Elementa Medicinæ, a sort of text book, which he explained in his lectures. He introduced a new language in the science, as well as new ideas; and though his manners were vulgar, and his disposition rude and disgusting, he obtained several followers. He took his doctor's degree at St. Andrew's, but his circumstances becoming more involved by his misconduct, he removed to London in 1786, and there published Observations on the old System of Physic. He died of an apoplexy in October 1788, occasioned, it is supposed, by a large dose of laudanum, which he was in the habit of taking when ordinary spirits would not relieve him. His fundamental principle is, that all things whatever acting on the human body are stimulants, or possessed of an exciting power; and that there is in every animated being a correspondent principle, which he calls excitability, and therefore he places all curative means in such as increase or lessen the excitement. This has occasioned the adoption in medical practice of many vigorous if not violent remedies, which the cautionary system of former times would have reprobated. Brown's system is more fashionable in foreign countries than in Britain.—Life by Dr. Beddoes, prefixed to the English Translation of the Elements.

BROWNE (George), archbishop of Dublin in the reign of Henry VIII was an Englishman, and had been provincial of the order of Augustin friars in London. He was consecrated to this see in 1535, and greatly promoted the reformation in that kingdom. Queen Mary deprived him of his see in 1554 for being married, and he died about two years afterwards. A remarkable sermon of his may be seen in sir James Ware's History of Ireland, and in the Phoenix, a collection of tracts, vol. i.—Biog. Brit.

BROWNE (sir Anthony), an English judge, was born in Essex, and educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple. In the reign of Mary he was made serjeant at law, and in 1558 chief justice of the common pleas; but on the accession of queen Elizabeth he was obliged to give place to sir James Dyer. However, he still continued to be a judge in that court to his death, which happened in 1567. Sir Anthony was a zealous papist, and wrote a piece, entitled, Arguments for Mary Queen of Scots, her Right of Succession to the Crown of England, which was published by John Lesley bishop of Ross.—Wood.

BROWNE (William), an English poet, was born at Tavistock in Devonshire, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. He died in his native county in 1645. His pastorals were praised by Selden and other authors, and his whole works were reprinted in 3 vols. 12mo. 1772.—Prince's Works of Devon. Biog. Br.

BROWNE (Sir Thomas), an eminent physician, was born in London in 1605, and brought up first at Winchester school, and afterwards at Oxford. Having taken his degrees in arts he entered upon the physical line, and then went on his travels. At Leyden he took his degree of M.D. and in 1642 published his famous book, the Religio Medici, which excited uncommon attention at home and abroad. In 1636 he settled at Norwich as a physician, and acquired there a wife and good practice. In 1646 appeared his book on Vulgar Errors, in folio. Charles II. honoured him with knighthood in 1671. He died at Norwich in 1682. All his works were printed in one volume, folio, after his death, and Dr. Johnson has honoured his memory by writing his life.—Biog. Br.

BROWNE (Edward), an eminent physician, and son of the above, was born about 1642, and educated first at Cambridge and then at Oxford, where he proceeded M.D. In 1668 he set out upon his travels, a relation of which he published at his return to England; and was made physician to Charles II. and to St. Bartholomew's hospital. He became president of the college of physicians, and died in 1708. He published a translation of some of Plutarch's lives.—Ibid.

BROWNE (Simon), an eminent nonconformist divine, was born at Shepton Mallet in Somersetshire, in 1680, and educated at an academy at Bridgewater, after which he became minister to a congregation at Portsmouth, from whence he removed to the Old Jewry; but on account of a disorder of his mental faculties, he was obliged to quit London, and retire to his native town, where he died in 1732. He wrote answers to Woolston and Tindal, which shew him to great advantage as a logician and divine. To his last book, entitled, A Defence of the Religion of Nature and the Christian Revelation, he wrote a dedication to queen Caroline, in which he maintained that God had extinguished in him the rational soul; but his friends would not suffer it to be printed. It was inserted in No. 88 of the Adventurer. On every other subject Mr. Browne was intelligent and collected, but upon this he was always determined, and no one could persuade him that he had a thinking principle.—Ibid.

BROWNE (Peter), a learned prelate of the Irish church, was a native of that kingdom, and from being provost of Trinity college, Dublin, was preferred to the bishopric of Cork, where he died in 1785. He wrote; A Defence of Christianity against Toland; The Progress, Extent, and Limits of the Human Understanding; Tracts against the custom of offering to the memory of the dead; and 2 vols. of Sermons.—Ibid.

BROWNE (Isaac Hawkins), an English poet, was the son of a clergyman at Burton-upon-Trent in Staffordshire, and born in 1706. From Westminster school he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M. A. and then went to Lincoln's-inn. However, he paid more attention to the muses than to the law, and wrote some poems, which possess great merit. He was returned member to parliament for Wenlock, Shropshire, first in 1744, and again in 1748. He died in 1760. His son published in 1768 a complete edition of his father's poems, the most esteemed of which is one in Latin, de Animi Immortalitate, of which two translations have appeared in English, one by Mr. Jenyns, and the other by Mr. Lettice.—Ibid.

BROWNE (Ulysses Maximilian de), a celebrated general, was the son of Ulysses baron Browne, a native of Ireland, and a colonel in the Austrian service. He was born at Basil in 1705, and at the age of ten served under his uncle count George Browne at the siege of Belgrade. He became a lieutenant-colonel at the age of 20, and served in Corsica in 1730. After seeing a considerable deal of service, and distinguishing himself in various actions, he was appointed colonel in 1734. In 1739 the emperor made him field marshal, and gave him a seat in the aulic council of war. The empress queen placed an implicit confidence in him, and he was appointed privy-counsellor at her coronation in Bohemia. In 1744 he went into Italy, where he signalized himself by several gallant exploits. The victory at Placentia in 1746 was principally owing to him; after which he took possession of Genoa, from which he effected a masterly retreat. For these, and subsequent services against the king of Prussia, he was loaded with honours, and died of his wounds received at the battle of Potshernitz in 1757, aged 52. He left two sons.—New. Dict. Hist.

BROWNE (Sir William), an English physician, was educated at Cambridge, and settled first at Lynn in Norfolk, from whence he removed to the metropolis, where he acquired an extensive practice, and died in 1774, aged 82. He left a sum for two prize medals, to be given annually at Cambridge for the best ode. He wrote several ingenious poems, miscellaneous tracts, speeches, and a work entitled Opuscula. He also translated Dr. Gregory's elements of Catoptrics and Dioptrics from the Latin into English, with additions.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BROWNE (Patrick), an eminent physician, was born at Crossboyne in the county of Mayo in Ireland, in 1720. When young he was sent to a relation in the Mand of Antigua, but the climate not agreeing with his constitution he returned to Europe in 1737. He resided at Paris five years, and removed from thence to Leyden, where he took his degree of M.D. He then went to London, where he formed an intimacy with some of the most learned and ingenious of the faculty, and once more visited the West Indies, and fixed his residence in Jamaica. By his means Kingston was made the port of clearance in 1750 instead of Spanishtown. In the same year he published his Natural and Civil History of Jamaica in folio, having the year before published a correct map of that island, drawn by himself. He died at Rusbrook in the county of Mayo, in 1790. He left some MSS. on the plants of Jamaica and Ireland, ready for publication, but they have not yet appeared.—European Magazine.

BROWNIE (Ralph), an English prelate, was born at Ipswich, and educated at Cambridge, where he became master of Catherine-hall, and in 1641 was promoted to the see of Exeter. Being deprived of all his preferments in the rebellion, he led a retired life, but in 1657 he was chosen preacher at the Temple. He died in 1659. His sermons were printed in 1674, 2 vols. folio.—Life by Dr. Gauden, Biog. Brit.

BRUCE (James), a celebrated traveller, was born at Kinnaird in Stirlingshire in 1730. He was educated first at Harrow school in Middlesex, and next at the university of Edinburgh, where he studied the law, which profession, however, he did not follow. On leaving Edinburgh he went to London, and entered into partnership with a wine merchant, whose daughter he married. On the death of his wife he went abroad, and before his return his father died and left him the patrimonial estate. In 1763 he went to Algiers as consul. After staying there about a year he went on his travels into Asia Minor, and made drawings of the ruins of Palmyra and Balbec, which are now in the king's library at Kew. In 1768 he set out on his grand tour to explore the source of the Nile. From Alexandria he went to Cairo, and then crossed the Desert to the Red Sea, after which he spent a considerable time in Arabia Felix. In 1770 he arrived at Gondar in Abyssinia, and in that country rendered himself a favourite by his skill in physic and his address as a courtier. That year he discovered the great object of his enquiries, in which he prided himself not a little, though it is certain that a Portuguese missionary had described the source of the Nile before him. He served in the Abyssinian army under the reigning king, and it was not without difficulty that he obtained leave to quit the country, after residing there two years. He was nearly thirteen months in travelling back to Cairo, during which he endured innumerable hardships. He returned to England in 1773, and retired to his seat at Kinnaird, where he married. In 1790 he published the long expected History of his Travels, in five heavy quarto volumes, which contain much curious information, though the veracity of the author in several instances has been strongly suspected. He died in April 1794, in consequence of a fall down stairs.—Supplement to the Encyclop. Britan.

BRUCIOLI (Antony), an Italian writer, was born at Florence. He engaged in a conspiracy against the Medici family, for which he was obliged to fly to France; but on the expulsion of them in 1527 he returned to his own country, from which he was again forced to withdraw on being suspected of heresy. He settled at Venice, where he published an Italian translation of the Bible in 1532. He accompanied it with a laborious Commentary in 7 vols. folio. This version is chiefly taken from Pagnini's Latin Translation. His works were prohibited by the inquisition. He was living in 1554.—Tiraboschi.

BRUCKER (John James), a learned writer, was born at Augsburg in 1696, and studied at Jena, where he took his degrees in arts. On entering into the ministry he became rector of Kaufbeuren, and the academy of sciences at Berlin chose him a member. He afterwards was appointed minister of a church at Augsburg, where he died in 1770. He wrote several esteemed works, the principal of which is his Historia Critica Philosophiz, printed at Leipzig in 6 vols. 4to. An abridgment of it was published by Dr. Enfeld, in 2 vols. 4to.—Gen. Biog.

BRUZES (David Augustin), a French writer, who from being a protestant was converted to popery by Bossuet. He was a volatile character, sometimes engaged in polemical divinity, and at others in writing farces. He died in 1723, aged 83. His dramatic pieces were printed in 3 vols. 12mo. 1735.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

BRUGES (John de), a Flemish painter, to whom some have attributed the invention of oil painting, but which others ascribe to Van Eyck. He flourished at the beginning of the 15th century.—De Pict.

BRUGUIERES (John William), an eminent French naturalist and physician, was born at Montpellier in 1750, and brought up to surgery by his father, who was of that profession. But he early conceived a strong propensity to the study of natural history, which displeased his father, who procured him a wife, thinking this would settle his mind to the profession for which he had been educated. Bruguieres, however, quitted his wife and his native place about three months after being married, and went to Paris, and shortly after embarked on a voyage made for discoveries to the South Seas, in the capacity of botanist. In the course of this voyage he collected many rare plants and unknown animals, particularly the genus Langaba, since adopted by La Cépède in his history of serpents. He was particularly attentive to the class of vermes, mollusca, and zoophyta, so common in the seas of the torrid zone. Bruguière drew up an interesting account of this voyage, but it has not yet been published. On his return he went and settled at Montpellier, where he resided seven years. The casual discovery of a coal mine, and of several fossils and petrifications, kindled a desire to explore the curiosities of the mineral kingdom. He repaired again to Paris, where he was engaged by Daubenton in composing the account of the class of animals called vermes, for the Encyclopédie méthodique. In conjunction with some others he undertook a journal of natural history, which, however, failed for want of encouragement. In 1793, though labouring under a bad state of health, he engaged with Olivier in a voyage to the east. This completely ruined his constitution, and he died, just after his return, at Ancona in 1799. L'Heretier has given his name to a new plant, discovered by Bruguières at Madagascar.—Life by Crevier.

BRUNIER D'ABLANCOURT (John James), a French physician of Beauvais, who died in 1756. He wrote, 1. A Treatise on Fevers, 1746. 2. On the Cure of the Gout. 3. On the Uncertainty of the Signs of Death, 2 vols. 12mo. 1746, &c.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BRUN (John de), professor of philosophy and mathematics at Utrecht. He was born in 1620, and died in 1675. He wrote some learned and ingenious treatises, de vi Altrice, de Corporum gravitate et levitate, de cognitione Dei Naturali, de lucis causa et origine, &c.—Moreri.

BRUMOR (Peter), a French jesuit, who rendered himself famous by an acute and entertaining work, entitled, the Theatre of the Greeks, 3 vols. 4to. He was born in 1688, and died in 1742.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BRUN (Charles le), an eminent painter, born in France, but of Scottish extraction, in 1619. He was brought up under his father, who was a statuary, and afterwards placed with Simon Vouet. He then went to Italy, where he formed an intimacy with Poussin. At his return he was patronized by cardinal Mazarin, and became first painter to the king, who took great delight in viewing him while he was painting the family of Darius, and gave him the direction of his manufactory at the Gobelins. He was also appointed chancellor and director of the royal academy. He died at the Gobelins in 1690. Le Brun published a book on Physiognomy, and another on the Characters of the Passions; but his greatest works are his paintings of Alexander's battle.—D'Argenville's Vies des Peintres.

BRUN (Laurence le), a French writer, who published Virgilius Christianus, and Ovidius Christianus, which show more piety than taste. He died in 1668, aged 56.—Moreri.

BAUN (Peter le), a learned French divine, born in Provence in 1661, and died in 1729. He wrote a curious work, entitled a Critical History of the Superstitious Practices which have seduced the Vulgar and embarrassed the Learned, 3 vols. 12mo. Another on the Unlawfulness of Dramatic Entertainments in a Religious View, and an elaborate one on Liturgies.—Moreri.

BRUNEHAUD, or BRUNECHILDE, the daughter of Athanagild, king of the Visigoths in Spain, and the wife of Sigebert I. king of Austrasia, during whose life she bore an excellent character. On his death she was seized, and with her two daughters sent to Rouen, where Merovée, the son of Chilperic, king of Soissons, fell in love with and married her. The king, however, being displeased, parted them, and sent back Brunehaud and her daughters to Austrasia, where she assumed the regency during the minority of her son Childebert. On the death of his successor Theodebert she resumed the same authority, and to preserve it, is charged with committing the greatest cruelties, for which she was banished. She then retired to the court of her grandson Thierry, king of Burgundy, whom she persuaded to take Paris from Clotaire, in which he succeeded. Her behaviour was now, according to some historians, extremely licentious, and she is said to have poisoned Thierry, soon after which she was betrayed into the hands of Clotaire, by whose orders she was tied to the tail of a wild horse, which dragged her about till her brains were beat out on the stones, A.D. 614.—Moreri.

BRUNCK (Richard Philip Frederick), a learned modern critic, was born in 1719, and resided at Strasburg, where he had a place in the military department. His great knowledge of the Greek language, and the superb editions which he gave of ancient authors, besides his own learned works, obtained for him a place in the academy of inscriptions, and of the national institute of France. He published editions of Anacreon, Æschylus, Apollonius Rhodius, Aristophanes, Sophocles, and Virgil; all carefully corrected by a collation of ancient MSS. and enriched with notes of various learned men. He also published, 1. Analecra Veterum Poetarum Græcorum, 4 vols. 8vo. which went through several editions. 2. Gnomici Poetæ Græci, 8vo. He died in 1803.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BRUNELLESCHI (Philip), an Italian architect, was born at Florence in 1377. He was at first a goldsmith and clock maker, after which he applied to the study of perspective and architecture, in which he made a surprising progress, almost without assistance. He erected the dome of the cathedral at Florence, which Michael Angelo has pronounced to be a work of uncommon beauty. He was patronised by the Medici family, for whom he built some magnificent structures. Brunelleschi was also skilled in military architecture, and was besides an excellent engineer. He died in 1446. Some of his verses have been printed with those of Burchiello.—Tiraboschi. D'Argenville.

BRUMI (Anthony), an Italian poet, counsellor and secretary of state to the duke d'Urbino. He died in 1635. His heroic epistles were printed at Venice in 1636.—Tiraboschi.

BRUNNER (John Conrad), an eminent physician, was born in Switzerland in 1653. He studied at Strasburg and Paris, after which he went to Holland, England, and Germany. He was consulted by several princes, and died at Manheim in 1727. His principal works are Experimenta nova circa Pancreatis accedit diatribe de Lymphæ & genuino Pancreatis usu, 4to. 1683; De Glandulis in duodeno intestino delectis, 4to. 1687; De Glandula pituitaria Dissertatio, 4to. 1688.—Haller Bibl. Anat.

BRUNO, a saint of the Roman calendar, and founder of the monastery of the Chartrreuse. He was born at Cologne in 1060, and adopted the solitary life in 1084. Pope Urban II. sent for him to come to Rome that he might profit by his advice. Afterwards he went to Calabria, where he established a monastery, and died in 1101.—Dupin. Moreri.

BRUNO (Giordano), a dominican monk in the 16th century, was born at Nola in the kingdom of Naples. By reading religious books he began to be dissatisfied with the tenets of the Roman church, and fled to Geneva in 1582; but disliking the intolerant spirit of Calvin and Beza, he went to Paris, where he attracted notice by his zeal in attacking the aristotelian philosophy. He next visited England, where he contracted an acquaintance with sir Fulk Greville and sir Philip Sidney, to the latter of whom he dedicated two books. In 1589 he was at Helmstadt, where he pronounced a funeral oration on Julius duke of Brunswick. He was afterwards imprudent enough to venture into Italy, and was arrested at Venice, from whence he was removed to Rome, where, after two years imprisonment, he was burnt alive in 1600. He was a man of talents, positive, vain, and singularly obscure in his ideas. This it seems has given the occasion to call him an atheist, because he opposed in a perplexed stile the philosophy of the schools. It must be allowed, however, that if he was not an atheist, he had little or no regard to religion, as appears from his most celebrated book, Spaccio della Bestia Triumphante, [the Demolition of the Triumphant Beast]. He was also the author of an Italian comedy, called Il Candelajo, and of some Latin poetry.—Bayle.

BRUNZELI (Otho), a physician and botanist, was born at Mentz, and became a carthusian; but on turning protestant he quitted that order, and went about preaching the lutheran doctrines with great ardour. Having thereby injured his voice, he settled at Strasburg, where he was chosen regent of the public school. Here he studied physic, and took his degree in that faculty at Basil. The city of Bern appointed him public physician, and he died there in 1594. He wrote several pieces on the medicinal virtues of plants, which were published in 3 vols. folio, at Strasburg, in 1537. He was also the author of a Biographical Catalogue of early Physicians, Strasburg, 1590, 4to.—Haller Bibl. Botan.

BRUSCHIUS (Caspar), a learned Bohemian of the 15th century. His Latin poems procured him marks of distinction from several princes. He also wrote an Ecclesiastical History of Bohemia. Bruschius was assassinated in a wood near Rottemberg in 1559.—Bayle.

BRUSONI (Jerome), a laborious writer, was born at Legnago in the Venetian territory in 1610, of a noble family. He entered three times among the carthusians, and as often quitted that fraternity. He published fifty different works in prose and verse; the best is the History of Italy, from 1628 to 1679, fol. and his Elucidario Poetico, 12mo. He died about 1680.—Tiraboschi.

BRUTÆ, or BRUTUS, a supposed king of Britain, whom our monkish chroniclers pretend to have been the son of Sylvius, who was the brother of Ascanius, and consequently the son of Æneas. On the death of his father he is said to have taken refuge in Greece, where he delivered a number of Trojans from slavery, with whom he passed to Albion, and there established a kingdom, which he called Britain. This story is now universally exploded as a fable.—Bede. Polydore Virgil.

BRUTUS (Lucius Junius), a celebrated Roman. He was the son of Marcus Junius, by a daughter of Tarquin the elder. When his father and brothers were beheaded by Tarquin, Brutus pretended to be an idiot, which saved his life. He continued this appearance till the death of Lucretia afforded him an opportunity of rousing the Roman people to action, and of shewing the energy of his mind. By his exertion the Tarquins were expelled, and the monarchy gave way to a republic. The consulship was then instituted, when Brutus and Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia, were chosen the first to hold that dignity. The same year he was slain at the head of his troops fighting against one of the sons of Tarquin, who also fell upon the field. This happened B.C. 509.—Livy.

BRUTUS (Marcus Junius), was the son of Junius Brutus by a sister of Cato. The precepts and examples of his uncle inspired him with the loftiest sentiments of liberty. and he resolved on the destruction of Julius Cæsar, as a tyrant who had enslaved his country. This design he carried into execution, March 15, 43 B.C. although that great man was one of his best friends. Brutus put an end to himself at the second battle of Philippi, where he performed prodigies of valour.—Tacitus.

BRUTUS (Decimus Albinus), a relation of Marcus Brutus, and one of those who engaged in the conspiracy against Cæsar, with whom he had served and lived on terms of the greatest friendship. Cæsar appointed him governor of Cisalpine Gaul, and intended him also for the consular dignity. What therefore could be his inducement to conspire against his life is a mystery. He actually forced him by his entreaties to leave his house and repair to the senate on the fatal day of the murder, an instance of treachery hardly to be paralleled. After that event he hastened to his province, and put himself at the head of his troops. Antony besieged him in Mutina, but Brutus by a sally forced him to withdraw, after which he drove him out of Italy, and was honoured on account of it with a triumph. Antony however returned, and Brutus was forced to retire in his turn; his troops abandoned him, and in his passage through Gaul he was put to death, and his head sent to Antony.—Suetonius. Univ. Hist.

BRUTUS (John Michel), an historian in the 16th century, was a native of Venice, which country he was obliged to leave, but on what account does not appear. After wandering about from place to place he settled at Cracow in 1574, where he was employed by Stephen Batori to write the history of that country. He afterwards settled at Prague, and died about 1590. He also wrote a History of Florence, and Letters.—Boyle.

BRUTZEE (John de la), a French writer of eminence, was born at Dourdan in the île of France, in 1640. Bossuet employed him as teacher of history to the duke of Burgundy. He was admitted a member of the French academy; and died in 1696. His Characters in the manner of Theophrastus, acquired uncommon popularity, as they were drawn from real persons, and exposed the prevailing follies in a bold yet delicate stile. The best editions are those of Amsterdam 1741, and Paris 1765.—Moreri.

BRUYN (Cornelius), a Dutch painter and traveller of the 17th century. He went through Russia, Persia, and the East Indies. The best edition of his Travels is that of Rouen, in 9 vols. 4to. 1725.—New. Dict. Hist.

BRUYS (Francis), a French writer, who from being a romanist turned calvinist, and went to Geneva, then returned to France and became a romanist again. He wrote a History of the Popes, 5 vols. 4to. 1732, and some other works. He died in 1738, aged 38.—Ibid.

BRUYS (Peter de), the founder of a religious sect called after him Parabruissians. He lived in Languedoc about the year 1110. He opposed infant baptism; maintained that churches were unnecessary; that crucifixes and other church ornaments should be demolished; that the body of Christ is not in the sacrament; and that prayers ought not to be offered for the dead. He and his followers committed shameful excesses, and in a fanatical rage polluted churches, destroyed the altars, and ill used the clergy. He was burnt alive at St. Gilles, in 1130.—Moreri. Moreri.

BRUZEN DE LA MARTINIÈRE (Anthony Augustin), a French writer. He became secretary to the king of the two Sicilies, and died at the Hague in 1749, aged 83. He compiled several useful works, the principal of which is the Great Geographical, Historical, and Critical Dictionary, 10 vols. folio, Hague 1790, but the Paris edition of 1768, which is the best, is in 6 vols.—New. Dict. Hist.

BRYAN (Francis), or BRIANT, was born of a genteel family, and educated at Oxford. In 1522 he attended the earl of Surrey, high admiral of England, in the expedition against France, and for his services there was knighted. He was afterwards employed in several embassies, and became gentleman of the privy chamber to the king. He wrote songs and sonnets, printed with those of the earl of Surrey and sir Thomas Wyatt. He also translated into English from the French, A Dispraise of the Life of a Courtier, &c. He died justiciary of Ireland in 1548.—Wood.

BRYCHAN, son of Aulach, the son of Cormach, one of the kings of Ireland. He was lord of Garthmatheoin, which from him was called Brycheinog, and by the English named Brecknock. He is a distinguished character in the Welsh history; but principally as being the father of one of the three holy families of Britain; for almost all his children embraced a religious life, and were the founders of several churches. He died about A. D. 450.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

BRYENNIUS (Nicephorus), the husband of the princess Anna Comnena. On the death of Alexis, his father-in-law, the throne was offered to him, which he refused to accept. He died in 1137. He began the Life of Alexis, which he never finished. The fragment was published with a Latin version at Paris, in 1661, and Du Cange added annotations to it in 1670.—Moreri.

BUC (George), an English historian. He was a native of Lincolnshire, and became master of the revels to king James I. who knighted him. Sir George wrote the Life of Richard III. which is an attempt to clear the character of that prince from many of the crimes with which he stands charged. Mr. Horace Walpole, afterwards lord Orford, made the same attempt, and with about the same success. Sir George also wrote some Account of the Houses of Learning, Schools, &c. in London.—Biog. Brit.

BUCKER (Martin), one of the reformers, was born in Alsace in 1491, and took the habit of St. Dominic, but the writings of Erasmus and Luther gave him a dislike to popery, which he abandoned, and became a zealous protestant. At first he united with Luther, but afterwards he inclined to Zuinglius, though he laboured much to bring the two parties to a union. He came to England in 1549, and was made divinity professor at Cambridge, where he died in 1551. In the reign of Mary, his body was taken up and burnt. Bucer was twice married: by his first wife, who had been a nun, he had 13 children. His writings are very numerous.—Bayle.

BUCHAN (Elizabeth), a modern visionary and fanatic. Her husband was one of the proprietors of the delft-work manufactory at Glasgow, by whom she had several children. About 1779 she began to prophesy that the end of the world was near, and that all christians must abandon worldly connections to be in readiness to meet Christ. She gathered a number of followers, and journeyed with them through several parts of Scotland, encreasing as they went. On her death in 1791, her disciples dispersed.—Europ. Mag.

BUCHANAN (George), an eminent writer of the 16th century, was born in Dumbartonshire in Scotland, in 1506; educated first at St. Andrew's, and then at Paris, where he embraced the doctrines of the reformation. James V. employed him as tutor to his natural son, the earl of Moray; and at the same king's command he attacked the franciscans in a satirical poem, for which his life being threatened he fled to England, and thence to France, where he wrote four tragedies in Latin. He next went to Portugal, and became a teacher of philosophy in the university of Coimbra, but expressing some free opinions, he was confined in a monastery, in which he translated David's Psalms into Latin. In 1551 he obtained his liberty, and after residing some time in France and England, returned to his native country, where he was appointed principal of the college of St. Leonard in the university of St. Andrew's. This favour he obtained from queen Mary, which he ill requited by writing a book called a Detection of her Doings, designed to prejudice the minds of her subjects against her. He was nominated tutor to James VI. and being afterwards reproached with making him a pedant, he replied, that "it was the best he could make of him." He died at Edinburgh in 1582. Besides what is above mentioned he wrote Latin poems, some of which are extremely beautiful. His History of Scotland is also elegantly written, but not faithful. In his famous treatise De Jure Regni apud Scotos, he defends the principles of democracy and republicanism. His works were printed together at Edinburgh, 2 vols. folio, 1714.—Bayle. Biog. Brit.

BUCKELBIUS, or BUCKLIN (William), the first who found out the method of curing herrings with salt, for which his countrymen, the Dutch, erected a monument to his memory. He died in 1449.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

BUCKERIDGE (John), an English prelate, born at Draycot, near Marlborough, in Wiltshire; made bishop of Rochester in 1611, and translated to Ely in 1628. He died in 1631. Bishop Buckeridge wrote a learned work against Bellarmine, and some other pieces of a polemical nature.—Wood's A. O.

BUQUET (John Michael Baptist), a French physician, was born at Paris in 1746, and his merit obtained for him, when young, a place in the academy of sciences, and the professorship of chemistry to the faculty of medicine at Paris. He was indefatigable in his chemical pursuits, to which he added the study of natural history. He united the two subjects in his lectures, and thus rendered them peculiarly interesting. A close application to his studies, and to the duties of his profession, laid the foundation of a disorder, which carried him off in 1780. He presented several memoirs to the academy of sciences.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

BUDÆUS (William), or Budé, a learned Frenchman, was born at Paris in 1467, and had every advantage of education, but he dissipated his youth in idleness and extravagance. At length he suddenly took another turn, abandoned his gay pursuits, and devoted himself to study. The king sent him ambassador to Rome, and at his request founded the royal college of France. He died in 1540. His works were printed at Basil, in 4 vols. folio, 1557. Erasmus was his frequent correspondent, but they appear to have been jealous of each other's abilities.—Bayle. Moreri.

BUDÆUS (John Francis), a learned German, was born at Anclam in Pomerania, in 1667, and died professor of theology at Jena in 1729. He wrote a System of Divinity; the Elements of Philosophy; both in Latin: and an Historical Dictionary, in German, 2 vols. folio.—Moreri.

BUDGELL (Eustace), an English writer, was born at Exeter in 1685, where his father was a clergyman. He received his education at Christ-church, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. Mr. Addison, to whom he was related, took him to Ireland as one of the clerks of his office. He contributed several papers to the Tatlers, Spectator, and Guardian. While in Ireland he was chosen member of parliament, and obtained some lucrative employments, which he lost for satirising the duke of Bolton and his secretary, when that nobleman was lord lieutenant. On this he returned to England, where he lost 20,000*l.* by the famous South Sea bubble. He now turned party writer and conducted a popular paper called the Lee. But while thus engaged an affair happened which totally ruined the little reputation he had left. On the death of Dr. Tindal the deist, a bequest was found in his will of 200*l.* to Budgell, which all who knew the doctor were sensible he never intended. The will was contested by his relations, and set aside. This and other circumstances had such an effect upon the mind of Budgell that he threw himself into the Thames and was drowned, May 4, 1737. He wrote the Lives of the Family of the Boyles, and translated Theophrastus's Characters from the Greek.—Biog. Brit.

BUFFALMACO (Bonamico), an eminent historical painter, born at Florence in 1262, and died in 1340.—Pilkington.

BUFFIER (Claude), a learned jesuit, born in Poland in 1661, and died at Paris in 1737. He wrote a Course of Sciences, upon Principles new and simple, 1732, folio, and other works.—Moreri.

BUFFON (George Lewis Le Clerc), an illustrious French writer, was the son of a counsellor of the parliament of Dijon, and born at the family seat at Montbard in Burgundy, Sept. 7, 1707. He studied at Dijon and was intended for the law, but his inclination lay to the sciences, particularly astronomy and geometry, and it is said he was never without Euclid's Elements in his pocket. At the age of twenty he made the tour of Italy, after which he visited England. On his return he divided his time between Montbard and Paris, and in 1735 published a translation of Hales's Vegetable Statics, which was followed by another of Newton's Fluxions. In 1739 he was appointed superintendent of the royal garden and cabinet, which by his care were considerably enriched and improved. In 1749 appeared the first part of his great work, "Natural History general and particular," and which was not completed till 1767, when it amounted to 15 vols. 4to. and 31 vols. 12mo. To it were afterwards added several volumes more by way of supplement. He begins this celebrated performance with a Theory of the Earth, fanciful and fallacious, as is also his Theory of Animal Generation. But his Natural History of Animals is peculiarly valuable, though in the classification he is rather extravagant. In 1771 appeared his History of Birds; and in 1773 he began the History of Minerals, which is charged with the same faults as his Theory of the Earth. On the whole, however, the works of Buffon, as a mass of valuable facts and observations, are of inestimable worth. They make 36 vols. 4to. and 62 vols. 12mo. He was a member of the French academy, and treasurer of that of sciences. In 1771 he was created a count. His private character was that of a libertine, and he was extremely vain of his person and his talents. "The works of eminent geniuses," he would say, "are few; they are those of Newton, Bacon, Leibnitz, Montequien, and my own!" He died in 1788. He left an only son, who suffered under Robespierre in 1793. On the scaffold he said to the people "Citizens, my name is Buffon."—New. Dict. Hist.

BUCHENHAGEN (John), a learned divine, was born in Pomerania in 1485. He renounced popery and embraced the doctrines of Luther, after having written against them. Christian III. king of Denmark sent for him to settle the reformation in his kingdom. He died in 1558. He wrote Commentaries on the Scriptures; the Harmony of the Gospels; and a History of Pomerania.—Moreri.

BUGIARDINI (Giuliano), an Italian painter of eminence in history and landscape. He was a native of Florence, and greatly esteemed by Michael Angelo Buonarroti. He died in 1556, aged 75.—Pilkington.

BULL (John), a famous musician, was born in Somersetshire about 1563, and in 1586 was admitted bachelor of music at Oxford. In 1591 he was created doctor, and appointed organist of the royal chapel. He was the first professor of music in Gresham college; but in the reign of James I. he went abroad, and died at Lubeck in 1622.—Ward's Lives of the Gresham Professors.

BULL (George), a learned prelate, was born at Wells in Somersetshire in 1634, and educated at Tiverton-school in Devonshire, from whence he removed to Exeter college, Oxford; but refusing the engagement he retired to his native county. At the age of 21 he was ordained privately by bishop Skinner of Oxford, who exercised his office at that critical period, though it was made a capital offence by the parliament to do so. After this he became minister of St. George's, near Bristol, where he read as much of the liturgy as he safely could under the appearance of extemporary devotion. In 1658 he married, and was presented to the rectory of Suddington in Gloucestershire. While here he composed most of his learned works, and in 1669 published his Harmonia Apostolica; the intent of which is to reconcile St. Paul and St. James on the article of justification. This performance gave great offence to the calvinists, and several answers were published to it, particularly by Dr. Tully. Mr. Bull, however, vindicated his work in an admirable apology, written also in Latin. His reputation now stood high, and in 1678 the lord chancellor Finch gave him a prebend in the cathedral of Gloucester. In 1683 appeared his principal performance, the Defensio Fidei Nicene, in which he proves that the consubstantiality and co-eternity of the son of God was the faith of the church before the council of Nice. This great work gained the author universal applause, and the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. He also obtained the rectory of Avening in Gloucestershire, and archbishop Sancroft made him archdeacon of Landaff. In 1694 he published his Judicium Ecclesie Catholice, for which he had the thanks of Bosuet, bishop of Meaux, and other learned divines of the Gallican church. In 1704-5 he was consecrated bishop of St. David's. He died in 1709, and was buried in the church of Brecknock. His sermons were published by Mr. Nelson, in 4 vols. 8vo. and all his Latin works in one vol. folio, by Dr. Grabe.—Life of Bishop Bull by Nelson, 8vo.

BULLER (Francis), an English judge, was descended from an ancient and respectable family settled both in Devon and Cornwall. After receiving a good classical education at Winchester school he entered of the Temple, and in 1763 was called to the bar, about which time also he became a member of parliament. In his profession he was chiefly distinguished as a special pleader, but his practice at the bar was also very considerable. In 1772 he published a work, which is held in considerable repute, called, "An Introduction to the Law of Nisi Prius." Being related by marriage to earl Bathurst he soon attained the honours of his profession, was made a Welsh judge, and at length a justice of the king's bench, where he acquired by his great legal knowledge the particular friendship of lord Mansfield. When that nobleman was about to retire he earnestly wished that sir Francis should be his successor, but superior interest prevailed in favour of lord Kenyon, on which he removed to the court of common pleas. He was a man well skilled in his profession, of pleasant manners, and strictly impartial. He died suddenly, June 4, 1800.—Public Characters, Vol. 1.

BULLET (John Baptist), a French divine, died in 1775 at Besançon, of which university he was dean. He wrote a History of the Establishment of Christianity, 1764, 4to.; some works against unbelievers; Memoirs on the Celtic Language, 3 vols. folio; and a Dissertation on the History of France, 8vo.—Novo. Did. Hist.

BULLEYN (William), an English physician and botanist, was born in the Isle of Ely, and educated partly at Cambridge and partly at Oxford; after which he travelled into Germany and other parts in quest of natural knowledge. In 1550 he was instituted to the rectory of Bloxhall in Suffolk, which he resigned in 1564, and about the same time took his degree of M. D. and settled as physician at Durham. From thence he removed to London, and became member of the college of physicians. He was falsely accused of having murdered sir Thomas Hilton, whom he attended as physician, but who died of a malignant fever; and though his innocence was clearly proved, yet his persecutor found means to throw him into prison for debt, where he wrote a great part of his medical treatises.

He died in 1576. There is a portrait of him prefixed to his Government of Health, and another to the Bulwarke of Defence, which is a collection of most of his works.—Biog. Br. Pulteney's Sketches of Botany.

BULLIALDUS, or BOULLIAU (Ismael), a learned astronomer, was born at Houdun in the Isle of France in 1605. His parents were protestants, but he embraced the Roman catholic religion and became a priest. He studied with ardour, and his knowledge was wonderfully various, for he was well versed in mathematics, philosophy, theology, sacred and profane history, and even the civil law, on which last subject he wrote some esteemed works. In 1649 he printed the History of Ducaz in Greek, with a Latin version, and notes of his own. His mathematical works are, A Treatise on the Nature of Light; Astronomica Philolaica, to which are added Tables of the Motions of Saturn, Jupiter, and Mercury; a Treatise on Spiral Lines; Opus Novum ad Arithmetica infinitorum. He died at Paris in 1694.—Moreri.

BULLIARD (N.), a French botanist, who died at Paris in 1793, aged 41. He published several useful works; as, 1. Flora Parisiensis, 8vo.; 2. The Herbal of France, 13 vol. folio; 3. Dictionnaire Elementaire de Botanique, folio; 4. History of the poisonous Plants of France, folio; 5. On the Mushrooms of France. He was an accurate observer.—Novo. Did. Hist.

BULLINGER (Henry), one of the reformers, was born at Zurich in 1504, and educated at Cologne. He intended to turn monk, but the writings of Melancthon altered his resolution, and he became a protestant. In 1529 he undertook the pastorate of the reformed church in his native place, and about the same time entered into the matrimonial state. Being driven from thence by the papists, he retired with his family to Zurich, where he was chosen to succeed Zuinglius. He died there in 1575. His works are numerous, and were once held in high estimation.—Bayle.

BULTEAU (Lewis), a learned writer, was born at Rouen in 1615. He succeeded his uncle as king's secretary, but afterwards entered as a lay brother among the benedictines of St. Maur. He died in 1693. He wrote an Essay on the Monastic History of the East; Abridgment of the History of the Order of St. Benedict. He also translated the Dialogues of St. Gregory.—Moreri.

BULWER (John), an English physician of the 17th century, who wrote a curious book on physiognomy; another entitled, Man transformed, or the artificial Changing; and one called Pathomyoemia, or a Dissection of the significative Muscles of the Affections of the Mind, 1649, 12mo.—Granger.

BUNEL (Jacob), a French painter, born at Blois in 1558, and brought up under Zuccherò. In the church of the Augustines at Rome is a fine piece by this master, representing the descent of the Holy Ghost.—D'Argenville.

BUNEL (Pèter), a learned Frenchman of the 16th century, was a native of Toulouse, and died at Turin in 1546, aged 47. Some elegant Latin epistles by him were printed in 1521, and a better edition in 1687 at Toulouse.—Bayle.

BONNICK (John van), a Flemish painter of history and portrait, born at Utrecht in 1654, and died in 1727. His pieces are very elegant and correct. His brother Jacob was his disciple, and excelled in painting battles. He died in 1725.—Pilkington.

BUNYAN (John), a pious English writer, was born at Elstow in Bedfordshire in 1628. He barely learnt to read and write, and followed his father's business, which was that of a travelling tinker. For some years he led a profane kind of life, and was much addicted to swearing and sabbath-breaking. At length he was converted by some poor women, and began to study the scriptures, in which he acquired a great knowledge. In the civil war he entered into the parliament army, and was present at the siege of Leicester. About 1655 he became a member of a baptist congregation at Bedford, in which he used to exhort. For this at the restoration he was taken up and confined in Bedford gaol twelve years and a half, supporting himself and family by tagging laces. There also he wrote his famous Pilgrim's Progress, a religious allegory, admirably wrought up, and which has gone through fifty editions, and been translated into different languages. On his release from prison, for which he was indebted to bishop Barlow of Lincoln, he became teacher of the baptist congregation at Bedford. He also travelled into different parts of England to visit the people of that persuasion, on which account he was called bishop Bunyan. He died in London of a fever in 1688. His works, which have been often printed collectively and in a separate form, make two volumes, folio.—Biog. Brit.

BUONMATTEI (Benedict), a learned Italian, was born at Florence in 1521. He was an ecclesiastic, and a member of several literary societies. He is chiefly known by his work on the Tuscan language, in which he gives clear rules for writing Italian. He died in 1647.—Tiraboschi.

BUONACCORSI (Philip), an elegant writer, was born in Tuscany in 1437. In conformity to a common custom of the learned in his age he assumed another name, which was that of Callimaco Esperiente. He resided at Rome till Pope Paul II. suspected him of being concerned in a conspiracy against his life, on which he fled, and after going through various countries settled in Poland, where he became tutor to prince Albert, son of king Casimir. He was also employed on several embassies, and possessed the office of prime minister. He died in 1496 at Cracow. He wrote the Life of King Ladislaus, predecessor of Casimir; a Life of Artilla, and other works, which have gone through several editions.—Tiraboschi.

BUONACORSI, or PERRIN DEL VASA, an Italian painter, who is said to have been suckled by a she goat. He had a natural turn for painting, which was encouraged by Julio Romano. He excelled in painting friezes and ornamental pieces, and died in 1547.—D'Argenville.

BUONAFEDE (Appiano), better known under his assumed names Appio amico de Fabia and Agapito Cromaniano, was born at Comachio, in the papal territory. He was an abbot of the Celestines, and a writer of considerable note. The best of his poetical works is the Ritratti poetici degli Nomini illustri (the poetical iconology of great men), of which there are several editions; and the best of his prose works is, The History and the Spirit of every Sort of Philosophy, 6 vols. 4to. He died at Rome in 1792.

BUONAMICI (Bastuccio), an Italian writer, born at Lucca in 1710. He embraced the ecclesiastical state, but being disappointed of preferment he became a soldier in the service of the king of Naples. He afterwards turned his attention to the belles lettres, and wrote a history of the war of Velletri in 1745, for which he had a pension and the rank of commissary-general. But his most considerable work is entitled De Bello Italico Commentarii, 4to. 1751, 8 vols. The duke of Parma was so pleased with it that he conferred on the author the title of count. He also wrote a treatise on military science. He died in 1761.—New. Dict. Hist.

BUONAMICI (Lazzaro), a celebrated Italian professor, was born at Bassano in 1479. He was educated at Padua, after which he became tutor in the Campeggi family, and then went to Rome, where he was professor of belles lettres in the college of Sapienza. When that city was sacked in 1527 he lost all his property, and narrowly escaped with his life. In 1530 he was invited to the rhetorical professorship at Padua, which he discharged with great applause. He died in 1552. Some of his letters and poems are extant. The latter were printed at Venice in 1572.—Tiraboschi.

BUONARROTTI, or BUONAROTA (Michael Angelo), a man of various and wonderful talents, whose genius in the fine arts places him on a line with Homer, Milton, and Shakspeare, was descended of a noble but reduced family in Tuscany, and born in 1474. He early shewed an inclination to painting, which his friends discountenanced as degrading the dignity of their house. However he studied with ardour, and copied some of the designs of Ghirlandajo with great exactness. He next turned his attention to sculpture, and at the age of 16 executed the head of a fawn, which still exists, and may vie with the best pieces of antiquity. This introduced him to that munificent patron of the arts Lorenzo de Medici, who took him to reside in his palace, and admitted him to his friendship. Here he executed a fine bas-relief on the subject of the battle of the centaurs. On the death of his patron he returned to his father, but resided some time in the convent of Santo Spirito, where he studied anatomy. Being invited to Rome he there distinguished himself by some beautiful works of sculpture. Julius II. employed him to make his monument, and a bronze statue in the act of distributing alms. On the death of that pontiff the latter was thrown down by the populace, and converted by the duke of Ferrara into a cannon called the Julian. The same pope set him to paint the dome of a chapel, by which he gained new reputation. Pope Leo X. employed him in architectural works, in which he shewed the same elegance of taste as in his other pursuits. He was afterwards engaged in fortifying Florence, and when the place was taken he repaired to Venice, where he gave a design for the Rialto. On the death of the architect employed in building St. Peter's at Rome, the important charge of conducting that magnificent work was entrusted to Michael Angelo, who devoted seventeen years to it without salary. He restored the capitol to its ancient glory, and adorned it with a rich front; he built several palaces and other public structures at Rome, and died crowned with glory in 1564, aged 90. His body was buried in the church of the apostles at Rome, but the grand duke of Tuscany contrived to get it removed to Florence, where it was interred with princely honours. His most famous painting is of the last judgment, painted for Paul III. in which he indulged a satirical vein by introducing among the damned a cardinal who was his enemy. Michael Angelo was also a good poet, and some of his sonnets and canzonets were published by his great nephew at Florence in 1627.—D'Argenville. Depiles. Roscoe's Life of Lorenzo de Medici.

BUONFIGLIO (Joseph Constant), an Italian writer, who distinguished himself by two works: 1. The History of Sicily, printed at Venice, 1604, 2 vols. 4to. 2. The History of Messina, 1606, 4to.—Novæ. Diss. Hist.

BUONTALENTI (Bernard), a famous architect and painter. In his infancy his father's house on the banks of the Arno fell down and crushed to pieces all the inhabitants except this child, who saved himself in a vault. The grand duke of Florence took pity on the orphan and provided for his education. He became eminent as an architect, and fortified many places in Tuscany, besides building several superb edifices. He was also a good sculptor, and painted well in miniature; he likewise invented several hydraulic machines, and was skilled in mechanics in general. He died in 1608.—Ibid.

BUPALUS, a famous sculptor of antiquity, was a native of the isle of Chios, and flourished B.C. 540. He and his brother Athenis are said to have carved a statue exactly resembling Hipponax, a meagre poet; and the bard, by way of revenge, wrote so keen a satire against them, that out of vexation they hanged themselves.—Plin. Nat. Hist.

BURCHARD, bishop of Worms in the 11th century, was tutor to the emperor Conrad, who made him a bishop in 1008. He compiled a collection of canons, called decrees, printed at Cologne in 1548. He died in 1026.—Moreri.

BURCHIELLO, an Italian poet, born in 1380, and died at Rome in 1448. He was a barber at Florence, and his shop was the meeting place of all the wits of the city. His poems were printed at Florence in 1568, 8vo.—Tiraboschi.

BURE (Catherine), a learned Swedish woman, who died in 1679, aged 77. She wrote Latin with great purity, and her correspondence with Vandela Skytte, a learned countrywoman of hers, is in print.—Novæ. Diss. Hist.

BURR (William Francis de), an eminent bookseller of Paris, who died in 1782. His treatise of scarce and curious books, 7 vols. 8vo. 1766, and his Museum Typographicum, 1775, shew his industry and knowledge to great advantage.—Ibid.

BURETTE (Peter John), a French physician, was born at Paris in 1665. His father was a musician, and young Burette, at the age of eight, played before Lewis XIV. and in concerts. He became a teacher of music, and his spare hours he devoted to literature. At the age of eighteen he resolved to follow a learned profession, and entered the college of Harcourt, where, in 1690, he received a doctor's degree. He became very eminent as a physician, and read lectures on the materia medica in Latin. In 1703 he was appointed Latin professor of surgery. In 1710 he was nominated professor of medicine in the royal college. He studied the oriental languages, and also the principal of the modern. He wrote numerous dissertations in the academy of belles lettres, chiefly on the games of the ancients. That on the symphony of the ancients is deemed a master piece. He died in 1747. The catalogue of his library makes 9 vols. 12mo.—Ibid.

BURGER (Godfred Augustus), a German poet, was born at Wolmerfwende, in Helmerstadt, in 1748. Being designed for the ministry he was sent to Halle, where he studied divinity, but afterwards relinquished this line for the law, and in 1768 went to Gottingen for that purpose, where he paid more attention to poetry and Bacchus than to Justinian and Grotius. However he acquired a knowledge of the modern languages, and was particularly fond of Shakspeare. Here he began the Almanac of the Muses, which continued to be published with reputation from 1770 to 1776. In 1772 he became steward to baron Ulster; but still continued his intercourse with the muses. The best known of his works in England is his Leonora, which is a bold stretch of the imagination, but extremely disgusting. In 1774 he married, and in 1776 he began the German Museum, a magazine of merit, and shortly after translated Macbeth, which was performed at Hamburg. In 1780 he commenced farmer, and resigned his stewardship; but on the death of his wife he gave up his farm, and went to live at Gottingen; here he obtained a professorship and another wife, on whose death he married a poetess, from whom he was divorced not long after. Burger died of a consumption in 1794.—Annual Necrology.

BURGESS (Cornelius) a puritan divine, was a native of Somersetshire, and educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of D.D. He was chaplain to king Charles, but on the breaking out of the civil war, he joined the presbyterians, and had a large share of the plunder of the church, which at the restoration he was forced to give up much against his will. He died in 1665. Several of his sermons and tracts have been printed.—Calamy. Wood.

BURGH (Ulick du), marquis of Clanricarde, a nobleman of great integrity and loyalty, died in 1657. He wrote Memoirs relative to the Irish Rebellion, 8vo. 1722, and fol. 1757, with additions.—Granger.

BURGH (James), an ingenious writer. He was born at Madderty in the county of Perth, in 1714, and educated at St. Andrews, being intended for the ministry, which he declined on account of his health. Having lost his property by embarking in the linen trade, he removed to London, where he supported himself as corrector to the press for some time, after which he became assistant in a grammar school. In 1746 he published a pamphlet to rouse the nation against popery, called Britain's Remembrancer, which quickly ran through five editions. The year following he opened a school at Stoke Newington, and conducted it with reputation nineteen years. He then retired from business, and settled at Islington, where he died of the stone in 1775. He wrote, 1. The Dignity of Human Nature, or a brief Account of the certain and established Means for attaining the true End of our Existence, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. The Art of Speaking, 8vo. 3. Crito, or Essays on various Subjects, 2 vols. 12mo. in which are some notions respecting the nature and origin of evil, similar to those of the Manichees. 4. Political Disquisitions, 3 vols. 8vo. 5. An Answer to Mr. Lindsey's Apology for resigning the vicarage of Catterick, 8vo. For this he was honoured with the degree of LL.D. by the university of Oxford.—Biog. Br.

BURGOME (John), an English general and dramatic writer, was the natural son of lord Bingley. He entered early into the army, and in 1762 had the command of a body of troops sent to Portugal, for the defence of that kingdom against the Spaniards. He distinguished himself in the American war by his activity and the taking of Ticonderago; but after two severe engagements he was forced to surrender, with his whole army, to general Gates, Oct. 17, 1777, which event occasioned the alliance between America and France. On his return to England he appears to have devoted himself to pleasure and the muses. His Maid of the Oaks, an entertainment; Bon Ton; and the comedy of the Heiress, were once very popular, and if not of the superior class of dramatic compositions, are respectable on account of the elegance of the dialogue. He died in 1792.—Genl. Mag.

BURIDAN (John), a learned Frenchman of the 14th century, who was rector of the university of Paris, from whence he was expelled by the realists, and went to Germany, where he established the university of Vienna. He wrote a Comment on Aristotle's Physics; but his name has been rendered proverbial by the story of "Buridan's Ass," the occasion of which it is difficult to discover, though generally said to have arisen from his illustrating the doctrine of necessity, by the absurd comparison of an ass placed between two bundles of hay, one of which he was necessarily bound to choose.—Bayle.

BURIGNY (Levesque de), a French writer, who died at Paris in 1785, aged 94. His works are; 1. On the Authority of the Popes, 1780. 2. History of the Pagan Philosophy, 1724. 3. History of Sicily, 1746. 4. History of the Revolutions of Constantinople, 1750. 5. Lives of Grotius, Erasmus, Bossuet, and Cardinal du Perron.—New. Dict. Hist.

BURKE (Edmund), an illustrious writer and statesman, was born at Dublin, January 1, 1730. His father was a respectable attorney, and a protestant. The son received his education under Abraham Shackleton, a quaker, who kept a school at Ballymore, near Carlow, and it is recorded to the honour of Mr. Burke, that whenever he visited Ireland he always went and paid his respects to his old tutor. In 1746 he entered as a scholar at Trinity college, which he left after taking his bachelor's degree in 1749. The assertion that he was educated in part at St. Omer's is not true. Not long after leaving college, he became candidate for the professorship of logic at Glasgow, but did not succeed. In 1753 he entered of the Middle Temple, where he applied more to general literature than to the law, and supported himself by writing for the booksellers. Falling ill, in consequence of too close an application to his studies, he removed to the house of doctor Nugent, a physician, whose daughter he afterwards married. In 1756 he published a pamphlet, entitled, "A Vindication of Natural Society; or, a View of the Miseries and Evils arising to Mankind, from every Species of artificial Society, in a Letter to Lord . . .", by a late noble Writer." This piece was purposely drawn up in the manner of lord Bolingbroke, and for a time imposed upon the friends of that writer as his real production. His next performance was the Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful, published in 1757. This philosophical piece of criticism, written in a fine and elegant style, procured the author a great reputation, and the esteem of the first literary characters of the age: the principal of whom was doctor Johnson. In 1758 he suggested to Mr. Doddsley his bookseller, the plan of that useful work, the "Annual Register," the historical part of which he wrote for several years. In 1761 he went to Ireland as the companion of his friend Mr. Hamilton, secretary to the earl of Halifax, then lord lieutenant. That gentleman, who was generally known by the name of Single-tree Hamilton, from the circumstance of his making only one speech in parliament, but one of uncommon eloquence, procured him a pension of 300*l.* on the Irish establishment. On his return from Ireland he was made private secretary to the marquis of Rockingham, then first lord of the treasury, and brought by his interest into parliament for the borough of Wendover. He was also enabled by the marquis to purchase a delightful villa near Beaconsfield, which continued to be his principal residence the remainder of his life. The Rockingham party continued in power but a short time, and on going out of office Mr. Burke wrote a forcible pamphlet upon the subject, entitled "A Short Account of a Short Administration," after which he became an active member of the opposition, both in his public capacity as a senator and also as a writer. A pamphlet of his, entitled "Thoughts on the Causes of the present Discontents," excited considerable interest as a bold exposure of court intrigues and favourites, in controuling the operations of ministers. Through the long and unsuccessful struggle between Great Britain and the colonies, Mr. Burke bore a distinguished part as an opponent of the ministry. His speeches were vehement, and had so powerful an influence upon the minds of the people, that the citizens of Bristol in 1774 invited him to be one of their representatives, without his being at the least expence. But at the next election in 1780 he was rejected by them chiefly for having supported the Irish petition for a free trade, and the bill for relieving the Roman catholics. He was then returned for Malton in Yorkshire, a borough belonging to the marquis of Rockingham. At this time he gained great popularity by his introduction of a bill for reform in the national expenditure, on which he spent prodigious labour, but it was unsuccessful. When the marquis of Rockingham returned to power on the resignation of lord North in 1782, Mr. Burke obtained the post of paymaster general of the forces, and a seat in the privy council; but this was of short duration, for on the death of his patron, lord Shelburne became first lord of the treasury, and Mr. Burke, with several of his friends, resigned their places. In the coalition, which for a little while succeeded the Shelburne administration, Mr. Burke had his share both of emolument and abuse. The leading particulars of his political life, after this, were his exertions against Mr. Hastings, in which he manifested uncommon industry to fasten guilt upon that gentleman, with no small share of personal asperity; his vigorous opposition to Mr. Pitt's design of forming a limited regency on the king's illness in 1788; and above all, his ardour against the actors and defenders of the French revolution. On the latter subject he evinced peculiar sagacity at the very outset, and when many worthy men were rejoicing at the prospect of rising liberty and happiness to the world, Mr. Burke predicted, with remarkable precision, the desolation, bloodshed, anarchy, and misery which have ensued. He displayed his detection of the revolutionists in the house of commons, and separated himself in consequence from Mr. Fox and many other of his old associates. In 1790 he published his famous "Reflections on the Revolution in France," which attracted wonderful attention, and produced a surprising effect upon the public mind. Many publications appeared in answer to Mr. Burke's book; the most noted of which was Paine's pamphlet, entitled The Rights of Man; wherein the principles of republicanism were so artfully addressed to the feelings of ordinary persons, as to excite for a time no small alarm to the friends of government. Mr. Burke, after this, published a variety of pamphlets in support of his positions: as, "A Letter to a Member of the National Assembly;" "An Appeal from the New Whigs to the Old;" "Letter to a noble Lord on the Subject in Discussion with the Duke of Bedford;" "Thoughts on a Regicide Peace," &c. His zeal on this occasion as well as his extraordinary talents recommended him to the royal favour, and he obtained a considerable pension, which gave room for those who had been galled by his arguments, to reproach him, and some severe, if not illiberal, animadversions were made upon him in the senate, which drew from him that admirable defence, his "Letter to a noble Lord," in which he retaliates upon a celebrated duke in a strain of keen irony and dignified remonstrance. Mr. Burke withdrew from parliament in 1794, leaving his seat for Malton to his son, an accomplished young man, who died shortly after. This melancholy event hastened his death, which happened July 8, 1797. A little before his death he caused to be read to him Addison's paper in the Spectator, on the Immortality of the Soul. Mr. Burke was very amiable in private life; of correct deportment; faithful in his attachments; charitable to the poor; and religious without being superstitious. He had a fine taste for the arts, and was fond of gardening and architecture.—Gen. Biography.

BURKITT (William), a pious English divine, born at Hitcham in Suffolk, 1650, and educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of M. A. In 1692 he became vicar of Dedham in Essex, where he died in 1703. He wrote a Practical Exposition of the New Testament, which has gone through numerous editions, and is exceedingly useful.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BURLAMAQUI (John James), a learned civilian, was descended from an ancient and noble family, originally of Lucca, but settled at Geneva, where he was born in 1694, and became professor there, but afterwards went to reside with prince Frederick of Hesse-Cassel, who had been his pupil. After an absence of some years he returned to his native place, was appointed counsellor of state, and died in 1748. He is known by his Principles of Natural and Political Law, 3 vols. 12mo.—New. Dict. Hist.

BURLEY (Walter), an English priest, and commentator on Aristotle, of the 14th century. He also wrote De Vita et Moribus Philosophorum, Cologne, 1472: a rare book.—Bale. Pitt.

BURMANN (Francis), a learned divine, was born at Leyden in 1628, and educated at that university. He afterwards became professor of divinity at Utrecht, where he died in 1679. He wrote Commentaries on the Pentateuch, and the Historical Books of the Old Testament, in Dutch; An Abridgment of Theology, and Exercitationes Academicæ, 2 vols. 4to.—Moreri.

BURMANN (Peter), son of the above, was born at Utrecht in 1668. He attended the lectures of Grævius, and took his degree of doctor of laws at Leyden, at the age of 20. In 1696 he was nominated professor of eloquence and history at Utrecht, and afterwards of Greek and history. He published valuable editions of several of the classics, as Velleius Paterculus, Quintilian, Valerius Flaccus, Virgil, Ovid, Suetonius, Lucan, Phædrus, Petronius, and the minor Latin poets. He also wrote a book on the Roman taxes; but in his critical notes and prefaces he was very severe upon other learned men. He died in 1741.—Moreri.

BURMANN (John), of the same family as the preceding, was professor of medicine and botany at Amsterdam. He is known as the author of, 1. Rariorum Africanarum Plantarum Decades x. Amst. 1738, 4to.; 2. Thesaurum Ceylanicum, 1737, 4to.—Ibid.

BURN (Richard) an English divine, and a celebrated law writer, was born at Kirby Stephen in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. On taking orders he obtained the vicarage of Orton in his native county, and became a justice of the peace, which circumstance led him to form a digest of the common law necessary to be known by magistrates. This work was published at first in 2 vols. 8vo.; but its success has been such, that every new edition, of which there have been several, has received considerable additions, so that Burn's Justice is now a standard book. He also wrote the Ecclesiastical Law, a book of equal merit, for which he was made chancellor of Carlisle. Dr. Burn likewise wrote part of the history of his native county. He was the most active and intelligent magistrate in the north of England, and died at his vicarage, which he had greatly augmented, in 1785. His only son, John Burn, esq. was bred to the law, which he did not follow, though calculated to shine in it, as appears from the additions made by him to his father's Justice of the Peace. His morals did not correspond with his abilities. He died in 1802, aged 58.—Gen. Mag. Monthly Mag. June, 1803.

BURNET (Gilbert), an eminent divine, was born at Edinburgh in 1643, and educated at Aberdeen. In 1664 he went to Holland, where he studied the Hebrew language, and on his return was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun. In 1669 he was appointed divinity professor at Glasgow, and soon after was employed in writing the Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton; about the same time he married the daughter of the earl of Castilia. In 1672 he published a Vindication of the Church and State of Scotland, and received the offer of a bishopric, which he declined, as he had done once before. In 1674 he resigned his professorship and settled in London, where he became preacher at the Rolls and lecturer of St. Clement's. In 1679 appeared the first volume of his History of the Reformation, for which he received the thanks of parliament. This great work he afterwards completed in 3 vols. He also published a judicious abridgment of it. His conduct at the trial and execution of lord Russell was so displeasing to the court, that he was dismissed from his lectureship and from his situation at the Rolls by royal mandate. At the accession of king James he went abroad, and after travelling through France, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, settled in Holland, where he was in great favour with the prince of Orange. King James sent to the States to deliver him up; but Dr. Burnet having married a Dutch lady, was considered as a citizen of Holland, and the demand was refused. He accompanied the prince of Orange to England, and in 1689 was made bishop of Salisbury. His first pastoral letter gave offence to both houses, on account of the bishop's asserting the title of the king and queen to the crown on the right of conquest, and it was ordered to be burnt by the hangman. In 1698 he lost his lady, and soon after married Mrs. Berkeley. In 1699 appeared his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, a work of considerable value, and which has been several times printed. He died in 1715, and was interred in the church of St. James, Clerkenwell. Besides what we have already mentioned, the bishop published an excellent treatise on Pastoral Care, and several Sermons. The History of his own Times appeared in 1724, and is very entertaining, though far from being impartial. This bishop possessed many virtues, but he was without vain, officious, and credulous. He had three sons: William, the eldest, died governor of New England, in 1729; Gilbert was chaplain to the king, and defended Hoadley in the Bangorian controversy; Thomas became a judge of the common pleas, and died in 1753.—Biog. Brit.

BURNET (Elizabeth), the third wife of the bishop, and daughter of sir Richard Blake, knight, was born in London in 1661, and married at the age of 18 to Robert Berkeley, esq. with whom she visited Holland, and resided there till the revolution. In 1693 she became a widow with a considerable fortune, which she disposed of to the best purposes. She applied much to the study of divinity, and wrote a book entitled A Method of Devotion. After remaining a widow seven years she married the bishop of Salisbury; to whose family she behaved with the tenderness of a mother. A second edition of her book was published after her death, which happened in 1709.—Account of her Life prefixed to her book, 8vo. 1713.

BURNET (Thomas), a learned divine, was born at Croft, in Yorkshire, in 1635, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Christ's college, where he was chosen fellow, and took his degree of M.A. in 1658. On leaving the university he became travelling tutor to the earl of Wiltshire, son of the marquis of Winchester; and he discharged the same office to the earl of Ossory, son of the duke of Ormond. In 1680 appeared his Telluris sacra Theoria, a work which gained him high reputation on account of its elegance, though its philosophical principles were proved, by Dr. Keil and others, to be void of foundation. It was afterwards translated into English, and published in folio and octavo. It may justly be pronounced a beautiful philosophical rhapsody. In 1685 he was appointed master of the Charter-house; in which situation he resolutely opposed the attempt of James II. to place a papist on the foundation of that house. At the revolution he was made chaplain to the king, and clerk of the closet, but lost the place for some free opinions expressed in his Archæologia Philosophica. He died in 1715. After his death appeared two posthumous works of his, 1. De Fide et officiis Christianorum; 2. De Statu Mortuorum et Resurgendum. Both these have been published in English. In the latter he holds the millenary notion, and questions the eternity of future punishments.—Biog. Brit.

BURNS (Robert), a poet of extraordinary merit, was the son of a small farmer near the town of Ayr in Scotland, and born there Jan. 29, 1759. He received a common education, during the progress of which he was employed in rustic labour. By dint of persevering application, however, he added to his mental acquirements some knowledge of the French language, and the mathematics, besides cultivating an acquaintance with a few of the best English poets. But it is to be lamented that, at this period, as his understanding improved, his habits became contaminated; and a love of company led him into idleness and intemperance. Finding his conversation courted, and his superiority acknowledged, he associated with those whom he should have shunned. On the death of his father he went into partnership with his brother in a small farm, in which he was very unsuccessful. An illicit amour at the same time rendered his circumstances still more perplexing, and he was about to emigrate from his native country to the West Indies, when the publication of a volume of poems was suggested to him. This appeared in 1785, at Kilmarnock, and had wonderful success. These pieces were in the popular language of the country, and on subjects the most familiar to the common people. Dr. Blacklock was charmed with the genius exhibited in them, and invited the Ayrshire bard to Edinburgh. His reception there was beyond his expectation; and a new edition of his poems produced him 500*l*. He then commenced farmer, and obtained also a place in the excise, before which, however, he married the young woman with whom he had cohabited. The union of these professions only served to embarrass him, and at last he settled at Dumfries only as an exciseman. Here he sunk into a constant habit of drinking, and kept the worst company, but occasionally wrote some admirable pieces of poetry, besides letters to several correspondents, in a style of energy, and full of sentiment. He died in 1796, leaving a widow and four children. An edition of his poems and letters appeared in 1800, in 4 vols. 8vo. under the management of Dr. Currie of Liverpool, and which produced above 1000*l.* profit for the benefit of his family.—Life prefixed to his Works.

BURRHUS (Afranius), an eminent Roman, who commanded the praetorian cohorts under Claudius and Nero; to the latter of whom he was tutor in conjunction with Seneca. He endeavoured, but in vain, to check the vicious and cruel propensities of his pupil, and died regretted by all good men, A. D. 62. not without suspicion of poison.—Tacitus.

BURROUGH (Edward), a preacher among the quakers, was born in Westmoreland, in 1634. He was at first a member of the church of England, after which he became a presbyterian, and lastly a quaker. He was a zealous preacher, for which he was imprisoned. He had the courage to remonstrate with Cromwell; and he obtained from Charles II. an order for stopping the persecution raging against the quakers in New England. However, he was at last thrown into Newgate by an alderman of London, for preaching; and died there of the gaol distemper in 1663. He wrote a number of tracts, which have been collected into one volume, folio.—Gen. Biog.

BURROUGHS (Jeremiah), a puritan divine, was educated at Cambridge, which university he was obliged to quit on account of nonconformity. He afterwards lived in Holland, and became teacher of an English congregation at Rotterdam. About the beginning of the rebellion he returned to England, and was chosen preacher to two congregations at Stepney, and Cripplegate, London. He also occasionally displayed his talents before the parliament. He died in 1646. His most considerable piece is a work on Patience and Resignation, in a course of sermons, 4to.—Granger. Neale.

BURROW (James), an English lawyer, and master of the crown office. In 1772 he was appointed to act as president of the royal society till the anniversary election in 1773, and the society addressing the king at that time, his majesty conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He published 4 vols. of Reports; and one of Decisions in the court of king's bench. He also wrote an Essay on Punctuation, and some Anecdotes of Oliver Cromwell and his family. He died in 1782.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BURTON (Henry), a puritan divine, was born in 1579 at Birsfal in Yorkshire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; but took his degree of B. D. at Oxford. He was afterwards clerk of the closet to prince Henry, and to prince Charles; but was turned out for a libel against some of the bishops. After this he obtained the rectory of St. Mathew, Friday-street; but soon got into trouble, owing to his seditious sermons, sentenced in the star chamber to pay a fine of 5000*l.* to be pilloried, and then imprisoned for life in Lancaster gaol.

The place of his confinement was afterwards altered to the castle of Guernsey; where he remained till 1640, when the parliament recalled him. He was also restored to his living; and died in 1648. He wrote many pamphlets, chiefly controversial, and very abusive.—Biog. Br.

BURTON (William), an English antiquary, was born in Leicestershire, in 1575, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar. In 1622 he published the Description of Leicestershire, folio, and died in 1645. He left several curious MSS. behind him on antiquarian subjects. His son Cassibilan Burton was a learned man, and translated Martial into English verse. He died in 1681.—Wood. Biog. Brit.

BURTON (Robert), an English divine, and brother of the above, was born in 1576, and educated at the same college; but afterwards became student of Christ-church. In 1616 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Thomas's, Oxford, and afterwards to the rectory of Seagrave in Leicestershire. He died in 1639. His Anatomy of Melancholy is a treasure of wit and learning. It has been plundered by more than one modern author of reputation; but the greatest plagiarist is the whimsical Sterne.—Wood's A. O. Granger.

BURTON (Hezekiah), an English divine, fellow of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and prebendary of Norwich. He died in 1681, and his Sermons were published by Dr. Tilloston. He also wrote the Preface to bishop Cumberland's Laws of Nature.—Preface to his Sermons.

BURTON (William), a learned Englishman of the 17th century, was born in London, and educated at Oxford; on leaving which he became usher to the famous Thomas Farnaby, and afterwards master of the grammar school at Kingston in Surry. He died in 1657. He wrote some learned works, the principal of which is, A Commentary on Antoninus's Itinerary, or Journeys of the Roman Empire, as far as it concerneth Britain, folio, 1658.—Wood's A. O.

BURTON (William), an English physician and antiquary, was born at Rippon in Yorkshire, in 1697, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he was chosen student, and took his degree of M.D. He wrote the History of Yorkshire, 2 vols. folio, and died in 1759.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BURTON (John), a learned English divine, was born at Wemworthy in Devonshire, and educated at Oakhampton in that county, afterwards at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and read a Greek lecture. He also discharged the office of college tutor with great reputation. In 1733 he was elected fellow of Eton college, and about the same time obtained the vicarage of Maple Draham in Oxfordshire, where he married the widow of his predecessor, though she was wholly unprovided for, and had three daughters, whom he regarded as his own. In 175 he was presented to the rectory of Worplesdon in Surry, being then D.D. At the close of life he collected his scattered pieces under the title of Opuscula Miscellanea. He died in 1771, and was buried in the chapel of Eton college.—Biog. Brit.

BUR (Arthur), an English divine, was born in Devonshire, and entered of Exeter college, Oxford, in 1638. In 1649 he was ejected by the parliamentary visitors, on which he retired to his native county. After the restoration he was made prebendary of Exeter, and in 1665 rector of Essex college, and king's chaplain. But he was afterwards ejected from his rectorship for writing a book, entitled, The naked Gospel, in which he avowed the tenets of Socinus. This work, by a sentence of the convocation of the university, was publicly burnt. Dr. Bury endeavoured to vindicate his book in several pamphlets. He died about the beginning of the 18th century at or near Exeter.—Wood BURY (Elizabeth), a pious and an accomplished woman, was the daughter of captain Lawrence, of Linton, Cambridge-shire, and born there in 1644. Her first husband was a Mr. Lloyd, of Huntingdon-shire; after whom she married Mr. Samuel Bury, a dissenting minister of Bristol, where she died in 1720. She had a very extensive knowledge in the mathematical sciences, in the languages, particularly Hebrew, and in theology. Her Life and Diary were published by her husband, from whence this article is taken. Dr. Watts honoured her memory with an elegy.

BURZUË, a Persian physician who lived under Chosroes, by whom he was sent to India to procure a copy of the book called the Wisdom of all Ages; which he afterwards translated into Persian.—D'Herbelot.

BUS (Cæsar de), a French divine, and promoter of a religious order called the Fathers of the christian doctrine, was born at Cavaillon in 1544. He was very gay in his youth, but afterwards reformed, entered into orders, and became a canon. His order, which went to a reform among the clergy, was approved by the pope, and the author created general of it. He died in 1607. His Familiar Instructions on the Christian Doctrine were much read.—Moreri.

BUSBEC, in latin Busbequius (Augur Giffen), a learned writer, was born at Comines in 1522. He was the natural son of the lord of Busbec, and after receiving a liberal education was employed in several embassies, particularly to Constantinople. He was a liberal patron of men of letters, and died in 1593. He made large collections of inscriptions in the Levant, which he communicated to Scaliger, Lippius, and Gruter. The account of his Travels is an excellent work; it was printed by Elzevir, in Latin, at Leyden in 1638, and has been translated into French.—Moreri.

BUSBY (Richard), a learned English school-master, was born at Lutton in Lincolnshire in 1606, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he removed to Christ-church, Oxford, where he was elected student. On entering into orders he was preferred to a prebend in the cathedral of Wells, and to the rectory of Cudworth in Somersetshire. In 1640 he was appointed master of Westminster school, which office he discharged 55 years. In 1660 he was made prebendary of Westminster, and the same year took his degree of D.D. He died in 1695, and was interred in Westminster abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory. He wrote some grammatical works.—Biog. Brit.

BUSCHÉ (Herman Von dem), or Buschius, a learned German, was born in Westphalia in 1468. He was one of the principal restorers of letters in his time, for which he was greatly persecuted by the monks. He embraced the doctrines of Luther, and assisted that reformer in some of his works. He died in 1534. He wrote Latin poems; and scholia on antient authors.—Gen. Biog.

BUSCHETTO (da Dulichio), a Greek architect in the 11th century, was born in the isle of Dulichio. He built the cathedral at Pisa, where he died, and had a monument erected to his memory.—Félib. en Vies des Architectes.

BUSCHING (Anthony Frederic), an eminent geographer, born at Stadthagen in Prussia in 1724. After finishing his studies at the university of Halle, he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became pastor of the Lutheran church at Petersburg. He afterwards returned to Berlin, and was named by Frederic II. director of the college. He died there in 1793. He wrote a great number of works, the principal of which is his Geography, which went through eight editions.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BUSHELL (Thomas), was born in Worcestershire, and received part of his education at Baliol college, Oxford, after which he was taken into the service of chancellor Bacon: on the fall of that great man he settled upon an estate which he had in Oxfordshire, where he entertained Charles I. and his queen, and by that monarch was appointed master of the royal mines in Wales, where also he set up a mint, and coined a quantity of silver, which he sent to the king at Oxford. At the restoration he procured an act of parliament for working the lead mines at Mendip in Somersetshire. He died in 1674, aged 80, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster abbey. He published, 1. Several Speeches and Songs at the Presentment of the Rock at Euston to the Queen's most excellent Majesty in 1636, 4to. 2. A just and true Remonstrance of his Majesty's Mines Royal in the Principality of Wales, 4to. 1642. 3. Extract of the Lord Chan- cellor Bacon's Philosophical Theory of mineral Prosecutions, 1660, 4to.—Wood.

BUSLEIDEN (Jerom), a patron of literature and a statesman, was employed by the emperor Charles V. in several embassies. He was the intimate friend of Erasmus and sir Thomas More; and founded in the university of Louvain the college of the three tongues, for teaching of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He died in 1517. A letter of his is prefixed to More's Utopia.—Bayle.

BUSSIERE (John de), a learned jesuit, was born in 1607, and died in 1678. His Latin poems are elegant, particularly Scanderbeg, an heroic poem in eight books. He also wrote a History of France, 2 vols. 4to.; and an Abridgment of Universal History.—Mor.

BUSSY (Roger Rabutin, count of), a French writer, was born in 1618. His Amours des Gaules gave such offence to the court, that he was thrown into the Bastille. He wrote several other works, which shew great knowledge and ingenuity. He died in 1693.—Moreri.

BUTLER (William), an English physician, was born at Ipswich, and educated at Clare hall, Cambridge. His reputation was very high as a practitioner, but he was a strange humourist. Mr. Aubrey says it was usual with him to sit among the boys at St. Mary's church in Cambridge, and that when he was sent for to king James at Newmarket, he suddenly turned back to go home, and that the messenger was obliged to drive him before him. He died at Cambridge in 1618, aged 82; and was buried in St. Mary's church.—Granger.

BUTLER (Charles), an English divine, born in Buckinghamshire, and bred at Oxford, after which he became master of the free-school at Basingstoke, and vicar of Lawrence Wotton. He died in 1647. He wrote the Feminine Monarchy, or the History of Bees; and a Treatise on Music.—Wood's A. O.

BUTLER (Samuel), an English poet, was the son of a farmer at Strensham in Worcester-shire, where he was born in 1600, or according to others in 1612. He received his first education at Worcester school, from whence he removed to Cambridge, where he resided six or seven years, after which he became clerk to a justice of peace in his native county. He next went to live in the family of the countess of Kent, where he was employed as amanuensis by the learned Selden. After this he resided with sir Samuel Luke in Bedfordshire, a gentleman very zealous in behalf of the covenant and puritanic principles. Here Butler became acquainted with the characters and sentiments of the leading men of that party, and formed the plan of his popular poem Hudibras, the principal person of which was, unquestionably, sir Samuel Luke. The idea of this exquisite piece, which gives so faithful a picture of the cant and hypocrisy of his times, was taken generally from Dou-

Quixote; but the humour and the poetry are wholly Butler's, and in these he stands unrivalled. Some have objected to the jingling double rhimes in it, but these appear rather to add to the drollery of the exhibition, and to excite that ridicule which the author intended at the expence of the gloomy fanatics of his day. The learning and extensive reading of Butler are shewn to great advantage in this performance, a most elaborate and curious edition of which was published by Dr. Zachary Grey, in 2 vols. 8vo. After the restoration Butler became secretary to the earl of Carberry, who appointed him steward of the court held at Ludlow castle. About this time also he married Mrs. Herbert, a lady of family and fortune. Much has been said about Butler's poverty, but either this is not well founded, or he must have been extravagant, for his employments and his marriage ought to have placed him above indigence. He died in London in 1680, and was buried in the church of St. Paul's, Covent garden. In 1721 alderman Barber, the printer, erected a monument to his memory in Westminster abbey. After his death were published his posthumous works, and in 1759 Mr. Thyer of Manchester published his genuine remains, in 2 vols. 8vo.—Biog. Brit.

BUTLER (James), duke of Ormond, was the son of Thomas Butler, of London, esq. and born there in 1610. He succeeded to the earldom of Ormond on the death of his grandfather in 1632. He distinguished himself with such gallantry against the Irish rebels, that he was created marquis of Ormond by Charles I. When Cromwell landed in Ireland, the marquis retired to France. He was greatly instrumental in bringing about the restoration; for which he was made a privy-counsellor, and created a duke. In 1662 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and by his activity prevented Blood's plot of seizing his person and the castle of Dublin; for which, that daring conspirator, some years after, forced his grace out of his coach in London with an intent to hang him at Tyburn; from which the duke was rescued by his servants. He died in 1688, and was buried in Westminster abbey.—Biog. Brit.

BUTLER (Thomas), earl of Ossory, was the son of the above, and born at Kilkenny in 1643. Cromwell sent him to the Tower; from whence he was released after eight months confinement, and then went to Flanders. At the restoration he was appointed lieutenant-general of the army in Ireland, and in 1666 created an English peer, by the title of lord Butler. He was a volunteer under lord Albemarle in the great fight with the Dutch; for which, in 1673, he was made sole admiral of the fleet, in the absence of prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the English forces at the battle of Mons. He died in 1680.—Ibid.

BUTLER (Joseph), a learned English prelate, was born at Wantage in Berkshire in 1692. His father, who was a dissenter, intended him for the ministry amongst those of the same persuasion; and placed him under the learned Jeremiah Jones, who kept an academy at Tewksbury in Gloucestershire. While there he wrote a letter to Dr. Clarke containing remarks on some of his arguments in his Treatise on the Being and Attributes of God, with which that great man was so pleased that he inserted them in his next edition. During his residence at Tewksbury he studied the subject of nonconformity, the result of which was, a determination to enter into the communion of the established church. Accordingly in 1714 he went to Oxford, and became a commoner of Ortel college, where he formed an intimacy with Mr. Talbot, son of the bishop of Durham; by whose interest he was appointed preacher at the Keils, and successively rector of Houghton and Stanhope in the county of Durham. In 1736 he was made clerk of the closet to queen Caroline, who delighted much in his conversation. Two years afterwards he was preferred to the bishopric of Bristol, and in a short time made dean of St. Paul's, on which he resigned the rectory of Stanhope. In 1746 he was appointed clerk of the closet to the king, and in 1750 translated to the see of Durham. He died at Bath in 1752, and his remains were interred in the cathedral of Bristol. He published a volume of excellent Sermons; and a valuable work, entitled, The Analogy of Religion, natural and revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature, 1736, 8vo. He also printed a charge on External Religion, which was the subject of much animadversion, and brought upon him the absurd imputation of being inclined to popery. Archbishop Secker published a refutation of this slander.—Biog. Br.

BUTLER (Alban), a divine of the Roman church, was born at London, and educated at Douay. He became director of the English college at St. Omer's, and died in 1782. He wrote Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and Saints, in English, with critical and learned notes.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BUTTS (William), an eminent English physician, was bred at Gonville hall, Cambridge, where he proceeded to his degrees in physic, and afterwards became physician and favourite to Henry VIII. who knighted him. He was one of the founders of the royal college of physicians at London, and is mentioned in their records with great honour. He favoured the reformation, and lived on terms of intimacy with archbishop Cranmer. Shakspere introduces him into his play of Henry VIII. as the friend of that great prelate. He died in 1545, and was buried at Fulham.—Wood's A. O.

BUXTON (Jedediah), an instance of extraordinary mental powers, was born at Elmeton, a village in Derbyshire, about 1704; but though his father was a schoolmaster, Jedediah could neither read nor write. Notwithstanding this he attained a power of calculation almost incredible. Even mixed company, conversation, and confused noises could not distract his mind when intent on a problem. A person once proposed to him this question: In a body the three sides of which are 23,145,789 yards, 5,642,732 yards, and 54,965 yards, how many cubic eighths of an inch? In about five hours Jedediah accurately solved this intricate problem, though in the midst of business, and surrounded by more than a hundred labourers. He would measure a piece of land by walking over it, as exactly as another could do with a chain. In 1754 he walked to London to see the royal family, but returned disappointed. Whilst in town he was introduced to the royal society; he was also taken to Drury lane, when, instead of minding the play, or gazing with wonder, he employed himself in counting the words uttered by Mr. Garrick. He lived to be above 70, and had several children.—Gent. Mag.

BUXTORF (John), a learned Hebrew, was born in 1654 at Camen in Westphalia. He became professor of Chaldee and Hebrew at Basil, where he died in 1629. His works, which are of great value to students, are his Lexicon Chaldaicum, Thalmudicum, and Rabbinicum, folio; a small Hebrew and Chaldaic Lexicon, 12mo; Thesaurus Linguae Hebraicae, 2 vols. 8vo; a Hebrew Bible in great esteem; another with a rabbinical commentary, 4 vols. folio; Synagoge Judaica, a curious book in the religious ceremonies of the Jews; Institutio Epistolariae Hebraicae, &c.—Moreri.

BUXTORF (John), son of the above, was born at Basil in 1599. He pursued the same course of studies as his father, and succeeded him in the professorship. He defended the antiquity of the Hebrew vowel points with great zeal against Lewis Cappel, in a book, entitled, Tractatus de punctorum vocalium & accentuum in libris veteris Testamenti Hebraicis origine antiquitate & auctoritate, 1648. He was also the compiler of a Chaldaic and Syriac Lexicon, and other works. He died in 1664. There were two others of the same family, John-James and John Buxtorf, successively professors at Basil, and writers in the same line; but they are all charged with being too partial to the rabbins.—Moreri.

BUY DE MORNAS (Claude), a French geographer, was a native of Lyons, and died at Paris, where he was tutor to the royal princes in his line, in 1783. He is principally known by an Atlas, methodical and elementary, of Geography and History, 4 vols. 4to. He also wrote the Elements of Cosmography, 8vo.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

BUZANVAL (Nicholas Choart de), an excellent French prelate, was born at Paris in 1611. He was brought up to the law, and attained some distinguished offices, which he renounced for the church, and became bishop of Beauvais in 1652. His conduct was exemplary and edifying; he resided constantly in his diocese, and performed extensive acts of charity. He died in 1679.—Moreri.

BYFIELD (Nicholas), a puritan divine, born in Warwickshire, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. On entering into orders he settled first at Chester, and next at Isleworth in Middlesex, where he died in 1622. He was a rigid calvinist and sabbatarian, and published several ponderous books in divinity. His son Adoniram distinguished himself in the rebellion, and was scribe to the assembly of divines at Westminster.—Wood.

BYNG (George), viscount Torrington, and a brave English admiral, was born in Kent in 1663. He entered young into the navy, and after passing through different ranks of the profession, became rear-admiral in 1703, in which capacity he served under sir Cloudesley Shovel in the Mediterranean. In 1706 he was sent to the relief of Barcelona, then besieged by the duke of Anjou, which service he performed with great reputation. On his return he was made admiral of the blue, and in 1708 sent to oppose the invasion designed against Scotland in favour of the pretender, and by his activity obliged the enemy to return to France without effecting their object, for which he received the freedom of Edinburgh in a gold box. The same year he had the honour of conveying the queen of Portugal to Lisbon, and her majesty presented him with her picture set in diamonds. On his return to England he was made one of the lords commissioners of the admiralty. In 1715 George I. created him a baronet; and in 1717, an invasion being intended from Sweden in favour of the pretender, he was sent into the Baltic, where he remained till that project was abandoned. In 1718 he was appointed commander in chief in the Mediterranean, where he attacked the Spanish fleet, which he entirely defeated off Sicily. On this great victory he had the honour to receive letters of thanks from George I. the emperor Charles, and the queen of Denmark. It was owing to his exertions that Sicily was saved from the Spaniards, and he displayed as much skill as a politician and negotiator as he did valour and prudence as a commander. In 1721 he was created viscount Torrington, and knight of the bath. He was afterwards appointed first lord of the admiralty, in which station he died in 1783.—Biog. Br.

BYNG (John), an English admiral, and son of the above. He served under his father in most of his expeditions, and was always esteemed a good seaman and a brave man. He was sent in 1756 to relieve Minorca, then besieged by the French under Gallissiere. After a partial action he was forced to bear away, and the place was taken. The public clamour was against the admiral, and the ministry caused him to be tried by a court martial; he was sentenced to be shot, though the court recommended him to mercy, which, however, was not granted, and he suffered with great fortitude at Portsmouth, March 14, 1757.—Smollet's Hist. of England.

BYNKERSHOEK (Cornelius Van), a learned Dutchman, was born at Middleburg in 1663, and after studying theology at Franeker applied to the law. He became president of the council in Holland, and professor of law at Leyden. He died in 1743. He wrote, Observations on the Roman Laws; a valuable treatise on the Rights of Ambassadors, and other works.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

BYNÆUS (Antony), a protestant divine, born at Utrecht in 1654, and died at Deventer in 1698. He was the pupil of Grævius, and well versed in the languages, history, and antiquities. He wrote, De Calceis Hebræorum; Christus Crucifixus; Explicatio Historiæ evangelicæ de Nativitate Christi.—Moreri.

BYRGE (Jussus), a French mathematical instrument maker at the end of the 16th century, who is said, but without proof, to have discovered logarithms, and the compass of proportion.—Ibid.

BYROM (John), an English poet, was born at Kersal, near Manchester, in 1691, and educated first at Merchant Taylors' school, and next at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he was chosen fellow. He wrote the beautiful pastoral to Phœbe in the Spectator, and the letters in the same work signed John Shadow. He supported himself chiefly by teaching short-hand, on which he wrote an improved system. In 1724 he was elected fellow of the royal society, and soon after came to the possession of his paternal estate. He died at Manchester in 1763. Mr. Byrom was an ingenious man, but strongly tinctured with mysticism.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

BYTHNER (Victorinus), a learned Hebræan, was born in Poland, but came young to England, and was matriculated at Oxford, where he read a Hebrew lecture several years. He afterwards removed to Cambridge and lastly into Cornwall where he practised physic. He died in 1664. His principal work is entitled Lyra prophetica Davidis Regis. Sive analysis Critico-practica Psalmorum. 4to.—Wood.

BZOVIVS (Abraham), a learned writer, was born in Poland in 1567, and educated at Cracow, from whence he travelled to Italy, and on his return to his own country became professor of philosophy and theology. Afterwards he went to Rome, where the pope gave him apartments in the Vatican. He died in 1637. He wrote Annals of the Church, 12 vols. and Lives of the Popes, 3 vols.—Moreri.

C.

CAAB, or CAB BEN ZOHARA, a Jewish rabbin, who wrote some satires against Mohammed, but afterwards became the friend of the impostor, and assisted him in compiling the koran. He died A.D. 622.—D'Herbelot.

CABADES, CAVADES, or COBAD, king of Persia, succeeded his brother Balasch about the year 486. On account of his tyranny and his vicious crimes his subjects deposed him, but he afterwards recovered his throne by the assistance of the Euthalites. He made war upon the Romans with great success, and left his crown to his son Choroës in 531.—Univ. Hist.

CABASILAS (Nilus), archbishop of Thessalonica in the 14th century. He wrote with great force against the papal claims to supremacy and infallibility, which work has been several times printed. His nephew Nicholas succeeded him in the archbishopric. He was also a learned man, and wrote an Exposition of the Liturgy, and other works.—Moreri.

CABASSOLE (Philip du), a French bishop, and chancellor to the queen of Sicily, whom he assisted greatly in the government of her kingdom. Urban V. made him a cardinal, and he was also nominated patriarch of Constantinople. He died in 1372. Two books are ascribed to him; a treatise De Nugis Curialium, and the Life and Miracles of St. Mary Magdalen. He was the friend and correspondent of Petrarch.—Dupin. Tiraboschi.

CABASSUT (John), a French divine, born at Aix in 1604. He became professor of canon law at Avignon, and died in 1685. He wrote, Juris Canonici theoria et praxis, 1638, folio. Notitia ecclesiastica consiliorum, canonum, veterumque ecclesia rituum, 1670, folio.—Moreri.

CABEL (Adrian van der), an eminent painter, born at Ryfwick in 1631, and died in 1695. His landscapes and cattle are very fine.—Houbraken.

CABESTAN, or CABESTAING (William de), a Provençal poet of the 13th century, whose fate was remarkable. He served Tricline Carbonal, wife of Raymund de Scillans, and became so great a favourite of the lady as to excite the jealousy of her husband, who killed him, and tore out his heart. This he caused to be dressed and served up to his wife. After she had eaten it, the barbarian informed her what it was, on which she died of grief about 1213.—Moreri.

CABOT (Sebastian), a celebrated navigator, was born at Bristol in 1477, and before he was 20 had made several voyages with his father, who was an excellent mariner and mathematician. They discovered part of Newfoundland in one of their voyages for a northwest passage; but Sebastian, after the death of his father, completed that discovery; and of the continent of America, long before either Columbus or Vesputius. In the early part of Henry the eighth's reign he sailed again with a design of proceeding to the East Indies, but owing to some disappointment he went no farther than the Brasils, from whence he shaped his course for Hispaniola and Porto Rico, and then returned. Soon afterwards we find him in the Spanish service, but after one voyage to America he returned to England, and settled in his native city. Edward VI. delighted in his conversation, and allowed him a pension. A new company, called merchant adventurers, was created, and Sebastian placed at the head of it. By his means a voyage was made to the north in 1552, and a trade commenced with Russia, which gave rise to the Russia company. He died about 1557, aged 80. In Hackluyt's Collection are his instructions for the direction of an intended voyage to Cathay. He was the first who noticed the variation of the compass, and wrote Navigazione nelle Parte Settentrionale, Venice, 1683, folio.—Campbell's Lives of the Admirals.

CABOT (Vincent), a learned civilian of Toulouse in the 16th century. He published four volumes, entitled Les Politiques de Vincent Cabot, dedicated to cardinal Richelieu. It was completed by his executor Campistron the poet.—Moreri.

CABRAL, or CARRERA (Pedro Alvares), a Portuguese navigator, who commanded the fleet sent out for the East Indies by Emanuel king of Portugal in 1500. In this voyage he was driven by a storm on that part of the coast of South America now called Brasil, where he landed, and called the spot Santa Cruz. From thence he crossed over to the coast of Africa, and afterwards proceeded to Calicut, where he engaged in a war with the zamorin, whom he forced to comply with his terms. In 1501 he returned to Portugal richly laden. An account of this voyage was printed in a collection at Venice by Ramusio.—Moreri.

CADALOUS, bishop of Parma, who was elected pope in 1061 by the imperial faction, and took the name of Honorius II. He was deposed by the council of Mantua in 1064, and died not long after.—Plutina.

CADEMOSTO (Lewis), a Venetian navigator, was born about 1422, and engaged in the service of the king of Portugal. In 1455 he sailed to the Canary islands, and then to the coast of Africa. The year following he carried his discoveries as far as the river St. Dominic. He died at Venice in 1464, leaving an account of his voyages, which was afterwards published.—Nov. Dis. Hist.

CADMUS, the founder of Thebes, is one of those characters of antiquity whose real history is blended with too much fable to be relied on. It seems certain that he was either a native of Egypt or Phœnicia; and that he was the first who introduced letters into Greece. The alphabet consisted at first of only sixteen letters. He flourished according to the Arundelian marbles B. C. 1519.—Moreri.

CADMUS, the Milesian, was the first Grecian who wrote history in prose. He composed the Antiquities of Ionia, which is lost. Another Cadmus wrote the History of Athens mentioned by Suidas.—Vossius de Hist. Græc.

CADUG, son of Brychan, a saint, and founder of some churches in Wales in the 5th century. He died in France.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

CADOG, commonly called the Wife, a bard who flourished in the sixth century. He was the first who collected the British proverbs together. There are some churches dedicated to him in South Wales.—Ibid.

CADOGAN (William Bromley), a pious English divine, was the second son of lord Cadogan by the honourable Frances Bromley, only daughter of lord Montfort. He was born in 1751, and educated at Westminster school, where he obtained several prizes, and removed from thence to Christ-church college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. On entering into orders he obtained the livings of St. Giles, Reading, and St. Luke, Chelsea, and might have had considerable preferment if he had sought it. But having embraced the calvinistic doctrines, he preached them with so much ardour as to draw upon himself the appellation of a methodist, which served to hinder his farther advancement in the church. However, he was a firm friend to the ecclesiastical constitution, and approved himself an excellent and unwearied parish priest. He died January 18, 1797. A volume of his Sermons was published in 1798, with an account of his life prefixed, from which this is extracted.

CADWALADYR, son of Cadwallon ab Cadvan, succeeded to the nominal sovereignty of Britain in 660; disheartened with the progress of the Saxons he went to Rome in 686, and died in 703. With him ceased the title of king of the Britons. He was called one of the three blessed kings on account of the relief which he gave to distressed christians.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

CADWALADYR CESAIL, a Welsh poet of some merit in the 16th century, many of whose pieces yet remain in manuscript.—There was another of the same name and age, whose works are to be met with, but unpublished.—Ibid.

CADWALLON, son of Cadvan, was prince of North Wales during the reign of his father. Being defeated by Edwin king of Northumberland he went to Ireland in 620, and remained there several years. On his return he assumed the title of king of the Britons, which he ably supported through a series of continual warfare against the Saxons. He was a great patron of the bards, and in his youth had been admitted among them.—Ibid.

CADWGAN, son of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, became prince of a part of Powys in 1073, and for some time had part of South Wales. In 1107 he gave a great banquet at Aber-teivi, which almost ruined him, as his son Owain was captivated with the charms of Nest the wife of Gerald, whom he carried off, and in consequence both him and his father were obliged to flee to Ireland. He returned the year after; but was assassinated in 1110 by his nephew.—Ibid.

CÆCILIANUS, archdeacon of Carthage, was chosen bishop of that see in 311 by the neighbouring bishops, which giving offence to the bishops of Numidia, a council was held in which the ordination of Cæcilianus was declared invalid. In a subsequent council, however, at Rome he was absolved, and his principal Donatus declared a schismatic.—Dupin. Mosheim.

CÆCILIUS (Statius), a comic poet, who was cotemporary with Ennius. A fragment by him is in the Corpus Poetarum of Maittaire.—Vossius de Poet. Lat.

CÆLIUS AURELIANUS, an ancient physician, was an African by birth, but when he flourished is uncertain. His works were printed at Amsterdam in 1722, 4to.—Haller.

CÆSALPINUS (Andrew), a physician of the 16th century. He was born at Arezzo, and became first physician to pope Clement VIII. He died at Rome in 1603. He is supposed to have had some knowledge of the circulation of the blood. He was also a good botanist, and wrote a treatise De Plantis.—Moreri. Freind.

CÆSAR (Caius Julius), was descended from the Julian family, and lost his father when young. He married the daughter of Cornelius Cinna, and was designed for the office of high priest of Jupiter, but was deprived of it by the dictator Sylla, who was Cinna's inveterate enemy. He also carried his revenge so far as to confiscate the property of Cæsar and his wife, and even issued a proscription against him. By the mediation of several of the patricians, this decree was reversed; but Cæsar, not thinking Rome a safe place for him, went into Asia, where he resided with Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. He obtained a civic crown for his conduct at the taking of Mitylene. On the death of Sylla he was recalled to Rome, where he distinguished himself as an orator, by impeaching Dolabella for mal-administration in Greece. He studied rhetoric at Rhodes under Apollonius, and in his passage was taken by pirates, from whom he gained his liberty by paying a considerable ransom. He afterwards fitted out some ships, and having taken those plunderers caused them to be crucified. On his return to Rome he joined the party of Marius, and united with Cicero in promoting the Manilian law, which gained him the friendship of Pompey. The first dignity he obtained was that of military tribune, after which he served the offices of quæstor and ædile. In the latter station he gained great popularity by his liberal donations, which, however, greatly embarrassed his circumstances. He was suspected of being concerned in Cataline's conspiracy, owing perhaps to his recommending clemency to the culprits, in an oration which was severely answered by Cato. This conduct greatly lessened his reputation. On the death of his wife Cornelia he married Pompeia, from whom he afterwards procured a divorce for receiving Clodius into her house at the time of celebrating the rites of the bona Dea. He did not, however, prosecute Clodius, and when asked why he had dismissed Pompeia, his answer was, that "Cæsar's wife should not even be suspected." On the expiration of his pretorship he was appointed governor of the farther Spain: but finding it difficult to settle with his creditors, Crassus became his bondsman. On his way thither, passing through a miserable village on the Alps, his friends asked him whether he thought there were any contentions for places in such a place? "No," replied he, "but I would rather be the first man here than the second at Rome." During his governorship he realized property enough to pay his debts, which are said to have amounted to a million and a half sterling. He next gained the consulship in conjunction with Bibulus, B.C. 59. At this time he formed the first triumvirate with Pompey and Crassus, the former of whom married his daughter Julia, and he himself married Calpurnia, daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso. In the following year he went into Gaul, where he distinguished himself as a military commander, in reducing the Belgians, the Helvetians, and Nervians. In the fourth year of his government he crossed over to Britain, but did little more than reconnoitre the coast; on his next expedition he entered the Thames, and ravaged a great part of the country, taking several of the inhabitants as hostages. Having completely reduced Gaul to the condition of a Roman province, and acquired prodigious wealth, Pompey grew jealous of him, and the senate deprived him of his government. This being considered by him as a declaration of war, he crossed the Rubicon, a small river which parted Cisalpine Gaul from Italy, with a determination of revenging himself upon his enemies. His army was zealously attached to him, and success attended him every where on his march. Rome was filled with fear and confusion; and Pompey, with the magistrates, withdrew on his approach. Cæsar entered the metropolis without his troops in an affected style of moderation. However, he seized upon the public treasury, which enabled him to complete the subjugation of the people. The civil war now raged with fury throughout the empire; but Cæsar, by himself or his lieutenants, was every where triumphant, except in his blockade of Dyrrachium, where Pompey was encamped, who burst through the barrier after slaughtering a considerable part of Cæsar's forces. Cæsar then retired to Macedonia, whither he was followed by Pompey, who was defeated on the plains of Pharsalia. He next embarked for Alexandria, where the head of Pompey being brought to him, he burst into tears, and caused it to be solemnly interred. Here he entered into a war with Ptolemy, in which the famous Alexandrian library, containing 400,000 volumes, was accidentally burnt. This war was attended with various success, but at last Cæsar's good fortune prevailed: the Egyptians were completely defeated, and Ptolemy was drowned. On the news of the death of Pompey the Roman senate proclaimed Cæsar consul for five years, and created him dictator, thus placing the sole executive power in his hands. He next conquered Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates the great, in Asia Minor, on which occasion he wrote this laconic letter to a friend, "Veni, Vidi, Vici; I came, I saw, I conquered." After settling the affairs of Greece he proceeded to Rome, where he shewed his clemency, by pardoning all who had conspired against him in his absence. He next made an expedition into Africa, in the course of which he displayed great address and prudence in quelling a mutiny which broke out in his favourite legion. In this war he defeated Scipio, Labienus, and Juba; and drove Cato to the necessity of putting himself to death at Utica. At his return to Rome he behaved with great liberality to the people, and enacted several good laws. Among other reforms which he introduced, was that of the calendar, which still remains in use under the name of the Julian calendar. The two sons of Pompey having excited a revolt in Spain, Cæsar marched thither, and after a bloody battle, which was for a long time doubtful, he succeeded in completing the subjugation of that country. His return to Rome was crowned with a triumph and the assumption of the imperial dignity, which roused the jealousy of several of his friends, who joined with the republicans in a conspiracy against his life. It is recorded of him, that a soothsayer bade him beware of the ides of March, and that his wife Calpurnia was so apprehensive that danger awaited him, as to dissuade him from going to meet the senate. The remonstrances, however, of Decimus Brutus, one of the conspirators, overruled his reluctance, and Cæsar went to the senate house, where he was assassinated, B.C. 43, and in the 56th year of his age. Thus fell

Julius Cæsar, who on all accounts may justly be called a great man; for though he aspired to and obtained the supreme power, yet it does not appear that he abused it by any acts of tyranny or cruelty. His ambition was certainly inordinate, but he was liberal and humane. His talents were of the first rank; and he might have shone as an orator if he had devoted himself to that profession, as Cicero himself acknowledges. His literary powers appear to great advantage in his Commentaries, written in the true spirit of historical dignity and faithfulness. The best editions are those of Flæzer, 1661; Grævius, 1697; Clarke, London, 1712; Davis, Cambridge, 1727; and Barbou, Paris, 1755. This work has been translated into English by Bladen. Some of his epistles are extant among Cicero's.—Plutarch. Suetonius.

CÆSAR (Julius), an eminent civilian, born at Tottenham in Middlesex, in 1557, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from whence he went to Paris, where he took the degree of doctor of the civil law in 1581. Two years after he proceeded doctor of the canon law at Oxford, and was made master of requests, judge of the admiralty, and master of St. Catherine's hospital near the Tower. He was knighted by James I. and made chancellor of the exchequer, which office he resigned in 1614, on being appointed master of the rolls. He died in 1636. His MSS. were sold by auction in 1757 for above 300*l*.—Biog. Brit.

CAFFA (Melchior), an able sculptor and designer, was born at Malta in 1631. He adorned many churches at Rome with his works, which occasioned him to be compared to the celebrated Bernini. He died there in 1697.—D'Argenville.

CAFFIAUX (D. Joseph), a benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Valenciennes in 1712, and died at St. Germain de Pres in 1777. He wrote, in conjunction with Grenier, the History of Picardy; and we have also by him, an Essay towards a History of Music, 4to; but his principal work is the Genealogical Treasure, full of curious researches.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CAFFIERI (Philip), a sculptor, born at Rome in 1634. He was invited to France by Mazarine, and was employed by Colbert, who appointed him inspector of the marine at Dunkirk in 1716. His son James was also eminent in the same line; he also executed some fine busts in bronze. He died in 1755. His son John James pursued the same profession.—Ibid.

CAGLIARI (Paul), an Italian painter, better known by the name of Paul Veronese, was born in 1532 at Verona. His most esteemed pieces are at Venice, where he died in 1588. His sons, Gabriel and Charles, were also eminent artists; the first died in 1596, the latter in 1631. His brother Benedict was a good painter and sculptor, and died at Venice in 1598.—D'Argenville.

CAGLIOSTRO, a famous impostor, whose name was Joseph Balsamo. He was born at Palermo in 1743, and assumed the name of Cagliostro from his godmother. He left his native country when young, and went to Rome, where he married a young woman as full of intrigues as himself. His first adventure was the cheating Marrano, a goldsmith of Palermo, out of a considerable sum, under the pretence of discovering to him some hidden treasure. On this occasion he was obliged to quit Sicily, and turned quack. At Messina he got acquainted with a Greek, named Altotas, who pretended to chemistry; with him he visited the Archipelago and Egypt; and on their return touched at Malta, where they worked in the laboratory of the grand master Pinto. Here Altotas died, and Balsamo went to Naples, where he assumed the title of marquis Pelligrini; but being recognized by his old friend the goldsmith, he was sent to prison on his information. He soon obtained his release, on which he visited most countries in Europe, taking different titles as suited his various purposes. In France he called himself the marquis Cagliostro, but even under this appellation his imposture was detected, and he was sent to the Bastille. He played his tricks afterwards with great success in England, where he pretended to wonderful skill in medicine, and to a knowledge of the occult sciences. At last, in an evil hour, he returned to Italy, and was seized at Rome, where he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of St. Angelo, and died there in 1795. Balsamo's deceptions were mostly played upon the opulent and noble, whose credulity he excited by pretensions the most extravagant, and in several cases the most impious. He pretended to magical skill, and to the power of raising the appearances of departed spirits; with it he associated the wisdom of foretelling things to come; and above all, the knowledge of such recondite treasures of nature as would prolong life. An interesting detail of his impostures was published at Rome, from which this is taken.

CAGNACCI, also called GAULASSI, on account of his deformity, an Italian painter of the 18th century. He was the disciple of Guido, and died at Vienna, aged 80.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CAGNATI (Marsilio), an eminent physician, was born at Verona. After studying at Padua he was invited to Rome, where he taught philosophy and medicine, and was patronized by Clement VIII. and Paul V. His works are, Variarum Observationum, 8vo.; De Sanitate tuenda, 4to.; De Aëris Romani salubritate, &c. 4to.; Opuscula Varia, 4to. 1603.—Moreri. Haller.

CAGHAGNES (James), royal professor of medicine in the university of Caen, born in 1548, and died in 1612. He wrote, 1. La Centurie des Eloges des Hommes célé- manbury for that of St. Laurence, Jewry; and in 1685 he obtained a prebend in St. Paul's. The year following he died. His sermons were printed after his death in one volume, 8vo.—Ibid.

CALAMY (Edmund), an eminent minister among the dissenters, was grandson of Mr. Edmund Calamy, above mentioned, by his eldest son Edmund, who was also a non-conformist, and born in 1671. After receiving a school education, he was sent to Utrecht, where he studied with assiduity. In 1694 he was ordained among the dissenters; and, after officiating to different congregations, succeeded Mr. Alsop in Westminster. In 1702 he published an abridgement of Mr. Baxter's Life and Times, with an account of the ejected ministers. In a subsequent edition it was enlarged to four volumes. This work occasioned a temperate controversy between the author and Mr. afterwards bishop. Hoadley. He was honoured with the degree of D. D. by three universities in Scotland. He died in 1732. Besides the above, he wrote two volumes of sermons and some tracts.—Ibid.

CALANDRUCCI (Giacintho), a disciple of Carlo Maratti, and a good painter; died in 1707. He ornamented many churches at Rome.—Pilkington.

CALANUS, an Indian brachman who accompanied Alexander to India. At the age of 83 he requested that prince to cause his funeral pile to be erected, that he might expire in the flames, which the conqueror reluctantly consented to; and the philosopher ascended the pile, with a lively emotion of pleasure, in the sight of the whole army, on the frontiers of Susiana, B.C. 325.—Arrian. Q. Curtius.

CALAS (John), a protestant merchant of Toulouse, who was accused, Oct. 13, 1761, of having strangled his eldest son, Mark Antony, on account of his having secretly embraced the Roman catholic religion. The young man was of an impatient and gloomy disposition, and in a fit of melancholy hung himself. But the people were persuaded that the father had perpetrated the fact, and he was accused before the magistrates. The unfortunate man was put to the torture to make him confess, and finally, without any evidence, broke on the wheel, declaring his innocence in his last moments, March 9, 1762. The widow and children found some friends, and by order of the king, the proceedings were considered in the council; by whom Calas was pronounced innocent. This was in 1765. Lewis, the younger son, came to London, where he practised surgery. In 1793 he returned to France. The widow of John Calas died in 1792, at the age of 94.—Novw. Dis. Hist., and private information.

CALASIO (Marius), a learned franciscan, who was professor of Hebrew at Rome, and published there in 1621 a Concordance of the Bible, a new edition of which was printed at London, in 4 vols. folio, 1747; but the editor, Mr. Romaine, foisted in some interpolations of his own, in the words Alcim and Berith.—Moreri.

CALCAGNINI (Celio), a learned Italian, was born at Ferrara, in 1579. He served in the imperial army some time; and was also employed in several embassies and other honourable commissions. At last he became professor of belles lettres at Ferrara, where he died in 1540. He wrote several works which shew great erudition, particularly on the Roman antiquities. He also asserted the motion of the earth before Copernicus published his system.—Moreri.

CALCAR (John de), an eminent painter, born in the duchy of Cleves, and died at Naples in 1546. He was a disciple of Titian, and his pictures are hardly to be distinguished from those of that master.—Depiler.

CALDERINI (Domizzio), a learned writer, was born about 1446, at Toris, in the territory of Verona, and died at Rome in 1478, on which occasion his scholars attended his funeral in mourning. He was professor of belles lettres in that city, and published numerous commentaries upon the Latin poets. He also wrote some elegant Latin poems, and published the two first books of Pausanias in that language.—Tiraboschi.

CALDERON DE LA BARCA (don Pedro), a Spanish soldier, priest, and dramatic writer, who flourished in the middle of the 17th century. His plays were printed at Madrid in 9 vols. 4to. 1689.—Moreri.

CALDERWOOD (David), a Scotch presbyterian divine. In 1604 he was minister of Crelling near Jedburgh, and opposed the design of James VI. to bring the church of Scotland to a conformity with that of England. For his violent conduct he was banished for life, and went to Holland, where he published a celebrated book, entitled Altare Damascenum, in which he attacked the English church with the asperity peculiar to his party. He afterwards returned and lived in his own country privately, and employed his time in writing an ecclesiastical History of Scotland; of which a part has been printed. He died about 1638.—Biog. Brit.

CALDWALL (Richard), an English physician, born in Staffordshire about 1513, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he was chosen fellow. He was elected censor of the college of physicians, and founded therein a chemical lecture. He died in 1585.—Wood's A. O.

CALEB, one of the Hebrews sent by Joshua to view the land of Canaan, of which he gave a faithful description; and thereby raised the spirits of the people. He possessed the country of Hebron, and died at the age of 114.—SS.

CALED, or KHALED, one of Mohammed's warriors, belonged to the tribe of Koreish, and for his valour was honoured by the impostor with the title of the Sword of God. He conquered several of the Arabian tribes, and was guilty of horrible cruelties, particularly in overtaking and putting to death the garrison of Damascus, after allowing them to depart that city. He died of the plague in 639.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

CALENDARIO (Philip), a famous architect and sculptor, who lived at Venice in 1354. He erected the beautiful porticos which surround the palace of St. Mark.—Moreri.

CALENTIUS (Elisius), an Italian writer, born in the kingdom of Naples; he was preceptor to the son of Ferdinand II. king of that country, and died about 1503. His poem of the Battle between the Frogs and Mice, in imitation of Homer, was printed in 1738, at Rouen.—Tiraboschi.

CALEPIO, or DA CALEPIO (Ambrose), a learned writer of the 15th century. He was a native of Bergamo, and descended from a noble family. He embraced the monastic life among the Augustines. His Vocabulary of the Latin tongue, the first edition of which appeared in 1503, was very famous, and after passing through various hands, swelled, in 1681, to two volumes, folio. He died blind, in 1511.—Moreri. Tiraboschi.

CALLAVIRI (Luca), an Italian painter of landscapes and sea views, born at Udino in 1665, and died in 1715.—Pilkington.

CALIGULA (Caius Cæsar), a Roman emperor, was the son of Germanicus Cæsar and Agrippina. When he was twenty he was adopted by Tiberius, to the great joy of the Roman people, with whom his father Germanicus had been a favourite. His first wife was Claudia, the daughter of a senator, but even while a boy he discovered the most abandoned disposition; having been detected in an intrigue with his own sister, Dolabella. On the death of Tiberius he was proclaimed emperor by the prætorian soldiers, and the nomination was confirmed by the senate, A. D. 37. The commencement of his reign was very promising; he set at liberty the state prisoners, caused honours to be shewn to his deceased relatives, behaved with liberality to those who were living, and distributed large donations to the people. But this state was of short duration. He fell dangerously ill, and so greatly was he then esteemed, that all orders were anxious in their supplications for his recovery. When, however, his health was restored, it was soon discovered that he was not the same man. His mind was either changed, or he had acted under the mask of the grossest hypocrisy. He began his career of wickedness by murdering several of his relations, who were followed by a number of senators, and other persons of high rank. He openly married his sister Drusilla, and on her death caused divine honours to be paid her, in temples built to her honour. For his favourite horse he built a palace, with a marble stable, and an ivory rack; fed him with gilt barley, and wine out of a golden cup. It was even his intention at one time to make him consul. He married several wives, whom he put away one after another. At last he attached himself to Cornelia, whose manners were as dissolute as his own. Cruelty in him became an inordinate habit, and he openly uttered the detestable wish, "that the Roman people had but one neck, which he might sever in two at a blow." His public exhibitions were extravagant and childish. He caused a bridge of boats to be constructed from Baix to Puteoli, on which were erected a number of castles, and after passing over it twice at the head of his troops, he caused the whole to be destroyed. In an expedition into Gaul he shewed his folly and cowardice on several occasions; but one of his most ridiculous exploits was in a pretended expedition against Britain. Having drawn up his whole army opposite the island, he commanded the trumpets to sound a charge and every preparation to be made for battle, when on a sudden the soldiers were ordered to fill their helmets with cockle shells, and the farce ended with giving a trifling donation to the troops. He was about to follow this up by the tragedy of decimating all the legions of the German army which had mutinied; but suspecting his intentions, those troops took up their arms, and stood on the defence. He then fled to Rome, where he revenged himself on the senate. At length a conspiracy was formed against him, headed by Cassius Chærea, and the monster was assassinated as he was passing to the baths, A.D. 41, in the 29th year of his age. His wife and infant daughter were also sacrificed to the vengeance of the people, who caused his statues to be demolished, and all his public acts to be annulled.—Suetonius. Dio Cassius. Crevier.

CALIXTUS (George), a German protestant divine, born at Middleburg, in Holstein, in 1586, made professor of divinity at Helmstadt in 1614, and died in 1656. He wrote, 1. Anti-moguntinus, 1644, 4to. 2. A treatise against the Celibacy of Priests, 1631, 4to. and other works. He endeavoured to promote a union between the Romish and protestant churches.—Moreri.

CALLARD (John Baptist), member of the academy of Caen, and professor of physic in that university, where he died in 1718. He established a botanic garden at Caen, and wrote a book entitled, Lexicon Medicum Etymologicum, 12mo. 1693.—Ibid.

CALLICRATIDAS, a Spartan general, who succeeded Lyfander as commander of the fleet in the Lesser Asia. He displayed great disinterestedness and valour; defeated Co-son the Athenian general, and afterwards blocked him up in Mitylene. The Athenians fitted out a large fleet for the relief of this place, and in the engagement the Spartan commander's ship was sunk, and he perished, B.C. 405.—Univ. Hist.

CALLIMACHUS, a Greek poet, who flourished in the time of Ptolemy Evergetes. He was the preceptor of Apollonius, the author of the Agonautica, who used him very ill. The works of Callimachus were translated into English by Dodd.—Vossius de Poet. Græc.

CALLIMACHUS, an architect, who invented the Corinthian capital about 540 B.C. The occasion of this discovery is said to have been this: A plant of acanthus being placed upon the tomb of a Corinthian lady, spread its leaves over the basket in so graceful a manner, that the architect adopted it as a suitable ornament for his pillars.—Moreri.

CALLISTRENE, a Greek philosopher, and the companion of Alexander in his expeditions. That prince caused him, in consequence of a charge of his having conspired against his life, to be put into an iron cage with a dog, after having had his nose, lips, and ears cut off. Lyfimachus, a disciple of the philosopher's, out of compassion gave him poison, B.C. 328; for this Alexander ordered Lyfimachus to be delivered to a lion, which he conquered, and for his bravery recovered the monarch's favour.—Arrian. Q. Curtius.

CALLISTUS (Johannes Andronicus), a reviver of learning in the 15th century, was a native of Thessalonica. He taught Greek at Rome, after which he travelled to France, and died there in a short time. Some MSS. in Greek by him were in the royal library at Paris.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CALLIXTUS I. pope and saint, succeeded Zephyrinus in 219, and suffered martyrdom in 222.—CALLIXTUS II. was the son of the count of Burgundy, and became archbishop of Vienne in 1083, pope in 1119, and died in 1124.—CALLIXTUS III. was a native of Xativa in Spain, elected pope in 1455, and died in 1458. His character was very respectable for learning, moderation, and piety.—Platina. Dupin. Bower.

CALLOT (James), a celebrated engraver, born at Nancy, in 1593, of a noble family. He learnt his art at Rome, and acquired a great reputation; he died at Florence in 1636. His engravings are highly valued.—Moreri.

CALMET (Augustin), a learned French Benedictine: he was born in 1672, and died abbot of Senones in 1757. He wrote a Literal Commentary upon all the books of the Scripture, 23 vols. 4to.: a History of the Old and New Testament, 4 vols. 4to.; an Historical, Critical, and Chronological Dictionary of the Bible; a Universal History, 15 vols. 4to.; and other learned works.—Moreri.

CALO-JOHN, or JOHANNITZ, a Bulgarian chief, who in the 13th century submitted to pope Innocent III. and was invested by him with the royal title. In 1205 he marched against the emperor Baldwin, whom he made prisoner and put to death. After ravaging Greece, and committing horrible cruelties, he was assassinated.—Moreri. Gibbon.

CALONNE (Charles Alexander de), an eminent French statesman, was born of a noble family at Douay in 1734. He was educated at the university of Paris, and then became an advocate. After attending the bar some time, he became successively solicitor general to the parliament of Douay, master of requests, intendant of Metz, and comptroller general of the finances, in which last place he succeeded the celebrated M. Necker in 1783, at which time he found not a single crown in the treasury. In this high and important office he continued till 1787, and during the period of his administration raised and maintained the public credit by a punctuality till then unknown in the payments of the royal treasury, though he found it drained to the lowest ebb. He laboured with unwearied assiduity to restore the proper equipoise between the annual income and expenditure, and to provide a supply for the emergencies of the state, without increasing the burthen of the people. For this purpose he advised the king to revive the ancient usage of convening national assemblies of the notables, to whom he proposed the bold project of suppressing the pecuniary privilege and exemptions of the nobility, clergy, and magistracy. This measure alarmed those powerful bodies, and M. de Calonne found it necessary not only to resign his place, but to retire to England, where he wrote two elegant defences of himself, his Requête au Roi, and Réponse à l'Ecrit de M. Necker. At the end of the war he returned to Paris, where he died in 1802. Besides the above pieces he wrote an Essay on Agriculture, 12mo.; Observations sur plusieurs matieres du droit civil et coutumier, 4to.; De l'Etat de la France present et à venir, 1790, 8vo.; in this work he displayed uncommon sagacity, and predicted the disasters which afterwards fell on his unhappy country; Des Finances publiques de la France, 8vo.; Lettre à l'auteur des Considerations sur l'Etat des Affaires publiques, 1798, 8vo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist. Europ. Mag. vol. XV.

CALOVIVS (Abraham), a German divine, was born in 1612, at Morungen, in the duchy of Brunswick. He became professor of divinity at Rostock, after which he removed to Dantzick, and lastly to Wittenberg. He was a bigoted lutheran, and strenuously opposed every project of a union between the reformed churches. So zealous was he on this point, that all who were of the same sentiments with him were called Calvinians. He died in 1686. His writings were numerous, but mostly controversial.—Moreri.

CALPRENEDE (Walter de Costes, lord of), a French romance writer, was gentleman of the bedchamber to the king, and in great favour with the prince of Condé, who is said to have assisted him in some of his works. He died in 1669. His romances are, Cassandra, Cleopatra, and Pharamond, all very voluminous, but, though once popular, they are now sunk into contempt, having given way to novels of a lighter and more probable cast. He also wrote dramatic pieces.—Ibid.

CALPURNIUS, a Sicilian poet of the 3d century, who wrote seven eclogues, addressed to Nemianus, another poet. They possess considerable merit, and are to be found in the Poetæ Latini Minores, 4to. 1731.—Voss. Poet. Lat.

CALVART (Denis), a Flemish painter, born in 1552. He kept a school at Bologna, where he had for his disciples, Guido and Dominichino. He died in 1619.—D'Argenville.

CALVERT (George), the first lord Baltimore, was born at Kipling, in Yorkshire, in 1582, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford, after which he went abroad, and at his return entered into the service of Robert Cecil, secretary of state to James I. That monarch made him one of the clerks of the privy council, and in 1619 he was appointed secretary of state. In 1625 he was created lord Baltimore, and had a grant of land in Newfoundland; which settlement being abandoned, he obtained another in Virginia, where a colony was afterwards formed called Baltimore.—He died in 1632.—Biog. Br.

CALVERT (James), an English nonconformist divine, born at York, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. He was ejected from the living of Topcliff, in Yorkshire, and died in 1698. He was the author of a work entitled, Naphthali seu colluctatio Theologica de reditu decem Tribuni, conversatione Judæorum et mensæ Ezekielius, 4to. 1672.—Calamy.

CALVIN (John), an eminent reformer, was born at Noyon in Picardy, in 1509, and educated at Paris under Corderius with a view to the church. Two benefices were procured for him, but having read the scriptures with great attention, he became dissatisfied with the tenets of the church of Rome, and altered his mind with respect to the ecclesiastical state. This change in his opinions induced him to study the law, in which he made a considerable progress; but his open avowal of the protestant faith rendered his stay in France dangerous, and he retired to Basil, where he published, in 1536, his Institution of the Christian Religion, to which he prefixed an elegant dedication to Francis I. This work rendered his name famous among all the reformed, and was translated into several languages. The year following he settled at Geneva as minister and professor of divinity, having Farel for his colleague. But soon after he was obliged to leave Geneva, together with Farel, for refusing the sacrament indiscriminately to the people. Calvin then went to Straßburg, where he officiated in a French church of his own establishment, and was also chosen professor of divinity. The divines of Straßburg appointed Calvin to be their deputy at the diet of Worms. In the mean time the citizens of Geneva requested his return to their city, and after repeated solicitations he consented, and arrived there in 1541. His first undertaking was to set on foot a system of ecclesiastical discipline, strictly presbyterian, and as rigorous and assuming as that of Rome itself. He continued in this city, actively employed as a preacher and a writer, till his death, which happened May 27, 1564. The moral character of Calvin was irreproachable, and he appears to have acted from conscientious motives; but he was proud and overbearing. His creed was narrow, and the doctrine of predestination which he broached and explained caused bitter heats and confusions long after his death. His intolerance was manifested in his conduct to Servetus, but this was more the fault of the age than of the man. In all respects, however, he was a great character. He left a widow, by whom he had a son, who died an infant. Calvin's works make 9 vols. folio.—Bayle. Mosheim.

CALVITIUS (Sethus), a learned chronologer, born in Thuringia in 1556, and died in 1615. His principal work is the Opus Chronologicum, the last edition of which was that of Frankfort in 1685. Scaliger speaks highly of it.—Moreri.

CALZA (Antonio), an Italian painter of the 17th century. He was the disciple of Carlo Cignani, and imitated the battle pieces of that master with great success; he also painted landscapes.—D'Argenville.

CAMASSEI, or CAMACE (Andrew), an Italian painter, born at Bevagna. He studied under Dominichino and Andrew Sacchi. He died in 1657. At Wilton there is a fine painting by him, representing Venus and the Graces.—Pilkington.

CAMBACERES (N.), a French prelate, was born at Montpellier in 1722. He became preacher to the king, and distinguished himself so much by his talents in the pulpit as to obtain several ecclesiastical preferments, the last of which was the archbishopric of Rouen. He died Nov. 6, 1802. His nephew became second consul of the republic under Bonaparte.—New. Dict. Fifth.

CAMBERT, a French musician, who was the first that exhibited operas in France; but being rivalled by Lulli, in 1672 he went to England, where he became master of the king's band, and died in 1677.—Ibid.

CAMBIS-VELLERON (Joseph Lewis Dominic, marquis de), a learned French nobleman, was descended of an ancient family in Venaissin, a captain of the dragoons, and colonel in the army. He was born at Avignon in 1706, and died in 1772. His library was one of the largest and most select in his country. He published, 1. A Catalogue raisonné of the MSS. in his cabinet, 2 vols. 8vo. a curious work; 2. Mémoires historiques de la Vie de Roger de Saint Lary de Bellegarde, 1767, 12mo. He had amassed large collections for a history of his native province. He was a true christian philosopher, animated by the best principles, which he evinced by a correspondent example.—Ibid.

CAMBRIDGE (Richard Owen), was born in London; February 14, 1714. He was sent early to Eton school, and thence in 1734 to Oxford. In 1737 he took chambers at Lincoln's-inn, and in 1741 he married a Miss Trenchard, with whom he resided at Whitminster in Gloucestershire. He was fond of the water, and contrived a double boat, consisting of two distinct boats fifty feet in length and only eighteen inches wide, placed parallel to each other at the distance of twelve feet, and united by a deck. This double boat is described as a very swift and steady sailer, and capable of waisting heavy weights. In 1744 Mr. Cambridge published the Scribleriad, which is the most considerable of his poetical, and in 1761 A History of the War of Candahar, which is the most extensive of his profane productions. He died September 17, 1802. He was temperate in his habits, and excelled in conversation. He wrote some papers in the World. All his works were collected and published in 2 vols. 4to. 1803, with his life prefixed, by George Owen Cambridge, A. M.

CAMBYSES, king of Persia, was the son of Cyrus the great, whom he succeeded B. C. 529. He was of a violent and bloody disposition, and at the beginning of his reign invaded Egypt, to revenge himself upon the king Amasis, who had broken his promise of giving him his daughter in marriage. That monarch, however, died during the march of Cambyfes, who defeated his son Psammenitus, and put him to death and all his family. He then made an unsuccessful attempt upon Ethiopia, in which he lost a great part of his army by famine. After committing the most wanton and detestable cruelties upon his own subjects, as well as upon his enemies, he died of an accidental wound in the eighth year of his reign.—Herodotus. Univ. Hist.

CAMDEN (William), a learned antiquary, was born at London in 1551, and after receiving his education at Christ's hospital and St. Paul's school, was sent to Magdalen college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college. In 1573 he took his degree of B. A. and in 1575 he was appointed second master of Westminster school. In 1586 he published in Latin, the History of the ancient Inhabitants of Britain, their Origin, Manners, and Laws; a third edition of this work appeared in 1590, at which time he had a prebend in Salisbury cathedral, but without being in orders. In 1593 he became head master of Westminster school, and next year published an enlarged edition of his Britannia. In 1597 he printed his Greek Grammar for the use of Westminster school; and the same year was made clarencieux king at arms. In 1600 came out his Catalogue of the Monuments in Westminster Abbey, and a new impression of his Britannia. In 1603 he published at Frankfort a Collection of our Ancient Historians in Latin, and in the year following appeared his Remains concerning Britain, in 4to. In 1615 he printed his Annals of Queen Elizabeth. He died at Chiffelhurst in Kent in 1623, and his remains were interred in Westminster abbey. Mr. Camden founded a history professorship at Oxford, and bequeathed all his books and papers to sir Robert Cotton.—Biog. Brit.

CAMERARIUS (Joachim), a learned German writer, was born at Bamberg in 1500, and educated at Leipsic. He embraced the reformation, and formed a friendship with Melancthon, whose life he wrote. On the establishment of a college at Nuremberg, Camerarius was made professor of belles lettres, and in 1527 married a woman of good family, who brought him four sons and five daughters. He afterwards removed to Leipsic to superintend that university, where he died in 1574. He wrote many good books, and translated several of the Greek authors. His son Joachim devoted himself chiefly to medicine and botany, on which last subject he wrote some pieces. He died at Nuremberg in 1598, aged 64.—Salnius de Vit. Camer.

CAMERON (John), an eminent protestant divine, was born at Glasgow, about 1580. He received his education at his native place, and after studying Greek in France, returned to Glasgow, where he was appointed master of the college, and professor of divinity. After residing there about a year, he went to Saumur, and thence to Montauban in France, where he obtained the divinity chair. At this time the disputes between the Romanists and protestants in that country were carried to the most violent height. Cameron was inclined to peace, and expressed himself freely against those contentions, for which one zealot gave him so severe a beating in the streets, that it occasioned a disorder, of which he died in 1625. Cameron endeavoured to reduce the harsh doctrine of predestination to more reasonable ideas of the goodness and justice of God; and he also maintained that salvation was attainable in the Roman church. These points were warmly agitated after his death, and caused his memory to be treated with rudeness, by less liberal protestants. His works were printed at Saumur, in 8 vols. 4to. and at Geneva, in 1 vol. folio. His Remarks on the New Testament, with the title of Myrothecium Evangelicum, were printed at Geneva, in 1672.—Bayle.

CAMILLA, the daughter of Metabus, king of the Volsci, whom she succeeded, and obtained great renown by her feats in arms. She assisted Turnus against Æneas, and fell in battle.—Virgil. Mævi.

CAMILLUS (Marcus Furius), an illustrious Roman, who obtained four triumphs, and served the office of dictator five times. This great man, whose virtues were equal to his talents, was basely prosecuted on a charge of peculation, and went into voluntary banishment: while he was absent, Brennus, at the head of an army of Gauls, ravaged the territories of the republic, and having taken Rome, besieged the senate in the capitol. Camillus, forgetting his wrongs, flew to the relief of his country, defeated the barbarian, and was created dictator. He died of the pestilence, 365 B. C.—Livy. Plutarch.

CAMOENS (Lewis), a famous Portuguese poet, was born at Lisbon, about 1527. After studying at the university of Coimbra, he entered into the army, and served in Africa against the Moors with great reputation. Soon after his return to Portugal, he engaged in an expedition to the East Indies; where he wrote a great part of his Lusiad. On his passage home he suffered shipwreck, but found means to preserve the MS. of his poem; which was published in 1569. He died very wretched at Lisbon in 1579. The people of Macao are still proud of shewing a cave where Camoens amused himself in writing his Lusiad. This excellent poem has been translated into English by sir Richard Fanshawe, and Mr. Mickle, the last of which is the best.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CAMPANELLA (Thomas), an Italian philosopher, and monk of the dominican order. He was born in Calabria, in 1568. His sagacity enabled him to discover the falsity of the peripatetic system; and he set himself about forming one of his own, which made a great noise, and procured him many enemies. In 1599 he was seized at Naples, and committed to prison on suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy; and he remained in confinement till 1626, when he was sent to Rome at the request of the pope. In 1634 he escaped and went to France, where cardinal Richelieu allowed him a pension. He died at Paris in 1639. His principal works are, De recta Ratione Studendi, in which are some excellent rules for philosophizing; Aphorismata Politica; and de Monarchia Hispanica.—Tiraboschi.

CAMPANO (John Antonio), a learned

Italian, was born about 1429, in Campania, of an obscure family. He was brought up to the mean occupation of keeping sheep, in which situation he was noticed by a priest, who, pleased with his manner, took him home, and gave him a liberal education. He acquired a considerable knowledge of the Greek language at Perugia, and was made professor of rhetoric there. Pope Pius II. made him a bishop, and sent him to the congress at Ratisbon. Sixtus IV. appointed him governor of Città da Castello, but Campano having resisted an arbitrary act of the pope against the inhabitants, incurred his displeasure, on which he withdrew to his bishopric of Terrano, and died there in 1477. He wrote the History of Andrew Braccio, a famous commander; several moral and political treatises, letters, orations; and Latin poems, all of which were published together, in 1707 and 1734, at Leipsic. He is not to be confounded with Novaresi Campano, an Italian mathematician in the 19th century. He was an ecclesiastic, and wrote commentaries on Euclid, and several works on astronomy, which still exist in MS.—Bayle. Tiraboschi.

CAMPBELL (Archibald), earl and marquis of Argyle, was born in 1598, and educated suitably to his birth and great interest in his country. He adhered strictly to the protestant profession, and was a zealous partizan of the covenanters. Charles I. created him a marquis in 1641, notwithstanding the opposition he had shewn to his majesty's favourite object of effecting a conformity between the churches of Scotland and England. It was chiefly through him that Charles II. visited Scotland, and was crowned at Scone in 1651, on which occasion the marquis bore a principal part. After the defeat of the king at Worcester he was made prisoner in his own house by one of the parliamentary generals, and sent to Edinburgh, where he signed a paper promising obedience to the government as established, and obtained his release. At the restoration he was sent to the Tower, and after lying there five months was sent to Scotland, where he was tried for high treason, and beheaded in 1661.—Biog. Brit.

CAMPBELL (Archibald), earl of Argyle, the son of the above, served the king with great bravery at the battle of Dunbar, and was exempted out of the general pardon by Cromwell in 1654 for his exertions in favour of the royal cause. The men who brought his father to the block laboured incessantly to do the same by him, and having gained possession of a letter of his, in which he complained of the ill usage he had experienced at court, they caused him to be tried before the parliament of Scotland on a charge of leasing-making, i. e. for creating dissensions between the king and his subjects, by giving the former lying information. Though this accusation was false, he was declared guilty, and sentenced to lose his head; but when the news came to court, the great earl of Clarendon made no scruple to tell the king, that if he suffered such a precedent to take place he would get out of his dominions as fast as his gout would let him. On this the sentence was suspended, and he was afterwards restored to liberty and to his estates. He was also taken into the royal favour, and made a privy counsellor and one of the lords of the treasury. When the duke of York was in Holland, advantage was made of the earl of Argyle's refusal to take contradictory oaths to try him again for treason, and he was once more condemned to suffer death by one of the most iniquitous acts ever heard of. He escaped from prison, and hid himself secretly in London, after which he went to Holland, from whence he returned with several other disaffected persons, and landed in the Highlands, with a view of aiding the duke of Monmouth. His plan, however, was ill concerted, and his people were divided, on which he endeavoured to effect his escape, but was taken by some country people, and conveyed to Edinburgh, where he was beheaded in pursuance of his former sentence, June 30, 1685.—Biog. Brit.

CAMPBELL (John), the second duke of Argyle, and duke of Greenwich, was the son of Archibald duke of Argyle by Elizabeth, daughter of sir Lionel Talmash. He was born in 1671, and entered when young into the army. In 1706 he served under the duke of Marlborough, and was brigadier-general at the battle of Ramillies. He also no less distinguished himself as a statesman, and was an active promoter of the union, for which he incurred considerable odium in his own country. He commanded at the battles of Oudenarde and Malplaquet with great honour, and assisted at the sieges of Lille and Ghent. For these services he was made a knight of the garter in 1710, and the year following was sent ambassador extraordinary to Charles III. of Spain. He was also appointed commander in chief of the English forces there. In 1712 he was nominated commander in chief in Scotland, of which post he was soon after deprived for opposing some of the court measures; but on the accession of George I. he was restored, and received additional honours. In 1715 he engaged the earl of Mar's army at Dunblain, and forced the pretender to quit the kingdom. In 1718 he was created an English peer by the title of the duke of Greenwich. He filled successively several high offices, of which he was deprived for his opposition to sir Robert Walpole, but on the removal of that minister he was replaced. He died in 1743, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where is a noble monument to his memory.—Ibid.

CAMPBELL (Archibald), of the same family as the preceding, and a prelate of the Scotch episcopal church. He resided long in London, and was very intimate with some of the best men of his time, as bishop Bull, doctor Hickey, doctor Grabe, and Mr. Nelson. He was a nonjuror, and in 1721 was elected bishop of Aberdeen, which charge he resigned in 1724. He died June 16, 1744. Bishop Campbell published a folio volume, entitled, The Doctrine of a Middle State between Death and the Resurrection, 1721. This is a very learned and curious book, upon a profound subject, which the author seems to have exhausted, and to have set in a very important light. It is now extremely scarce.—Bishop Skinner's Primitive Order restored, 1804. Appendix.

CAMPBELL (Colin), a Scotch architect, who wrote Vitruvius Britannicus, 3 vols. folio; and built some elegant edifices in Kent. He was surveyor of the works at Greenwich; and died in 1794.—Gen. B. D.

CAMPBELL (George), an eminent divine of the church of Scotland, born in Argyleshire in 1696, educated at St. Andrew's, where he took his degree of D.D. and died in 1757. He wrote a Vindication of the Christian Religion, 1736, 8vo.—Ibid.

CAMPBELL (John), an ingenious writer, was born at Edinburgh in 1708, but was brought by his mother to Windsor when he was only five years old, and never after visited his native country. He was designed for the law, but renounced that profession immediately on the expiration of his clerkship, and devoted himself wholly to literary pursuits. The first performance of his which is known, was the Military History of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, in 2 vols. folio, published in 1736. This work was very favourably received, and occasioned the author to be employed in writing the Universal History, of which the cosmogony is known to be his. While he was engaged in this work he published several books, the principal of which was the Lives of the Admirals, 4 vols. 8vo. a performance of great merit. In 1743 he published a curious tract, entitled Hermippus redivivus, or the Sage's Triumph over Old Age and the Grave. The year following appeared his improved edition of Harris's Collection of Voyages and Travels, 2 vols. folio. He next engaged in that great undertaking the Biographia Britannica, which began to be published in numbers in 1745, and was completed in seven volumes folio. In 1750 he published his Present State of Europe, which went through six editions. In 1754 the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He wrote a Vindication of the Peace in 1763, for which he was appointed king's agent for the province of Georgia. His greatest work, in the compilation of which he had spent many years, is his Political Survey of Britain, which appeared in 2 vols. 4to. 1774, and abounds in speculative projects and political schemes.

He wrote, besides the publications here mentioned, a great number of pamphlets and anonymous books, and contributed to a variety of compilations. His moral character was truly amiable, he had a constant attachment to the established church, and in his politics he was a tory. He died Dec. 28, 1775.—Biog. Brit.

CAMPBELL (George), a learned Scotch divine, was born at Aberdeen in 1719, and educated at the Marischal college. In 1750 he obtained the living of Branchary Ternan, near Aberdeen; from whence he removed to that city in 1756. In 1759 he became principal of Marischal college, and in 1771 was chosen professor of divinity. He died in 1796, having resigned his offices a short time before. Dr. Campbell is advantageously known by his answer to Hume on the miracles, and by his translation of the Gospels; but in a posthumous work of his, entitled, Lectures on Ecclesiastical History, he has evinced no small degree of prejudice, partiality, and bigotry on the side of presbyterianism.—Life by Skene Keith.

CAMPECCIO (Lorenzo), a Roman cardinal, was born at Milan in 1474. He was at first a professor of civil law at Bologna and married, but on the death of his wife he entered into the church, and in 1512 was made a bishop. Leo X. created him a cardinal while he was nuncio at the imperial court. In 1519 he was sent legate to England to collect the tenths for the war against the Turks, and while here was nominated bishop of Salisbury. In 1524 he was again in Germany, as the delegate of the pope, to oppose the progress of lutheranism, in which, however, he met with no success. He was again in England on the difficult subject of the separation between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon, in which he gave satisfaction to neither party. He was recalled in 1529, and the pope sent him once more to Germany, where he attended the diet of Augsburg. He died at Rome in 1539. He was a learned man, and the friend of Erasmus and other eminent scholars. Some of his letters are in a collection printed at Basil in 1550. His brother Thomas was also a bishop, and a learned canonist. He published several works on the canon law, and died in 1564.—Moreri. Tirabeschi.

CAMPER (Peter), an eminent physician and naturalist, was born at Leyden, in 1722. His father was a learned protestant divine, and gave him an excellent education. He studied under Boerhaave, Muschenbroek, Gravefande, and other great men in that university. Having lost his parents at the age of twenty-six, he visited England, France, and Germany, where he cultivated the acquaintance of several men of letters. At Berlin he met with a flattering reception from Frederic the Great. To the study of medicine he joined that of many other sciences, and a taste for the fine arts.

He designed, painted and modelled with exactness and elegance: but his chief excellence lay in philosophy and natural history. His works on these subjects make 6 vols. 8vo. enriched with above 100 folio plates on the most curious subjects. He wrote also on the physiognomies of men of different countries, a work of considerable ingenuity, though rather hypothetical. He died in 1789.—Novo. Diet. Hist.

CAMPHUYSEN (Dirk), an eminent painter, born at Gorcum in 1586. His landscapes and moonlight pieces are extremely beautiful.—Pilkington.

CAMPI (Bernardin), an Italian painter, who published in 1580 an excellent book on the principles of his art. He died in 1584, aged 62.—Ibid.

CAMPI (Galeazzo), an eminent Italian painter of history and portrait; born at Cremona. He died in 1596.—Ibid.

CAMPION (Edmund), an English jesuit, born in London, and educated at Christ's hospital. In 1553 he was elected scholar of St. John's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts; and afterwards entered into orders. In 1568 he went to Ireland, where he turned papist, and in 1571 entered among the jesuits at Douay. He resided at Vienna some time, and wrote a tragedy called Nectar and Ambrosia, which was performed with applause before the imperial court. Gregory XIII. sent him as a missionary to England, where he was tried and executed for high treason, in 1581. His principal work is the Chronologia Universalis.—Wood.

CAMPISTRON (John Galbert de), a French poet, and secretary to the duke of Vendôme; born at Toulouse in 1556, and died in 1723. His plays were printed in 3 vols. 12mo. 1750. They possess many beauties, and some of them are little inferior to those of Racine.—Novo. Diet. Hist.

CAMPO (Antonio), an Italian historian of the 15th century. He wrote the History of Cremona, 1585, folio.—Moreri.

CAMPRA (Andrew), a French musician, born at Aix in 1660, and died at Versailles in 1744. He composed church music and operas with great success.—Moreri.

CAMPS (Francis de), a French author, born at Amiens in 1643, and died at Paris in 1723. He was abbot of Ligny, and wrote Dissertations on Medals, a History of France, and other works.—Ibid.

CAMPSON-GAURI, sultan of Egypt, to which dignity he was raised by the Mamelukes in 1504. He governed with prudence and moderation, and was slain in a battle fought with Selim emperor of the Turks, in 1516, aged 70.—Ibid.

CAMUS (John Peter), a celebrated French prelate, was born at Paris in 1582. King Henry IV. appointed him bishop of Bellay, and he was consecrated in 1609, by St. Francis de Sales. He distinguished himself by his diligence in the discharge of the episcopal copal function; and was also a zealous and frequent preacher. In his sermons, however, he indulged a vain of raillery, not very suitable to the pulpit. He was very severe on the monks in his discourses, which occasioned a complaint from them to cardinal Richelieu. After twenty years unwearied labour, he obtained leave to resign his charge; on which he retired to a monastery. He died in the hospital of incurables at Paris, after refusing two valuable bishoprics, in 1632. His works are very numerous, and among them are several pious romances, written with a view of checking the rage for the reading of romances in his time.—Moreri.

CAMUS (Stephen la), another French bishop, was born at Paris in 1632. He became a doctor of the Sorbonne in 1650, and in 1671 was appointed bishop of Grenoble. He lived a most mortified life, always sleeping upon straw, wearing a hair shirt, and eating the plainest food. In his episcopal character he was highly exemplary, visiting every part of his diocese, and that chiefly on foot. He founded several charitable institutions and schools. Innocent XI. made him a cardinal in 1686. He died in 1707, leaving his property to the poor. He wrote Pastoral Letters, and a Discourse on the perpetual Virginity of the Virgin Mary.—Moreri.

CAMUS (Charles Stephen Lewis), a member of the royal academy of sciences, Paris, and of the royal society of London. He died in 1768, aged 58. He wrote a Course of Mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo.; also treatises on Mechanics and Arithmetic.—Nov. Diss. Hist.

CAMUS (Antony le), a French physician, born at Paris in 1722, and died there in 1772. He wrote, 1. Physic for the Mind, 2 vols. 12mo.; 2. Abdeker, or the Art of preserving Beauty, 4 vols. 12mo.; 3. Medical Miscellanies.—Ibid.

CAMUSAT (Nicholas), a learned Frenchman, born at Troyes, of which city he became canon; and died in 1655, aged 80. His works are, Promptuarium sacrarum antiquitatum Triacensis diocesis, 1610, 8vo.; Historia Albigenensis, 1615; Melanges Historiques, 1619, 8vo.—Ibid.

CANANI (John Baptist), an Italian anatomist, was born at Ferrara about 1515. He was professor of medicine and anatomy at Ferrara, and chief physician to the duke. He is said to have discovered the valves of the veins. The only work by him is entitled Musculorum Humani Corporis Picturata Dissectio, which is extremely scarce. Canani died about 1590.—Trabeschi.

CANAYE (Philip sieur du Fresnoy), an eminent statesman, was born at Paris in 1551. He travelled at an early age as far as Constantinople, of which journey he published an account. On his return to Paris he was called to the bar, and became counsellor of state. Henry IV. sent him on several embassies, memoirs of which have been published in 3 vols. folio. He was converted from calvinism to the Roman catholic faith, at the famous conference between du Perron and du Plessis Mornay. He died in 1610.—Moreri.

CANDAULES, a king of Lydia, who imprudently exhibited his wife naked to his favourite Gyges. The queen out of revenge directed Gyges to kill the king, after which he put her also to death, and obtained the crown, B.C. 718.—Moreri.

CANDITO (Peter), a Flemish painter, whose real name was White. He was born at Bruges in 1548, and excelled in painting history. Several prints after his designs have been engraved.—Nov. Diss. Hist.

CANGE (Charles du Fresnoy du), a learned antiquary, was born at Amiens in 1610. He was made treasurer of France, and was greatly esteemed for his amiable manners, as well as for his great learning. He died in 1688. His principal works are, A History of the Empire of Constantinople under the French emperors, fol.; History of St. Louis by Joinville, with Dissertations, folio; Glossarium ad Scriptores mediz et infimz Latinitatis, 3 vols. folio; [This is a collection of vast merit] Historia Byzantina, fol.; Glossarium ad Scriptores mediz et infimz Gracitatis, 2 vols. fol.—Moreri.

CANGIAGIO, or CAMBISI (Ludovico), an eminent Genoese painter, born in 1597. He painted some admirable works in Italy and Spain; but falling in love with the sister of his deceased wife, and endeavouring in vain to get a papal dispensation, he died in the latter country in 1585.—D'Argenville Vie des Peintres.

CANINI (Angelo), a learned grammarian of Italy, who died in 1557. He wrote, Observations on the Greek Language; and Institutiones Linguz Syriacæ, Assyriacæ atque Thalmudicæ una cum Æthiopicæ atque Arabicæ collatione.—Moreri.

CANISIUS (Henry), a German canonist, who died at Ingoldstadt in 1610. He wrote some learned works in the line of his profession, and others on antiquities.—Ibid.

CANITZ (the baron of), a Prussian poet, born at Berlin in 1634, and died there in 1699. He was privy counsellor of state; and wrote some elegant poems in the German language.—Nov. Diss. Hist.

CANO (Alonso), called the Michael Angelo of Spain, from the variety of his talents in painting, statuary, and architecture, was born in 1600 at Grenada, where his father was an eminent architect. After studying architecture under his father, he applied to sculpture under Pacheco of Seville. He next became the disciple of Juan dell Castillo, the painter, practising sculpture at the same time, in which line he executed two colossal statues of St. Peter and St. Paul so very fine that foreign artists came to copy them. He was soon created first royal architect, king's painter, and instructor to the prince don Balthazar Carlos. He adorned the royal palaces and many churches with elegant pieces of sculpture and beautiful paintings. A singular misfortune occurred to him while he was in the career of glory and fortune. Coming home one evening he found his house robbed, his wife murdered, and his Italian servant fled. Notwithstanding the strong presumption that this man was the criminal, the magistrates fastened their suspicion on Cano, who was known to be of a jealous and vengeful temper. Fearful of the consequences he fled, but after some time returned to Madrid, where he was apprehended, and racked to extort confession. He endured the torture without uttering a word to criminate himself, and the king caused him to be delivered, and took him into favour. After this he entered into the church as an asylum from farther persecution, but still continued his professional pursuits. In his last moments, when the priest held to him a crucifix wretchedly executed, he told him to take it away, for that it was so badly done he could not bear the sight of it. He died in 1676.—Cumberland's Anecdotes of Spanish Painters.

CANO, or CANUS (Melchior), a Spanish prelate, was born at Tarancon, in the diocese of Toledo, and entered into the order of St. Dominic at Salamanca, where he became theological professor in 1546. In 1552 he was made bishop of the Canary islands, which he resigned that he might live at court, being a great favourite with king Philip II. He died at Toledo in 1560. He wrote some books, the best of which is entitled Locorum Theologicorum.—Dupin. Moreri.

CANTACUZEMUS; see JOHN.

CANTARINI (Simon), called the Penaroso, from the place of his nativity. He was the disciple of Guido, and his paintings are often taken for those of his master. He died at Verona in 1648.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CANTEL (Peter Joseph), a jesuit, born in 1645, and died at Paris in 1685. He wrote, 1. De Romana Republica, 12mo. 1707. 2. Metropolitanarum urbium historia civilis et ecclesiastica. He also edited Justin and Valerius Maximus.—Moreri.

CANTEMR (Demetrius), a Moldavian prince of Tartarian extract, born in 1673. Early in life he served the grand seignior, who appointed him governor of Moldavia, which he surrendered to Peter the great, and obtained from him the title of prince. He died in 1723. He wrote, A History of the Rise and Fall of the Ottoman Empire, in Latin; The System of the Mohammedan religion; The present State of Moldavia, &c.—Moreri.

CANTEMIR (Antiochus), son of the preceding, born in 1710, and educated at Petersburg, where he was raised to several important offices, and sent ambassador to Paris and London. He died in 1744. He wrote poems in the Russian language, and translated Anacreon and other authors.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CANTER (William), a learned critic, was born at Utrecht in 1542, and educated at Louvain. He died in 1575. His writings are, Varie lectiones, or Emendations of ancient Writers; Notes on Euripides, Sophocles, Æschylus, &c.; Latin Poems; the Deliciz Poetarum Belgarum. His brother Theodore published critical remarks on various ancient authors.—Moreri.

CANTON (John), a natural philosopher, was born at Stroud in Gloucestershire in 1718, and acquired a common education, after which he was put apprentice to a broad-cloth weaver. His leisure hours were devoted to mathematical studies, and he succeeded so well as to make a dial upon stone, which not only gave the hour of the day but the rising of the sun, his place in the ecliptic, and other particulars. This was placed against the front of his father's house, and so pleased many gentlemen of the neighbourhood that he found, by access to their libraries, great helps in his favourite pursuits. In 1739 he went to London, and was engaged as assistant to Mr. Watkins, master of an academy in Spitalfields, whom he afterwards succeeded. About 1746 he made some improvements in electricity, and in 1750 he presented to the royal society a method of making artificial magnets, for which he was elected a member, and received the gold medal. In 1751 he was honoured with the degree of M.A. by the university of Aberdeen, and chosen one of the council of the royal society. His communications to that learned body upon astronomical and philosophical subjects were numerous and important, but he never published any separate work. Mr. Canton died in 1773, leaving a widow and seven children.—Biog. Br.

CANTWELL (Andrew), an Irish physician, and F.R.S. died in 1764. He wrote, Latin Dissertations on Medicine, Fever, and Secretions; New Experiments on Mrs. Stephen's Remedies; History of a Remedy for Weakness of the Eyes; Account of the Small-pox; Dissertation on Inoculation.—Gen. B. D.

CANUS, or CANO (Sebastian), the first person who sailed round the globe, was a native of Biscay, and accompanied Magellan to the East Indies, after whose death he sailed to the Isles of Sunda, and doubled the Cape of Good Hope. He returned to Spain in 1522. He is not to be confounded with James Canus, a Portuguese navigator, who discovered the kingdom of Congo in 1484.—Moreri.

CANUTE, or KNUD the great, king of Denmark and of England, succeeded his father Sweyn in the former kingdom about the year 1014. He commenced his reign by an expedition against England, but hearing that the king of Norway had invaded Denmark, he was obliged to make a precipitate return. Having repulsed the invader he resumed his enterprize, and landed on the southern coast, where he committed dreadful ravages. Edmund Ironside opposed him with such bravery that Canute agreed to divide the kingdom between them. On the murder of Edmund by Edric in 1017 Canute obtained the whole kingdom in an assembly of the states. He then put to death Edric and several of the English nobility who had basely deserted their sovereign. He likewise levied heavy taxes on the people, particularly the inhabitants of London. However, he distributed justice with an even hand, shewed no partiality to the Danes in preference to the English, and instituted some good regulations. The king of Sweden having attacked Denmark, he embarked thither, and penetrating into Schonen slew the Swedish monarch in battle. But though he had acquired so large an accession of power and territory, his mind was superior to vanity, as the following story evinces. Some of his flatterers having praised him one day beyond bounds at Southampton, Canute caused a chair to be placed on the sea-shore, and seating himself therein, commanded the waves not to approach his feet. The tide, regardless of the mandate, rolled onwards as before; on which, leaping up, he said, no one deserved to be called sovereign but the Being whom the winds and waves obey. After this he made a pilgrimage to Rome, founded several churches, and died at Shaftsbury in 1035.—Univ. Hist. Hume.

CANUTE IV. called the pious, king of Denmark, succeeded his brother Harold in 1080. He undertook an expedition to England, which failed. He was slain by one of his subjects after an insurrection, owing to the exorbitant grants which he had given to the church in 1087. For this he was canonized by pope Alexander III. in 1164. There were some other princes of the same name, but their history is no way interesting.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

CAPACCIO (Julio Cesare), a learned Italian of the 17th century. He was appointed secretary to the city of Naples, and tutor to the prince of Urbino. He died in 1631. We have by him a History of Naples, and other works in Italian.—M. var.

CAPASSO (Nicholas), a learned Italian writer, was born at Fratta in the kingdom of Naples in 1671, became a divine, and professor of civil law in the university of that metropolis. His works on divinity and jurisprudence are fallen into oblivion; but his poetical performances in Latin and Italian, the last edition of which was published at Naples, in 1780, in 1 vol. 4to. are held in great esteem. He spent upwards of twenty years of his life in translating Homer's Iliad into the Neapolitan patois, which is highly prized among his countrymen, but little known elsewhere. He died at Naples in the year 1740, the 75th of his life.

CAPECIO (Scipio), a Latin poet of the 16th century, was born at Naples, where he became professor of law. He wrote a poem on the Principles of Things, in imitation of Lucretius, printed first in 1542, and again with notes at Venice in 1754.—Tiraboschi.

CAPEL (Arthur, lord), a loyal English nobleman, was the son of sir Henry Capel, knt. In the parliament of 1640 he represented the county of Hertford, where he distinguished himself by his moderation, though he inclined to the popular side, and voted for the attainder of the earl of Strafford, a measure which he afterwards sincerely repented. Finding that the parliament went farther against the king than he wished, he began to oppose their violent measures, for which he was created lord Capel of Hadham. In the war which followed he acted zealously for his majesty, for which the house of commons confiscated his estates. In 1648 he defended Colchester, in conjunction with the earl of Norwich and sir Charles Lucas, against the parliament forces, but was obliged at last to surrender upon promise of quarter. Notwithstanding this he was committed to the Tower, from whence he made his escape, but being soon taken, was tried, and sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, which was changed to beheading. This sentence was executed March 9, 1648. His conduct on the scaffold became the cause for which he suffered. While in the Tower he wrote some tender and beautiful stanzas, which have been frequently printed.—Biog. Brit.

CAPEL (Arthur), son of the preceding, was created by Charles II. earl of Essex on account of his father's loyalty and his own merits. He was also sent ambassador to Denmark, and made lord lieutenant of Ireland, where his conduct was a pattern for all that should come after him. In 1679 he became first lord of the treasury, but resigned that place in a few months. He voted in behalf of the bill for excluding the duke of York on its second introduction, though he had before been against it. For this, and his correspondence with persons well known to be disaffected against government, he was struck out of the list of privy counsellors. In June 1683 he was accused by lord Howard of Effric of being concerned in the Rye-house plot, on which he was committed to the Tower. July 13th following he was found with his throat cut with a razor, and the coroner's jury found a verdict of felo de se, though the general opinion was that he was murdered.—Ibid.

CAPELL (Edward), one of the numerous editors of Shakspeare, was born at Troston near Bury, in Suffolk, in 1713. He obtained the place of deputy-inspector of the plays, with a salary of 200l. a year, which probably turned his attention towards publishing an edition of Shakspeare, on which he spent above twenty years; but though it appeared in 10 vols. 8vo. it was destitute of notes. In 1783 these were published in 3 vols. 4to. and evince considerable research. He was also the editor of a volume of poems, called Prolusions, and the altered play of Antony and Cleopatra, acted at Drury-lane in 1758. He died in 1781.—Biog. Dram.

CAPPELLA (Marcianus Minzus Felix), a Latin poet of the 5th century. There is extant of his a poem, entitled, De Nuptiis Philologiz et Mercurii, et de septem artibus liberalibus, which was printed in 1599. There was an earlier poet of the same name mentioned by Ovid.—Vossius de Poet. Lat.

CAPPELLO (Bianca), an Italian lady, was born at Venice about 1542. Born of a noble family she married a person of inferior rank, with whom she left Venice and went to Florence, where she captivated Francis, the son of the grand duke Cosmo de Medici, and became his mistress. On the death of her husband and the grand duchess he married Bianca, and sent an embassy to Venice on the occasion. That obsequious state returned the compliment by acknowledging Bianca a daughter of their republic. She was a woman of considerable talents, though numerous charges of cruelty are brought against her by the Florentines, who detest her memory. She and her husband died within a few days of each other in October 1587, not without strong suspicion of being poisoned by the cardinal Ferdinand, the brother of Francis.—Life translated by Ludger from the German of J. P. Siebenketter.

CAPILLUPI (Camillo), an Italian writer, who rendered himself famous by a book, entitled, The Stratagems of Charles IX. against the Hugonots, 1572. He describes the massacre of St. Bartholomew in glowing colours, but not with a strict attention to veracity. His brothers Lelio, Julio, and Ippolito were also distinguished by their talents. The Latin poems of the two first were printed in the Deliciz Poetarum Italarum. The last became bishop of Fano, and died at Rome in 1580.—Moreri. Tirabeschi.

CAPISTRAN (John), a friar minor, and saint of the Roman church, who laboured with great zeal against Turks and heretics in the 14th century. He headed a crusade against the Hussites, and converted numbers of them, but probably more by terror than argument. He died in 1456, and was canonized in 1690.—Moreri.

CAPISUCCI (Blasius), marquis of Monterio, and general of the papal forces. He became famous by his exploits against the Hugonots, particularly at Poitiers, which was besieged by them in 1569. The assailants threw a bridge across the river to facilitate the capture of the place, when Capisucci, with two others, plunged into the river, and destroyed the fastenings of the bridge, thereby rendering it useless.—Ibid.

CAPISUCCI (Paul), a canon of the Vatican, bishop of Neocastro, and vice-legat of Hungary. The pope appointed him to examine the circumstances of the divorce of Henry VIII. of England from Catherine of Arragon, and his report was against that proceeding. He died at Rome in 1599, aged 60.—Ibid.

CAPITO (Wolfgang Fabricius), a German protestant divine, born at Hagenau in 1478, and died there of the plague in 1542. He wrote a Hebrew Grammar, the Life of Ecolampadius, and other works.—Mor.

CAPITOLINUS (Julius), a Latin historian of the 3d century, who wrote Lives of some of the latter emperors, but neither with purity nor exactness.—Voss. Hist. Lat.

CAPORALI (Cæsar), an Italian poet, born at Perugia in 1536, and died in 1601. He wrote some burlesque pieces in a very popular style; also, the Life of Mæcenas, and some comedies.—Tirabeschi.

CAPPEL (Lewis), a learned French divine, was born at Sedan in 1585. He became Hebrew professor at Saumur, and distinguished himself by his writings against the authority of the Hebrew vowel points. He also published a profound work, entitled, Critica Sacra, folio, 1658. It was attacked by John Buxtorf and approved by Grotius. His Commentaries on the Scriptures of the Old Testament were printed after his death, which happened in 1658.—Moreri.

CAPPELLO (Bernardo), an Italian poet of the 16th century, was a native of Venice, and the intimate friend of Bembo. Having expressed some free political opinions, he was banished by the senate, on which he retired to the ecclesiastical state. He died at Rome in 1559. His poems have been often printed.—Tirabeschi.

CAPPERONIER (Claude), a learned Frenchman, born in Picardy in 1671. He was the son of a tanner, and though destitute of a learned education, attained of himself a considerable knowledge of the Latin language, after which he studied at Amiens and Paris. He became professor of Greek at the latter university in 1722, and died in 1744. He published a splendid edition of Quintilian at Paris, in 1725, folio. After his death appeared at Strasburgh, an edition of ancient Latin rhetoricians, collected by him.—A relation of his, Join Capperonier, succeeded him in the professorship. He published editions of Cæsar and Plautus, and died in 1774.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CARANICA (Nicholas), a Roman cardinal, born in 1400. His reputation in the canon law was so great that pope Martin V. made him his secretary and a bishop, and employed him in several important state affairs. He also gave him a cardinalship, but dying about the time, the conclave refused his claim to a seat. Pope Eugenius IV. went farther, and deprived him of his estate. Fearful of farther outrage he escaped.

and appealing to the council of Basil, had his right confirmed. He was then reconciled to Eugenius, who made him a legate and commander of the army against Francis Sforza. But the cardinal was defeated and wounded. He was a great encourager of learning, and ordered by will that his palace should be converted into a college. He died in 1458.—Moreri.

CAPRIATA (Pier Giovanni), an Italian historian, was born at Genoa, and died there about 1660. He wrote a history of the transactions in Italy during his time, extending from the year 1613 to 1660.—Tiraboschi.

CARACALLA (Marcus Aurelius Antoninus), a Roman emperor, born in 188, and succeeded his father Severus in 211, with Geta his brother, whom he put to death in the arms of his mother, who was covered with his blood. This monster, after gaining over the soldiers, wanted in cruelty, and married his mother-in-law. The people of Alexandria having uttered some sarcasms on the murder of Geta, he entered it with his army, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. He was slain by one of his guards at Edessa in 217.—Univ. Hist.

CARACCIO (Anthony), an Italian poet and nobleman of the 17th century. He wrote some tragedies, of which Il Corradino is the best. His epic poem, entitled, Imperio Vendicato, was printed at Rome in 1690, and possesses great merit.—Tiraboschi. Moreri.

CARACCIOLI (Robert), an Italian ecclesiastic, famous for his eloquence, was born in 1425, of a noble family in the kingdom of Naples. He was employed by the popes Callixtus III. and Sixtus V. and was made first bishop of Aquino and afterwards of Lecce, where he died in 1495. His sermons were printed at Lyons in 1503.—Tiraboschi.

CARACCIOLI (Lewis Antony), an ingenious French writer, was born at Paris of a noble family, and entered early into the military profession in the service of the king of Poland. After quitting that country he went to Italy, and then returned to France, where he devoted himself principally to letters. He died at the age of 80 in 1803. His writings are very numerous, and chiefly moral or historical, written in a lively and fascinating style; the most remarkable are, the Letters, pretended to be those of Ganganelli, pope Clement XIV. in 4 vols. 12mo. These appeared so superior to the other writings of Caraccioli, as to pass for a time as genuine; but his refusing to shew the originals induced a suspicion, which was confirmed on examination of the letters themselves, wherein Ganganelli is made to mention the discovery of Herculaneum some years before it actually took place; and to quote the poems of Gesner before they were published. These letters, however, may be read to advantage, as containing fine moral truths, conveyed in very pleasing language.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CARACTACUS, a British king, whose true name was CARADOG, was the son of Bran ab Llŷr. He is celebrated for his magnanimous deportment when carried before the emperor Claudius, through the treachery of Cartimandua, in 52. Claudius was so touched on the occasion as to take him into his favour. There were some other British princes of the same name.—Tacitus. Owen's Camb. Biog.

CARADOG, a British historian, wrote the Chronicle of Wales from the year 686 to his own time. Of this work several copies remain. He died in 1156. One copy of his Chronicle has been continued to 1196, and another to 1280. They are all in MS.—Owen.

CARAMUEL DE LORKOWITZ (John), a cistercian monk, born at Madrid in 1606. He was made bishop of Missi, and superintendent of the fortifications in Bohemia. He died in 1682. His works were printed in 7 vols. folio, and are chiefly controversial.—Moreri.

CARAVAGGIO (Michael Angelo Amerighi da), an eminent painter, born in the Milanese country in 1569. He became a painter by his own application without a master; but his quarrelsome temper, and licentious conduct, always kept him in poverty. He died in 1609. Being once at an alehouse, without any money to pay his reckoning, he painted a new sign, which afterwards sold for a considerable sum.—D'Argenville.

CARAUSIUS, emperor of Britain, was a native of Flanders, and by his skill as a pilot, gained the confidence of the emperor Probus and his successors, who entrusted to him several important maritime commands. Maximian employed him to defend the coasts of Gaul against the piratical Franks and Saxons. In this situation he acquired so much wealth by his prizes, as to excite the jealousy of the emperor, who intended to put him to death. Carausius, apprized of his design, sailed for Britain, where he assumed the imperial title in 287. He kept up a formidable fleet, and by retaining possession of Boulogne, was enabled to resist all attempts of the Romans to expel him. They were obliged also to acknowledge his independence by a treaty. Carausius ruled in a most arbitrary manner, and was murdered by one of his domestics, named Allectus, in 293. Several of his coins are extant.—Stukely's Carausius. Moreri.

CARRAN (Jerem), a physician of the 16th century, was the illegitimate son of an advocate at Milan, but was born at Pavia, in 1501. He took his degree of M.D. at Padua in 1525, and at the age of 33 was appointed professor of mathematics at Milan, where he also read lectures upon medicine. In 1552 he went to Scotland, and cured the archbishop of St. Andrew's of an asthma.

man which had baffled the skill of numerous physicians. He was next at the court of Edward VI. and cast the nativity of that prince; from thence he rambled through various countries, and at Bologna was committed to prison. On recovering his liberty he went to Rome, where he died in 1576. As a physician he was empirical, and in philosophy fanciful and extravagant, but in mathematical knowledge he was eminent. His superstition was extreme, and he was so addicted to astrology, that having foretold the time of his own death, he starved himself to prove the truth of his prediction. His works were printed at Lyons in 1663, in 10 vols. folio.—Boyle.

CARDONNE (Dionis Dominic de), secretary and keeper of the manuscripts in the royal library at Paris, and professor of the Turkish and Persian languages in the royal college. He died in Dec. 1783. He wrote a History of Africa and Spain under the Dominion of the Arabs, 3 vols. 12mo.; Miscellaneous of Oriental Literature, 4 vols. 12mo.; Indian Tales and Fables, 8vo.—Narr. Dis. Hist.

CAREW (George), a learned English nobleman, was born in Devonshire in 1557, and educated at Oxford; but entered upon a military life, and served with great reputation in Ireland and at Cadiz. James I. made him governor of the isle of Guernsey, and created him a baron by the title of lord Carew of Clopton. He afterwards became master-general of the ordnance, and a privy counsellor. Charles I. made him earl of Totness. He died in 1629. His lordship wrote a History of the late Wars in Ireland, printed at London in 1633, folio.—Biog. Br.

CAREW (Thomas), an English poet; born in Gloucestershire, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He was appointed gentleman of the privy chamber, and sewer in ordinary to Charles I. and died in 1639. His masque, entitled Cæli Britannicum, was performed before the king and nobility at Whitehall, 1633.—Ibid.

CAREW (Richard), an English topographer, born at Anthony in Cornwall, in 1555, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple, and afterwards went on his travels. On his return he settled in his native county, of which he served the office of high sheriff in 1586. He died in 1620. Mr. Carew is best known by his Survey of Cornwall, printed first in 1602, 4to. again in 1723, and lastly in 1769.—Ibid.

CAREW (George), brother of the above, was educated at Oxford, and became secretary to chancellor Hatton. Queen Elizabeth conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and sent him ambassador to Poland. In the next reign he was employed as one of the commissioners to treat with the Scotch about a union of the two kingdoms, after which he was sent to France, where he formed an intimacy with Thuanus. On his return he was made master of the court of wards, and died about 1613. He wrote a Relation of the State of France, with the characters of Henry IV. and the principal persons of that court, which remained in MS. till 1749, when it was published by Dr. Birch.—Ibid.

CAREW (Sir Alexander), of the same family as the preceding, was one of the knights of the shire for the county of Cornwall in the parliament of 1640. He voted for the attainder of the earl of Strafford. He accepted from the parliament the post of governor of St. Nicholas's island and fort at Plymouth; but when the king's forces began to prevail in the west he was apprehensive that his estates would be seized by them, and therefore solicited the royal pardon on condition of delivering up the fort. While the treaty was going on his design was discovered, and his person seized. He was then sent up to London, and being tried by a court-martial, was beheaded on Tower-hill, in 1644.—Biog. Brit.

CAREW (Bampfylde Moore), an extraordinary character, was the son of a clergyman at Bickley, in Devonshire, and educated at Tiverton school. Falling among some gypsies near that town, he became so pleased with their mode of life, that he abandoned the school and his friends. His exploits in this course were wonderful. He has imposed upon the same company three or four times a day under different disguises, and with new tales of distress. Sometimes he was a distressed clergyman, ruined because he could not take the oaths; at others a quaker who had met with severe losses in trade. Now a shipwrecked mariner; and the same day a blacksmith, whose house and family had perished by fire. Carew had a method of enticing away people's dogs, for which he was twice transported from Exeter to America, but soon made his escape. On one of these occasions he travelled from Virginia through the woods, and swam across the Delaware upon a horse, with only a handkerchief for a bridle. He was a man of strong memory and pleasant address, and could assume the manners of the gentleman with as much ease as any other character. The fraternity to which he belonged, elected him their king; and he remained faithful to them to the last. It is supposed that he died about 1770, aged 77.—Life by Goodby, 12mo.

CAREY (Harry), an English dramatist, who wrote some good songs, particularly God save great George our King, and several farces. He put an end to his own existence in 1744.—Biog. Dram.

CARIBERT, or CHARIBERT, king of Paris in the 6th century, was the son of Clotaire I. On the expulsion of his brother Childert, the kingdom of Paris became his portion, in 562. He was a learned man, and governed with great prudence. But his private character was immoral; for, having put away his queen, he married successively two of her servants, and a third who was a shepherd's daughter. For this he was excommunicated, and died in 567.—Moreri.

CARINUS (Marcus Aurelius), son of the emperor Carus, who made him Caesar in 282, and sent him into Gaul, where he plunged into debauchery. He was slain in Mylia, in 285, by a tribune.—Crevier's Roman Emperors.

CARLETON (Dudley), an eminent English statesman, born in Oxfordshire, in 1573, and educated at Christ-church. After visiting different courts in a diplomatic character, he was appointed ambassador to the United Provinces, where he bore a distinguished part in the synod of Dort. He returned to England in 1625, and was created a peer the year following by the title of baron Carleton. He was soon after sent again to the Hague, and was employed there in several important concerns. He was recalled in 1628, and created viscount Dorchester, and made secretary of state. He died in 1631. His letters, during his embassy in Holland, were printed in 1757, and again in 1775.—Hist. Br.

CARLETON (George), a learned English prelate, born at Norham, in Northumberland, and educated at Edmund-hall, Oxford. In 1580 he was chosen fellow of Merton; and in 1617 made bishop of Landaff. The year following he was sent to the synod of Dort. At his return he was translated to Chichester, and died in 1628, aged 69. He wrote the Life of Bernard Gilpin; an historical Collection of the Deliverances of the Church and State of England, and other works.—Ibid.

CARLINI (Agostino), an Italian artist, who came to England, and was made keeper of the royal academy. His draperies are elegant. He died in 1797.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CARLOMAN, the eldest son of Charles Martel, whom he succeeded as king of Austrasia, in 741. He and his father Pepin united in the defence of their dominions from the encroachments of their neighbours, and defeated the Germans in 743. Carloman then entered Saxony, and took the duke prisoner. After several successful expeditions he retired from his kingdom, and became a monk of the order of St. Benedict. He assembled a famous council in 742, the acts of which bear his name. There were three others of the same name; the first was the younger brother of Charlemagne, with whom he had some contention about the kingdom, but on his death in 771 left him in full possession. The second was the son of Lewis II. whom he succeeded in 879, in conjunction with his brother Lewis III. On the death of Lewis he was declared king of France, and was killed in hunting, by a wild boar, in 884. The third Carloman was the eldest son of Lewis I. king of Germany, whom he succeeded in 876, in the kingdom of Bavaria. He made some partial conquests in Italy, and died in 880.—Moreri.

CARLONE (John), a Genoese painter, born in 1590, and died in 1630. His paintings are greatly admired.—D'Argenville.

CARLOS (Don), son of Philip II. king of Spain, was deformed in his person and perverse in his temper. He endeavoured to kill his tutor for gently reproving him. A match was negotiated between him and the princess Elizabeth of France, but Philip becoming a widower married her himself. He was then desirous of marrying his cousin Anne of Austria, but being crossed by his father, he grew discontented, and endeavoured to excite discontents among the nobles. His father caused him to be arrested, and he was condemned to death. He died shortly after in prison, 1567, some say by violence, but others attribute his death to an inflammation in the bowels.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

CARLYLE (Joseph Dacres), a learned divine and orientalist, was born at Carlisle in 1759. His father was a physician at that place, and practised with considerable reputation. He removed in 1775 from the grammar-school at Carlisle to Christ's college, Cambridge, and after a residence there of about two years was admitted of Queen's, where he obtained a fellowship. About this time he began to study the Arabic language, in which he made a considerable progress, and then proceeded to the other oriental tongues, being assisted in these pursuits by David Zabio, an Asiatic, born at Bagdad, and then a resident at Cambridge. After a residence of about ten years in college, during which he proceeded to his degree of B.D. he married and settled at Carlisle. In 1794 he was chosen professor of Arabic, on the resignation of Dr. Craven; and the year following was collated to the chancellorship of Carlisle. In 1796 appeared the "Specimens of Arabian Poetry," with elegant translations and brief biographies of the authors. In 1799 Mr. Carlyle accompanied lord Elgin in his embassy to Constantinople. While there he gained admittance to the libraries, and made catalogues of the works contained in them. He also made excursions into Asia Minor, and explored with interesting accuracy the site of ancient Troy. After visiting Egypt, Syria, and the Holyland, where he gathered considerable literary treasures, he returned to Constantinople, from whence he travelled through Italy and Germany to England, where he landed in Sept. 1801. Soon afterwards he was presented, by the bishop of Carlisle, to the rich rectory of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. His health, however, was undermined by his travels, and to the great loss of letters, this worthy and ingenious man died at Newcastle, (April 12, 1804. He was engaged at the time of his death in superintending an edition of the Arabic Bible; a Dissertation on the Troad; and Observations made during his Tour in the East. The two last are expected to be published.—Gent. Mag. Month. Mag. May, 1804.

CARMATH, a celebrated Arabian impostor, who in 891 attacked the primary doctrines of mohammedanism, and obtained numerous disciples; but the sect is now extinct.—D'Herbelot.

CARMICHAEL (Jerome) a Scotch divine, and professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow, who wrote some notes on Puffendorff de Officiis Hominis. He died in 1738, aged 56. His son Frederic Carmichael was also a minister, and died at Edinburgh in 1731. A volume of his sermons has been printed.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CARNEADES, of Cyrene in Africa, the founder of the third academy at Athens. His eloquence was dreaded by his adversaries, and it is recorded that when the Athenians sent him with other ambassadors to Rome to get their fine mitigated, Cato the elder pressed the senate to dismiss them, lest the oratory of Carneades should corrupt the Roman youth. He died at an advanced age, B.C. 128.—Bayle.

CARO (Annibal), an Italian writer of eminence; born at Civitanuova, of poor parents, in 1507. He was employed by the duke Farnese in several important concerns, and in 1544 was sent by him on a particular business to the emperor Charles V. He afterwards became secretary to cardinal Farnese, and died possessed of considerable riches in 1566. He was a good poet, well versed in medals, and had a profound knowledge of the ancient languages. He translated the Aeneid into Italian blank verse, printed at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. 1765. His Poems were printed at Venice in 1584, 4to.; and his Letters at Padua, in 1749, 3 vols. 8vo.—Tiraboschi.

CAROLINE, wife of George II. king of England, and the daughter of John Frederic, marquis of Brandenburg Anspach, and of Eleanor Louisa his second wife, was born March 1, 1682. She was sought in marriage by Charles III. of Spain, afterwards emperor of Germany, but being firmly settled in the protestant religion she rejected the offer. Her fortitude on this occasion induced the elector of Hanover to make choice of her for the wife of his son, and they were accordingly married in 1705. She was crowned queen consort of Britain October 11, 1737. Four sons and five daughters were the fruits of this marriage. George I. her father-in-law, had for her the sincerest regard, which she returned with the greatest respect. When raised to the dignity of queen, she studied to contribute to the happiness of the people. She was entrusted with the affairs of state by her husband, who in his absence left her regent of the kingdom. She was a great and enlightened princess, well acquainted with philosophy, a patron of men of letters, and unaffectedly pious and devout. Dr. Clarke gives her a high character in his dedication of the correspondence between him and Leibnitz. She died Nov. 20, 1737.—Biographium Femininum.

CARLOSTADT, or CARLOSTADIUS (Andrew Bodenstein), a protestant divine, was a native of Carlostadt in Franconia. He became dean of Wittemberg in 1512, the same year that Luther received his doctor's degree. Being zealous for the reformation, he carried it to an extreme by some violent outrages in the churches. Luther was dissatisfied with his conduct, and the difference was heightened by Carlostadt's denial of transubstantiation. He was the first protestant divine who took a wife. He became professor of divinity and minister at Basil, where he died in 1541.—Moreri.

CAROTÓ (John Francis), an Italian painter, born at Verona in 1470, and died in 1546. He was disciple of Andrea Mantegna. His brother and disciple John settled at Venice, where he became eminent in his profession, and had for scholars Paul Veronese and Anselmo Canneri.—Pilkington.

CARPENTER (Nathaniel), a dean of the Irish church, was born at Hatherleigh in Devonshire, and educated at Oxford. He was a man of learning, particularly in mathematics. He died at Dublin in 1635. Dr. Carpenter wrote a System of Geography, and a treatise, entitled Architophel, or the Picture of a wicked Politician.—Wood's A.O.

CARPENTIER (Peter), a French writer, born at Charleville in 1697, and died at Paris in 1767. He was prior of Donchery, and wrote a part of Du Cange's Glossary, and the whole of the supplement to that work; besides which he wrote Alphabetum tyronianum, folio, 1747. He is not to be confounded with N. Carpentier, born at Beauvais, and died in 1778. He was an eminent calculator, and wrote some esteemed works in the line of his profession.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

CARPI (Ugo da), a painter, who discovered the art of painting in chiaroscuro, which he performed with two pieces of box-wood, one of which marked the outlines and shadows, and the other impressed any colour laid upon it. In this manner he executed several prints after great pictures. He died in 1500.—Pilkington.

CARPI (Girolamo), an Italian painter, born at Ferrara in 1501, and died in 1556. He imitated Correggio's style with great exactness, and many of his paintings were taken for the pictures of that master.—Ibid.

CARPIONI (Julio), a Venetian painter, born in 1611, and died in 1674. He excelled in painting bacchanals, triumphs, and sacrifices.—Ibid.

CARPOCRATES, a heretic of the second century, who flourished at Alexandria about the year 130. He revived the gnostic heresy, to which he added the antine-mian doctrine, that actions are indifferent, as the passions are implanted in human nature by God himself. His son Epiphanius taught the same opinions.—Mosheim. Dupin.

CARPZOVIVS, the name of a family in Germany, which produced several eminent lawyers and divines, as Benedict the elder, professor of law at Wittenberg, who died in 1624. Benedict the younger, born in 1595, and died in 1666. He quitted the study of the law for that of divinity. David Benedict, his brother, a lutheran minister, who wrote a Dissertation on the sacred Vestments of the Hebrews, 1655. John Benedict, also a lutheran minister, died at Leipzig in 1657, where he was professor of the theology, and wrote De Ninivitarum Pœnitentia. John Benedict, his son, born at Leipzig in 1639, and died in 1699. He translated into Latin several books of the rabbins, and wrote dissertations on the scripture.—Moreri.

CARRA (John Lewis), one of the persons who from an obscure station rose to notice in the French revolution. He was born at Pont de Vessles in 1743, and bred to the law, which profession he quitted for that of letters. Before the revolution broke out he travelled as far as Moldavia, where he became secretary to the hospodar. On his return to France the political ferment was begun, in which he readily took a part, and published a journal, called Les Annales Politiques et Littéraires, which had an astonishing sale. It is certain that this paper had a considerable share in producing the sanguinary scenes which afterwards raged in that country. For this work Carra was appointed one of the keepers of the national library, and afterwards nominated a member of the convention. He was also employed as a commissioner to the army, for which the eagerness of his temper well fitted him. He was charged with being in the pay of England, occasioned by a ridiculous proposal said to have been made by him, of proscribing the Bourbon family and placing the duke of York on the throne of France. At last this restless man, who had always sided with the Girondists, fell with the rest of his party, and was guillotined October 31, 1793. He wrote a History of Moldavia and Wallachia, 12mo; New Principles of Philosophy, 2 vols. 4to; An Essay on Aerial Navigation, in which he pretended to give directions for guiding air balloons; An Examination of Animal Magnetism; Historical Memoirs of the Bastille, &c. &c.—Nowe. Dict. Hist.

CARRACCI (Lewis), the founder of a famous school of painting at Bologna, was born there in 1555. He was the son of a butcher, who gave him an indifferent education. Lewis having a natural taste for drawing became a disciple of Prospero Fontana; but working very slowly he was made an object of ridicule by his comrades. After this he studied in the academy of Palladiana at Florence, and improved himself by visiting the principal cities in Italy. On his return to Bologna his merits soon became conspicuous, and he was considered as superior to his old master. He behaved very liberally to his two cousins, Augustin and Annibal, in conjunction with whom he formed that school and style of painting which has rendered their name so celebrated. Lewis was great in landscapes as well as in figures, and his private character was estimable. He died in 1619. Many of his pictures have been engraved, and some by himself.—D'Argenville.

CARRACCI (Augustin), the elder of the two cousins of Lewis, was the son of a taylor at Cremona. He was placed in the school of Fontana, and afterwards under Passeroni. He applied with great success also to engraving, which enfeebled his colouring as a painter. He and his brother worked long together, but a jealousy on the part of Annibal caused a separation. Augustin for a time led a free course of life, but at last the contemplation of a Madonna of his own painting struck him with remorse, and he retired to a convent, where he died in 1602, aged 45.—Ibid.

CARRACCI (Annibal), the younger brother of the above, studied under his cousin Lewis, by whom he was sent to Rome, where he worked for the pope. He invented a manner so excellent that both Lewis and Augustin adopted it. The Farnese gallery immortalized his name, though he received only the petty sum of 500 crowns of gold (about 200l. sterling), for the labour of eight years. He died in 1609, aged 49. His nephew Antony, a natural son of Augustin, was a pupil of his, and painted some fine pieces in fresco at Rome. He died in 1618, at the age of 33.—Ibid.

CARRANZA (Bartholomew), a learned ecclesiastic, was born at Miranda in Navarre, in 1508. He became a dominican, and distinguished himself greatly at the council of Trent, on the duty of the residence of the clergy. He accompanied Philip, king of Spain, to England, in the hope that he might prove successful in converting the English to popery. He was made confessor to queen Mary; and in 1557 appointed archbishop of Toledo. He attended the emperor Charles V. in his last moments; but in 1559 he fell under the suspicion of heresy, and was imprisoned by the inquisition. After continuing in prison eight years, he was on his appeal removed to Rome, and it was nine years longer before sentence was pronounced against him, when he was ordered to abjure errors which he had never uttered. He submitted with patience, and was then sent to a convent of his order, in which he died in 1574. He wrote a collection of councils, and some religious pieces.—Bayle. Moreri.

CARRÉ (Lewis), a French mathematician, was born in the province of Brisa in 1663.

He was educated for the church, but after studying theology three years he refused to enter into orders, on which his father abandoned him. He then went to Paris, where he was employed as an amanuensis by Malebranche, under whom he learned mathematics and philosophy. After residing with him seven years he commenced teacher, and it is remarkable that the greatest number of his pupils were females. In 1697 he became member of the academy. He died in 1711. He wrote a treatise, entitled, A Method of measuring Surfaces and Solids, and finding their Centres of Gravity, Percussion, and Oscillation; and a number of papers in the Memoirs of the Academy.—Eloge par Fontenelle.

CARRERA (Peter), a Sicilian priest, who wrote a curious book on Chels in 1617, 4to.; and a History of Catania, 1641, 2 vols. folio; both in Italian. He died at Messina in 1647, aged 76.—Moreri.

CARRIER (John Baptist), a monster of ferocity, generated in the French revolution, was born near Aurillac in 1756. He passed through the inferior functions of the law, and became deputy of the department of Cantal in the national convention, an honour which he merited by his denunciations and sanguinary acts. He was sent with a band of cut-throats into La Vendee, where he exterminated numbers, under the mere suspicion of being affected to royalty. Nantes was the grand theatre of his butcheries. He caused twenty-four to be put to death in one day, four of whom were no more than fourteen years of age. Here he devised a new mode of murder, by forcing cargoes of unhappy persons on board covered barges, and sinking them in the stream which flows by Nantes. To enumerate the savage cruelties of this wretch and his myrmidons, would be painfully disgusting. At last fate overtook him. On the fall of the party called the Mountain, he was recalled, and tried before the revolutionary tribunal, which condemned him to the guillotine 15th Dec. 1794.—News. Dict. Hist.

CARRERA (Rosa Alba), a female painter, was born at Venice in 1672. She learnt the rudiments of the art from her father, who was a drawing master; after which she was placed under an eminent painter in oil, and her progress was so great, that her full length portraits became famous throughout Italy. She went to Paris, where she was admitted a member of the academy of painting 1720. She painted portraits of the royal family, and then went to Vienna, where she received distinguished honours. She died at Venice in 1787. Her miniatures are very beautiful.—D'Argenville.

CARRIERS (Lewis de), a priest of the oratory, who died at Paris in 1717, at an advanced age. He published a Commentary upon the Bible; in French, 24 vols. in 18mo. 1716.—Moreri.

CAROVAGGI, a clockmaker of Pavia, who made a clock for Alciat; the hammer of which, on striking the bell, struck fire from a flint, which kindled a match, and gave light to a lamp, all at once.—News. Dict. Hist.

CARSTARES (William), a Scotch divine, born near Glasgow in 1649, and after receiving a good education in his own country was sent to Utrecht. Being introduced to the pensionary Fagel, that gentleman presented him to the prince of Orange, who perceiving considerable intelligence in Carstares, entrusted to him his designs with respect to Britain. On his return to Scotland he entered into the ministry; but a turn for politics induced him to take the resolution of going back to Holland. His intercourse with several noblemen, known to be disaffected to government, in 1682, caused him to be taken up at London, and after examination he was sent to Scotland, where he was put to the torture to make him confess. But though he resisted the torture, he gave way to perfidiousness and promises, and made a sort of confession which was published. On his release he went to Holland, and remained there till 1688, when he accompanied the prince of Orange to England, and was appointed the royal chaplain for Scotland, with the revenues of the chapel royal. But he was still retained about the king's person. In 1704 he was appointed principal of the university of Edinburgh, and the first divinity professor there. He was an active promoter of the union between the two kingdoms. He was a liberal-minded man, and endeavoured to restrain the bigotted spirit of the presbyterians, for which he incurred their jealousy. To recover their good opinion he acted as their agent in opposing the bill for tolerating the episcopal clergy in Scotland. He died in 1715. His letters and state papers were printed in 1774, in 1 vol. 4to.—Biog. Brit.

CARSUOGHI (Reiner), a jesuit, born in 1647 at Citeria, in Tuscany, and died in 1709, provincial of his order. He is known by a poem on the Art of writing well, printed at Rome in 1709, 8vo.—News. Dict. Hist.

CARTE (Thomas), an English historian, was born in 1686, at Clifton in Warwickshire, and educated at Oxford, but he took his degree of M.A. at Cambridge, and entered into orders. His first publication was a defence of Charles I. from the charge of being privy to the Irish massacre. At the accession of George I. Mr. Carte refused the oaths. He was afterwards secretary to bishop Atterbury, and when that prelate was committed to the Tower, a reward of 1000l. was offered for apprehending Mr. Carte, who escaped to France, where he remained till queen Caroline obtained permission for him to return to England. In 1736 appeared his Life of James, Duke of Ormond, in 3 vols. folio. Soon after this he issued proposals for a History of England. He met with great encouragement in this work, but only published 3 volumes in his life-time; the 4th, which ends with the year 1654, appeared after his death. Though much neglected, it is a valuable performance, as a repository of curious facts faithfully related. The author died in 1754. His MSS. are in the Bodleian library. Besides the above, he published a Collection of original Letters and Papers relating to the affairs of England, in 3 vols. 8vo. a History of the Revolutions of Portugal, and some other pieces.—Biog. Br.

CARTEIL (Christopher), an English officer, born in the county of Cornwall in 1550. He entered into the service of the prince of Orange, and commanded a fleet which sailed from Holland to Muscovy. On his return to England he had the command of the troops sent out with Sir Francis Drake to the West Indies, where they took the towns of St. Jago, Carthagena, and St. Augustin. The good conduct and liberality of Carteil gained him the esteem even of his enemies. He died at London in 1593.—Mureri

CARTER (Francis), an English writer, who is known by an Account of a Journey from Malaga to Gibraltar, printed in 1776, in 3 vols. 8vo. and again in 1778. He died in 1783.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

CARTES (René des); see DESCARTES.

CARTERET (John), earl of Granville, was the eldest son of George lord Carteret, and succeeded to the title at the age of five years. He received his education at Westminster school and Christ-church college, Oxford. He took his seat in the house of lords in 1711, and distinguished himself by his earnestness for the succession of the Hanover family, which recommended him to George I. who gave him several important places. In 1719 he went ambassador to Sweden, and mediated the treaty between that power and Denmark. In 1721 he became secretary of state; and in 1724 was appointed viceroy of Ireland, where his administration, at a most trying season, was generally applauded. He was again nominated to that high office, after the accession of George II. and governed that kingdom with great wisdom till 1730. He was a constant enemy of Walpole's administration, and moved, in 1741, for the removal of that minister. When that was effected the year following lord Carteret became secretary of state, and in 1744, on the death of his mother, he succeeded to the titles of viscount Carteret and earl Granville. He died in 1763. He was a pleasant companion, affable, and a great encourager of learned men.—Biog. Br.

CARTEROMACO (Scipio), a learned Italian, born in 1467, at Pistoia. He studied Greek under Politian, and was appointed professor of that language at Venice. He afterwards settled at Rome, where he was in high reputation, and died there in 1513. Erasmus gives him a great character for learning and modesty. He wrote, a Latin oration in praise of Greek learning, 1504; a translation into Latin of the Greek oration of Aristides, in praise of the city of Rome. He was also the editor of Ptolemy's Geography and other works.—Bayle. Tiraboschi.

CARTIER, or QUARTIER (Janies), a French navigator, was a native of St. Malo, and became eminent as a pilot. Francis I. employed him in exploring the coast of North America, where, in 1534, he completed the discovery of Canada, partly made before by the baron de Levi.—Mureri.

CARTISMANDUA, queen of the Brigantines in Britain, has gained a name by her treachery, in betraying to the Romans the unfortunate Caractacus. She put away her lawful husband Venustus, and took in his room his armour-bearer Vellocatus. On this her subjects revolted, which induced her to call to her assistance the Romans, who made themselves thereby masters of the country.—Tacitus.

CARTWRIGHT (Christopher), an English divine, born at York in 1602, and died in 1652. He was an excellent Hebrew scholar, and wrote Electa Targumico-Rabbinica in Genesis, et in Exodus, 1648 and 1653, 8vo.

CARTWRIGHT (Thomas), a paritan divine, was born in Hertfordshire in 1555, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, which he afterwards exchanged for one of Trinity. In 1567 he proceeded B.D. and became a popular preacher. His opinions were adverse to the hierarchy, and he was complained of by archbishop Grindal, in consequence of which he was hindered of his doctor's degree, and deprived of his fellowship; he then went abroad, and was chosen minister to the English merchants at Antwerp, and afterwards at Middleburg. On his return to England he took great pains to subvert the ecclesiastical order, and to establish the Genevan discipline. He also wrote several pieces on that side, which were answered by doctor Whitgift. Cartwright was imprisoned, and obtained his liberty through lord Burleigh and the earl of Leicester, the latter of whom appointed him master of his hospital at Warwick, where he died in 1603, aged 68. He wrote a Harmony of the Gospels in Latin, printed at Amsterdum in 1647; a Commentary on the Proverbs; and other works.—Biog. Brit.

CARTWRIGHT (William), an English divine and poet, born in Gloucestershire, and educated at Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts; and became a famous preacher. He died in 1644, aged 33. Ben Jonson, and the other wits of the time, held him in great estimation. He wrote some plays, poems, and sermons.—Wood's A.O.

CARTWRIGHT (Thomas), an English prelate, was born at Northampton in 1634. He received his education among the parizans, and obtained a fellowship in Queen's college, Oxford, but was episcopally ordained. At the restoration he was made D.D. prebendary of St. Paul's, and chaplain to the king. On the death of bishop Pearson he was nominated to the see of Chester, but gave too much countenance to the arbitrary proceedings of king James, whom he followed to France, and afterwards to Ireland, where he died in 1689. His remains were interred with great solemnity in Christ-church, Dublin. This bishop hath several sermons in print.—Wood.

CARVALHO D'ACOSTA (Anthony), an ingenious Portuguese, who wrote a topographical survey of his native country with great exactness, in 3 vols. folio; also a system of Geography, and a treatise on Astronomy. He died in 1715, aged 65.—Novo. Diâ. Hist.

CARVER (Jonathan), born in Connecticut, North America, in 1732. He lost his father, who was a justice of peace, when he was only five years old. He was intended for the profession of medicine, which he quitted for a military life, and served with reputation till the peace of 1763. After this he formed the resolution of exploring the interior part of America, and to penetrate as far as the Pacific Ocean. This project he carried into execution amidst numerous difficulties, and published an interesting Account of his Travels in 1776. On his return from this enterprize he went to England, where being disappointed of preferment, he was under the necessity of accepting the office of clerk of the lottery, to support himself and family. He died in very poor circumstances in 1780. Captain Carver also wrote a piece on the Culture of Tobacco.—Gen. Biog. Diâ. Novo. Diâ. Hist.

CARUS (Marcus Aurelius), a Roman emperor, born at Narbonne, about the year 220. He rose to a military command by his virtues; and on the death of Probus was elected emperor in 283. He defeated the Samaritans and Persians; and was killed the same year, as it is said, by lightning, in his tent, but others assert that it was set on fire by his servants.—Cresier. Gibbon.

CARY (Robert), a learned English divine, was born at Cockington, in Devonshire, about 1615; and educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of LL.D. in 1644. He obtained the living of Portsmouth, in his native county; and complied with the changes of the times. He died in 1688. He is known by his Chronological Account of Ancient Times, printed in folio, 1677.—Wood's A. O. Prince's Worthies of Devon.

CARY (Lucius), lord Falkland, the eldest son of the first viscount of that title, and born in Oxfordshire about 1610. He was educated partly at Dublin, and partly at Cambridge. At about the age of 20 he went abroad, but soon returned and settled near Oxford, where he followed his studies with eagerness. In 1639 he served in the army against the Scots; and was afterwards with the earl of Essex. In 1640 he sat in parliament for Newport in the life of Wight; was for some time an opposer of the prerogative of the crown; and voted against the right of the bishops to a seat in the house of lords, but afterwards he altered his mind on that subject. When the war broke out, which he endeavoured to prevent, he raised troops in defence of the throne. It was observed of him that he grew more pensive as the breach between the king and parliament widened; and was frequently heard to express the word peace. He was slain at the battle of Newbury in the 34th year of his age. His mind was enriched with the stores of learning, and with the principles of virtue and religion. He wrote some poems; a discourse concerning Episcopacy; another on the infallibility of the Church of Rome; and some other pieces. His saying was, that he pitied unlearned gentlemen on a rainy day.—Biog. Brit.

CARY (Felix), a French writer, and member of the academy of Marseilles; born in 1699, and died in 1754. He wrote the Medallist Histories of Marseilles, Thrace, and the Bosphorus.—Novo. Diâ. Hist.

CARY (Henry), earl of Moumouth, was grandson to Henry lord Hunsdon, cousin-german to queen Elizabeth. He received his education with Charles I. and suffered considerably by the civil wars. We have by him numerous translations from foreign writers, ancient and modern. He died in 1661, aged 65.—Walpole's Cat. of royal and Noble Authors. Granger.

CARYL (Joseph), a nonconformist divine, was educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. He was for some years preacher to the society of Lincoln's-inn, a member of the assembly of divines, and one of the triers for the approbation of ministers. Besides his public sermons before the parliament he published a large commentary on Job, in 12 vols. 4to. and 2 vol. folio. He died in 1673.—Culamy.

CARYLL (John), an English gentleman, who followed James II. and was created by him earl of Caryll, and baron Dartford. In the reign of queen Anne he came to England, and became intimate with Mr. Pope. He wrote two plays, and translated the Psalms of David from the Vulgate, &c.—Gen. Biog. Diâ.

CASA (John de la), an Italian writer and prelate, was born at Florence in 1508, and educated at Bologna. He settled at Rome, and in 1533 was appointed clerk of the apostolic chamber. He cultivated his talents, but indulged himself also in sensual pleasures, and had a natural son whom he named Quirino. In 1544 he was made archbishop of Benevento, and the same year was sent nuncio to Venice, where he displayed his diplomatic abilities to great advantage. He was in disgrace under Julius

III. on account of his connection with cardinal Farnese, but was restored to favour by Paul IV. who made him secretary of state. He died in 1556. He is accounted one of the most elegant of the Italian writers, and his Latin poetry is uncommonly fine. His principal performance is the Galateo, or Art of living in the World; besides which he wrote some beautiful Italian poems, the Lives of Cardinals Contarini and Bembo, and other works, all collected at Venice in 5 vols. 4to. 1728.—Tirab. sibi.

CASANOVA (Mark Antony), a modern Latin poet, born at Rome, and died for want, being reduced to the necessity of begging his bread, in 1527. He imitated Martial with great success. His poems are in the Deliciae Poëtarum Italorum.—Ibid.

CASAS (Bartholomew de las), an eminent Spanish divine, was born at Seville in 1474. At the age of 19 he accompanied his father, who sailed with Columbus to the West India. On his return he entered into orders, and returned to Hispaniola with Columbus in his second voyage, where he settled as a priest. On the conquest of Cuba he went thither, and laboured to convert the Indians, and to protect them from the oppressions of his countrymen. The cruelties of the Spaniards at last induced him to return to Europe for the express purpose of laying the case of the poor Indians before Charles V. and in consequence of his representations, ordinances were passed for the regulation of the conduct of the Spaniards in America, which, however, were never executed. One priest had the boldness to apologize for the barbarities in a book, printed at Rome, which was answered by las Casas, who was made bishop of Chiapa. He resided in America above fifty years, labouring with all his might to restrain the cruel spirit of his countrymen. The state of his health rendered it necessary for him to return to Europe, and he died at Madrid in 1566. His book on the Destruction of the Indians has been translated into several languages; besides which he was the author of another on the Rights of Sovereigns and Subjects, printed at Tubingen in Latin, 1625, 4to.—Moreri. Robertson's Hist. of America.

CASATI (Paul), a learned jesuit, born at Placentia in 1617. It was chiefly by his persuasion that queen Christina of Sweden embraced the Roman catholic religion. He died at Parma in 1707. His works are mostly mathematical, and are very judicious, particularly one on optics, which he composed at the age of 88.—Moreri.

CASABON (Isaac), a learned divine and critic, born at Geneva in 1559. At the age of 28 he was chosen professor of Greek at Geneva, and, in 1586 he married a daughter of Henry Stephens, the learned printer, by whom he had twenty children. After residing at Geneva fourteen years he removed to Montpellier, where he filled the professor's chair; but being dissatisfied with his situation, he went to Paris in 1598, where he had the promise of a professorship, which he never obtained, and had the grant of a pension, which was badly paid. He was one of the judges on the protestant side, in the conference between cardinal du Perron and du Plessis Mornay in 1600, and gave his opinion against the latter, which occasioned a belief that he was about to change his religion; and to effect it cardinal du Perron was directed to have some communications with him on the subject, the result of which was Casaubon's inflexible resolution of abiding by the protestant principles. He had, however, an increase of his pension, and in 1603 the place of king's librarian. On the death of Henry IV. he went to England, where James I. entertained him with great kindness, settled upon him a considerable pension, and gave him a prebend at Westminster, and another at Canterbury. He died in 1614, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He published several valuable editions of ancient authors, as Strabo, Gr. and Lat. Genev. folio, 1587; Theophrastus, Leyd. 1592 and 1612, 12mo.; Apuleii Apologia, 1593, 4to; Athenæi Deipnosophist, Gr. and Lat. 2 vols. folio, 1600, 1612; Persius, 1605, 8vo.; Polybius, Gr. et Lat. Par. 1609, folio. He was also the author of De Libertate Ecclesiastica, which was suppressed by Henry IV. as being offensive to the pope; De Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis; which is a criticism on Baronius; Epistole, the best edition of which is that of Almeloveen at Rotterdam, 1709, fol.—Mor. Biog. Brit.

CASABON (Meric), son of the above, born at Geneva in 1598, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered into orders. He obtained from archbishop Laud a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, and two livings in Kent, of which he was deprived in the rebellion, fined, and imprisoned. Cromwell made him large offers to induce him to write the history of the war, but he steadily refused them; as he also did an invitation from Christina, queen of Sweden, to take upon him the superintendence of the universities in her kingdom. At the restoration he recovered his preferments, and died in 1671. He edited several ancient writers, to which he subjoined versions and learned notes. He also wrote some pieces which shew great learning. The most remarkable are, a Defence of the Existence of Witches, and a true and faithful Relation of what passed many Years between Dr. John Dee and some Spirits, 1659, folio.—Ibid.

CASE (Thomas), a nonconformist divine, was born at Boxley in Kent, and bred at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A.; after which he became minister of Erpingham in Norfolk. He next settled in the living of St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-street, London, and was chosen one of the assembly of divines. He was turned out for refusing the engagement, and suffered imprisonment for being concerned in Love's plot; but on making a submission he was released. In 1660 he was appointed one of the city ministers to attend the king at the Hague, and assisted at the Savoy conference. He died in 1682, aged 84. He printed some sermons.—Calamy.

CASE (John), a native of Lyme Regis in Dorsetshire, and a noted empyric and astrologer, was looked upon as the successor of the famous Lilly, whose magical utensils he possessed. He is said to have got more by this distich over his door than Dryden by all his poetry:

"Within this place
"Lives Doctor Case."

And he was doubtless well paid for composing that which he affixed to his pill-boxes:

"Here's fourteen pills for thirteen pence,
"Enough in any man's own conscience."

There is a story told of him and Dr. Radcliffe; being together at a tavern, Radcliffe said, "Here, brother Case, I drink to all the fools your patients." "Thank ye," quoth Case, "let me have all the fools, and you are welcome to the rest." He wrote a nonfensical rhapsody, called the Angelical Guide, shewing men and women their lot and chance in this elementary life, 1697, 8vo.—Granger. Biog. Brit.

CASEL (John), a learned German, born at Gottingen in 1533. He was the pupil of Melancthon and Camerarius, and took his degree of doctor of laws at Pisa. He died professor of philosophy and rhetoric at Helmstadt in 1613. He wrote several learned works, and a collection of his letters was published at Franckfort in 1687, 8vo.—Moreri.

CASENEUVE (Peter de), a French antiquary and ecclesiastic, born at Toulouse in 1591, and died there in 1652. He wrote, Le France Aleu de la Province de Languedoc, etabli et defender, 4to.; L'Histoire de la Vie des Miracles de St. Edmond, Roi d'Angleterre, 8vo.; Origines sur Etymologies Françaises, &c.—Ibid.

CASIMIR I. king of Poland, son of Miecislus, whom he succeeded in 1034; but the Poles revolted under the regency of his mother, upon which he went to Paris, where he became a monk. Seven years afterwards the Poles having discovered his retreat, obtained leave from the Pope for him to return to his kingdom and marry. He espoused a daughter of the grand duke of Russia, governed with great wisdom, civilized his subjects, and promoted commerce. He died in 1501.—Univ. Hist. Mor.

CASIMIR II. surnamed the Just, king of Poland, was the younger son of Boleslaus

III. On coming of age he was made prince of Sandomir. When his brother Miecislus was deposed for tyrannical conduct in 1177, the Poles conferred the crown on Casimir. He was an upright, generous prince, and adopted measures to relieve the peasants from the oppression of their lords. He died in 1194, aged 77.—Ibid.

CASIMIR III. the great, born in 1309, and succeeded Ladislaus in 1333. He took several places from John king of Bohemia, and conquered Russia. He united to his warlike qualities the virtues of a great king; maintained peace, founded several churches and hospitals, and built numerous fortresses. Yet he is said to have been a lover of wine and women. He died of a fall from his horse in 1370.—Ibid.

CASIMIR IV. the son of Jagellon, was grand duke of Lithuania, and called to the throne of Poland in 1447. He humbled the Teutonic knights, subdued the vavrode of Wallachia, and by an edict enjoined the study and use of the Latin language, which has ever since continued to be the vernacular tongue of the Poles. He died in 1492. Ibid.

CASIMIR V. (John), son of Sigismund III. He was intended for the church, became a jesuit, and was made a cardinal; but on the death of Ladislaus VII. he took the crown, and obtained permission to marry his brother's widow. He was defeated by Charles Gustavus king of Sweden, but afterwards, with the assistance of the emperor Leopold, he obtained a victory over that prince, and concluded a peace with his successor in 1660. The year after he defeated the Muscovites in Lithuania. The cares of government, and the discovery of a conspiracy which had been formed against him, made him form the resolution of resigning the crown, after which he went to France, where he died at Nevers in 1672.—Ibid.

CASIMIR SARBIEVIUS; see SARBIEWSKI.

CASLON (William), an eminent letter-founder, was born at Hales-Owen in Shropshire in 1692, and served his apprenticeship to an engraver of ornaments on gun-barrels, which business he afterwards carried on in London. He also made tools for bookbinders, and the letters which he cut for this purpose so pleased Mr. Bowyer, the printer, that he encouraged him to turn his attention to cutting types, and assisted him in the undertaking. In a short time his types were found superior to those of other founders; and instead of importing from Holland as had been customary, his types were sent abroad. His first foundry was in Helmet-row, near Old-street, but afterwards he removed to Chiswell-street, where he carried on a very extensive business. At the close of his life he left the concerns of the foundry to his son, and went to live at Bethnal-green, where he died in 1766.—Biog. Br.

CASNODYN, an elegant Welsh poet, who flourished from about the year 1290 to 1340. Several of his productions are in the Archæology of Wales.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

CASSAGNES (James abbe de), a French poet and member of the academy. Colbert procured him a pension, and the post of king's librarian. Having a desire to shine as a preacher at court, he directed his attention to pulpit eloquence, but was unfortunately impeded by a satirical line in a poem by Boileau, who associated his name with that of father Cotin, one of the worst preachers of his time. This had such an effect upon his spirits that at last he became quite deranged, and died in a mad-house in 1679. He translated Sallust and some of the works of Cicero into French. His poems are now forgotten.—Moreri.

CASSAN, king of Persia, to obtain which dignity he renounced the christian religion. He subdued Syria, defeated the sultan of Egypt, and died in 1304, after returning to his former faith.—Univ. Hist.

CASSANA (Nicolo), called among painters Niccetto; born at Venice in 1659, and died in London in 1713. At Florence he painted an admirable picture of the conspiracy of Catiline consisting of nine figures as large as life. He painted the portrait of queen Anne, by whom he was distinguished in a very honourable manner. His brother John Augustine excelled in painting beasts, birds, fishes, and fruits.—Pilkington.

CASSANDER, king of Macedon after Alexander the Great. He compelled the Athenians to accept Demetrius Phalerius to be governor of their city, and after committing a number of murders died of a dropsy, 304 B. C.—Univ. Hist.

CASSANDER (George), a learned divine, born near Bruges in 1513, and died in 1566. He laboured all his life to effect a union between the catholics and protestants, and thereby incurred the ill-will of both parties. His works were printed at Paris in 1616, folio.—Thouani Hist. Moreri.

CASSANDER (Francis), a learned Frenchman, who died in 1695. He translated some books into French, particularly the Rhetoric of Aristotle.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

CASSANDRA-FIDELLE, a learned Venetian lady, who applied with success to the Greek and Latin languages, history, philosophy, and theology. Philip Tomassini published her letters and discourses at Padua, in 1636. She died in 1567, aged 102.—Ibid.

CASSENTINO (Jacopo di), so called from the place of his birth, where he painted many fine pieces, as well as at Florence and other cities of Italy. He was the founder of the Florentine academy, and died in 1356, aged 80.—Pilkington.

CASSERIO (Julio), an eminent anatomist, was born of poor parents in Placentia. Becoming a servant to Fabricius ab Aqua-pendente, he became his instructor, and at last took him for an assistant. He succeeded his master in the professorship of anatomy and medicine at Padua in 1609. He died there in 1616. His anatomical tables are in considerable repute. He also wrote De Vocis auditeque organis historia, fol. 1600; and other works.—Haller Bibl. Anat. Gen. Biog.

CASSIANUS (Johannes), a monk of the 5th century, was a native of Scythia, and brought up in the monastery at Bethlehem. He settled in France, where he founded two monasteries, and died about 430. He wrote Institutio Monachorum; and some other works, in which he maintained the semi-pelagian notion on the subject of grace.—Dupin. Moreri.

CASSIBELAN, CASSIWELLAUNUS, or according to the British CASWALLON, a celebrated king of the Britons, who opposed Cæsar with great valour and prudence. He is said to have taken a considerable army into Gaul, where he fought the Romans with so much bravery as to provoke Cæsar to invade Britain. Cassibelan was elected to the supreme command by the other chiefs, and fixed his residence at Verulam, now St. Albans.—Cæsar's Commentaries. Owen's Camb. Biog.

CASSINI (John Dominic), a celebrated astronomer, born in 1625 in Piedmont, and educated among the jesuits at Genoa. He had such a turn for Latin poetry, that some of his compositions were printed when he was only eleven years old. He afterwards devoted himself to mathematics, particularly astronomy, and in 1650 was appointed professor of mathematics at Bologna. In 1652 he made an observation of a comet which then appeared, and determined the apogee and eccentricity of a planet from its true and mean place, a problem which Kepler had pronounced impossible. In 1658 he corrected and settled a meridian line in the great church at Bologna, on which occasion a medal was struck. In 1663 he was appointed inspector-general of the fortifications of the castle of Urbino, and superintendent of the rivers in the ecclesiastical state. In 1666 he printed at Rome a collection of astronomical pieces, and among others a Theory of Jupiter's Satellites. Lewis XIV. desired leave of the pope for Cassini to come to Paris, which was granted, but the time of absence was limited to six years. and at the expiration of the term he was commanded to return, and on his refusal his places were taken from him. Cassini was the first professor of the royal observatory, which was finished in 1670. Here he made numerous observations, and in 1684 he discovered four satellites of Saturn. In 1695 he went to Italy to examine the meridian line which he had settled in 1653, and in 1700 he continued that through France which Picard had begun. He died in 1712, having lost his sight some years

CASSINI (James), the ſon and ſucceſſor of the above; born at Paris in 1677, and educated at the Mazarine college, under Varignon, profeſſor of mathematics. At the age of 17 he was admitted a member of the academy, and in 1696 viſited England, where he was choſen fellow of the royal ſociety. He ſucceeded his father in 1712, and enriched the ſtock of ſcience with many valuable diſcoveries. In 1720 he publiſhed a book on the figure of the earth, in which he maintained, in oppoſition to Newton, that it was of an oblong ſpheroid. To determine this the French king ſent two companies of mathematicians, one towards the polar circle, and the other to the equator, to meaſure a degree, the reſult of which was, a decided reſutation of Caſſini's opinion. In 1723 he deſcribed a perpendicular to the meridian of France, from Paris to St. Malo, and the year following from Paris to Straſburg. He publiſhed Elements of Aſtronomy, with Aſtronomical Tables, in 1740. He died in 1756.—Ibid.

CASSINI DE THURY (Cæſar François), the ſon and ſucceſſor of the preceding; born at Paris in 1714, and at the age of ten calculated the phaſes of the ſolar eclipse of 1727. He employed himſelf for many years in perfecting a general chart of France, and in continuing the perpendicular of the meridian of Paris. He publiſhed a great number of pieces in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, and died in 1784, being ſucceeded by his only ſon count John Dominic Caſſini.—Ibid.

CASSIODORUS (Marcus Aurelius), a man of great talents in the 5th century. He was a native of Italy, and appointed by Theodoric, king of the Goths, governor of Sicily; and in 490 the ſame prince made him his ſecretary and privy counſellor. In 514 he was raiſed to the conſular dignity, in which he was continued by Theodoſius and Vitiges. The approaching fall of the Gothic kingdom, and a diſguſt of public buſineſs, made him form the reſolution of retiring from the world. He accordingly went to his native place, Squillace, in Calabria, where he built a hermitage and a moaſtery. Here he devoted himſelf to his ſtudies and religion. He is ſaid alſo to have amused himſelf with mechanical purſuits, and invented ſome curious water-clocks, ſun-dials, and lamps. He died in 577, aged 96. He wrote a Chronology from the beginning of the world to the year 519; a Hiſtory of the Goths, of which an abridgment only remains: but his Letters, written while ſecretary, are extant and valuable. He alſo compoſed Commentaries on ſome parts of Scripture, and a book on Orthography. The beſt edition of his works is that of Rouen in 1679, 2 vols. folio.—Voffius Hiſt. Lat. Mereri.

CASSIUS (Caius), one of the murderers of Cæſar, who had ſaved his life after the battle of Pharſalia. He married the ſiſter of Brutus, and in the participation of the provinces obtained Africa as his ſhare. When Auguſtus and Antony prevailed againſt the conſpirators at Rome he retired to Philippi, where he and his friends were defeated. Afraid of falling into the enemy's hands, he cauſed one of his freedmen to run him through the body, 42 B. C. Some of his letters remain among Cicero's epiſtles.—Suetonius. Plutarch.

CASSIUS (Longinus Lucius), a Roman prætor, rendered remarkable by his inflexible adminiſtration of juſtice. He had the name given him of being the rock of the accuſed; and adopted firſt the practical maxim of cui bono? He lived B. C. 115.

CASSIUS (Avidius), a Roman commander under Marcus Antoninus, is ſaid by ſome to have been a Scythian, and by others the ſon of Avidius Severus, a perſon of conſiderable rank in the empire. He commanded in 164 againſt the Parthians, whom he defeated, and after conſiderable ravages put an end to the war. He next had the command of the army in Syria, where he reſtored the troops, who had relaxed into effeminacy and licentiousneſs, to diſcipline and good order. He then marched againſt the Egyptians, whom he conquered. In 175 he took advantage of the information of Aurelius's illneſs to ſpread a report of his death, and was proclaimed emperor by his army. The emperor, who was then in Germany, on receiving intelligence of his uſurpation, immediately ſet out for Illyricum, and the ſenate proclaimed Caſſius a traitor. Before the two armies met Caſſius was aſſaſſinated, and ſome of his own officers carried his head to the emperor. That great man ſpared his family, but Commodus afterwards cauſed them to be burnt alive.—Univ. Hiſt.

CASSIUS (Parmenſis), a Latin poet, was alſo one of the conſpirators againſt Cæſar. He afterwards, however, attached himſelf to Antony, and was put to death by Octavianus. Varus, who killed him, took away his papers, and it is ſuppoſed that the play of Thyeſtes, which goes under the name of Varus, was in reality the production of Caſſius.—Voff. de Poet. Lat.

CASSIUS (Severus Titus), a Roman orator in the time of Auguſtus. He was ſo much addiſted to accuſing as to become a libeller and calumniator: and his writings were the cauſe of a law paſſed by Auguſtus againſt libels. That monarch alſo baniſhed Caſſius, who died miſerably. Seneca ſpeaks highly of his eloquence.—Tacitus. Quæſtilian. Bayle.

CASTAGNO (Andrew del), a wretch, who having learned the art of painting in oil from Dominico de Venise, assassinated him in the night that he might possess the secret alone. This happened in the 15th century.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

CASTALDI (Cornelius), an Italian poet of the 16th century. He endowed a college at Padua, and died in 1597, aged 57. His poems were printed in 1757, 4to. and are very elegant.—Moreri.

CASTALIO (Sebastian), a learned Frenchman, born in 1515, and died at Basil, where he was Greek professor, in 1563. He wrote Colloquia Sacra, or Dialogues on Sacred History, in elegant latin, 4 vols. 12mo; and translated the whole Bible into the same language. His notions upon predestination and grace were condemned by the church of Basil, and Calvin and Beza wrote very bitterly against him.—Bayle.

CASTELS (Peter), a painter of Antwerp, where he was born in 1684, and died at Richmond in Surry in 1749. In 1726 he published 12 plates of birds, designed and etched by himself.—Pilkington.

CASTEL (Lewis Bertrand), a famous French jesuit, born in 1688, and died in 1757. He was a great admirer of sir Isaac Newton, and published in 1743 a work, entitled, Vrai Système de Physique générale de Newton, 4to. He also wrote the Optic of Colours, 12mo.; a Treatise of universal Gravity, 2 vols. 12mo.; a System of Mathematics, 4to. and other works.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

CASTELL (Edmund), a learned English divine, was born at Hatley, in Cambridgeshire, in 1606, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to St. John's college. While in the university he laboured in compiling his Lexicon Heptaglotton, which is a standing proof of his industry, though he ruined his circumstances by it. In 1663 he was presented to the rectory of Higham-Gobion, in Bedfordshire; and in 1666 was appointed chaplain to the king, and Arabic professor at Cambridge, to which was added afterwards a prebend of Canterbury. He died in 1685.—Biog. Br.

CASTELLI (Benedict), an Italian mathematician, was born at Brescia. In 1595 he entered into the order of Benedictines, and was for some time a disciple of Galileo, whom he assisted in his astronomical observations. He became professor of mathematics at Pisa, and afterwards at Rome, where he died in 1644.

CASTELLI (Bernard), a Genoese painter, born in 1557, and died in 1629. He painted portraits of the most eminent poets, for which he received complimentary verses in return. He also engraved the plates for the Jerusalem of Tasso. His son Valerio, who died in 1659, was a good painter of battle pieces.—D'Argenville.

CASTELNAL (Michael), an eminent French writer and statesman. He was born of a noble and ancient family, and was employed by Charles IX. and Henry III. in many difficult and important negotiations. He died in 1592, having been five times ambassador to England. His memoirs of his embassies were printed in 1669, 2 vols. fol. and again at Brussels in 1731, in 3 vols. folio.—Moreri.

CASTLENAU (Henriette Julie de), countess of Murat, an ingenious French lady, and the wife of the count de Murat; died in 1716, aged 45.—She wrote the Tales of the Fairies, and other ingenious romances.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

CASTELVETRO (Lewis), an Italian critic of great learning, but very spleenetic; born at Modena, and died in 1571 at Basil, whither he had fled to escape the severity of the inquisition. He wrote a Commentary upon Aristotle's Poetics, and some Latin poems.—Bayle.

CASTI (L'Abbe), an Italian poet of the 18th century, is known by a great number of poems, and other productions in his native language. His principal work is entitled, Gli Animali Parlanti, or the "Speaking Animals." He died at Paris in February 1803.—L'Esay Diâ. Univ.

CASTIGLIONE (Balthazar), an ingenious nobleman of Mantua, born in 1478. After serving with great bravery in a military capacity, he was employed by the duke of Urbino in state affairs, and sent ambassador to several courts. He was also engaged in the same service by pope Clement VII. The emperor Charles V. to whom he was sent as nuncio, had a very high esteem for him. He died, while on this embassy, at Toledo, in 1529. His greatest work is, "Il Cortigiano," or the Courtier, written in an elegant style, and abounding with good rules and reflections. His letters were published at Padua, in 2 vols. 1769. His poems are in the Deliciae Poet. Italarum.—Tiraboschi.

CASTIGLIONE (Joseph), a poet and critic, was born at Ancona, and became governor of Corneto in 1598. He died in 1616. He wrote in Latin verse a history of his own time, and left several critical works under the title of Variae Lectiones et Opuscula, Rome, 1694, 4to.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

CASTILLO (Ferdinand de), a Spanish divine of the dominican order, of which he wrote the history in 2 vols. folio, 1584. He died in 1593.—Moreri.

CASTILLO Y SAAVEDRA (Anthony del), a Spanish painter, born at Cordova, and did there of despair, in consequence of being outshone by Murillo, in 1647, aged 64. He painted history, portrait, and landscape, with equal success.—Cumberland's Anecdotes of Painters.

CASTRACANI (Castruccio), an Italian general, was born at Lucca in 1281. At the age of 20 he entered into the service of Edward king of England, but was obliged to leave this country for having killed a courtier in a duel. He then went to Flanders, and entered into the army of Philip, king of France, where he displayed high military talents and courage. In 1313 he returned to Italy, which was then distracted by the wars between the Guelfs and Ghibelins. He took the side of the latter, and gained many battles over the Florentines. The emperor Lewis V. made him duke of Lucca and a Roman senator. He died in 1328.—Moreri.

CASTRO (Alphonso de), a Spanish friar of the Franciscan order, and a famous preacher. He accompanied Philip II. to England, after which he retired to Flanders, and died at Brussels in 1558, just as he was appointed archbishop of Compostella. He wrote a curious book against heresies.—Dupin. Hist. Eccl.

CASTRO (John de), a Portuguese general, born at Lisbon in 1500. He served against the Moors, and then accompanied de Gama to the east. He there drew up a description of the Red Sea. On his return to Portugal he was appointed commander of a fleet, and attended Charles V. in his expedition against Tunia. He was next made governor of the Portuguese settlements in India, where he greatly fortified Diu, and died at that place in 1548.—Moreri.

CASTRO (Paul de), an illustrious civilian, was born at Castro in the Roman state, and was successively professor of law at Florence, Bologna, Siena, and Padua. The saying of Cuius concerning him became proverbial; qui non habet Paulum de Castro, unicam vendit et emat. "He who has not Paul de Castro, let him sell his coat and buy him." He died in 1437. His works went through several editions, the last of which contains 8 vols. in folio.—Tirabosini.

CAT (Claude Nicholas le), a celebrated French surgeon, was born at Blerancourt in Picardy in 1700, and brought up to the church, which he quitted for the study of medicine and surgery. In 1725 he published a letter on the aurora borealis. In 1731 he became chief surgeon of the Hotel Dieu at Rouen, where he formed a school of anatomy and surgery, and a literary society, which was afterwards erected into an academy, of which he was chosen perpetual secretary. The king gave him in 1759 a pension, and in 1766 letters of nobility. He died in 1768. He wrote the Theory of Hearing, 1758, 8vo.; a Treatise on the Nervous Fluid, 1765, 8vo.; an Abridgment of Osteology, 8vo. 1767; a Treatise on the Senses, 2 vols. 12mo. 1767.—Haller Bibl. Anat.

CATEL (William), a French lawyer, born at Toulouse in 1569. He became counsellor of that place, and wrote the History of the Counts of Toulouse, folio; and Memoirs of the Province of Languedoc, folio. He died in 1626.—Moreri.

CATELLAN (Maria Claire Friselle Marguerite de), an ingenious French lady, born in 1622, and died at Toulouse in 1745. She wrote odes, which possess merit, and were crowned by the academy of Toulouse.—Ibid.

CATESBY (Mark), an English naturalist, was born about 1680. He took a voyage to Virginia in 1712, and remained there seven years. While in that country he collected various productions in natural history, some of which he sent to England. These gave so much satisfaction to Sir Hans Sloane, and other eminent naturalists, that by their persuasion he visited Carolina, from whence he extended his enquiries into the neighbouring provinces, and to the Bahama islands. He returned to England in 1726, where he published the Natural History of Carolina, Florida, and the Bahama Islands, in 2 vols. folio. The plates were done from his own drawings, and coloured under his inspection. This work was reprinted in 1754 and in 1771. The author was chosen a fellow of the royal society, and sent to their Transactions a paper on the Migration of Birds. He died at London in 1749.—Pulteney's Sketches of Botany.

CATHARINE, the daughter of Charles VI. of France, and the wife of Henry V. king of England. After the death of that prince she married secretly Owen Tudor, by whom she had a son called Edmund, father of Henry VII. She died in 1431.—Moreri.

CATHARINE of Arragon, daughter of Ferdinand V. king of Castile and Arragon, espoused in 1501 Arthur, son of Henry VII. and on his death, five months after the union, she was married to Henry prince of Wales, afterwards Henry VIII. by whom she had several children, all of whom died young except Mary, afterwards queen of England. When Henry became enamoured of Anne Boleyn he sought every means to procure a divorce from Catharine, under the pretence of religious scruples. The delays of the pope induced the impatient monarch to throw off the papal yoke. The divorce was pronounced by his divines, and Catharine ceased to be treated as queen. Her behaviour through the whole of this trying affair was calm, ready, prudent, and pious; so that her brutal husband could not help paying respect to her virtues, while he pleaded conscience for what he did. In her retreat she wrote some religious pieces. She died at Kimbolton castle in 1536.—Hume. Moreri.

CATHARINE DE MEDICIS, queen of France, was the only daughter of Lorenzo de Medici, duke of Urbino, and married in 1534 to Henry duke of Orleans, son of Francis I. She was married several years without bearing children, but at last had ten, three of whom were in succession kings of France, and one was queen of Navarre. In 1559 she became a widow, and her son Francis succeeded to the throne, during whose short reign her influence was supplanted by that of the Guises. On the accession of her other son Charles IX. in his eleventh year, she acquired the chief authority, and brought eternal infamy on her name by her horrible treachery to the Huguenots, and the projecting of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. She died in 1589, hated by all parties. She was greatly addicted to pleasure, and fond of judicial astrology.—Moreri. Mod. Univ. Hist.

CATHARINE I. empress of Russia, was born in 1683 in Livonia, of poor parents, whom she lost in her youth, and then lived with a clergyman, on whose death she went to Marienburg, and in 1701 married a Swedish dragon, who was killed when the place was taken by the Russians. General Bauer then became enamoured of her beauty, and took her to live with him. Afterwards she obtained a situation in the family of prince Menzikoff, who was also smitten with her charms. Here she attracted the attention of the czar, who made her his mistress, and in 1711 his wife. She is supposed not to have been very faithful to his bed; and it is certain that the emperor put a Frenchman to death from a jealousy of his being her lover. However, at his death he left her the throne, and she was proclaimed empress in 1725. She carried into execution the great designs which had been left unfinished by her husband, and died in 1727.—Coxe's Travels in Russia. Gen. Biog. Dict.

CATHARINE II. empress of Russia, was the daughter of the prince of Anhalt Zerbst, and born in 1729. Her original name was Sophia Augusta, but on her marriage with the grand duke of Russia, in 1745, she was baptized according to the formulary of the Greek church, and named Catharine Alexievna. She brought her husband two children, Paul, who succeeded her, and Anne, who died an infant. Catharine, however, at this period, was not quite clear of the charge of infidelity, and her husband, by way of reprisal, attached himself to a daughter of count Woronzof. On the death of the empress Elizabeth in 1761, Peter came to the throne, and soon discovered his intention of disinheriting the young grand duke and divorcing Catharine; after which it was his design to marry the countess of Woronzof. At this juncture he had greatly offended the army and the church, by some capricious innovations, and had excited the jealousy of the Russian nobility by his partiality to foreigners. These were favourable circumstances to aid the project of Catharine; a conspiracy was entered into, the army gained over, and on June 27, 1762, the unfortunate Peter, after signing a renunciation of his crown, was sent prisoner to the palace of Robscha, near Peterburgh. Between the prisons and the graves of princes the distance is short. On the 17th of July Alexius Orloff, the empress's favourite, with some other conspirators, went to Robscha, where they assassinated Peter, by strangling him; but that this was without the knowledge of Catharine is at least to be supposed, though the circumstance did not so affect her as to punish the perpetrators of it. It was proclaimed to the nation that the czar had died of the colic. Catharine behaved with magnanimity to the friends of her deceased husband, and pardoned her rival the countess Woronzof. In September she was crowned at Moscow. The regulations adopted by her at the beginning of her reign were much in the manner and conducted in the spirit of Peter the Great. She affected to rule by clemency, and to win the hearts of her subjects by acts of liberality and magnificence. She also wisely avoided foreign war till she had completely settled the tranquillity and order of the empire. Fond of literature and the arts, she gave unbounded encouragement to the introduction of them into her dominions; and she condescended to open a correspondence herself with the most eminent literary characters in Europe. In 1764 she caused her favourite, Poniatowski, to be crowned king of Poland, and the same year was marked by the death of prince Ivan, grand-nephew to Peter the Great, who had been a prisoner eighteen years, and in a state of mental imbecility. Notwithstanding these blots on her character, Catharine shewed herself deserving of the sovereign power, by public acts of the greatest importance. She caused a wife and liberal code of laws to be enacted, in which the practice of torture was abolished; she attended much to the subject of education, and wished to diffuse knowledge among all classes of her subjects; and she encouraged medical discovery, by submitting to the practice of inoculation herself, and persuading the grand duke to follow her example. In 1768 the grand seignior declared war against Russia, which terminated in 1774, after a series of victories and conquests gained by the forces of Catharine. About this time she quelled a dangerous revolt which had broken out in the southern provinces, headed by the cossack Pugatcheff, who assumed the name of Peter III. Foreign and domestic peace being restored, the empress devoted her attention to public improvements, and to political engagements. In 1780 she formed, with the other northern states, the famed armed neutrality, the object of which was, to protect the Baltic trade from the belligerent powers. In 1782 she founded a Roman catholic archbishopric in her dominions, for the benefit of her subjects of that persuasion. About the same time she created a new military order by the title of St. Wolodimir. The year following she seized upon the Crimea and Cuban, which so alarmed the Porte, that war became almost inevitable, but the accession of Germany as an ally to Russia stopped the preparations, and the Turks reluctantly yielded to the aggression. Catharine travelled through her newly acquired territory with a magnificent retinue, and at Cherfon had an interview with the emperor Joseph. Immediately after this the war broke out between Russia and the Porte, in which the former was assisted by Germany, and the latter by Sweden. The war was carried on with great fury; Oczakoff was stormed by the Russians, and a prodigious carnage ensued; Ismail was also taken by Suwarrow in the same manner; the naval force of the Turks in the Black sea was destroyed; several engagements took place in the Baltic between the Russian and Swedish fleets, and generally in favour of the former. Sweden was in consequence obliged to make peace in 1790; which was followed in 1792 by that of Yassi, in which the Porte yielded to Russia the important fortrefs of Oczakoff, which caused considerable uneasiness to the British court; and if the parliament had not opposed it, might have produced a new war. Shortly after, the attention of Catharine was drawn to the state of Poland, where a spirit of revolt had broken out, and the people seemed determined to shake off a foreign yoke. A Russian army was sent into that unhappy country, which committed dreadful ravages, and decided the fate of Poland, by the horrible massacre of the inhabitants of Warsaw. That kingdom was then completely annihilated, being partitioned out between Russia, Germany, and Prussia. This ambitious and restless woman, who possessed great mental powers mixed with many grossly vicious propensities, died of an apoplexy, Nov. 9, 1796.—Cass's Travels in Russia. Cooke's History of Catharine.

CATHARINE of Sienna, a Romish saint, was born in 1347, and vowed celibacy at the age of eight years. She became celebrated for her pretended revelations, which she committed to writing in a good style. She persuaded pope Gregory XI. to remove the seat of ecclesiastical government to Rome, after it had been seventy-six years at Avignon. However, he was sorry for it afterwards, and on his death-bed cautioned those about him from hearkening to an enthusiast. She died in 1380, and was canonized in 1461. A volume of her letters is in print; and some religious pieces of a fanatical cast. She is not to be confounded with another saint of the same name, who was born at Bologna, where she founded a convent, and died in 1463. She also wrote revelations, and other treatises.—Dupin. Moreri.

CATHARINUS (Ambrose), an Italian divine, born at Sienna in 1487. He was at the council of Trent, and wrote a book against Luther, and another in answer to Ochinus. He was made bishop of Minorì, in the kingdom of Naples, from whence he was translated to the archbishopric of Canza. He died in 1553.—Tirolofschi. Dupin. Moreri.

CATILINE (Lucius Sergius Catilina), a famous Roman, was born of a noble family, and became early in life remarkable for the licentiousness of his manners. His abilities were great, and in temper he was resolute, but his heart was depraved, and he scrupled not any means to obtain the object on which he was set. He delighted in scenes of riot, confusion, intestine wars, and murders. Such is the character given of him by Sallust, which is confirmed by other historians. Catiline was one of the most active ministers of Sylla, who procured his advancement to the quaestorship, and other high and lucrative offices. In the year B.C. 65 he formed a conspiracy with several abandoned young men, to murder the consuls and to overturn the government. This plot was discovered by Cicero, who was then consul, and who delivered in the senate his famous oration against Catiline, in which he exposed all his abominable designs before his face. Catiline then left Rome, and put himself at the head of an army, on which the senate declared him a rebel. Those of his party which were left at Rome endeavoured to gain over to their side the ambassadors of the Allobroges, who were then at Rome. The ambassadors disclosed the whole to Cicero, and the conspirators were seized and punished. In the mean time Catiline was about to march into Transalpine Gaul, in hopes of being joined by that nation, but in this he was hindered by the proconsul Q. Metellus Celer, whose army lay at the foot of the Alps. An engagement ensued on the plains of Tuscany, in which Catiline was slain, after fighting desperately; B.C. 62.—Sallust. Plutarch. Cicero.

CATINAT (Nicholas), an illustrious French general, born at Paris in 1637, and was brought up to the bar, which profession he renounced for that of arms. He rose to the highest military honour, and distinguished himself in a number of battles and sieges. In 1688 he defeated the duke of Savoy, and conquered all his dominions. In 1697 he took the fortrefs of Ath in Flanders; and four years afterwards was appointed commander of the army in Italy against prince Eugene; but his wonted success failed him, and he was obliged to retreat. He died at his estate of St. Gratian, in 1712, aged 74. He was a man of great promptness, cool and deliberate, but modest and unassuming.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

CATO (Marcus Portius), an illustrious Roman, usually called the Censor. He was born at Tusculum, B.C. 235, served in the army at the age of 17, and behaved with great valour; his temperance was remarkable, never drinking any thing but water, and being always contented with the plainest food. By the interest of his friend Valerius Flaccus he was enabled to gain considerable preferment, and was appointed military tribune in Sicily, and afterwards quaestor in Africa under Scipio, in which offices he displayed a strict economy in the expenditure of the public money. After going through other employments he was chosen consul, B.C. 195, in which station he had Valerius Flaccus for his colleague, and whom he opposed in his attempt to repeal the oppian law. He conducted the war in the further Spain with great success, and took no part of the spoils to his own share. On his arrival at Rome he was honoured with a triumph. His next advance was to the consulship, in which he shewed his dislike to luxury of every kind. He also distinguished himself by his hatred to Carthage, always concluding his speeches in the senate with the expression, defenda est Carthago! He wrote a history of Roman affairs, of which only a few fragments remain; but a treatise of his on husbandry is extant in the Scriptores de re Rustica. He died B.C. 150, aged 90. By his first wife he had a son, who distinguished himself as a foldier. On her death he kept a mistress for some time, and in his old age married another wife, by whom he had a son, who was the grandfather of Cato of Utica.—Plutarch. Corn. Nepos.

CATO (Marcus Portius), surnamed of Utica, from the place where he died. He was the great-grandson of the preceding, and born about 98, B.C. His parents died when he was a child, and he was left in the care of his uncle Livius Drusus, a person of distinction and opulence. He manifested at an early age that inflexibility of disposition which marked the whole of his public conduct. His habits of austerity and frugality led him to embrace the doctrines of the Stoics. He served in the army with his brother Cæpio against Spartacus, and displayed so much valour and prudence as to obtain the commission of tribune, in the army sent to Macedonia. In his civil character he served first the office of quaestor, which department he reformed of many abuses that had crept into it. His uprightness in administering justice gained him great popularity, and rendered his name proverbial for integrity. He gave his support to Cicero when that great man was consul, and publicly honoured him with the title of father of his country. He saw through the ambitious projects of Cæsar, and opposed him with so much zeal that he sent him to prison, though he thought it expedient to release him almost immediately. He was afterwards sent into Asia to announce to Ptolemy, the king of Cyprus, the decree which deprived him of his dominions. That unhappy prince poisoned himself, and Cato seized on all the royal treasure for the republic. He supported Pompey against Cæsar, whose designs he considered as dangerous to the Roman liberty, yet the civil war which ensued filled him with grief. After the battle of Pharsalia he retired to Africa, thinking that Pompey had fled thither. He and his troops endured great hardships in their march across the deserts, and at last joined Scipio at Utica, with whom he had some contest about the mode of carrying on the war. Cato also gave offence to that general by sparing those inhabitants of Utica who were attached to Cæsar. When that conqueror came before the place, and all hopes of a successful resistance to his arms were vanquished, Cato retired to his chamber, and after reading Plato's Phædo, or Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul, fell upon his sword B.C. 45. When Cæsar arrived, he said, "Cato, I envy thee thy death, since thou didst envy me the glory of saving thy life."—Plutarch. Sallust.

CATO (Valerius), a Latin poet and grammarian in the time of Sylla. The only piece of his that has reached us is a poem, entitled Diræ, to be found in the Corpus Poëtarum, by Maittaire. He died B. C. 30.—Moreri.

CATROU (Francis), a learned French Jesuit, who died at Paris in 1737, aged 78. He was engaged in writing for the Journal de Trevoux several years. He was besides the author of, 1. A History of the Empire of Mogul; 2. A History of the Fanaticism of Protestants, Anabaptists, Quakers, &c.; 3. A Translation of Virgil; 4. A Roman History, with notes, in which he was assisted by father Rouille, who continued it.—Moreri.

CATULLUS (Caius Valerius), a Roman poet, born at Verona B.C. 86. His compositions, though elegant, are tinged with licentiousness. He died B.C. 40. The best editions of Catullus are those of Vossius, Lond. 1684; Vulpius, Patav. 1717; Grævius, Utr. 1680; and Barbeau, Paris, 1754.—Boyle. Moreri.

CATZ (James), a Dutch statesman and poet, born in Zealand in 1577. He was sent ambassador to England in the time of Cromwell. He died in 1660. His poems are in Dutch, and were printed in 1756, 2 vols. folio.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CAVALCANTI (Bartholomew), a learned Italian, born in 1503. He served in a military capacity with great reputation, and was also employed by pope Paul III. in some important embassies. He died at Padua in 1562. He wrote on rhetoric, a work of considerable merit; and on the best forms of republics. There was another of the same name in the 13th century; he was also of Florence, and wrote poems of merit, printed in 1527.—Tirab. Bib. Moreri.

CAVALIER (John), a French protestant, was the son of a peasant in the Cevennes. He became the enterprising leader of the Camisards, or protestants of that country, who were provoked to rebellion against Lewis XIV. by the persecutions which they endured. His courage and skill were so great, that the regular armies under the best generals could not defeat him, and at last marshal de Villars found it expedient to make a treaty with him. He was then taken into the king's service as colonel of a regiment, but being apprehensive that some design was formed against him, he entered into the service of England, and commanded a regiment of French refugees at the battle of Almanza, where Cavalier and his little troop did wonders. He was afterwards appointed governor of Guernsey and Jersey, where it is supposed he died.—Vultaire's Age of Lewis XIV. Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CAVALIERI (Bonaventura), an Italian mathematician of the 17th century. He was a friar, and a disciple of Galileo, and afterwards became professor of mathematics at Bologna, where he died in 1647. He wrote on geometry, trigonometry, logarithms, conic sections, &c.—Hutton's Math. Dict.

CAVALLINI (Pietro), a celebrated painter, born at Rome in 1279, and the disciple of Giotto. He assisted his master in the famous mosaic in the church of St. Peter. He died in 1364, aged 85.—Pilkington.

CAVE (William), an English divine, born in 1637, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. After the restoration he obtained the vicarage of Illington, and was appointed chaplain to the king. In 1684 he was made canon of Windsor, and in 1688 published his Historia Literaria, or an account of all the writers for and against christianity, down to the 14th century. Besides this learned work he published the Lives of the Apostles and Martyrs of the first three centuries; and an excellent book, entitled Primitive Christianity, &c. Dr. Cave died in 1713, and was buried at Illington.—Biog. Brit.

CAVE (Edward), a London bookseller, was born at Newton in Warwickshire in 1691, and educated at Rugby school; on leaving which he became clerk in the excise, but soon left that situation, and went to London, where he put himself apprentice to a printer. On the expiration of his apprenticeship he obtained a place in the post-office, though he still continued at intervals to follow his business. He corrected the Gradus ad Parnassum, and wrote for the newspapers. On being dismissed from his place in the post-office for resisting the abuses in the privilege of franking, he set up the Gentleman's Magazine, which had a great success. He died in 1754, and was buried in the church of St. James, Clerkenwell.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CAVEDONE (Jacomo), an eminent Italian painter, born in 1580. He was educated in the school of the Carracci, and it is said that some of his pieces are equal to those of his master's, Annibal Carracci. A series of misfortunes disordered his intellects, and he was reduced to beggary in which wretched state he died in a stable at Bologna in 1660.—D'Argenville.

CAVENDISH, or CANDISH (Thomas), an English navigator, was born in Suffolk of a good family, and having squandered away his fortune, fitted out three ships to cruise against the Spaniards. He sailed from Plymouth July 21, 1586, and on the coast of South America took several good prizes, and among the rest an Acapulco ship of rich value. Sept. 9, 1588 he returned to Plymouth, after having circumnavigated the globe, and acquired a princely fortune, which he soon dissipated, and made another voyage, but meeting with no success, he died of grief on the coast of Brazil.—Biog. Br.

CAVENDISH (sir William), an English gentleman, born in Suffolk, and became usher to cardinal Wolsey, who honoured him with his confidence, and in return he adhered faithfully to him in his fall. Henry VIII. was so pleased with his fidelity, that he admitted him into his service, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and gave him several places and grants. Edward VI. added to these honours, and he enjoyed them all undiminished in the reign of his successor. Sir William died in 1557. By his last wife he had Henry, William (the first earl of Devonshire), Charles, and three daughters. He wrote the Life of Wolsey, printed in 1667, and again in 1706.—Ibid.

CAVENDISH (William), duke of Newcastle, son of sir Charles Cavendish, the youngest son of the above, was born in 1592. His personal qualifications recommended him to king James, who made him knight of the bath, and in 1620 baron Ogle and viscount Mansfield. Charles I. created him baron Cavendish and earl of Newcastle, and in 1638 appointed him governor to the prince of Wales. The earl contributed 10,000*l.* towards the expedition of that monarch against the Scotch, besides a troop of horse. He behaved with great spirit and loyalty during the civil wars, till the destruction of the royal cause obliged him to go abroad. While he was in exile he wrote a book entitled A Treatise on Government, and the interest of Great Britain with respect to the other powers of Europe. Shortly after the restoration he was created duke of Newcastle. He died in 1676. His grace wrote several plays and poems, but his treatise on Horsemanship is, perhaps, the best known of his pieces. His second wife wrote a great number of volumes and plays, amounting to thirteen folio volumes, now sunk into oblivion: she was the daughter of sir Charles Lucas, who suffered death at Colchester from the rebels. She died in 1673. The duke's title descended to his son Henry, who died without issue, 1691.—Ibid.

CAVENDISH (William), the first duke of Devonshire, born in 1640. In 1661 he represented the county of Derby in parliament, and four years afterwards attended the duke of York as a volunteer against the Dutch. He distinguished himself very zealously in the house of commons against the court, and was a witness in favour of lord Russel on his trial; he offered also to exchange clothes with that nobleman to enable him to effect his escape, which he gallantly refused. In 1684 he succeeded to the title of earl of Devonshire, and about the same time was fined 30,000*l.* and imprisoned in the king's bench for assaulting colonel Culpepper in the presence chamber. He gave bond for the payment of the fine, which, however, he saved by the arrival of the prince of Orange. In 1689 he was made a privy-councillor, and at the coronation he served as lord high steward. In 1694 he was created duke of Devonshire, and during the king's absence was always one of the regency, after the death of the queen. He died in 1707. He wrote an Ode on the death of queen Mary; and an Allusion to the bishop of Cambray's Supplement to Homer.—Biog. Brit.

CAVENDISH (lord John), the son of the fourth duke of Devonshire. In the administration under the marquis of Rockingham, in 1765, he was appointed one of the lords of the treasury, and during the American war he constantly opposed lord North. On the resignation of that nobleman he became chancellor of the exchequer, but on the death of the marquis of Rockingham soon after, and the appointment of the earl of Shelburne, he and his friends resigned their places. In the coalition administration he had his part as chancellor of the exchequer; but the ministry were soon dismissed, and from that time he continued in opposition to his death, Dec. 19, 1796.—Monthly Mag.

CAVENDISH (lord Frederick), field marshal of his majesty's forces, and uncle to the present duke of Devonshire, was born in 1729. Frederick prince of Wales was his godfather. He entered early on a military life, and in 1758 was appointed aide-du-camp to the king. In 1761 he was advanced to the rank of major-general; in 1770 lieutenant-general; then general, and lastly field-marshal. When the late duke of Devonshire was called to the house of lords in 1751, lord Frederick succeeded him as representative of the county of Derby. At the general election in 1774, he was chosen for the town of Derby, and continued to represent that place till 1784, when he retired from parliament. He was in the action at St. Cas on the coast of France in Sept. 1758, where he was taken prisoner. The duke d'Aiguillon, who commanded the French army, politely offered the British officers permission to return to England on their paroles. All of them accepted the offer except lord Frederick, which surprised the duke, who asked his reason, to which he answered "that being a member of parliament, he should in England attend his parliamentary duty, and consequently vote for the supplies for carrying on the war, which might be considered as a breach of his parole." "Poh, poh," said the duke, "we should as soon think of restraining you from getting a child, lest when it came to maturity it should conquer France." This anecdote shews the delicacy of his mind and his high sense of honour. He was one of the six English officers who at the beginning of the seven years war entered into an agreement with each other not to marry until peace was restored; that no domestic relations might influence their conduct. Generals Wolfe, Monkton, and Keppel were among the number. His lordship died at Twickenham, Oct. 21, 1803.—Monthly Mag.

CAULET (Francis Stephen de), a French bishop, famous for his opposition to the court in the regale, or the assumed right of the crown to dispose of ecclesiastical benefices during the vacancy of a see. For this he was deposed, and died in 1680. He was a very virtuous prelate, and effected a considerable reform in his diocese.—Moreri.

CAULIAC (Guy de), a French anatomist, and physician to the popes Clement VI. and Urban V. He published, in 1363, Chirurgiæ tractatus septem cum Antidotario. He also wrote a Compendium of Surgery, of which art he is called the restorer.—Ibid.

CAUSSIN (Nicholas), a learned French jesuit and confessor to Lewis XIII. Cardinal Richelieu caused him to be banished from court for opposing his measures. He died at Paris in 1651, aged 71. The most esteemed of his works is entitled, the Holy Court which has been translated into English; besides which he wrote an excellent work, De Eloquentia Sacra et Humana, 1619, 4to.—Ibid.

CAWDREY (Daniel), a nonconformist divine, was bred at Peter-house, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. He settled at Dilling, in Northamptonshire, from whence he was ejected in 1662. He was a noted member of the assembly at Westminster, and a considerable disputant. He died in 1664. He wrote some polemical pieces against the established church, practical treatises and sermons.—Gulamy.

CAWTON (Thomas), a nonconformist divine, was minister of St. Bartholomew's behind the Exchange, and being implicated in Love's plot against Cromwell was obliged to fly to Holland, where he became one of the pastors of the English church at Rotterdam, and died there in 1659. He was learned in the oriental tongues, and assisted in promoting the Polyglot Bible, and Dr. Castell's Polyglot Lexicon.—Life by his Son, 8vo. 1662.

CAWTON (Thomas), a puritan divine, was educated at Rotterdam, and afterwards at Utrecht, where he acquired a knowledge of the oriental tongues. On his return to England he was entered of Merton college, Oxford, where he was episcopally ordained. In 1662 he left the university on account of nonconformity, after which he officiated to a dissenting congregation in Westminster, where he died in 1677, aged about 40. He wrote the Life of his Father, 8vo; Dissertatio de Usu Linguae Hebraicae in Philosophia Theoretica; Disputatio de Versione Syriaca Vet. et Novi Testamenti, 4to. Balaam's Wish, 8vo.—Calamy.

CAXTON (William), the first English printer, was born in Kent about the year 1410. At the age of 15 he was apprenticed to a mercer, and on the death of his master he went abroad, as agent to the mercers' company. He was afterwards in the service of lady Margaret of York, wife of the duke of Burgundy. During his residence in Flanders he acquired a knowledge of the new invention of printing, and the first book he printed was the Recuyell of the History of Troy, translated by himself from the French, 1471. But the first book printed in England was the Game of Chess, which he executed in Westminster Abbey in 1474. His next performance was the Dictes and Sayengis of the Philosophers, translated out of French by Antone erle Ryvvyres lord Seerles, emprinted by Wyllyam Caxton at Westmestre, 1477. He died 1491.—Lewis's Life of Caxton. Biog. Br.

CAYLUS (Ann-Claude-Philip de, count of), a French writer, was born of a noble family at Paris in 1692. He entered into the army, which he quitted after the peace of Rastadt, and then travelled through a great part of Europe and Asia. He had a fine taste for the arts, to which he added a considerable classical knowledge. To him the world is indebted for the publication of that magnificent work, the Description of the Gems in the Royal Cabinet. In 1731 he became a member of the academy of painting, in which he founded a prize for drawing. He discovered the ancient art of encaustic painting, and of tinging marble, from hints in the works of Pliny the elder. He wrote numerous dissertations on the arts; a Collection of Etruscan, Greek, Roman and Gaulish Antiquities, 7 vols. 4to.; a Discourse on Ancient Pictures; and other works of great merit. He died in 1765.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

CAZES (Peter James), an eminent French painter, was born at Paris in 1676. Discovering an early genius for drawing he was placed under Houasse the elder, and afterwards with Boullogne, and he profited so well as to gain several of the prizes given by the academy. He was received a member of that body in 1703. His reputation was established by a noble picture painted for the church of Notre Dame, representing the woman with an issue of blood. He died in 1754. His works are numerous in France.—D'Argenville.

CEBA (Ansoldo), an Italian poet, born at Genoa in 1565, and died in 1623. He wrote two heroic poems, entitled "Esther," and "Il Furio Camillo." The first was prohibited by the court of Rome for blending mythology with the sacred history. He wrote also two tragedies, the Gemelle Capoane, and the Alcippo. He was likewise the author of a History of Rome, and other works.—Tiraboschi.

CEBES, a Greek philosopher, was a native of Thebes, and the disciple of Socrates. The Pinax, or Tablature of Human Life, attributed to him, is questioned by some critics. It is usually printed with the Enchiridion of Epictetus.—Moreri.

CECCO DE ASCOLI, whose real name was Francis degli Stabili, was born at Ascoli. He was a poet and physician, and well skilled in mechanics. In 1322 he was made professor of astrology and philosophy at Bologna, but fell under the censure of the inquisition for magical pretensions. He removed from Bologna to Florence on being appointed physician and astrologer to the duke of Calabria. Here he was again noticed by the inquisition on the same charge of magic, and condemned to the flames, which was executed in 1327. He wrote a poem called L'Acerta, which went through several editions.—Tiraboschi.

CECIL (William), lord Burleigh, a celebrated English statesman, the son of Richard Cecil, master of the robes to Henry VIII. and born at Bourne in Lancashire in 1521. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Gray's-inn. He married a sister of sir John Cheke, by which means he was introduced to the great duke of Somerset, who appointed him master of requests, and afterwards secretary of state. He also received the honour of knighthood, and had a seat in the privy council. When Mary came to the throne he was dismissed from his employments; but he was still respected, and often consulted by the queen and her ministers. At the accession of Elizabeth he was appointed one of her counsellors, secretary of state, and master of the court of wards. Soon afterwards he was chosen chancellor of Cambridge; and in 1571 advanced to the peerage. He died in 1598, leaving two sons. He was an acute, steady minister, well acquainted with mankind, indefatigable in business, correct in his private deportment, and of unimpeachable integrity in his public capacity. And so disinterested was he, that though he held the office of lord high treasurer 27 years, he left but a moderate estate to his family. He wrote some tracts in answer to libels on the queen and government; and his state papers were published by Haynes in 1740; and a continuation by Murdin in 1760. His second wife was the daughter of sir Anthony Cook, and a lady of great learning and accomplishments. She was well acquainted with the Greek and Latin languages, and wrote a letter in the former to the university of Cambridge, where she founded an exhibition for two poor scholars. She also distinguished herself by several other charitable institutions. She died in 1589; and lord Burleigh was greatly affected by her death, as appears by some pathetic imitations which he wrote on the occasion.—Biog. Br. Butler's British Ladies.

CERT (Robert), earl of Salisbury, was second son of the above lord and lady Burleigh, and born in 1563. He was of a weak constitution, and deformed in person, but his understanding compensated for his bodily defect, and it was greatly improved and exalted by a most liberal education. His father took pains to instil into him the knowledge necessary for a courtier and statesman. He was at first assistant to secretary Walsingham, and on the death of that great man became his successor. He was very instrumental in the destruction of the earl of Essex, and cultivated the friendship of James King of Scots, by which means he became a favourite with that monarch on his accession to the English throne. In 1605 he was created earl of Salisbury, and made knight of the garter. On the death of lord Dorset in 1608 he was appointed high treasurer, in which important office he behaved with a faithful regard to the interests of the people. The concern he had in bringing Sir Walter Raleigh to the scaffold is an eternal disgrace to his memory, though he was in other respects the ablest and best minister of that period. He died in 1612.—Biog. Brit.

CEROPUS, an Egyptian, who founded Athens about 1556 years B.C. He married the daughter of Ateus, a Grecian prince, and gave his name of Ceropus to the country over which he reigned. After a long reign of 50 years he died, and left three daughters.—Univ. Hist.

CERYENUS (George), a Greek monk of the 11th century, who wrote a History from the Creation to the year 1057. It was printed with a Latin version at Paris in 1617.—Dupin.

CELESTI (Andrea), a Venetian painter of great merit, who died in 1706, aged 69. He painted several beautiful views in Italy; also some fine pictures for churches.—Pilgrimage.

CELESTINE I. a pope and saint, succeeded Boniface I. in 422. He condemned the doctrine of Nestorius in a council held at Rome in 430. He died in 432, with the reputation of wisdom and sanctity.—CELESTINE II. was elected in 1123, on the death of Innocent II. and sat in the chair only five months.—CELESTINE III. the successor of Clement III. in 1191. He claimed the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and gave the latter to Frederic, the son of the emperor Henry VI. on condition of his paying a tribute to the holy see. He died in 1198.—CELESTINE IV. This pope died in 1241, eighteen days after his election.—CELESTINE V. a pope and saint. He was a benedictine monk, and founded a new order, called the Celestines, which was suppressed in France in 1778. Celestine confined himself to his cell, where he led a life of constant devotion. The fame of his sanctity caused him to be elected pope in 1294. Cardinal Cajetan by an artifice prevailed upon him to resign the chair, after which he got himself elected in his stead by the name of Boniface VIII. He then caused the credulous Celestine to be imprisoned in a castle, where he died in 1296. Clement V. canonized him in 1313.—Dupin. Platina. Bower.

CELLARIUS (Christopher), a learned writer, was born in 1638 at Smalcalde in Franconia. In 1667 he was appointed professor of Hebrew and moral philosophy at Weisensfels, and in 1673 rector of the college at Weymar, which place he quitted afterwards for the same office at Zerts. In 1678 he removed to Meribourg, and in 1693 accepted the professorship of history at Halle, where he died in 1707. He edited several Latin and Greek authors; but he is best known by his Notitia Orbis Antiqua, 2 vols. 4to.; Atlas Cœlestis, folio; Historia Antiqua, 1698, 12mo.; and De Latinitate mediz et infimæ ætatis. His Letters were published after his death.—Moreri.

CELLIER (Remi), a learned benedictine, born at Bar-le-Duc in 1688, and died in 1761. He compiled a General History of sacred and ecclesiastical Authors, 23 vols. 4to. He also wrote an Apology for the Morality of the Fathers against Barbeyrac.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CELLINI (Benvenuto), a famous artist, was born at Florence in 1500, and served his apprenticeship to a jeweller and goldsmith. He also learnt drawing, engraving, and music; and Clement VII. appointed him his goldsmith and musician. He was a man of a turbulent and restless spirit, but of an undaunted courage; and when Rome was besieged by the duke of Bourbon, the charge of the castle of St. Angelo was committed to Cellini. The same pontiff employed him to make stamps for the mint, and the coins and medals which he executed are exquisitely beautiful. On the death of Clement he returned to Florence, from whence he went to France, where he was patronized by Francis I. but being of a roving disposition he soon left that country, and revisited Rome, where he was confined a long time in the castle of St. Angelo, on the charge of having robbed that fortress of a considerable treasure when he had the care of it. His escape from this prison was wonderful; but he was retaken, and suffered great hardships till he was released by the mediation of cardinal Ferrara. He then went to France, and was admitted into the service of Francis. He executed some fine works of sculpture in that country, and particularly cast large figures of metal, which gained him a high reputation. After staying there five years he returned to his own country, where he was employed by the grand duke Cosmo. He worked equally well in marble and metal. He died at Florence in 1570. Cellini wrote a treatise on the goldsmith's art, and another on sculpture and the casting of metals.—Life written by himself, and translated into English by Dr. Nugent, 2 vols. 8vo.

CELSUS (Aurelius Cornelius), a celebrated physician. He flourished at Rome in the reign of Tiberius; and wrote eight books on medicine, the best edition of which is that of Leyden, 1730, in 2 vols. 8vo. or Paris, 1722, 12mo. He also wrote treatises on Agriculture, Rhetoric, and Military Affairs, which are lost.—Hulier. Bibl. Méd. Friend's Hist. of Physic.

CELSUS, an epicurean philosopher of the 2d century, who wrote a book against the christian religion, which was answered by Origen. That of Celsus is lost; but he appears to have been a subtle disputant.—Dopin. Moreri.

CELTES (Cotrad), a modern Latin poet, born in 1459, and died at Vienna in 1508. Besides his Odes, Epigrams, and Amatory Verses, he wrote a History of the City of Nuremberg, 1513.—Moreri.

CENSORINUS (Appius Claudius), a Roman senator, and twice consul, who in 270 was compelled to accept the purple by his soldiers, who murdered him seven days afterwards. He is not to be confounded with the consul of that name, to whom Horace addressed an ode. He lived in the time of Augustus.—Moreri.

CENSORINUS, a grammarian of the third century. He flourished at Rome, and wrote a book entitled De die Natali, printed at Cambridge in 1659. It treats of the birth of man, of years, months, and days.—Voff. de Hist. Lat.

CENTLIVRE (Sufannah), an ingenious dramatic writer, was the daughter of a Lincolnshire gentleman named Freeman, but she is supposed to have been born in Ireland about 1667. Being ill-used by her relations she went to England, and became the mistress of Anthony Hammond, esq. then a student at Cambridge, where she passed as his servant, being dressed in man's clothes. From Cambridge she removed to London, and married a nephew of sir Stephen Fox, but becoming a widow shortly after, she took a second husband, who was an officer in the army. In less than two years after, her husband was killed in a duel. She then turned dramatic author for a subsistence, and she also ventured to perform, but her success as an actress did not equal her reputation as a writer. Some of her comedies possess considerable merit, particularly the Busy Body, and A Bold Stroke for a Wife. In 1706 she married Mr. Centlivre, yeoman of the mouth to queen Anne. Besides her dramatic pieces, in 3 vols. 12mo.

she wrote poems and letters. She died in 1723.—Bizz. Brit.

CENTORIO (Ascanius), a celebrated Italian, who was not only a soldier, but a scholar; and wrote Military Annals of his Time, printed at Venice in 1565, and 1569, in 2 vols. 4to.—Tirab. Bibl.

CERATINUS (James), a learned Dutchman, whose true name was Tyng, which he changed to one of Greek derivation, the translation of Horn or Horn, of which place he was a native. On the recommendation of Erasmus, by whom he was greatly esteemed, he became Greek professor at Leipsic. He died at Louvain in 1530. He translated Chrysostom on the priesthood into Latin; and published a Græco-Latin lexicon, and a book de Sono Græcarum Literarum.—Boyle.

CERCEAU (John Anthony du), a French poet, was born at Paris in 1670, and at the age of eighteen entered among the jesuits. In 1705 he published a collection of Latin poems, which gained him considerable reputation; but his French poetry was little esteemed. He wrote also some comedies and critical pieces. He died in 1730.—Moreri.

CERDA (John Lewis de la), a learned Spanish jesuit, who wrote Commentaries upon Virgil, Cæsar, and Tertullian. He died in 1643.—Moreri.

CERDON, a heretic of the 2d century, who maintained two principles; one good, the creator of heaven; the other evil, who created the earth. He rejected the Old Testament, and allowed only a part of the New; he also held that Christ had not a real body.—M. Jeun.

CERETA (Laura), an ingenious Italian lady, born at Brescia in 1469. She acquired a considerable knowledge of the learned languages and philosophy. Being left a widow very young, she devoted herself wholly to literary pursuits, but died in the prime of life, about 1498. A collection of her Latin letters was published at Padua in 1680.—Tirab. Bibl.

CERINI (Giovanni Dominico), an Italian painter, born at Perugia in 1606, and died in 1681. He was the disciple of Guido and Domenichino. His historical subjects are happily executed.—Pilkington.

CERINTHUS, an heresiarch, the disciple of Simon Magus. He lived A. D. 54; and attacked the divinity of Jesus Christ. It is said that as St. John was going into the public baths, and seeing Cerinthus, he retired with indignation, not enduring the company of an enemy to his Saviour.—E. Jeun. Mosheim.

CERISANTES (Mark Duncan de), an ingenious writer, was the son of a Scotch physician at Saumur, in France. He acquired considerable reputation by his elegant address and his literary talents; but he was excessively vain and quarrelsome. Cardinal Richelieu sent him envoy to Constantinople, of which journey he wrote an account in Latin. He was afterwards envoy at the court of Sweden; but was deprived for challenging a French nobleman. He was killed while serving under the duke of Guise in Italy, in 1618. Two Latin odes by him are in the Menagiana.—Bayle.

CERMENATI (John de), an Italian historian, who flourished about the year 1330. He wrote in elegant Latin, and with great accuracy, the history of his native city, Milan, from 1307 to 1313. It was printed by Muratori in his Collection of Italian Historians, 1726.—Tiraboschi.

CERRATO (Paul), a latin poet, was born at Alba in Montferrat, in 1485. His principal production is a poem in 3 books, De Virginitate. All his works are in the Deliciae Poetarum Italarum.—Ibid.

CERUTI (Frederic), a learned Italian, was born at Verona in 1541. He was brought up in France by the charity of the bishop of Agen, who intended him for the church; but Ceruti disliking that profession returned to Verona, married, and opened an academy. He died in 1579. He published an edition of Horace with a paraphrase, which was followed by similar ones of Persius and Juvenal. He was the author of a Dialogue on Comedy, in Latin; and another, De Recta Adolescentulorum Institutione; and some poems and letters in the same language.—Ibid.

CERUTTI (Joseph Antony Joachim), born at Turin in 1738. He was educated among the jesuits, and having entered into that order, was made professor in their college at Lyons. He gained two prizes from the academy at Toulouse and Dijon when young. On the abolition of his order he wrote an apology for that institution, which he was obliged afterwards to recant by the parliament of Paris. The duchess des Brancas then took him to live with her, and he resided under her roof fifteen years. When the revolution commenced he entered into it with ardour, and became, through Mirabeau, a member of the legislative assembly. He died in 1792. He conducted a popular revolutionary paper, entitled, Feuille Villageoise. His miscellaneous pieces were collected and published the year after his death.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CERVANTES; see SAAVEDRA.

CERVETTO, an Italian musician, who came to England about 1740, being then an old man; and was engaged at the theatre in Drury-lane to play the bass. He died in 1783, aged 103. The following anecdote is told of this performer and Mr. Garrick: One night, when the house was in profound silence during one of Garrick's solemn pauses, poor Cervetto, being half asleep, stretched wide his jaws, and uttered a loud yawn, which set the audience in a roar of laughter. This was very mortifying to the English Roscius, who afterwards attacked the musician with violence in the green-room. Oh, Mr. Garrick! (cried the humble scraper), I beg ten thousand pardons—but it is alway the way ven I be ver much pleased. This flattery immediately disarmed Garrick of his anger.—Gen. B. D.

CESARINI (Julian), a cardinal, was born of a respectable family at Rome in the 14th century. Pope Martin V. employed him as nuncio, and as a reward for his services made him cardinal in 1426, and sent him to Bohemia to oppose the Hussites. Eugenius IV. recalled him, and appointed him president of the council of Basil, where he displayed considerable learning and eloquence. He was next at the council of Ferrara, and proved a powerful antagonist of the Greek schismatics. Eugenius after this sent him to Hungary, to persuade king Ladislaus to break his treaty with the Turks. The consequence of this was the battle of Varna in 1444, in which the christians were defeated, and Ladislaus and the cardinal slain. Many of his letters and orations are in print.—Moreri.

CESARINI (Virginio), a learned Italian, was born at Rome in 1595. So highly was he esteemed for his universal knowledge, that a medal was struck to his honour, on which his head was joined with that of the famous Pico de Mirandula, crowned with laurel. He was chamberlain to Urban VIII. and would have been cardinal, but was taken off by death in 1624. He published a collection of Latin and Italian poems; which are very elegant.—Tiraboschi.

CESEDES (Paul), an eminent Spanish painter; his picture of the last supper, in the cathedral of Cordova, is greatly admired. He was a man of letters as well as an artist, and wrote a learned book on ancient and modern painting. He died in 1608, aged above 70.—Cumberland's Anc. of Spanish Painters.

CHABANON (N. de), a French writer, and member of the academy of sciences and of that of belles lettres, died at Paris in 1792, aged about 60. He wrote some dramatic pieces of indifferent merit, but his translation of Pindar obtained the praise of Voltaire. He also translated Theocritus, and wrote a dissertation on Homer; the Eulogies of Rameau, &c. the Life of Dante; a Treatise on Music, 2 vols. 8vo.; and his own life. His brother CHABANON de Mangris, who died in 1780, was also an ingenious writer. He had a taste for poetry and music, and wrote an opera, called Alexis and Daphne, and some other dramatic performances.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHABOT (Francis), one of the actors and victims of the French revolution, was originally a capuchin, but threw off his religious dress for the political, and became a violent Jacobin. As a member of the convention he proposed several lauguinary measures, but was at last executed for being concerned with Danton, April 5, 1794, aged 35.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHABRIAS, an Athenian general, who distinguished himself by assisting the Boeotians against Agesilaus, for which a statue was erected to his honour. He conquered Cyprus for the king of Egypt, but was slain shortly after at Chio B.C. 355.—Cornelius Nepos.

CHABRIT (Peter), a French advocate, who is known by a book in 2 vols. entitled, Of the French Monarchy and its Laws, printed in 1785, the year of the author's death. Diderot recommended him to the empress Catharine of Russia to assist in the formation of a new legislative system in her dominions; but Chabrit died before the empress's answer was received.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHABRY (Mark), a painter and sculptor, who died at Lyons in 1727, aged 67. Several of his works ornamented Lyons, particularly a fine equestrian statue of Lewis XIV. but all of them were destroyed in the revolution. He was appointed sculptor to that monarch. His son Mark followed his father's profession, but his works were mostly destroyed by the revolutionary fanatics.—Ibid.

CHAIS (Charles), a protestant divine, born at Geneva in 1701, and in 1728 chosen pastor of the French congregation at the Hague, where he died in 1785. He was an admirable preacher, and a benevolent and pious man. He translated the Bible into French, 6 vols. 4to. and wrote an Apolo- gy for Inoculation, and several theological pieces.—Ibid.

CHAISE (Francis de la), a French jesuit, was born in 1624, and educated in the jesuits' college at Rouen; and after teaching the belles lettres and theology with reputation, became provincial of Lyons, which office he quitted in 1675, on being appointed confessor to Lewis XIV. He acquired a prodigious influence over that monarch, and was consulted by him on all important occasions; and even when he was grown old and deaf, and his mental faculties were decayed, the king, to use the expression of a French author, would have the carcase of his confessor brought to him that he might seem to consult him. He died in 1709.—Moreri. Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHALCIDIUS, a platonic philosopher of the third century, who wrote a commentary upon the Timæus of Plato, which was translated from the Greek into Latin, and printed at Leyden in 1617, 4to.—Moreri.

CHALCONDYLES (Demetrius), a learned Greek, who came into Italy when Constantinople was taken, and settled in 1479 at Florence, from whence he removed to Milan, and taught Greek till his death in 1513, at the age of 80. He wrote a Greek grammar, and published the lexicon of Suidas in 1499.—Tiraboschi. Moreri.

CHALCONDYLES (Laonicus), an Athenian of the 15th century, who wrote a history of the Turks from 1298 to 1462, which has been translated into Latin, and published in 1650. A French translation appeared in 1662 in 2 vols. folio.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHALES (Claudius Francis de), a jesuit and mathematician, was born at Chamberi in 1621. He was nominated royal professor of hydrography at Marseilles, and taught mathematics for many years in the jesuits' college at Lyons. His superiors appointed him professor of theology, a department which he was indifferently calculated to fill. Emanuel duke of Savoy saw the impropriety of this, and by his advice the society named father Chales to the mathematical chair. He died at Turin in 1678. He wrote a Complete Course of Mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo.; A Treatise of Navigation and Researches on the Centre of Gravity; A History of Mathematics from Thales to the year 1680.—Moreri.

CHALLE (Charles Michael Angelo), professor in the academy of painting at Paris, where he was born in 1718, and died in 1778. He was honoured with letters of nobility, and the order of St. Michael, in compliment to his talents. The king of Prussia, the empress of Russia, and other princes, endeavoured to draw him into their service, but he preferred residing in his own country. He imitated with success the respective manners of Guido and Salvator Rosa. He left in manuscript a translation of the works of Piranesi, and Travels in Italy.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHALONER (sir Thomas), an eminent statesman, born at London about 1516. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards attended the English embassy to the emperor Charles V. and entered into the service of that monarch as a volunteer in his expedition to Algiers. On his return to England he was made clerk to the privy council, and distinguished himself so greatly at the battle of Musselburgh that the duke of Somerset knighted him on the field. Queen Elizabeth sent him ambassador first to Germany and then to Spain, in which capacity he behaved with great address. He died at London in 1565. Sir Thomas translated Erasmus's Morizæ Encomium, and wrote a book, entitled De Republica Anglorum instauranda, libri decem, and other pieces.—Biog. Br.

CHALONER (sir Thomas), the son of the above, was born in 1559, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, after which he went abroad, and acquired in his travels a considerable knowledge of natural philosophy and chemistry. After his return he married the daughter of sir William Fleetwood, recorder of London, by whom he had several children. In 1591 he was knighted, and about that time discovered the first alum mines ever known in England on his estate near Gisborough in Yorkshire. They were, however, taken possession of by the crown, but in the long parliament restored to sir Thomas's family. He was appointed tutor to Henry prince of Wales, and continued about his person till the death of that promising prince. Sir Thomas died in 1615. His eldest son was created a baronet in 1620, and the title became extinct in 1681.—Biog. Brit.

CHALONER (Edward), an English divine, was educated at All-souls college, Oxford; became chaplain to James I. and principal of Alban-hall. His sermons were much valued at that period. He died of the plague at Oxford in 1625, aged 34.—Wood's A. O.

CHALONER (James), son of sir Thomas Chaloner, was born in London in 1603, and educated at Brasenose college, Oxford, from whence he removed to one of the inns of court. In the rebellion he sided with the parliament, and was returned for Aldborough in Yorkshire, and acted so zealously as to be appointed one of the king's judges. Fairfax made him governor of Peck castle in the Isle of Man. At the restoration messengers were sent to apprehend him, and send him to London; on being informed of which he poisoned himself. He wrote a Short Treatise of the Isle of Man, appended to King's Vale Royal of Cheshire, fol. 1656. His brother Thomas was a violent republican, and one of the king's judges. At the restoration he went to Middleburg in Zealand, where he died in 1661. He wrote, among other things, a pretended discovery of the Tomb of Moses on the top of Mount Nebo, 1657, 8vo. which book made a great noise for the time, and extremely puzzled (says Wood) the presbyterian rabbies, till it was found to be a sham.—Wood.

CHALOTAIS (Lewis Rene Caradenc de la), solicitor-general to the parliament of Rennes, distinguished himself by his zeal in the affair of the jésuits, on which subject he wrote an energetic work in 2 vols. 1762. He was afterwards imprisoned for opposing the proceedings of the commandant of his province. He died in 1715. He wrote an Essay on National Education, 8vo. His son, who succeeded him in his office, was guillotined at Paris in 1794.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHAMBERLAINE (Robert), an English poet, was born in Lancashire, and became a member of Exeter college, Oxford, in 1637, at which time, however, he was thirty years of age. He wrote, 1. Nocturnal Lucubrations or Meditations divine and moral, to which are added Epigrams and Epitaphs, 1681, 12mo. 2. The swaggering Daniel, a comedy, 1640, 4to. 3. Sicelides, a pastoral. Wood.

CHAMBERLAYNE (Edward), an English writer, was born at Odington in Gloucestershire, in 1616, and educated at Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. After the restoration he was elected F.R.S. and went to Sweden as secretary to the embassy. In 1670 he received the degree of LL.D. from the university of Cambridge. About 1679 he was appointed tutor to Henry duke of Grafton, natural son of Charles II.; and he had the honour of instructing prince George of Denmark in the English language. He died at Chelsea in 1703. He directed by will that some of his books should be covered with wax and buried with him, that they might be serviceable to future ages. The work by which he is best known is the Present State of England, which passed through near forty editions.—Biog. Br.

CHAMBERLAYNE (John), son of the preceding, was educated at Oxford, and died in 1724, aged about 60. He continued his father's Present State of England, translated Nieuwenydt's Religious Philosopher, and other books; and communicated three papers to the royal society, of which he was a member.—Ibid.

CHAMBERS (Ephraim), the compiler of the Cyclopaedia, was a native of Kendal in the county of Westmorland. He was placed under Mr. Senex, an eminent globe maker, and while an apprentice formed the plan of his dictionary. This design occupied his whole attention, and the first edition of it appeared in 1728, in 2 vols. folio. The next year he was chosen F.R.S. In 1738 a new edition came out, with additions, and which is extraordinary, a third in the very next year; a fourth in 1741; and a fifth in 1746. It was afterwards continued by Mr. Scott and Dr. Hill; but the best edition is that of Dr. Abraham Rees, publishing in 4to. Besides this great work he was engaged in translating and abridging the History of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. He also translated the Jesuit's Perspective. He died in 1740, and was buried in Westminster abbey.—Ibid.

CHAMBERS (sir William), surveyor-general of the board of works, tellow of the royal and antiquarian societies, treasurer of the royal academy, and knight of the polar star in Sweden, was descended of an ancient Scotch family, but born at Stockholm, where his father had resided some years. At the age of eighteen he was appointed supercargo to the Swedish East India Company, and brought from China the Asiatic stile of ornament, which became so fashionable in England at one time, under the patronage of the king, as generally to be adopted. Mr. Chambers settled in England, obtained considerable business as an architect, and was appointed surveyor-general. The building of Somerset-house will prove a lasting monument of his skill and taste; but his principal works are his stair-cases, and his designs for interior arrangements. His treatise on civil architecture is a valuable work. He died March 5, 1796.—Europ. Mag. Monthly M.g.

CHAMBERS (sir Robert), an eminent

Judge, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1737. He was educated under Mr. Moyfes in that town, with lord Eldon and sir William Scott, whose attachment to him continued through life. In 1754 he was chosen exhibitor of Lincoln college, Oxford, and afterwards became fellow of Univerſity college, where he was again associated with the Scotts and other eminent characters, particularly ſir William Jones. In 1766 he was elected vinerian profeſſor of law in the room of ſir William Blackſtone, a high teſtimony of his abilities and worth. At the ſame time he was appointed principal of New Inn hall. His professional talents were now conſpicuous, and procured him the eſteem and friendſhip of the ableſt men of his time, as the earls Bathurſt, Mansfield, Liverpool, and Roſſlyn; lords Thurlow, Aſhburton, and Alvanley, to whom may be added Johnſon, Burke, Goldſmith, Garrick, and others. In 1768 he was offered the attorney-generalſhip of Jamaica, which he declined. In 1773 he accepted the place of ſecond judge in the ſupreme court of judicature at Bengal, on which occaſion the univerſity paid him a particular mark of reſpect, by continuing to him the profeſſorſhip three years, in caſe he ſhould think proper to return. Before he went to India he married the daughter of Mr. Wilton the ſtatuary. In 1778 the honour of knighthood was conferred on him, as a proof of the royal approbation of his upright conduct. In 1782 he had the miſfortune to loſe his eldeſt ſon, who was paſſenger in the Groſvenor Eaſt-Indiaman, ſhipwrecked on her voyage to England. Sir Robert ſucceeded to the office of chief juſtice on the reſignation of ſir Elijah Impey, in 1791; and in 1797 he became preſident of the Aſiatic ſociety. In 1799 he returned to England, but his conſtitution being delicate, ſoon felt the effects of a northern climate, and the autumn of 1802 he went to France for the benefit of his health. He died at Paris on the 9th of May following, and his remains being brought to England, were interred in the Temple church. Sir Robert was an excellent ſcholar, poſſeſſed a fine taſte, united to a feeling ſenſe of religion, and the ſtrict eſt integrity of life. He wrote an elegant epitaph in Latin, inſcribed on the monument of his friend ſir William Jones, at Oxford. His collection of oriental books was particularly valuable. — Genl. Mag. Monthly Mag.

CHAMIER (Daniel), a learned French divine of the proteſtant church; born at Montelimar in Dauphiny, and profeſſor of divinity at Montauban, where he was killed when that place was beſieged in 1621. He is ſaid to have been a profound politician, and to have drawn up the edict of Nantes. He wrote a learned book againſt Bellarmine, in 4 vols. folio. But his Treatiſe de Œcumenico Pontifice, and Jefuits Letters, are moſt eſteemed. — Bayle.

CHAMILLARD (Stephen), a learned jeſuit, born at Bourges in 1656, and died at Paris in 1730. He published, 1. an edition of Prudentius ad uſum Delphini, 1687. 2. Diſſertations on ſeveral Medals, Gems, and other Monuments of Antiquity, 4to, 1711. He was a profound antiquary, but very credulous, and often impoſed on. — Mar.

CHAMILLART (Michael de), a French ſtateſman, was born at Caen in 1651. His father was a maſter of requeſts, and Michael, who was brought up to the ſame profeſſion, became counſellor of the parliament of Paris. He was particularly ſkilful as a player at billiards, and Lewis XIV. being fond of that game, Chamillart was introduced to him by ſome noblemen, and ſo ingratiated himſelf with the monarch, that he made him comptroller general of the finances, and afterwards miniſter of war, for which offices he was not at all qualified, though otherwiſe a very excellent man. He reſigned his places in 1709, and died in 1721. Many pleaſing ſtories are told of his generoſity. — Nouv. Diſt. Hiſt.

CHAMOUSSET (Charles Humbert Piarron de), a benevolent Frenchman, born at Paris in 1717. He was a judge in the parliament of that city, and ſtudied medicine that he might be ſerviceable to the poor. He reformed the Hotel Dieu, and was appointed intendant-general of the military hospitals, which office he diſcharged in the moſt honourable manner. He died in 1773. — Ibid.

CHAMPAIGNE (Philip de), a famous painter, born at Bruffels in 1602, and died in 1642. He became painter to the queen of France, and was one of the firſt members of the academy of painting at Paris, where he reſided the greateſt part of his life. Many of his pictures have been engraved. His nephew, John Baptiſt Champagne, was a good artiſt, and a member of the academy. He died in 1688. — D'Argenville Vie: des Peintres.

CHAMPEAUX (William de), in Latin Campellensis, a ſcholastic divine in the 11th century, born at Champeaux, a village in the province of Brie. He taught philoſophy with great reputation at Paris, and had Abelard for a pupil, who afterwards became his rival. Champeaux, in 1113, was appointed biſhop of Chalons, and died in 1121. A treatiſe of his, on the Origin of the Soul, is in print. — Moreri.

CHAMFORT (N.), a French writer, commenced his career as clerk to an attorney, and was afterwards tutor to a rich heir of Lyons. He next ſettled at Paris, where he conducted the Journal Encyclopedique. He alſo published the Elogies of Moliere and Fontenelle, which gained him the prizes from the French academy and that of Marſeilles. Theſe procured him conſiderable reputation, and the patronage of the duke de Choiseuil and madame Helvetius, who engaged him in compiling a French vocabulary, and a dictionary of the theatres. The latter work led him to dramatic composition, and he wrote some pieces which were praised by Voltaire, particularly the tragedy of Mulapha. Champfort published several poetical pieces and translations. He was the intimate friend of Mirabeau, and they assisted each other in their writings, particularly in the piece published by the latter on the order of Cincinnatus. At first he was a friend to the revolution, but afterwards grew disgusted with its terrible outrages. He suffered imprisonment under Robespierre, and the horrors he witnessed produced such an effect upon his mind that he put an end to himself in 1794. His works were printed at Paris, in 4 vols. 8vo. 1795.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

CHAMPIER (Symphorien), in Latin Camperius and Campegnis, a learned physician, born at Lyons, and educated at Pavia. He served Antony duke of Lorraine both as a physician and soldier in the wars of Italy, for which he was knighted. He was the founder of the college of physicians at Lyons, and wrote several learned works. He died about 1540. His son Claude wrote a book on the singularities of the Gauls.—Moreri.

CHAMPLAIN (Samuel de), a French naval officer, who founded Quebec in Canada, of which he was governor-general. He wrote Travels in New France or Canada, 4to. 1632. There is a lake in that country which still bears his name. He died in 1634.—Ibid.

CHAMPMELE (Mary-Desmazes de), a French actress, was born at Rouen in 1644. She was at first a strolling player, and afterwards appeared at Paris, where she met with uncommon success. Racine had a great respect for her, and gave her instructions in the performance of tragedy. She died in 1698. Her husband was also an actor and a dramatic writer. He died in 1701, and his works were published in 1742, 2 vols. 12mo.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

CHANCELLOR (Richard), an English adventurer, who commanded under sir Hugh Willoughby in his unfortunate voyage to discover a north-west passage to China in 1553. This expedition was undertaken by the interest and under the direction of Sebastian Cabot, who obtained from Edward VI. letters of recommendation written in Latin, Greek, and other languages, to the sovereigns in the north-east parts of the world. In this voyage sir Hugh Willoughby was parted from his company, and perished with his crew on the coast of Lapland, where they stopped to winter. Captain Chancellor had better fortune, and discovered Russia, where he was introduced to the grand duke John Basilovitz, who received him graciously, and gave permission to the English to trade in his dominions, which was the foundation of the Russian company. On Chancellor's arrival in England, king Edward was dead, but queen Mary was too sensible of the advantages offered by the discovery to let the opportunity of enlarging commerce pass by, and a company of adventurers was incorporated, by whom the captain was sent again to Russia. In his return to England, he was accompanied by a Russian ambassador and suite, but was unfortunately lost on the coast of Norway, where Chancellor perished after nobly exerting himself to save the Russians who were with him, and who arrived at last in London in 1557.—Hacknuyt's Voyages.

CHANDLER (Mary), an English poetess, born at Malmesbury in Wiltshire in 1687. She resided at Bath as a milliner, and one of her poems met with the approbation of Mr. Pope. She was never married, and died in 1745.—Biographium Femininum.

CHANDLER (Samuel), a dissenting divine, was born at Hungerford in Berkshire in 1693, and educated for the ministry. In 1716 he was chosen minister of the congregation at Peckham, near London, and the income being slender, he set up as a bookseller in the Poultry; which business he continued till he was appointed minister at the Old Jewry. In 1725 he printed a Vindication of the Christian Religion, which gained him considerable reputation. This work was followed by several others, particularly a Paraphrase and Commentary on the Prophecy of Joel; a History of Persecution; and a Vindication of the History of the Old Testament. On a visit to Scotland, he was complimented by the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh with the degree of D.D. He was also elected a member of the royal and antiquarian societies. His sermon on the death of George II. in which he compared that monarch to David, occasioned Annet's pamphlet, entitled The History of the Man after God's own Heart; upon which the doctor wrote, his History of the Life of David, in 2 vols. 8vo. He died in 1766. His sermons have been printed in 4 vols. 8vo.—Biog. Brit.

CHANDLER (Edward), a learned English prelate, was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and in 1693 was chaplain to Dr. Lloyd bishop of Litchfield and Coventry. In 1717 he became bishop of the same diocese, from whence, in 1730, he was translated to Durham. He died in 1750, aged about 80. He published various single sermons, but is best known by his "Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, wherein are considered all the objections against this kind of proof, advanced in a late Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion," of which three editions were printed. He was also the author of a Chronological Dissertation prefixed to Arnold's Commentary on Ecclesiasticus; and he wrote a curious biographical Preface to Dr. Cudworth's Treatise on Morality.—Monthly Mag. March 1803.

CHANTREAU-LE-FEVRE (Lewis), a learned French antiquary, was born at Paris in 1588, and became intendant of the duchies of Bar and Lorraine, of which countries he wrote the history. He died in 1658.—Moreri.

CHANOT (Peter), ambassador of France to Christina queen of Sweden, and afterwards to Holland. He died in 1662. His memoirs were published after his death.—Ibid.

CHAPELAIN (John), a French poet, born in 1595, and died in 1674. He was a miser as well as a poet, and amassed great riches. He wrote La Pucelle and other poems.—Ibid.

CHAPELLE (Claude Emanuel L'Huillier), a French poet, born in 1621, and educated under Gassendi. He was the intimate friend of Moliere, who consulted him in the composition of his comedies. He died in 1686. His works were printed at Amsterdam in 1708.—Ibid.

CHAPELLE (John de la), a French writer, born at Bourges in 1655. He was secretary to the prince of Conti, and a member of the French academy. He died in 1723. He wrote several plays, the Life of the Prince of Conti, and other works.—Ibid.

CHAPMAN (George), an English poet. He received a university education, and was well versed in the Latin and Greek languages, and translated Homer's Iliad and Odyssey into English; of which Mr. Pope is said to have made more use than he has acknowledged. He also wrote 17 dramatic pieces, but his genius was indifferent. He died in 1634, aged 77.—Biog. Brit.

CHAPMAN (John), a learned divine, was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge. Archbishop Potter gave him the livings of Mertham and Aldington in Kent; and the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. As executor to the archbishop he presented himself to the precentorship of Lincoln, for which he was attacked in chancery, and obtained a decree in his favour from the chancellor, which was reversed by the house of lords. He died in 1784, aged 80. He wrote Eusebius, or a Defence of Christianity, 2 vols. 8vo. 1749; also two tracts relating to Phlegon, in answer to Dr. Sykes; and he assisted bishop Pearce in his edition of Cicero de Officiis.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CHAFFE D'AUFEROCHÉ (John), a French astronomer, born of a noble family in Upper Auvergne, in 1728, and studied in the college of Louis le Grand, where he made a rapid progress in the mathematics. The celebrated Cassini employed him in delineating his general map of France. In 1752 he translated into French the works of Dr. Halley; and soon after was appointed superintendent of some important works in Lorraine. On his return to Paris he was chosen member of the academy of sciences, and in 1759 promoted to be assistant astronomer. He went to Tobolsk in Siberia in 1760, to observe the transit of Venus, which was to happen June 6th of the year following. In 1768 he published an account of his journey in 3 vols. 4to. and the same year went to California, to observe the transit of Venus, which was to happen in 1769. He died there August 11th of that year.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

CHAPPEL (William), a learned prelate, born of poor parents in Nottinghamshire, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow. He was made dean of Cashel in Ireland, in 1633, and soon after preferred to the provostship of Trinity college, Dublin. In 1638 he was preferred to the see of Cork. At the beginning of the Irish rebellion he retired to England, and died there in 1649. He printed Methodus Concionandi, which was translated into English in 1656. He also wrote an account of his own life.—Biog. Brit.

CHAPONE ^{(Hester) (vide corrigenda ad finem)} ~~(Susan)~~, an ingenious English lady, was born of a respectable family in Northamptonshire named Mulso. Her marriage appears to have been far from happy. Among her first productions were the interesting story of Fidelia, in the Adventurer, and a poem prefixed to the translation of Epictetus, by Mrs. Carter. Her literary reputation, however, rests upon her Letters on the Improvement of the Mind, addressed to a young lady, and printed in 1775. This is truly an excellent work. She also wrote a volume of Miscellanies, containing moral essays and poems. Mrs. Chapone died at Hadley in Middlesex, Dec. 25, 1801, aged 75.—Monthly Mag.

CHARPUZEAU (Samuel), preceptor to William III. king of England, was a native of Geneva. He died in 1701, at Zell, where he was governor of the pages to George duke of Brunswick Lunenburg. He wrote a Description of Lyons; an Account of Savoy; the political State of Europe; and arranged and published the Travels of Tavernier.—Moreri.

CHARAS (Moses), a French physician, who left his native country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes; and was invited to Spain to attend Charles II.: while there the Spanish physicians, out of jealousy, got him imprisoned in the inquisition, from whence he was released on abjuring the protestant religion. He died in France, in 1698, aged 80. His Pharmacopœia was translated into Chinese for the use of the emperor; he also distinguished himself by his experiments on poisons.—Ibid.

CHARDIN (sir John), a celebrated traveller, was born at Paris in 1643, but came to London on the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685. Charles II. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He died in 1719. His travels into Persia and the East Indies are very valuable.—Moreri.

CHARENTON (Joseph Nicholas), a French jesuit, was born in 1659. He was a missionary in Persia sixteen years, and then returned to Paris, where he died in 1735. He translated Mariana's History of Spain into French, with curious notes.—Ibid.

CHARES, a famous statuary, who made the celebrated colossus of the sun at Rhodes, which was destroyed by the Saracens in 667, and the brass loaded 900 camels. It was purchased by a jew.—Plinii Nat. Hist.

CHARETTE DE LA COINTRE (Francis Athanasius de), a celebrated French royalist, and leader of that party in la Vendee, was born in 1763, and bred in the navy, where he rose to the rank of lieutenant. Enflamed against the atrocities of the revolutionists, he headed an army of Bretons, with which he achieved wonders, and at length drove the republicans to the necessity of entering into a treaty with him, which they basely violated, and the war was renewed with additional horrors and various success. At last the weight of numbers prevailed, and he was defeated in February 1796. In that battle he received a wound in his head, and had three fingers of his left hand cut off with a sabre. He made his escape, but was taken soon after in a wood, and conveyed to Nantes, where he was shot March 9th following. He refused to kneel, but bared his breast, and undauntedly gave the soldiers the signal to fire.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

CHARITON, the author of a romance in Greek, entitled the Loves of Chereas and Callirhoe, printed at Amsterdam by Reiske, in 3 vols. 4to. 1750. He was a native of Cyprus, and flourished in the 4th century.

CHARKE (Charlotte), the youngest daughter of Colley Cibber. She was of a masculine turn; and when young married one Charke a musician, who proved a bad husband, in consequence of which she went on the stage, and died in extreme wretchedness in 1759. She published a narrative of her own life.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CHARLEMAGNE, or Charles the Great, king of France, and 4th emperor; born in 742. He was the son of Pepin, and succeeded his brother Carloman, king of France, in 771. After defeating the Saxons, and putting an end to the monarchy of the Lombards, he was crowned emperor in 800. He was an encourager of learning; and founded several universities. He died at Aix la Chapelle in 814.—Un. Hist. Mit. lot.

CHARLES II. called the Bald, king of France; born in 823, crowned in 840, and elected emperor by the pope and people of Rome in 875. He died as it is supposed, of poison, in 877.—Ibid.

CHARLES III. or the Simple; born in 879, and ascended the throne in 898. On the death of Lewis IV. he was elected emperor; but he was reduced to a small dominion by the usurpations of his nobles, and the encroachments of the Normans. His minister Haganon gave so much offence to the nobles, that they revolted against the king, and chose Robert, of the blood royal, who was crowned by the archbishop of Rheims in 922. The same year a battle was fought between the two monarchs, in which Robert was slain; but his son, Hugh the Great, defeated Charles, who fled for shelter to the count of Vermandois; at whose castle he died in 929, aged 50.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

CHARLES IV. the third son of Philip the Fair, obtained the crown of France in 1328. In his reign a fierce war raged between France and England, which ended in the cession of the province of Guienne to the latter country. He died in 1328, aged 34.—Ibid.

CHARLES V. called the Wise, was the eldest son of king John, and the first prince who bore the title of dauphin. He succeeded to the crown on the death of his brother in 1364. He restored the commerce and agriculture of his country, and gained several important advantages over the English. His maxim, that "kings were happy only in proportion as they had the power of doing good," sufficiently entitles him to the character of the wise. He died in 1380, in the 43d year of his age. He founded the library of Paris.—Univ. Hist. Moreri.

CHARLES VI. the Well-beloved, son of the above; born in 1368, and crowned in 1380. His reign was very unfortunate, owing to the bad management of his ministers, and the contentions of the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy for the succession. Henry V. king of England, took advantage of these disputes to invade France, which he conquered, and disinherited the dauphin. Charles died in 1422.—Ibid.

CHARLES VII. called the Victorious, because he regained his kingdom from the English. He was crowned in 1422, and by his activity drove out the invaders from all their possessions, except Calais. He died in 1461.—Ibid.

CHARLES VIII. the Affable, son of Lewis XI. ascended the throne in 1483, aged 13. He conquered Naples, and in 1495 obtained a great victory over the Italians, though their army was five times as large as his own. He died in 1498.—Ibid.

CHARLES IX. born in 1550, and succeeded to the throne in 1560, under his mother, Catherine of Medicis, who abused her trust in a most shameful manner, inasmuch that the protestants, irritated at the oppressions which they endured, revolted, and a civil war ensued, in which the insurgents were unsuccessful. The massacre of Paris will remain an eternal curse on the memory of this prince. It is said, however, that he repented of this horrid crime on his death bed, in 1574.—Ibid.

CHARLES the Gros, emperor of Germany. He was elected in 881, and being deposed, by Arnoul, died of grief and poverty at Constance in 888.—Univ. Hist. Merri.

CHARLES IV. emperor of Germany, was the son of John of Luxemburg, and grandson of the emperor Henry VII. He ascended the throne in 1347. His reign was rendered remarkable by the golden bull given at the diet of Nuremberg in 1356, and which established the Germanic constitution. Charles died in 1378. He was a learned man, and a great encourager of letters.—Ibid.

CHARLES V. emperor of Germany, and king of Spain, was born at Ghent in 1500. He succeeded his grandfather Ferdinand in the kingdom of Spain in 1516, and to the empire on the death of Maximilian in 1519. Francis I. of France disputed with him the latter title, which occasioned a violent war in 1521. Charles made a league with Henry VIII. of England, and after several important actions took Francis prisoner at the battle of Pavia. A peace was concluded in 1529, and Charles turned his arms against Africa, where he took Goletta, vanquished Barbarossa, entered Tunis, and re-established Muly-Hassan on the throne. Soon after this he recommenced hostilities against France, and ravaged Champagne and Picardy, but was at length obliged to retire, and peace was restored in 1538. In 1541 he attempted the conquest of Algiers, but his fleet was dispersed in a hurricane, and the emperor was obliged to return in disgrace. He then leagued with England against France, but fortune was not so favourable to him as she had formerly been, and he was glad to enter into a treaty in 1545. The protestant princes of Germany confederated against him, and obtained liberty of conscience for those of their religion. In 1556 he resigned the crown to his son Philip, and went into a monastery in Estramadura, where he employed the remainder of his days in religious exercises, mechanical pursuits, and gardening. He died in 1558.—Robertson's Hist. of Charles V.

CHARLES VI. the fifth son of the emperor Leopold, born in 1683, declared king of Spain by his father in 1703, and crowned emperor of Germany in 1711. He made peace with France in 1714, and the year following declared war against the Turks, in which his general, prince Eugene, obtained several victories, and took Belgrade. This forced the Turks to make peace. A quadruple alliance was entered into between the emperor, France, Great Britain, and Holland, against Spain; the consequence of which was the wresting Sardinia and Sicily from that power, and erecting the former into a monarchy in the person of the duke of Savoy. He afterwards entered into a war with his allies, and thereby lost Naples and Sicily, and the close of his reign was disturbed by an unfortunate war with Turkey. Charles died in 1740.—Ibid.

CHARLES VII. emperor of Germany. He was elector of Bavaria, and owed his crown to France and Prussia in 1742; but he had a powerful rival in Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, whose right was supported by Great Britain and Sardinia. He died in 1745.—Ibid.

CHARLES I. king of England, was the second son of James VI. of Scotland and the first of England, by Anne daughter of the king of Denmark. He was born in Scotland in 1600, and on the accession of his father to the English throne created duke of York. The death of his brother prince Henry made him prince of Wales. In 1623 he took a romantic journey to Spain, accompanied by his father's favourite the duke of Buckingham, for the purpose of paying his personal addresses to the infant. This adventure, however, proved unsuccessful, and the prince was betrothed soon after to the princess Henrietta Maria of France, daughter of Henry the great. In 1625 he succeeded his father, and found his kingdom not only engaged in a Spanish war, but filled with dissensions, owing in a great measure to the mal-administration of Buckingham, and the predominating spirit and influence of the puritan faction. The first parliament called in this inauspicious reign, instead of granting supplies began to murmur about grievances, and therefore was quickly dissolved. The new parliament, instead of being more compliant to the king, proceeded to greater lengths of opposition, and impeached the minister, on which this was also dissolved, and Charles began to raise supplies by loans, benevolences, and ship-money. These measures only served to heighten the public discontent, which were aided by the lectures of the puritans, who in attacking the hierarchy of the church and the ceremonies of worship, made the people believe that popery and arbitrary power were about to be introduced by the king and the bishops. An unsuccessful expedition, commanded by the duke of Buckingham, to relieve the French protestants at Rochelle in 1627, embarrassed the king's affairs still more, and he was under the necessity of calling another parliament, which after voting the required supplies, passed a bill, called the petition of right, in which the rights of the subject were ascertained and fixed. This famous act, after some opposition, was confirmed by the king, and became a law. The impeachment was continued against Buckingham, but that favourite was assassinated at Portsmouth by a fanatic named Felton. The parliament was again dissolved, and Charles having made peace with France and Spain began to govern with firmness, and to rely more upon his own judgment than he had hitherto done. Strong measures were resorted to to raise supplies, the most offensive of which was the tax called ship-money, for the purpose of providing men of war for the defence of the nation. It must be observed, however, that the king did not adopt this mode of raising money without legal advice and without precedent; but the times were altered, and that which had been readily acquiesced with in the reign of Elizabeth for the public good was now represented as an act of tyranny. The famous Hampden stoutly resisted the payment of this tax, and though he lost his cause in the exchequer, yet his trial excited a general interest in the country, and served the more to irritate the public mind against the court. In the mean time a storm was gathering in the north, owing to the king's resolution of forcing upon the Scotch the English liturgy and church ceremonies, which the greatest part of them abhorred. This occasioned the solemn league and covenant, by which all the people, old and young, were obliged to bind themselves to the defence of the protestant religion. The covenanters, as they were called, took up arms under this specious pretence, and were told by their preachers that it was the cause of Christ. Though the king marched northwards with an army, he found it necessary to enter into a negotiation, and the troops were disbanded. In 1640 his affairs were so disturbed that he called a parliament, which immediately began to consider the public grievances, and the king, driven out of patience by their proceedings, hastily dissolved them. The insolencies of the covenanters compelled him to raise another army, which meeting with a check near the Tyne, retreated into Yorkshire, where the king called a council of his peers at Rippon, the result of which was the calling a new parliament. This assembly, known by the name of the long parliament, met in November 1640, and proved the ruin of the king and constitution. The first measure of the house of commons was the impeachment of the great earl of Strafford, who was committed to the Tower, and so violently persecuted by Pym and his associates at the bar of the house of lords as to be declared guilty. Charles determined to save the life of this virtuous servant, but being pressed by entreaties and casuistry he was prevailed on to give his consent to the bill of attainder against him, in consequence of which he suffered. The great archbishop Laud was the next victim to fanatical rage. This parliament declared ship-money illegal, abolished the courts of high commission and star-chamber, and passed several other acts which retrenched the royal prerogative. In the mean time a rebellion broke out in Ireland, where the papists taking advantage of the confusion in England assembled a great force, and committed dreadful outrages and massacres. They also pretended to act under the king's authority, and to that effect shewed a commission, bearing the king's name and seal. Though this was evidently a forgery, it had a fatal effect in prejudicing the minds of the people against their sovereign. The house of commons, where the puritans and republicans prevailed, voted ordinances against superstitious ceremonies, and for the exclusion of bishops from parliament. Mobbs were gathered to besiege the house of lords, to compel their passing these acts, and the prelates in attempting to go to their seats were so rudely treated as to be in danger of their lives. Thirteen of them being hindered from entering the house assembled at the house of the archbishop of York, and signed a protest against all proceedings during their absence. For this impolitic measure they were impeached for high treason, and sent to the Tower. The public ferment was heightened by the king's going to the house of commons, and taking possession of the speaker's chair, where he demanded the persons of five members the most violent against him, and whom he had accused to the peers of high treason. The house broke up in indignation at this breach of their privileges; the city militia was mustered for their protection, and the king retired to Hampton court, from whence he went northwards, and erected the royal standard at Nottingham, August 25, 1642. The first battle that took place was at Edgehill, in which neither party had cause to claim the victory. Charles marched towards the capital, but instead of entering it as he might have done, he removed to Oxford, where he set up his head quarters, and thus enabled the parliament to recover from its alarm, and to concentrate its strength. For some time the royal arms were successful, particularly in the west; but the battle of Marston Moor in 1644, and that of Newbury, were ruinous to the king's cause. A treaty was entered into at Uxbridge, but the parliament insisting upon the abolition of episcopacy, which Charles in conscience could not yield, hostilities were renewed. June 4, 1645, was fought the battle of Naseby, in which the king displayed uncommon skill and valour; but the arms of the rebels prevailed, and he lost all his artillery, baggage, and cabinet, the letters found in which the parliament most basely published with interpolations, to render his majesty odious. He then retired to Oxford; but on the approach of Fairfax he removed from thence, and threw himself under the protection of the Scots, who basely sold him for a stipulated sum to the parliament, and he was kept in close confinement at Holmby-house, Northamptonshire. A detachment of the army forcibly conveyed him away to the head quarters, and then to Hampton court, where he was treated with some respect, as the parliament and army were then at variance, the former being mostly presbyterians and the latter independents. The king effected an escape from Hampton court with an intent to quit the kingdom, but was detained in the Isle of Wight by colonel Hammond, who gave information to Cromwell where he was. Here a new negotiation was entered into, and the king conceded every point except the abolition of episcopacy, which he adhered to with inflexible integrity, as being bound to its support by his coronation oath. The army, however, was determined to bring him to trial, to which the house of commons concurred, and he was accordingly arraigned before a pretended high court of justice, of which an obscure lawyer named Bradshaw was president. Charles in this last act of his life behaved with a noble dignity of mind, blended with christian patience and meekness. He repeatedly refused to acknowledge the authority of his judges, and to the most brutal behaviour of them and the soldiers he submitted with calm composure and christian resignation. At last he was condemned to suffer as a traitor, and only three days were allowed him to prepare for death. That time he spent in most affectionate interviews with his children, exhorting them to steadfastness in the protestant religion as reformed in the church of England, and recommending his successor to forgive his enemies. On the scaffold, before his own palace of Whitehall, he displayed the true heroism of a christian martyr; being attended by Dr. Juxon, bishop of London, and having given the signal, had his head struck off by a masked executioner, January 30, 1648. His body was interred in the royal vault at Windsor, but the barbarians would not suffer the burial service to be read over his remains. He left six children, of whom two, Charles and James, were kings of England; and of the daughters one was married to the prince of Orange, and the other to the duke of Orleans, brother of Lewis XIV. In his domestic character few sovereigns have equalled Charles I. and even as a monarch the faults of his reign were to be attributed more to circumstances, bad advisers, and the virulent usage which he met with, than to any wrong intentions of his own. Had he relied more upon his own judgment than upon that of others, many fatal mistakes would have been prevented; but taking the whole of his character and conduct into account, his conscientious firmness and his christian deportment under suffering, he will be found truly to merit the appellation of a martyr. He had naturally a fine genius, was a liberal encourager of the arts, and of a solid unostentatious understanding, as his letters and papers sufficiently prove, especially those which give an account of his conferences with Henderfon, on the episcopal form of church government. The Icon Basilike published soon after his death was eagerly read, and had so powerful an effect that the great talents of Milton were hired to write a libel in its refutation. Great efforts have been made to deprive Charles of the honour of being the author of this book, and to give it to Dr. Gauden, a vain bombastic writer, who was never able to compose a page of it.—Hume. Clarendon.

CHARLES II. king of England, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1630. He was at the Hague when his father was murdered, and immediately on that event assumed the title of king. The Scots who had betrayed the father sent an invitation to the son, which he accepted, and was crowned at Scone in 1651, where he was obliged to take the covenant. However, Cromwell defeated the Scotch at Dunbar, and when Charles went to Worcester, that enterprising general obtained a decisive victory over him there. His escape after this battle was almost miraculous, and the narrative of it is highly romantic. Hid in the thick branches of a large oak in Boscobel wood, he avoided his pursuers, who came under the tree where he was. After going from one place to another in various disguises he reached Brixthelmstone, and then escaped in a small vessel to France. In 1660, by the management of general Monk, he was restored; and so overjoyed was the nation at being delivered from republican tyranny and fanaticism, that licentiousness and infidelity broke in with a full tide under a monarch whose affability and good nature were admitted as a sufficient apology for his errors and vices. In 1662 he married the princess of Portugal, by whom he had no children, though he always treated her with respect. By his various mistresses he had a numerous offspring, who were ennobled and handsomely provided for. One of his first acts, and the most unpopular, was the sale of Dunkirk to supply his extravagancies. In 1668 he declared war against Holland, which produced a confederacy against England between that country, France, and Denmark. A Dutch fleet sailed up the Medway, and burnt and destroyed several ships. To add to the national calamities, a plague broke out in London in 1665, which swept off a prodigious number of inhabitants, and the next year a fire destroyed a great part of that city. In 1667 peace was concluded with the Dutch, and soon after the virtuous lord Clarendon was disgraced and sent into exile. About 1670 was formed the famous ministry called the cabal, from the five persons who composed it. At this time Charles became a pensionary of France, and in consequence of it entered into a new war against Holland, which terminated in 1674. In 1678 the peace of Nimueguen was established, and the same year was remarkable by the pretended discovery of a popish plot, an odious imposture contrived by Oates and Bedloe, on whose evidence several eminent persons were convicted and put to death. The parliament, jealous of the duke of York, passed a bill for his exclusion. The famous habeas corpus act was also passed in this assembly. The contests between the court and popular party gave rise to the famous distinctions of whig and tory in 1680. A new parliament met at Oxford in 1681, but was soon dissolved. The charters of the corporations were called in, and altered in such a manner as to make them dependent on the crown. A conspiracy, called the Rye-house plot, was discovered, and lord Ruffel and Algernon Sydney were executed for their supposed concern in it. Charles died of an apoplectic fit February 6, 1685. In his last moments he received the sacrament from a popish priest, and thus proved that he had been a hypocrite as well as a libertine.—Hume's Hist. of England. Rapin.

CHARLES I. of Spain; see the emperor CHARLES V.

CHARLES II. the son and successor of Philip IV. in 1665. He married twice, but never had any issue. By his first will he named for his successor the prince of Bavaria, nephew of his second wife; but by another made in 1700 he constituted Philip of France, duke of Anjou, his heir, which after his death caused some contentions. That event happened in November of the same year, in the 39th year of his age.—Univ. Hist.

CHARLES GUSTAVUS X. king of Sweden, the son of John Casimir, count palatine of the Rhine, born at Upsal in 1622, and ascended the throne of Sweden on the abdication of Christina in 1654. He turned his arms with great success against the Poles, and obtained the famous victory of Warfaw, besides taking a great number of important places. The Poles called to their assistance Muscovy, Holland, and Denmark, which obliged the king of Sweden to conclude a peace; but the war soon broke out again, and after taking Cronenburg, Charles laid siege to Copenhagen, but his navy being defeated he was obliged to return home, and died in 1660.—Ibid.

CHARLES XI. of Sweden, son and successor of the above, was born in 1655. On his accession a peace was concluded with Denmark, but in 1674 the latter power declared war against the king of Sweden, who lost several places, which were restored at the peace of Nimeguen. He married the sister of the king of Denmark, and died in 1697. He reformed the abuses which had crept into the government, and particularly those which disgraced the courts of judicature, so that more causes were dispatched in one year than usually had been done in twenty. He also paid off a considerable part of the public debts, and increased his army to a respectable establishment.—Ibid.

CHARLES XII. son and successor of the preceding, was born in 1682, and from his childhood had an ambition to imitate Alexander the great. He came to the throne at the age of fifteen, and at his coronation snatched the crown from the hands of the archbishop of Upsal, and put it on himself. His youth presented a favourable opportunity to Russia, Denmark, and Poland, to form a confederacy against him. The young hero, undaunted at this alliance, attacked each in turn, beginning with Denmark, which produced a peace with that power. In 1700 he obtained an astonishing victory over the Russians at Narva, and though his force consisted only of 8000 he attacked them in their entrenchments, slew 30,000, and took 20,000 prisoners. His next enterprise was against Poland, and after several battles he dethroned Augustus and placed Stanislaus upon the throne. Charles could have done prudently in contenting himself with the glory of these actions after the peace of 1706; but a portion of madness entered into his character, and he formed the romantic resolution of humbling Peter the great. He at first obtained some signal advantages, but at length experienced a terrible defeat at Pultowa in 1709. Almost all his troops were either slain or taken prisoners; he was wounded himself in the leg, and was carried off in a litter. Charles sought an asylum in Turkey, where he was entertained by the grand seignior, who provided for him a residence at Bender, where his conduct was so violent that he was ordered to leave the Turkish territories, which he refused. On this the grand seignior directed that he should be forced away, but Charles with his retinue formed an encampment, and resisted the attack of the janizaries till superiority of numbers obliged him to take shelter in his house, which he defended with great spirit, and did not yield till fire was set to the premises. He then sallied out sword in hand, but being entangled by his long spurs he fell, and was taken prisoner. He was treated with more respect than he deserved, and after being kept as a prisoner ten months, requested leave to return to his dominions, which was readily granted. His arrival diffused universal joy in his kingdom, though he found it in a wretched condition. In 1716 he invaded Norway, but after penetrating to Christiansa was obliged to return to Sweden. He resumed the attack in the winter of 1718, but was killed by a cannon shot at the siege of Frederickshall, December 11, aged 36 years, having reigned 21. Charles was liberal, active, and firm, but rash, obstinate, and cruel. He was never intimidated even in the midst of the greatest dangers. At the battle of Narva he had several horses shot under him, and as he was mounting upon a fresh one, he said, "These people find me exercise." When he was besieged at Stralsund, a bomb fell into the house while he was dictating to his secretary, who immediately dropped the pen in a fright. "What is the matter?" said Charles. "Oh, the bomb!" answered he. "The bomb," says the king, "what have we to do with the bomb? go on."—History of Charles XII. by Voltaire.

CHARLES I. king of Naples and Sicily, born in 1220, was the son of Lewis VIII. of France. He married the daughter of the count of Provence, and thereby became his successor, adding to it the countries of Anjou and Maine. He was with his brother St. Lewis in Egypt in 1248, and was taken prisoner at the same time. On his return he marched against Manfred, the usurper of the Sicilian crown, and having defeated him assumed the title of king of Naples. He had a rival in Conradin, duke of Suabia, whom he also defeated, and took him and the duke of Austria prisoner. Charles on this occasion brought endless infamy upon his name, by causing his royal captives to be tried and condemned to death at Naples, which sentence was executed on a public scaffold. After this he laid the prince of Tunis under tribute, and destroyed the Ghibelines. In 1276 he gained the title of king of Jerusalem, and meditated an expedition against Constantinople. But his arbitrary conduct occasioned a general insurrection in Sicily, where eight thousand of the French were massacred on Easter Monday, 1282. This massacre is known by the name of the Sicilian vespers, the bell for evening prayers being the signal of revolt. The Sicilians then chose Peter of Arragon for their king. Charles died at Poggia, in 1285.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

CHARLES II. the son and successor of the above, was, at the time of his father's death, a prisoner in the hands of the Sicilians, who intended to have put him to death to avenge the fate of Conradin, but he was saved at the intercession of Constantia, queen of Peter of Arragon. He recovered his liberty in 1288, on condition of renouncing his claim to the Sicilian crown; but being afterwards absolved from his treaty by the pope, he made several attempts to get possession of Sicily, which failed. He governed Naples with great wisdom and mildness, and died in 1309, and was succeeded by his son Robert.—Ibid.

CHARLES III. king of Naples, was the great grandson of the preceding, and in consequence of his marriage with Margaret, niece of Joan queen of Naples, obtained that kingdom from the pope, on the excommunication of that queen in 1380. He put Joan to death, and afterwards quarrelled with the pope, who excommunicated him in his turn. Charles next claimed the crown of Hungary, but was slain in the attempt, in 1386, aged 41.—Mod. Univ. Hist.

CHARLES II. king of Navarre, called the bad, was the son of Philip count of Evreux, who became king of Navarre by virtue of his marriage with the daughter of Lewis Hutin, king of France. At the age of eighteen Charles succeeded his mother, who reigned alone after her husband's death. He murdered the constable, Charles of Angouleme, for which, John, king of France, caused him to be arrested, but soon after gave him his liberty. He seduced the dauphin, afterwards Charles V. to rebel against his father, but the plot was discovered, and the dauphin gained his pardon by betraying the king of Navarre into the hands of his father, who confined him in the castle of Arleux. On this he became the irreconcilable enemy of the dauphin, and is charged by some historians with causing slow poison to be administered to him. The king of Navarre escaped from prison and joined the English on their invasion of France, but in 1358 he made peace with Charles, who had succeeded his father, John. He entered into a fresh alliance with the English, and was accused of employing a person to poison Charles VI. His death was remarkable, and seems to have accorded fully with so bad a life. Being ill of a leprosy, the physicians caused him to be wrapped in sheets, dipped in spirits of wine, and covered with brimstone. These were sown about his body, and his page, endeavouring to loosen the bandage one day, set fire to it with a small taper which he held in his hand, by which the king died in great agonies, Jan. 1, 1387.—Ibid.

CHARLES MARTEL, mayor of the palace under Chilperic and Thierry IV. kings of France. He in fact possessed the whole regal power, which he managed with great vigour and address. He gained many victories, the principal of which was over the Saracen general Abdalrahman, in 732. On the death of Thierry, in 737, no successor was appointed, and Charles conducted the government as duke of the Franks. He died in 741, and left his dominions between his sons Carloman and Pepin; the latter of whom became the first king of France of the Carlovingian race, which name was taken from the founder Charles Martel.—Ibid.

CHARLES DUKE OF BURGUNDY, surnamed the rash, was the son of Philip the Good, and born in 1433. There were constant wars between him and Lewis XI. king of France, who instigated Charles's subjects, the Liegeois, to revolt against him. The duke made the king prisoner, and compelled him to enter into a treaty on the terms that were dictated to him. Charles then pushed his victorious arms into the Low Countries, and seized on Guelderland and Zutphen. He afterwards invaded Switzerland, where he committed the most inhuman outrages; but the Swiss at length collected their forces, and the duke's whole army was put to the rout and his baggage taken. He collected another army, but was again defeated. He was slain while besieging Nanci, January 6, 1477. He married four wives, one of whom was Margaret of York, sister to Edward IV.—Philip de Commines. Univ. Hist.

CHARLES IV. duke of Lorraine, was the son of Francis count of Vaudemont, and born in 1609. He was twice deprived of his territories by Lewis XIII. of France, but recovered them again by treaty. He afterwards leagued with the Spaniards, but was imprisoned by the prince of Condé at Antwerp, and not released till the Pyrenean treaty. In 1662 he surrendered his states to Lewis XIV. on condition of being acknowledged prince of the blood. He afterwards broke this agreement, and in 1670 lost his dominions again, on which he went to Germany. He was defeated by Turenne in 1674, but afterwards took Treves, where he made prisoner the marshal de Crequi. He died in 1675. While his first wife was alive he married another, and before her death he contracted himself to a French lady, but Lewis XIV. caused her to be confined in a convent.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHARLES V. duke of Lorraine, and a famous general, was the son of the grand duke Francis, born at Vienna in 1643. He became an officer early in the Imperial service, and at the age of twenty made a campaign in Hungary against the Turks. Two attempts were made to procure his election to the throne of Poland, but without success. On the death of his uncle in 1675, he succeeded to the title of duke of Lorraine, and about the same time was appointed to the chief command of the Imperial army. He gained several great victories, which inspired him with the idea of recovering his hereditary dominions, but in this he was baffled. In 1677 he married the queen dowager of Poland, and sister to the emperor. After the peace of Nimeguen he served against the Turks, but not with his wonted success, and was forced to retreat to Vienna, which was then besieged by them. John Sobiesky coming to the assistance of the duke, they attacked the Turks, and completely defeated them. This victory was followed by the reduction of a considerable part of Hungary, and the siege of Buda, which, however, was raised in consequence of the duke's being taken ill of a fever. That place was taken the next campaign, and the Turks experienced a terrible defeat at Mohatz. The duke next took possession of Transylvania, and in 1689 again commanded against the French in Flanders. He died in 1690.—Moreri.

CHARLES (Emanuel), duke of Savoy, surnamed the Great, was born in 1562. Though of a weak constitution he was of an enterprising spirit, and, taking advantage of the internal commotions which divided France in the reign of Henry III. he seized part of Dauphiné and Provence; and on the death of that monarch aspired to the crown, but was disappointed. A war broke out, and the French troops took possession of a good part of Savoy. At last, by the mediation of the pope, peace was concluded. The duke made a treacherous attempt to seize Geneva in time of profound peace, but his troops were repulsed, and the few prisoners taken were hung up by the Genevans as robbers. On the death of Francis, duke of Mantua, in 1613, this restless prince laid claim to the succession, but was obliged to relinquish it. The French persuaded him to turn his arms against Genoa, and he gained some advantages, but the interference of Spain effected a peace. He aspired to the imperial crown, and made an attempt on the duchy of Montferrat, which involved him in a war with France and Spain. The loss of Pignerol in 1630, is supposed to have broken his heart.—Moreri.

CHARLES (Emanuel II.) duke of Savoy, was the son of Victor Amadeus I. and succeeded his brother Francis in 1638, being only four years old. During his minority the Spaniards invaded his territories, and took several places, but the interference of Lewis XIII. obliged them to make restitution. This duke cultivated the arts of peace. He penetrated the Monte Viso with an arched road 500 geometrical paces long, and built several fine structures at Turin. He was at last involved in a civil war with his protestant subjects of the Vaudois, who revolted in consequence of the persecutions which they endured. He died in 1675.—Ibid.

CHARLES (Emanuel III.), duke of Savoy, and king of Sardinia, succeeded his father Victor Amadeus II. in 1730. He joined France and Spain against Austria, and gained a great victory at Gualtalla, by which means he considerably enlarged his dominions. In 1742, however, he assisted the queen of Hungary, and obtained several advantages. On the restoration of peace he devoted himself to acts of public good, and promoted by every means he could adopt, the happiness of his subjects, and succeeded in relieving them from the heavy taxes which his wars had occasioned. He corrected the abuses of the law by enacting a new code, and died in 1773.—Ibid.

CHARLES (Edward), of the Stuart family, commonly called the pretender, was the grandson of James II. and born at Rome in 1720. In 1745 he landed in Scotland, and published a manifesto exhibiting the claims of his father to the English throne.

He was joined by several of the highlanders, and entering Edinburgh, caused his father to be proclaimed, and fixed his residence in Holyrood house, the palace of his ancestors. Sir John Cope, commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland, hastened towards the capital, but was attacked, sword in hand, by the pretender, at Preston pans, and completely defeated. Instead of making a proper use of this victory, by pushing into England, Charles returned to Edinburgh, wasting his time in an idle parade of royalty. But being joined by lords Kilmarnock, Cromarty, Balmerino, and other discontented chiefs, he marched southwards, as far as Manchester, but hearing that the king was about to take the field, he formed the sudden resolution of returning to Scotland, where he again defeated the English forces under Hawley at Falkirk. In the mean time the duke of Cumberland advanced to Edinburgh, and from thence to Aberdeen, the pretender retreating before him. At last the two parties met at Culloden, when, after an obstinate conflict, in which the highlanders displayed signal courage, the royal army was successful, and the others fled, leaving three thousand of their number dead in the field. Charles, after wandering about for a considerable time, and in different disguises, chiefly among the Hebrides, effected his escape to France, and thus ended all hopes of this unfortunate family. He died at Florence in 1788. He married the princess Stolberg Guendern. His brother, Henry Benedict cardinal York, suffered so much from the ravages of the French in Italy, as to excite the compassion of the English, and his case being made known to king George III. with that magnanimity which always characterises his majesty's character, he settled upon the venerable representative of an illustrious house a considerable pension.—Novv. Dict. Hist. Boswell's Tour in the Hebrides. Monthly Mag. Oct. 1803.

CHARLETON (Walter), an English physician, was born at Shepton Mallet, in Somersetshire, in 1619, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he took his doctor's degree in 1642, and became physician to the king. He was one of the first members of the royal society, and president of the college of physicians. He died at Jersey in 1707. Dr. Charleton wrote several medical books, but he is best known by a volume entitled Chorea Gigantum, or the most famous Antiquity of Great Britain, Stonehenge, restored to the Danes, 1663, 4to.—Biog. Brit.

CHARLEVAL (Charles Fauçon de Ry, lord of), a French writer of great merit and liberality. He died in 1693, aged 80. A small collection of his poems was printed in 1759, 12mo.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

CHARLEVOIX (Peter), a French jesuit, who died in 1761, aged 72. He was several years a missionary in America, and published a History of the Island of St. Domingo, 2 vols. 4to.; a History and Description of Japan, 2 vols. 4to. and 6 vols. 12mo.; History of Paraguay, 6 vols. 18mo.; a General History of New France, 3 vols. 4to. This last is a valuable performance.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

CHARMIS, a physician at Rome in the time of Nero. He went contrary to all his brethren in his practice; and Seneca acknowledges that he had been weak enough to follow his prescriptions. This quack, like all of his kind, was very extravagant in his fees.—Moreri.

CHARNACE (Hercules Girard), baron de, a French ambassador, was born in Brittany. He served with reputation in the army, but becoming known to cardinal Richelieu, he sent him, in 1628, ambassador to Sweden, where he concluded a treaty with Gustavus Adolphus, who thereby engaged in a war with Germany. He was afterwards ambassador to several other courts. He had the command of a troop of horse, and was killed at the siege of Breda, in 1637.—Bayle. Moreri.

CHARNOCK (Stephen), a nonconformist divine; born in London, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was for some time chaplain to Henry Cromwell, and afterwards officiated to a congregation in London, where he died in 1680, aged 52. His works were collected into two vols. folio; the best is a Discourse on Providence.—Calamy.

CHARONDAS, a Sicilian legislator and philosopher, who died about 400 years B. C. He formed a code of laws for the inhabitants of Thurium in Græcia Magna, one of which inflicted death upon any one who should appear armed at a public assembly. Hearing that a tumult had arisen in a popular meeting, he hastened thither to quell it, without laying aside his sword. Being reminded of his own law, he said that he would seal it with his blood, and instantly stabbed himself.—Diog. Laert. Valerius Maximus.

CHARPENTIER (Francis), a learned Frenchman, born at Paris in 1620, and died in 1702. He was dean of the French academy, and member of that of inscriptions and medals. He published several works on antiquities, and some poems.—Moreri.

CHARRON (Peter), a French divine, born at Paris in 1511, and brought up to the law, which profession he quitted for that of divinity, and became a popular preacher. Queen Margaret, duchess of Blois, appointed him her chaplain. He formed a close friendship with Montaigne, and resided with him at Bourdeaux, where he printed his book entitled The Three Truths, 1594. The bishop of Cahors was so pleased with it, that he made him his vicar-general. Afterwards he obtained some dignities in the church of Condom. In 1601 he printed his famous work Of Wisdom, which has been translated into English by dean Stanhope. Charron died in 1603.—Moreri.

CHARTIER (Alain), an eloquent French writer of the 15th century. He was a native of Bayeux, and secretary to the kings Charles VI. and VII. who employed him in several embassies. He was famous for his wit as well as his compositions. His works were published in 1617, and consist of pieces in prose and verse. He died in 1449. His brother, Jehan Chartier, was a benedictine monk, and wrote the great chronicles of France from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. 3 vols. fol. 1493. His History of Charles VII. was printed in 1661, fol.—Moreri. Novo. Dict. Hist.

CHARTIER (René), a physician to the French king, and royal professor of medicine. He distinguished himself by editing the works of Hippocrates and Galen in Greek and Latin, 14 vols. folio; the first volume appeared in 1619, and the last in 1679.—Ibid.

CHASSENEUX (Bartholomew de), a French lawyer, who has deserved celebrity more by his humanity than by his literary productions. As president of the parliament of Provence he opposed the persecution of the Vaudois, a religious sect, who rejected the papal authority and the superstitions of the church of Rome; for which he was poisoned in 1541. He wrote on the customs of France, and other works.—Moreri.

CHASTEL (John), a fanatic, who attempted to assassinate Henry IV. of France, at the instigation of the jesuits; for which the flesh was torn off his bones with red-hot pincers, afterwards he was tied to four wild horses, and his wretched remains burnt to ashes. The jesuits were banished the kingdom. This was in 1594.—Ibid.

CHASTELAIN (Claude), an ecclesiastical writer of great learning, was born at Paris in 1639. Few men equalled him in the knowledge of church history, and he was employed by the archbishop of Paris in drawing up formularies for the use of his diocese. He published the Roman Martyrology, and a Universal Martyrology, and left a MS. Journal of his own Life, abounding with anecdotes. He died in 1712.—Ibid.

CHASTELET (Gabrielle Emilie de Breteuil, marchioness of), an ingenious lady, was the daughter of the baron de Breteuil, and the wife of the marquis de Chastelet. She had a very liberal education, which she greatly improved by studying the best writers, ancient and modern. She published the Institutes of the Philosophy of Leibnitz, in French, but on becoming acquainted with the Principia of Newton, she renounced the fanciful system of the German philosopher. She also translated that immortal work into her native language, and added a commentary to it, which was not published till after her death in 1743. Voltaire, who was intimate with her, wrote an eulogy to her memory.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

CHASTELLUX (Francis John, marquis de), an ingenious French nobleman, was descended of a family eminent for military talents. He was a field marshal, and a member of the French academy and of several other literary societies. He died at Paris in 1788. His principal works are, On Public Happiness, 8vo. This performance was translated into English, as also have been his Travels in North America, 8vo. The marquis had served in that country in a military capacity, but the Americans complain that he has not done justice to it.—Ibid.

CHATEAUBRUN (John Baptist Vivien de), a French dramatic writer, born at Angoulême, in 1686. He was a member of the French academy, and died in 1775. His best play is entitled Les Troyennes, which he kept by him forty years before it was acted; besides this he wrote the tragedies of Philoctetes, Astyanax, and Mahomet II.—Ibid.

CHATEAURENAND (Francis Lewis Rousselle, count of), a French naval commander, born in Touraine in 1636. He distinguished himself in the Mediterranean against the Saltee rovers, defeated the Dutch fleet in 1675, and rendered other eminent services to his country, for which he was made an admiral and a marshal of France. He died in 1716.—Ibid.

CHATEL (L'annevuy du), an eminent French general, was born of a good family in Brittany. He distinguished himself early by an expedition against England, where he gained considerable booty. In 1410 he defeated Ladislaus the usurper of the two Sicilies, and in 1414 was made marshal of Guienne. He was at the battle of Agincourt, and when Paris was surprised by the Burgundian faction, he had the address to save the dauphin, and afterwards effected a peace between the two princes. But he blasted his laurels by advising the dauphin to assassinate the duke of Burgundy in 1419. When the dauphin ascended the throne, he made du Chatel grand master of his household. He also employed him in several honourable missions. He died in 1449. His nephew of the same name was remarkable for his fidelity to the unfortunate Charles VII. whom he attended in his last moments, and buried at his own expense.—Moreri.

CHATEL (Peter du), in Latin Castellanus, a learned French divine, born at Arc, and educated at Dijon. He assisted Erasmus in his translations from the Greek, and became corrector of the press in Frobenius's office at Basil. After travelling into various countries and as far as Egypt and Palestine, he returned to his native country, where he became reader to Francis I. who gave him first the bishopric of Tulle, and afterwards that of Maçon. Henry II. translated him to Orleans, where he died in 1552. He was not only a man of universal learning, but of great eloquence, and a strenuous defender of the liberties of the Gallican church. He wrote two funeral orations for Francis, and a Latin letter for that king against the emperor Charles V.—Bayle.

CHATEL (Francis du), an eminent painter of Brussels in the middle of the 16th century. The most capital picture by this master is one in the town-hall at Ghent, representing the king of Spain receiving the oath of fidelity from the states of Flanders and Brabant.—Pilkington.

CHATELET (Paul du Hay), lord of; born of a noble family in Brittany, which was derived from the Scotch house of Hay. He served several important offices, and at last became president in the court of justice in the royal army under Lewis XIII. He spoke his mind very freely to the king, especially in favour of the duke of Montmorency, when that nobleman was condemned for high treason. Chatelet was one of the first members of the academy, and wrote several pieces in prose and verse; the principal is the History of Bertrand du Guesclin, constable of France, folio. He died in 1636, aged 44.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHATTERTON (Thomas), an extraordinary youth, was born at Bristol, November 20, 1752, and educated in writing and arithmetic at Colton's charity school; after which he was articled to an attorney, with whom he continued till he was 17, and soon after went to London, where he earned a scanty maintenance by writing for periodical publications, but being reduced to great distress, he poisoned himself in Aug. 1770, and was buried by the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn. In 1778 were published, in one volume, 8vo. Miscellanies in prose and verse, by Thomas Chatterton. But what has given celebrity to his name is the real or pretended discovery of poems, written in the 15th century, by Thomas Rowley, a priest of Bristol, and others, in Redcliffe church, of which Chatterton's ancestors had been sextons near a century and a half. His father certainly removed a number of parchments from an old chest in that church, most of which were used in covering books. Young Chatterton, from the perusal of some of them, is supposed to have formed the design of a literary forgery. In 1768 appeared in a Bristol newspaper, an article entitled "A Description of the Friars first passing over the old bridge, taken from an ancient manuscript." This attracted the notice of Mr. Barrett, who was engaged in writing the history of Bristol; and he obtained from Chatterton several pieces in prose and verse, purporting to be written by Canynge, founder of Redcliffe church, and Thomas Rowley. The year following he began a correspondence with Mr. Horace Walpole, well known as an antiquary and connoisseur, but on his communicating the papers to his friends Mason and Gray, those acute judges pronounced them forgeries. Chatterton had formed great expectations from the patronage of Mr. Walpole, but finding himself neglected, he wrote him a very impertinent letter, and their intercourse ended. Rowley's poems were first collected by Mr. Tyrwhit, in one volume 8vo. and afterwards in one vol. 4to. by dean Miller, but the former gentleman gave up the question of their genuineness. A sharp controversy was carried on for some time on the point, between Mr. Warton, Mr. Bryant, Mr. Mathias, and others; but the poems are now generally considered as Chatterton's own productions. A new edition of his works was recently published in 3 vols. 8vo.—Biog. Brit.

CHAUCER (Geoffrey), the father of English poetry, was born in London in 1328. His father appears to have been a wealthy merchant, who gave him a liberal education. He was for some time at Cambridge, and afterwards studied at Oxford. He next improved himself by travelling into foreign countries, and on his return studied the law in the Inner Temple, which he soon quitted for the court, and became yeoman to Edward III. who gave him a pension out of the exchequer. In 1370 he was appointed his majesty's shield-bearer. He was sent to Genoa some time after to hire ships for the king's service, and at his return obtained a grant of a pitcher of wine a day, to be delivered by the butler of England; and the place of comptroller of the customs of London, for wool, &c. In the succeeding reign he was obliged to go abroad to avoid the resentment of the clergy for having embraced the doctrines of Wickliffe. He returned privately, but was taken and committed to prison, from whence he was not released till he had made his submission. On this he retired to Woodstock, where he employed himself in correcting his works. Here he published his treatise on the Astrolabe. Henry IV. in the first year of his reign gave him an annuity of forty marks for his life. He died in 1400, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Chaucer married Philippa de Rouet, a lady of good family, by which means he became allied to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who was his great patron while he was himself in power. Chaucer left two sons, one of whom was speaker of the house of commons, and ambassador to France. Of his poems, the Canterbury Tales are by far the best. There have been several editions of his works, the best is that of Mr. Urry, in folio; but the Canterbury Tales have been published separately by Mr. Tyrwhit, 5 vols. 8vo. They have been modernised by Dryden,

CHAULIEU (William), a French poet, and called the Anacreon of France, was born in Normandy, and educated in the college of Navarre at Paris. The duke of Vendôme gave him a priory in the isle of Oleron. He died in 1726, aged 81. The best edition of his poems is that of Paris, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1774.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHAUNCEY (Isaac), a puritan divine, and physician, was the son of Mr. Charles Chauncey, a nonconformist minister, who removed from Ware in Hertfordshire to New England, where he became president of Harvard college, and died in 1671. His son came to England, and was for some time a dissenting minister at Andover, but quitted that profession for physic, which he practised in London, where he died about 1700. He wrote, the Divine Institution of Congregational Churches, 8vo.; an Essay on Daniel's Prophecy, and other things. He is not to be confounded with Dr. Isaac Chauncy, who was ejected from a living at Bristol, and afterwards practised physic there. He died in 1691.—Calamy.

CHAUNCEY (Henry), an English antiquary, was born in Hertfordshire, and educated at Cambridge, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple, and in 1656 was called to the bar. In 1681 he was knighted, and in 1688 was made a Welsh judge. He died in 1700. He wrote the Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire, in 1 vol. fol.—Biog. Brit.

CHAUSSÉ (Michael Angelo de la), a French antiquary, who published at Rome, in 1690, his Museum Romanum, which was reprinted in 1746, in 2 vols. folio. He also published, in 1707, a Collection of ancient Gems, 4to.; and in 1738, Picturæ Antiquæ Cryptarum Romanorum et Sepulchri natorum, fol.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHAUVEAU (Francis), a French engraver, born at Paris in 1613, and died there in 1676. His engravings are mostly after his own designs, in a very excellent taste. His son René was an ingenious sculptor. He resided many years in Sweden, and also executed some considerable works at Berlin. He died at Paris in 1722, aged 59.—Moreri.

CHAUVIN (Stephen), a protestant divine. He left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled at Berlin, where he was chosen professor of philosophy, and died in 1725, aged 85. He wrote a philosophical Lexicon in Latin, fol. 1692. Ibid.

CHAZELLES (John Matthew), a French mathematician, was born at Lyons in 1657. He assisted Cassini in drawing the meridian line, and in 1685 was made hydrographical professor of the galleys at Marseilles, in which situation he drew a number of maps of the coast. He afterwards visited Egypt, where he measured the pyramids, and discovered that the four sides of the largest answer to the cardinal points of the compass. He was elected a member of the academy of sciences in 1695, and died in 1710.—Eloge par Fontenelle.

CHEFONTAINES (Christopher de), a French theologian, was a native of Brittany, and entered among the cordeliers, of which order he became provincial, and lastly general. In 1579 pope Gregory XIII. made him archbishop of Casarea. He went into Flanders, where he was very successful in drawing over many protestants to the Roman church. He was himself, however, accused of holding some heretical tenets. He died at Rome in 1595, aged 63. This prelate was a man of various and profound learning. The most curious of his works is on Transubstantiation.—Moreri.

CHEKE (John), a learned Englishman, was born at Cambridge in 1514, and educated at St. John's college, where he took his degrees in arts, and was appointed professor of Greek, in which station he laboured with great success in reforming the mode of pronouncing that language. But Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, viewed the innovation as allied to heresy, and arrogantly prohibited any deviation from the old corruption. In 1544 he became one of the tutors to prince Edward, at whose accession he was rewarded with a pension, and a grant of lands. He was also made provost of King's college, and received the honour of knighthood. Queen Mary sent him to the Tower, for being concerned in the plan of raising Jane Grey to the throne. In 1554 he was set at liberty and went abroad, but his estate was confiscated. In 1556 he was seized at Brussels and conveyed to Antwerp, from whence he was sent to London, and committed again to the Tower, where he was attended by the Romish priests, who plainly told him, that he must recant, or burn. Cheke had not resolution enough to endure martyrdom, and made a solemn submission in the presence of the queen and whole court. The shame of this apostacy and disgrace preyed upon his spirits, and he died of grief in 1557. He wrote "The Hurt of Sedition" against the Insurgents in 1549; Epistles on the death of Bucer; De Pronuntiatione Græcæ potissimum Linguae Disputationes, Basil 1555; De Superstitione ad regem Henricum; and other learned pieces.—Life by Strype.

CHIELONIS, the daughter of Leonidas, and wife of Cleombrotus, kings of Sparta, was an illustrious example of filial and conjugal duty. When Leonidas was deposed by Cleombrotus, she accompanied him in his exile; and afterwards, on the restoration of her father and the banishment of her husband, she voluntarily went with him, though earnestly entreated by Leonidas to stay with him. This was about the year B.C. 484.—Plutarch.

CHEMIN (Catharine du), an ingenious

French lady. She was the wife of Girardon, and excelled in painting flowers. She died at Paris in 1698, and her husband erected to her memory a noble monument in the church of St. Landry.—Moreri.

CHEMINAIS (Timoleon), a French jesuit, was born at Paris in 1662. He was celebrated as a preacher, and was reckoned little inferior to Massillon. When his health prevented him from preaching he used to go into the country to instruct the poor. He died at the age of 38. Five volumes of his sermons have been printed, and he was also the author of a book, entitled, Sentiments of Piety.—Moreri.

CHEMNITZ (Martin), a German divine, born in Brandenburg, in 1522. He was educated under Melancthon, after whose death he became the most esteemed of all the divines of the augustan confession. He was well versed in mathematics and astronomy, and was thirty years a professor at Brunswick, where he died in 1586. He wrote an Harmony of the Gospels, and some controversial pieces against popery.—Moreri. Melc. Adam.

CHEMNITZ (Bozslaus Philip), grandson of the above, born at Stettin in 1605. He served first in the armies of Holland, and afterwards in those of Sweden. Queen Christina made him a counsellor of state and historiographer. He died in 1678. He wrote a History of the Swedish Wars in Germany, 2 vols. fol.—Moreri.

CHEKILUS, a Greek poet, the friend of Herodotus. He celebrated the triumphs of the Athenians over Xerxes, for which poem his countrymen rewarded him with a piece of gold for each verse.—Ibid.

CHERON (Elizabeth Sophia), an ingenious painter. She was the daughter of an eminent artist, and born at Paris in 1648. In 1672 she was admitted a member of the academy of painting, and the academy of Ricovrati at Padua did her the same honour. She excelled in painting portraits in miniature, but painted also historical subjects in a fine style. She was likewise a good poetess, and had a taste for music. She died in 1711.—D'Argenville.

CHERON (Lewis), brother of the above; born at Paris, and died in London in 1719, aged 53. He came to England on account of his religion, being a protestant, and was employed by several of the nobility, particularly the duke of Montague.—Ibid. Walpole.

CHERUBIN, Father, a mathematician of Orleans, was a capuchin friar, and lived about the year 1650. He wrote a book on the theory of telescopes, entitled Ocular Dioptrics, and another in 2 vols. fol. under the title of La Vision parfaite.—Moreri.

CHESELDEN (William), a celebrated English surgeon, was born at Borough-on-the-hill, in Leicestershire, in 1668, and brought up first under Mr. Cowper the anatomist, and then under Mr. Ferriar, at St. Thomas's hospital. In 1711 he was elected F.R.S. His Anatomy of the Human Body appeared first in 1713, and went through numerous editions. In 1733 he published his Osteography, in folio. Mr. Chefelden obtained great celebrity by his practice of cutting for the stone, and couching the eye, in both of which he had wonderful success. He was elected member of the French academy of sciences, and of that of surgery. He became principal surgeon to queen Caroline, and head surgeon of Chelsea hospital. He died in 1752.—Biog. Brit.

CHESEZ (Joseph du), a French physician, was of a noble family in Armagnac, and obtained considerable eminence in his profession, particularly in chemistry. He died at Paris in 1609. He wrote two poems in French; one entitled, the Folly of the World; and the other, the Mirror of the World. He also wrote some books on chemistry.—Moreri.

CHESENEW (Andre du), a French historian, born in 1584, and died in 1640. He wrote Histories of the Popes and Cardinals; a Collection of the Ancient Historians of France, in 24 vols. folio; and a History of England.—Ibid.

CHESTWODE (Knightly), an English divine, was fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and nominated by king James bishop of Bristol, just as he abdicated the crown, but as the congé d'élire had not passed the seals, he missed the preferment. In 1707 he was made dean of Gloucester, and died in 1720. He wrote a Life of Lord Roscommon, which was never printed, and some poems.—Gen. Biog. Diet.

CHEVALIER (Anthony Rodolph le), a learned Frenchman, was born at Montchamps, in Normandy, in 1507. Being a protestant, he left France, and sought an asylum in England, where he taught the French language to princess, afterwards queen Elizabeth. On the death of Edward VI. he retired to Germany, where he married the daughter-in-law of Tremellius, and studied under him the Oriental languages. He taught Hebrew at Strasburg and Geneva, from whence he removed to his own country, but in consequence of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, he went to Guernsey, where he died in 1572. He published in Latin the Rudiments of the Hebrew Language, 4to. 1574. He also translated from Syriac the Jerusalem Targum.—De Thou.

CHEVALIER (Lewis), a French advocate, was born at Touraine about 1668. When young he embraced a religious life in the rigid order of La Trappe; but the austerities he underwent bringing on a dangerous complaint, he quitted it and adopted another profession, in which he obtained the highest reputation. Still, however, he retained a warm sense of religion. He died in 1744. His pleadings for the canons of Rheims were printed in 1716.—Moreri.

CHEVERT (Francis de), a French general, who rose from the ranks to the highest honours of his profession, was born of mean parents, at Verdun, in 1695. He was distinguished for his great skill in tactics. After the retreat of marshal de Bellisle from Prague, in 1742, Chevert defended the place with uncommon firmness and bravery, till famine compelled him to surrender on honourable terms. The victory at Hastenbeck, in 1757, as well as that at Lauterburg, were principally owing to him. He died in 1769.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHEVILLIER (Andrew), a French antiquary and ecclesiastic, who wrote the Origin of Printing in Paris; a Dissertation on the Council of Chalcedon, and other works of merit. He was librarian of the Sorbonne, and died in 1700, aged 64.—Moreri.

CHEVREAU (Urban), a native of Loudun, who served Christina, queen of Sweden, as secretary, and afterwards the king of Denmark, and other princes. On his return to Paris he became preceptor and secretary to the duke of Maine. He died, aged 88, in 1701. He wrote a "History of the World," and a romance, entitled the Effects of Fortune, and some other works.—Moreri.

CHEYNE (George), an eminent physician, was born in Scotland in 1671, and educated at Edinburgh. At the age of 30 he came to London, and led a free life; in consequence of which he became immoderately corpulent and asthmatic. He then had recourse to a vegetable diet, which removed his complaints, and he died at Bath, in 1742, aged 72. He published Philosophical Principles of Religion, natural and revealed; the English Malady, or a treatise of Nervous Diseases; Fluxionum Methodus Inversa, five quantitatuum fluentium leges Generationes, &c.—Big. Br.

CHEYNELL (Francis), a puritan divine, was the son of a physician at Oxford, where he was born in 1608, and educated in Magdalen college, of which he became fellow in 1629. In the time of the rebellion he joined the presbyterians with great zeal, and was chosen one of the assembly of divines at Westminster. He was also presented to the rectory of Petworth, and made a commissioner for reforming the university of Oxford, where he usurped the offices of Margaret professor of divinity, and the presidentship of St. John's college, but at the restoration he was ejected from all his places, and died in 1665. He wrote several fanatical books, and distinguished himself by his ridiculous behaviour at the funeral of Mr. Chillingworth, of whose illness he wrote an account.—Wood. Calamy.

CHIABRERA (Gabriel), an Italian poet, born at Savona in 1552, and died there in 1637. His poems were printed at Rome in 1718, in 8vo.—Tiraboschi.

CHIARI (Joseph), an historical painter, born at Rome in 1654. He was a disciple of Carlo Maratti, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He executed several historical pieces for churches and persons of rank, and died in 1727.—Pilkington.

CHIAVISTELLI (Jacob), a painter of Florence, born in 1621, and died in 1698. He painted in perspective with great accuracy and elegance.—Ibid.

CHICHELE, or CHICHELEY (Henry), archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Higham Ferrers, in Northamptonshire; educated first at Winchester school, and then at New college, Oxford. In 1407 he was sent ambassador to the pope, who gave him the bishopric of St. David's. In 1414 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, which station he maintained with great spirit and attention; and obtained many privileges for the clergy. He also resisted the encroachments of the papal see. This archbishop was a liberal encourager of learning; and his foundation of All-souls college, Oxford, will eternize his memory. He died in 1443.—Life by Dr. Duck, 8vo.

CHICOYNEAU (Francis), physician and counsellor of state to the king of France, was a native of Marseilles, which place he visited when it was ravaged by the plague. He died in 1752, aged 80. He published a treatise on the Plague, in which he denies that it is contagious.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHICOYNEAU (Francis), son of the above, was an eminent botanist, and wrote several esteemed memoirs on his favourite science. He became professor and chancellor of the university of Montpellier, and died in 1740, aged 38.—Moreri.

CHIFFLET (John James), a French physician, born in 1588. He was physician to Philip IV. of Spain, and died in 1660. He wrote the antiquities of his native city Besançon, in elegant Latin, 4to.; and Vindiciæ Hispanicæ, Antwerp, 1643, 4to. and other works. He had three sons, who were all men of literary abilities.—Ibid.

CHILDEBERT I. king of France, the son of Clovis, commenced his reign in 511. He joined his brothers Clodomir and Clotaire, against Sigismund king of Burgundy, whom they defeated. Afterwards Childebert and Clotaire turned their arms against Spain, wherein they were unsuccessful. He died at Paris in 558.—Millot's History of France. Moreri.

CHILDEBERT II. the son of Sigebert and Brunehaut, succeeded his father in 575. On the death of his uncle Chilperic, king of Soissons, he obtained the kingdoms of Orleans and Burgundy, and died of poison in 596, aged 26.—Ibid.

CHILDEBERT III. called the Just, came to the crown in 675, aged 12, and was governed by Pepin, mayor of the palace, who took upon him all the state of royalty. Childebert died in 711.—Ibid.

CHILDERIC I. king of France, succeeded his father Meroveus in 456, and was deposed the year following for his bad comduct, and constrained to retire to Thuringia; but he was recalled in 463, and died in 481.—Moreri.

CHILDERIC II. son of Clovis II. came to the throne in 670, by the death of Clotaire III. his brother. He disgraced himself by his debaucheries and cruelties, and was assassinated with his queen and son, in 673.—Ibid.

CHILDERIC III. called the Idiot, was proclaimed in 742, and deposed in 752 by Pepin, who confined him in a monastery, where he died three years afterwards.—Ibid.

CHILLINGWORTH (William), an eminent divine, was born at Oxford in 1602, and educated at Trinity college, where he took his degrees in arts; after which he was persuaded by Fisher, the jesuit, to embrace the Romish faith. He went over to Douay for that purpose, but the letters of bishop Laud, who was his godfather, made him repent of his hastiness, and he returned to England and the protestant communion in 1631. The Romanists, hurt at losing so valuable an acquisition, attacked him with great severity; which occasioned him to write his famous book, entitled, The Religion of Protestants a safe Way to Salvation; which was first printed in 1638, in folio. The same year he obtained the chancellorship and a prebend of Salisbury, to which was afterwards added the mastership of Wigton's hospital in Leicestershire. In the civil wars he adhered to the royal cause, and was at the siege of Gloucester as an engineer, in 1643. But the same year he was taken prisoner in Arundel castle, Sussex, and conveyed to Chichester, where he died at the bishop's palace in January 1644. He was buried in the cathedral of that city, by that furious zealot, Francis Cheynel, who had attended him in his sickness, and at the grave made a frantic speech, after throwing in the book above mentioned, with all the terms of execration his fanatical imagination could invent.—Biog. Br.

CHILMEAD (Edmund), an English divine, born in Gloucestershire, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford. Being ejected from his preferment by the republicans in 1648, he went to London, where he subsisted by teaching music, and died in 1654. He wrote a treatise on the Use of the Globes, and translated several books from the Greek.—Wood.

CHILLO, a philosopher of Sparta, who has been dignified with the title of one of the seven wise men. He died of excessive joy in the arms of his son, who had been victor at the Olympic games, B.C. 597.—Diog. Laertius.

CHILPERIC I. king of France, was the youngest son of Clotaire I. immediately on whose death he seized the throne, but was deposed in 562, and contented himself with the kingdom of Soissons. On the death of Charibert he succeeded to the kingdom of Paris. He attached himself to a woman named Fredegonde, who contrived the murder of the queen Galswintha, which produced a war between Chilperic and Sigebert, king of Austrasia. Chilperic put to death his son Meroveus, and Fredegonde also caused his other son Clovis to be murdered. These domestic evils at length made a considerable impression on the king's mind, and he turned devotee. He was assassinated in 584, as he was returning from hunting.—Moreri. Univ. Hist.

CHILPERIC II. supposed to be the son of Childeric II. On the death of Dagobert he was taken from a monastery, where he acted in a menial capacity, and was placed by the mayor of Paris at the head of an army against Charles Martel. He was for some time successful, but was at last obliged to fly for shelter to the duke of Aquitaine, who delivered him to Charles. He died at Noyon in 720.—Ibid.

CHINA. The antiquity of this wonderful empire is doubtless very great. It carries all the appearances of originality; having no mixture of foreign usages, or those marks of corruption which are the result of conquest or of commercial intercourse. Still the pretensions of the Chinese are fabulous; and their chronology is not to be depended on. The founder of their monarchy was Fohi, whom some take to have been Noah. The first foreign invasion of China was by the Kitans in 946. In 1117 the Kin Tartars invaded and destroyed the dominion of the Kitans. In 1211 Jenghis Khan invaded China: his son Oktay destroyed the dynasty of the Kin. He attacked the Song, or native princes, in 1235, but they were not finally subdued till 1279. In 1356 Chu, a Chinese, recovered Nanking from the Tartars, and in 1368 he put an end to the authority of the Monguls, whose dynasty is called Iwen. In 1645 the Mantchew Tartars obtained a complete conquest of China.—Dubalde's Hist. of China. Univ. Hist.

CHINE NOUNG, emperor of China about 2837 years B.C. according to the historians of that country. He is said to have taught his subjects agriculture, and the making of wine from rice. He was skilled in physics, mathematics, music, and poetry.—Ibid.

CHING, or XI-HOAM-TY, emperor of China about 240 B.C. He rendered his name illustrious by a number of victories; and then disgraced it, by causing all books to be burnt. He built the great wall after having expelled the Tartars.—Ibid.

CHIRAC (Peter), physician to the king of France, and to the army of Roussillon in 1692; in which last capacity he did great service, when the soldiers were attacked by a dysentery. He died in 1732, aged 82. He wrote on the use of the rust of iron in the incubus; on the healing of wounds; on malignant fevers; and a collection of medical dissertations.—Moreri.

CHISEULL (Edmund), an English divine, born in Bedfordshire, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.D. He became travelling fellow, and went into the East, where he was appointed chaplain to the factory at Smyrna. In 1708 he was presented to the living of Walthamstow in Essex, and died in 1733. He wrote against the learned Dodwell on the mortality of the soul, and after his death Dr. Mead published his travels in Turkey.—Biog. Br.

CHOISEUL (Stephen Francis, duke of), a French statesman, born in 1719, and after being minister for foreign affairs, and discharging other high offices, he fell into disgrace, and went into retirement, where he died in 1785. He was a liberal patron of literature and the arts.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHOISY (Francis Timoleon de), a French ecclesiastic. In the early part of his life he was distinguished by the effeminacy of his manners and his gallantries. At last he embraced the ecclesiastical state, and was sent out with others on an embassy to Siam, for the purpose of converting the king of that country. But the attempt proved fruitless, and the abbe returned to France, where he was admitted a member of the academy, and in 1697 made dean of Bayeux. He died in 1724, aged 81. He wrote a Journal of his Voyage to Siam; a History of France; an Ecclesiastical History; and other works.—Moreri.

CHOMEL (Peter John Baptist), physician to the French king, was born at Paris, and died in 1740. He applied with great success to botany, and wrote a History of common Plants, 3 vols. 1761. His son, John Chomel, was a doctor in physic, and died in 1765. He wrote the History of Medicine in France; the Life of Molinus; the Eulogy of Duret; on the Malady among the Cattle, &c.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CHOPIN (René), an eminent lawyer, was born at Baillleul in Anjou in 1537. He wrote the Customs of Anjou; a Treatise de Dominio; De Sacra Politica Monastica; the Custom of Paris, &c.; the whole consisting of six volumes folio. He died under the operation for the stone, in 1606.—Moreri.

CHORIER (Nicholas), an advocate of the parliament of Grenoble, where he died in 1692, aged 83. He wrote the Philosophy of an Honest Man; the History of Dauphiny; a volume of Latin poems; but he is rendered remarkable by an indecent work, entitled Aloisia Sigeæ Toletanæ, Satyra Soladica de Arcanis Amoris & Veneris.—Ibid.

CHOSROES I. or KHOSROU the Great, king of Persia, succeeded Cabades in 531. He concluded a peace with the Romans, but afterwards invaded their territories, and was repulsed by Belisarius. In the reign of Justin II. he attacked the Romans again, but was defeated by Tiberius. He died of vexation in 579. He was fierce, cruel, and rash; but he possessed many noble qualities, and liberally encouraged the arts and sciences.—Univ. Hist.

CHOSROES II. ascended the throne on the deposition of his father Hormisdas, in 590. He is accused, on plausible grounds, of murdering his father. His nobility conspired against him on account of his cruelties, and obliged him to fly to the Romans, who set him again upon the throne. He carried his arms into Judea, Lybia, and Egypt, and made himself master of Carthage. He was, however, defeated by the emperor Heraclius, and thrown into prison by his own son, where he died, in 627.—Ibid.

CHOVET (John Robert), a learned magistrate of Geneva, born in 1642. His talents were so conspicuous, that at the age of 22 he gained the professorship of philosophy at Saumur, where he substituted the system of Descartes for that of Aristotle. In 1669 he removed to his native city, where he occupied the same station, and in 1686 obtained a seat in the council. He was several times syndic, and conducted himself with great honour. He died in 1731. He wrote an Introduction to Logic; Theses Physicæ de Variis Astrorum Luce; Discourses on the History of Geneva; and other works.—Senelier Hist. de la Geneve.

CHOUL (William du), a French antiquary, who wrote a curious book on the Religion and Castrametation of the ancient Romans; printed in French at Lyons in 1556, and again in 1580.—Moreri.

CHRISTIAN I. king of Denmark, was the son of Theodoric, count of Oldenburg; and elected to the Danish throne in 1448. He became popular by his prudence, moderation, and liberality; and died in 1481. He instituted the order of the Elephant.—Univ. Hist.

CHRISTIAN II. called the Northern Nero, succeeded his father John, in 1513. He laid claim to the throne of Sweden, and was crowned at Stockholm in 1520, when he caused all the Swedish nobility to be massacred. This horrid action rendered him so odious to the Swedes, that they forced him to return to Denmark, where he was soon after deposed, on which he fled into Flanders. He afterwards attempted to recover his crown by the assistance of the Dutch, but was taken prisoner, and died in 1559.—Ibid.

CHRISTIAN III. the nephew and successor of Frederic I. He came to the throne in 1534, and embraced lutheranism, which he made the established religion. He died in 1558, aged 56.—Ibid.

CHRISTIAN IV. succeeded his father Frederic II. in 1588. He made war against Sweden, and was elected chief of the protestant league against the emperor, for the re-establishment of the prince palatine in 1625. He died in 1648, aged 71.—Ibid.

CHRISTIAN V. ascended the throne in 1670, on the death of his father Frederic III. He united with the princes of Germany, and declared war against the Swedes, in which he was unsuccessful. He died in 1699, aged 54.—Univ. Hist.

CHRISTINA, queen of Sweden, was the only child of Gustavus Adolphus, whom she succeeded at the age of six years, in 1632. Her education was very liberal, and her understanding elevated and comprehensive. But her manner, and even her dress and occupations, were masculine. She invited to her court the most learned men in Europe, among whom may be mentioned Grotius, whom she sent as her ambassador to France; Salmasius, Descartes, Bochart, Huet, Vossius, and Meibomius. It is a reasonable question, however, whether ostentation was not more the cause of this encouragement of celebrated men than any real design to promote the interests of learning or the improvement of her subjects. In 1654 she resigned the crown to her cousin Charles Gustavus, the principal occasion of which act was her having embraced the Roman catholic religion. From Sweden she removed secretly to Rome, but, after residing there some time, she went to France, where she was well received by Lewis XIV. But the unaccountable murder of her master of the horse, Monaldeschi, whom she caused to be put to death in her own house for having betrayed some confidential secrets, gave general disgust, and she applied to Cromwell for leave to visit England, which was civilly declined. On this she returned to Rome, where she amused herself with studying antiquities, and in making chemical experiments. On the death of Charles Gustavus, in 1660, she returned to Sweden, with a view of regaining the throne, but her subjects were disgusted with the change of her religion; and to preserve her income she was obliged to make a second renunciation of the crown. She returned again to Rome, where she died in 1689. She left a collection of maxims, and reflections on the life of Alexander the great, of whom she was a great admirer. Christina was a woman of strong mind, learned, and versed in the sciences; but her character was far from amiable, and her manners were not irreproachable.—New. Dict. Hist.

CHRISTOPHERSON (John), an English prelate, was a native of Lancashire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was a zealous Roman catholic, and in the reign of Edward VI. went abroad; but returned on the accession of Mary, who made him bishop of Chichester in 1557; he died the year following. He translated Eusebius, and the other early ecclesiastical historians, but not with much fidelity.—Moreri.

CHRYSTIUS, a stoic philosopher of Tarsus, who wrote above 700 books, chiefly upon logic. He was a conceited pedant, and as licentious as he was vain. He died B.C. 207.—Boyle.

CHRYSOLOGUS (Manuel), a learned Greek of the 14th century, who came to England in the reign of Richard II. as ambassador from John Paleologus, to solicit succour against the Turks. He afterwards taught Greek at Florence, Milan, and Rome. Pope Martin V. sent him on an embassy to Germany, about settling the general council of Constance; where he died in 1415. He wrote a Greek grammar, and a parallel between ancient and modern Rome.—Tiraboschi.

CHRYSOSTOM (John), an eloquent father of the church, and bishop of Constantinople, was born at Antioch in 354. His father's name was Secundus, but the son is known only by the surname of CHRYSOSTOM, which signifies golden-mouthed. He was bred to the bar, which he quitted for a religious life, and lived as a hermit in a cave six years, after which he returned to Antioch and was ordained. He became so famous for his eloquence, that, on the death of Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, he was elected his successor in 397. He built several hospitals in that city, gave most of his income to the poor, but in his endeavours to enlarge his episcopal jurisdiction, he became involved in a dispute with Theophilus bishop of Alexandria, who gained over the empress Eudoxia to his side, and the consequence was, that Chrysostom was deposed in a pretended synod at Chalcedon, in 403. The patriarch was then seized by the emperor's orders, and sent into Bithynia, which occasioned an insurrection at Constantinople; and to appease the people Chrysostom was restored in triumph. He was once more sent into exile for opposing the empress in placing her statue near the church, and died at Pityus, on the Euxine Sea, in 407. His works were edited by Saville, at Eton, in 8 vols. folio, 1613; and by Montfaucon, in 13 vols. 1718, Paris. His book on the priesthood is a very valuable work, and has been translated into English.—Cave. Dupin. Mosheim. Moreri.

CHUBB (Thomas), a deistical writer, was born near Salisbury, in 1679. He received a common education, and served his apprenticeship to a glover, but was never, as hath been said, a chandler. His leisure hours he devoted to study, especially divinity; and in 1715 he wrote a tract on the supremacy of God the father, with which Whiston was so well pleased, that he published it with some observations of his own. This performance brought him into considerable notice, and in 1750 he printed a collection of tracts on theological subjects, in 4to. which excited attention at the time. This work was followed by several others, in which Chubb made a regular progress towards deism; the principal of these are, "The true Gospel of Jesus Christ asserted;" "an Inquiry into the Ground and Foundation of Religion;" and "Four Dissertations on Subjects in the Old Testament." He lived for some time with sir Joseph Jekyll, where, however, he was occasionally required to wait at table as a servant out of livery. But he soon quitted this degrading situation, and returned to Salisbury, where he died in 1747. His posthumous works in 2 vols. were printed in 1748.—Eng. Brit.

CHUDLEIGH (Mary), an ingenious English lady, was born in 1656, at Winslade, in Devonshire. She married sir George Chudleigh, bart. by whom she had several children. Lady Chudleigh wrote a volume of poems, and another of essays; both of which possess merit. She died in 1710.—Bullard's Memoirs of Learned Ladies.

CHURCHILL (sir Winston), an English historian, was born in Dorsetshire in 1620, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford. He married the daughter of sir John Drake, of Ashe, in Devonshire; at whose house he resided during the civil war, having lost his estate in the service of the king. At the restoration he recovered his lands, obtained a seat in parliament, and the honour of knighthood. He wrote a Chronicle of the Kings of England, published in 1675, folio. He died in 1688. Besides his eldest son, the subject of the next article, he had several other children, particularly Arabella, who became mistress to James duke of York, by whom she had two sons, and two daughters.—Wood's A. O.

CHURCHILL (John), duke of Marlborough, and prince of the Roman empire, was the son of the above, and born at Ashe, in Devonshire, in 1650. He received but an indifferent education, for his father took him to court at the age of twelve years, where he became page to the duke of York, and in 1666 obtained a pair of colours in the guards. His first service was at the siege of Tangier; and, at his return to England, he became the favourite of the duchess of Cleveland, who gave him 5000*l.* with which he purchased an annuity for life. He served afterwards under the great Turenne, who was so pleased with his person and bravery, as to call him the handsome Englishman. He distinguished himself so gallantly at the siege of Maestricht, that the king of France publicly thanked him at the head of the regiment. On his return to England he was made lieutenant colonel, gentleman of the bed-chamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York. He attended that prince to Holland and Scotland, and about this time married Miss Jennings, maid of honour to princess, afterwards queen Anne. In 1682 he was shipwrecked with the duke of York, in their passage to Scotland, on which occasion his royal highness expressed the utmost anxiety to save his favourite. The same year he was made a peer, by the title of baron Eymouth in Scotland; and when James came to the crown, he was sent to France to notify the event. In 1685 he was created lord Churchill of Sandridge. The same year he suppressed Monmouth's rebellion, and took him prisoner. He continued to serve king James with great fidelity, till the arrival of the prince of Orange, and then left him, for which he has been stigmatized by several writers, and perhaps not unjustly, with base ingratitude. His own apology was a regard for the religion and constitution of his country. King William created him earl of Marlborough in 1689, and appointed him commander in chief of the English army in the Low Countries. He next served in Ireland, and reduced Cork, with other strong places. But in 1692 he was suddenly dismissed from his employments, and committed to the Tower; from whence, however, he was soon released. The cause of this disgrace has never been clearly explained. After the death of queen Mary he was restored to favour; and at the close of that reign he had the command of the English forces in Holland, and was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the states, who chose him captain-general of their forces. On the commencement of queen Anne's reign he recommended a war with France and Spain, which advice was adopted. In the first campaign of 1702 he took a number of strong towns, particularly Liege. He returned to England the following winter, and received the thanks of both houses, and the honour of a dukedom from the queen. In 1704 he joined prince Eugene, with whom he fought the French and Bavarians at Hochstedt, and obtained a complete victory, taking marshal Tallard prisoner. Just before this he had been created a prince of the empire. In the winter he returned to England, bringing with him the marshal Tallard, and 26 other officers of rank, 121 standards, and 179 colours. He again received the thanks of parliament, and the grant of the manor of Woodstock, with the hundred of Wotton. May 12, in 1706, he fought the famous battle of Ramillies, in which his life was frequently in the most imminent danger, a cannon shot taking off the head of colonel Bingley, as he was helping the duke to remount. This victory accelerated the fall of Louvain, Brussels, and other important places. He arrived in England in November, and received fresh honours and grants from the queen and parliament. A bill was passed to settle his titles upon the male and female issue of his daughters; and Blenheim house was ordered to be built to perpetuate his gallant actions. He had also a pension of 5000*l.* a year granted him out of the post office. The following campaign presented nothing worth recording; but the ensuing one was pushed with such vigour, that the French king was glad to enter into a negotiation for peace, which, however, had no effect. In 1709 he defeated marshal Villars at Malplaquet; for which victory a general thanksgiving was solemnized. In the winter of 1711 he returned to England, having added considerably to his laurels; but soon after was dismissed from his employments. To add to this unjust treatment, a prosecution was commenced against him for applying the public money to his private purposes. Stung at this ingratitude, he went into voluntary banishment, accompanied by his duchess, and remained abroad till 1714, when he landed at Dover, amidst the acclamations of the people. Queen Anne was just dead, and her successor restored the duke to his military appointments; but his infirmities increasing, he retired from public employment; and died at Windsor Lodge, having survived his intellectual faculties, June 16, 1722. His remains were interred with great pomp in Westminster abbey. The duke had four daughters, who married into the first families of the kingdom. His duchess outlived him several years. She was a woman of strong mind, but of overbearing passions. Several of her letters have been printed, which shew uncommon sagacity blended with as great a share of vanity.—Biog. Brit. Lediard's History of the Duke of Marlborough.

CHURCHILL (Charles), an English poet, was the son of a curate of St John's, Westminster, where he was born in 1731. He received his education at Westminster-school, but was refused matriculation at Oxford, on account of his insufficiency in classical knowledge; he then returned to Westminster, and married when very young. At the age of 23 he was ordained, and served a small curacy in Wales, where he turned dealer in cyder; but becoming bankrupt he returned to London, and succeeded his father; he also taught young ladies to read and write. His first literary performance was the Rosciad, which had so great a success that it stimulated him to further exertions in the satirical line. He now gave himself up to a dissipated course, renounced his clerical profession, discarded his wife, kept a mistress, and joined Wilkes the patriot of the day. His satires were wholly adapted to the fleeting circumstances of the moment, and though strong, and oftentimes highly wrought, are now sunk into oblivion. He died in 1764, at Boulogne. Besides his poems he was the author of a volume of dull sermons.—Biog. Br.

CHURCHWARD (Thomas), an English poet of the 16th century. He was born at Shrewsbury, and wrote a poem entitled The Worthiness of Wales. He died in 1604, and was buried in St. Margaret's church, Westminster.—Wood's A. G.

CYTRÆUS (David), a learned German divine, born in Suabia in 1580, and died in 1600. He was divinity professor at Kofstock, and wrote a Commentary on the Revelations; a History of the Confession of Augsburg, and other works.—Mélel. Adam. Vit. Theol. Germ.

CIACONIUS (Alphonfus), a Spanish writer, who died at Rome in 1599, aged 59. He wrote, 1. Vitæ & Gestæ Romanorum Pontificum & Cardinalium, 4 vols. folio; 2. Historia Utriusque Belli Dacici; 3. Bibliotheca Scriptorum ad ann. 1588; 4. An Explication of Trajan's Pillar, 1576, folio.—Mereri.

CIACONIUS (Petet), a Spanish critic, born at Toledo in 1525, and died at Rome in 1581. He was one of those employed by Gregory XIII. in correcting the calendar, and published some of the Latin classics.—Ibid.

CIAMPELLI (Augustine), an eminent historical painter of Florence, born in 1578, and died in 1640. He was the disciple of Santi di Titi, and performed many great works at Rome.—Piligrim.

CIAMPINI (John Justin), a learned Italian, born at Rome in 1633, and died in 1698. He instituted the academy of ecclesiastical history, and another of mathematics, at Rome. He wrote some pieces on antiquarian subjects.—Tirabazbi.

CIBBER (Colley), the son of Gabriel Cibber, a celebrated sculptor, by the daughter of William Colley, of the county of Rutland, Esq. He was born in London in 1671, and educated at Grantham school. He served in the prince of Orange's army at the revolution, and after that went upon the stage; but he never obtained any considerable reputation as an actor, and became dramatic writer to help his finances. His first play was Love's Last Shift, which was performed in 1695, and met with great applause; after which he wrote a number of others. His best play is the Careless Husband, performed in 1704: but the Nonjuror brought him the most fame and profit; George I. to whom it was dedicated, gave him 200l. with the office of poet laureat. He left the stage in 1750, and died in 1757. His comedies are light, airy, and pleasant, but his royal odes are extremely ridiculous. His apology for his own life is very amusing.—Biog. Br.

CIBBER (Theophilus), son of the preceding, was born in 1708, and entered early upon the stage, in which he might have shone if he had not given way to dissipation. He was drowned on his passage to Ireland in 1757. He wrote a ballad opera, called Pattie and Peggy, and his name was affixed to the Lives of the Poets, in 5 vols. 12mo. 1753, but the work was written by Robert Shields.—Ibid.

CIBBER (Susanna Maria), a celebrated actress. She was sister to Dr. Arne, the musician, and wife of Theophilus Cibber last mentioned, who literally sold her honour and his own to a gentleman, against whom he afterwards commenced a suit in the king's bench, and received 10*l.* damages: she continued to live with that gentleman till her death in 1766. Mrs. Cibber was excellent in tragedy.—*Bio*g.* Br.*

CICERO (Marcus Tullius), an illustrious Roman orator and philosopher. He was born at Arpinum, B.C. 105. He was honourably descended both by his father and mother's side, and his education was answerable to his birth and expectations. He was taught philosophy by Philo, and law by Mutius Scævola; and military knowledge he acquired under Sylla, in the Marston war. When young he translated the Greek poem of Aratus on the celestial phenomena into Latin, of which some fragments remain. At the age of 26 he appeared at the bar, and pleaded the cause of P. Quintilius, and defended Roscius of Ameria in such a manner as charmed the Romans. Soon afterwards he travelled into Greece and Asia, and spent some time at Athens with his friend T. Pomponius, called, from his love to that city, Atticus. On his return to Rome he became distinguished above all the pleaders; and his conduct in Sicily, whither he was sent as quaestor, procured him the applause of the inhabitants of that island. After passing through the offices of ædile and prætor, he offered himself candidate for the consulship; and though powerfully opposed, he succeeded, and had for his associate C. Antony. One of his competitors was the famous Catiline, who formed the design of murdering him, but the conspiracy being discovered, and Catiline accused to the senate, he quitted the city and raised an army in Gaul, which was defeated by C. Antony. The conspirators at Rome were put to death by Cicero, who was called by the citizens, "the father of his country and the second founder of the republic." His vehemence against Clodius, who was accused of having violated the mysteries of the Bona Dea, brought upon him a train of evils; and when Clodius became tribune he undermined his enemy so effectually, that Cicero found it expedient to go into voluntary exile. His banishment did not last long, for the Clodian faction became so odious that the senate and people unanimously recalled him. In the disputes between Cæsar and Pompey he sided with the latter, and followed him into Greece; but after the battle of Pharsalia he returned into Italy, and obtained the friendship of Cæsar. He now led a retired life, and left political contentions for literary amusements. But when Cæsar was slain he came once more upon the public stage, and advised the senate to grant a general amnesty. When Antony began to get the ascendancy, Cicero, knowing that he was hated by him, removed to Athens: from whence, however, he soon returned, though he lived in the constant expectation of being assassinated. Augustus at first courted his friendship, and affected a wish to be guided by his councils; but this was all artifice, and when he joined Antony and formed the triumvirate, he readily sacrificed this great man to the resentment of Antony. Cicero was at Tusculum when he received the news of the proscription in which he was included, and immediately set out in a litter for the sea-coast, to avoid his enemies. But he was overtaken by Popilius Lænas, a tribune, whose life he had formerly saved by his eloquence. When the assassins came up he stretched his head out of the litter, and was beheaded. Popilius carried the head and hands in triumph to Antony, who had the baseness to place them on the rostra, where Cicero had so often defended the lives, fortunes, and liberties of the Roman people. This happened December 7th, B. C. 42. The talents of this great man have been the subject of universal admiration, and his virtues were also eminent, both public and private, but they were in some degree obscured by an excessive vanity. The best editions of his works are those of Oxford, in 10 vols. 4to. 1782; Geneva, by Olivet, in 9 vols. 4to. 1758; and Paris, by Barbou, 14 vols. 1768. Cicero married Terentia, whom he afterwards divorced, and by whom he had a son and a daughter. His second wife was a young woman to whom he was guardian. His son Marcus served under Pompey, with great reputation, and Augustus made him augur; but his conduct was very licentious, and Pliny says that he was the greatest drunkard in the empire.—Life of Cicero by Middleton.

CICERO (Quintus Tullius), brother of the orator. He served the office of prætor, and was also governor of Asia. The triumvirs caused him to be proscribed, and the soldiers entering his house in search of him, put his son to the torture to make him confess where his father was. Cicero hearing his groans, came forth to save his son, and the assassins put them both to death.—Plutarch.

CID (the), a celebrated hero in the Spanish history, whose narrative is blended with a considerable share of romance. Thus much appears to be plain truth. His real name was Don Roderigo Dias de Bivar, and he was reared in the court of the kings of Castile. On account of his early prowess he received the honour of knighthood, and in 1068 went with Don Sancho of Castile against Ramiro king of Arragon, who was slain in battle. On the accession of Sancho, he accompanied him to the siege of Zamora, where the king being killed by treachery, Roderigo led the troops safely back to Castile, carrying with him the dead body of his master. Alfonso, the brother of Sancho, was then placed on the throne, after purging himself by oath from having had any concern in the murder of Sancho. In 1074

Roderigo married donna Ximena Dias, daughter of count Diego Alvarez of the Asturias; soon after which, he revolted against Alfonso, and committed great ravages throughout Arragon, and penetrating near Saragossa, fixed his residence in a fortress still called Pena de el Cid (the rock of the Cid), where he became an independent chief. In 1094 he took Valentia, and held it to his death in 1099. The word Cid in the Arabic signifies Lord. Corneille has written a famous tragedy on this man's history, drawn from the Spanish romances.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CIGNANI (Carlo), an Italian painter; born at Boulogne in 1628, and brought up in the school of Albano. His pictures are held in high estimation. He died in 1719.—D'Argenville.

CIMASUE (John), a celebrated painter, was born at Florence in 1240, and revived the art of painting in Italy, in which he was instructed by some Grecian artists. He painted in fresco and distemper, and many of his pieces exist in the Franciscan church at Afcici. He was also a good architect, and died at the age of 60.—Pilkington.

CIMON, an Athenian general, the son of Miltiades, who signalized himself at the battle of Salamis. He defeated the Persians by sea and land on the same day, and applied the money which he took to public use. Some time after he lost his popularity, and was sent into exile, from whence he was recalled when Athens declared war against Sparta. By his address he restored peace, and then turned his arms against the Persians, whose fleet he ruined. He died while besieging Citium in Cyprus B. C. 449, in the 51st year of his age.—Nipor. Plutarch.

CINCINNATUS (Lucius Quintius), a famous Roman, who was called from the plough to be dictator, at the time when the city was besieged by the Volsci and Æqui. Having defeated the enemies of his country, he resigned his office and retired to his farm. At the age of 80 he was again called upon to act against Prænest, where he had equal success. He lived about 460 B. C.—Livy. Florus.

CINCIUS ALIMENTUS (Lucius), an old Roman historian who is frequently quoted by Livy as a writer of integrity. He wrote the history of the wars of Hannibal in Greek: but his history of Gorgias Leontinus was in Latin; as also a work by him on military affairs; but they are all lost.—Vossius de Hist. Lat.

CINNA (Lucius Cornelius), a Roman consul, 87 B. C. He and Marius filled Rome with blood, and Cinna procured the consulate four times. He was assassinated at Ancona.—Plutarch. Livy.

CINNAMUS (John), a Greek writer of the 12th century, and notary to the emperor Manuel Comnenus, whose history he wrote, and likewise that of his father John. This work was printed in Greek and Latin, at Utrecht, in 1652, 4to. and by Du Cange, at Paris, 1670, folio.—Cowr. Hist. Lat.

CINO DU PISTOIA, an Italian poet, so called from the place of his birth, but his real name was De Sigioldi. He studied law, and acquired considerable reputation. In 1310 he was chosen senator of Rome, and afterwards became professor in several universities. He died in 1336. He wrote a commentary on the Digest, but he is best known by his poetical works, which are praised by Dante. The best edition is that of Venice in 1589.—Tiraboschi.

CINQ-MARS (Henry Coiffier), marquis of, a celebrated favourite of Lewis XIII., was the son of the marquis d'Effiat, marshal of France, and born in 1620. Cardinal Richelieu became his friend and introduced him to the king, who conferred on him several marks of his favour. Cinq-Mars, however, had no regard either for the cardinal or the monarch, and was so imprudent and ungrateful as to instigate Gaston, duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebellion: between them a secret treaty was set on foot with Spain for its assistance, but the plot being discovered by Richelieu, the marquis was seized and beheaded, in September 1642, aged 22.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CIOFANI (Hercules), an Italian critic, who published annotations upon the works of Ovid, and the life of that poet, in 1578.—Moreri.

CIRCIGNANO (Nicolo), an historical painter, called Pomerancio from the place of his birth. Several of his paintings are in the churches at Rome and Loretto. He died in 1538, aged 72. His son Antonio was also an eminent painter. He died in 1620, aged 60.—Pilkington.

CIRILLO (Dominic), an Italian botanist, was born near Naples in 1730. His uncle, Nicolas Cirillo, was primary professor of medicine in the university of that capital, and president of the academy in the same place. Dominic received a liberal education, with a view to the medical profession, but he devoted himself with ardour to the study of natural history, and at the age of thirty was elected professor of botany at Naples. In 1761 he published his first work, Introductio ad Botanicam. As he spoke the English language well, he was the exclusive physician to all those of that nation who visited Naples; and lady Walpole persuaded him to accompany her to England, where he profited by the lectures of Dr. William Hunter, and the conversation of other men of science. In 1780 he published his Nosologia Methodicæ Rudimenta. In 1784 he returned to his favourite pursuits, and printed his De Essentialibus Nonnullarum Plantarum Characteribus, which was followed by several other performances of merit, the principal of which were, his Neapolitan Flora, 1793, and his Cyperus Papyrus, printed at Parma. This last closed the literary career of Cirillo; and it would have been fortunate for his reputation if he had with it closed his life. But unhappily he had imbibed the new philosophy, and when the French entered Naples he not only sided with them against his sovereign, but accepted a place under them during their usurpation. When the lawful government was restored at the end of 1795, he was publicly executed as a traitor.—Monthly Mag. Aug. 1802.

CISNER (Nicholas), a learned German, was born at Mosbach on the Neckar, in 1529. He studied at Strasburg under his relation Bucer, after which he became professor of moral philosophy at Wittemberg, which place he left in 1553, and went into France and Italy. After taking the degree of doctor of laws, at Pisa, he settled at Heidelberg, where he was nominated professor and counsellor to the elector-palatine. He died in 1583. A collection of his works was published at Frankfurt in 1611, under this title, Opuscula historica et politico Philologica, 8vo.—Moreri.

CIVILIS (Claudius), a famous Batavian general, who commanded a body of his countrymen in the Roman service. Being accused of treachery, he was sent in chains to Rome, but absolved by Galba. He was afterwards brought into danger on the same charge under Vitellius, and with difficulty escaped. This inflamed him with resentment against the Romans, and having roused his countrymen, expelled them from Batavia: but after various changes of fortune, he was obliged to enter into a treaty and to submit to Vespasian.—Tacitus.

CIVOLI (Lewis), an eminent painter, whose real name was Cardi, was a native of Cigoli in Tuscany. He studied the manner of Correggio with great success, and excelled also in poetry and music, but abandoned the latter that it might not impede his progress in painting. His best pictures are at Florence.—D'Argenville.

CLAGETT (William), an English divine, was born at St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk, in 1646, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D. D. in 1683. He became preacher to the society of Gray's-inn, rector of Farnham-Royal, in Bucks, and lecturer of St. Michael Bassishaw, London. He died in 1688. Four volumes of his sermons were published after his death; besides which he wrote some controversial pieces against the romanists and dissenters. His brother Nicholas was also D. D. and rector of Hitcham, in Suffolk. He died in 1727. His son Nicholas became bishop of Exeter.—Biog. Brit.

CLAIRAUT (Alexis), a French mathematician, born at Paris in 1713. At the age of four years he could read and write; at nine he made some progress in algebra and geometry, and solved several difficult problems. In his eleventh year a memoir of his on curves appeared in the Miscellanea

Berolinensia, with a honourable certificate of the academy of sciences. That learned body admitted him an associate at the age of eighteen, and he was one of the academicians who went to the north to measure a degree, for ascertaining the figure of the earth. He died in 1765. He wrote, Elements of Geometry, and of Algebra; a treatise on the Figure of the Earth; Tables of the Moon, &c.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CLAIRFAIT (N. count de), a famous Austrian general, was a Walloon by birth, and entering into the imperial service, distinguished himself greatly against the Turks. In 1792 he commanded the Austrian troops against France, and evinced in that war the most brilliant military talents, though not with equal success. After taking Longwy and Stenay, he retired into the Low Countries, where he lost the famous battle of Jemappe, owing to the superior numbers and impetuosity of the French. His retreat across the Rhine in consequence of this was a masterly stroke of military skill. Clairfait was next put under the command of the prince of Cobourg, and achieved considerable advantages at Altenhoven, Quievrain, Hansen, and Famars. He commanded the left wing at the battle of Nerwinde, and decided the victory. He was afterwards opposed in Flanders to general Pichegru, with whom he bravely disputed every foot of ground, till the inequality of his forces obliged him to abandon the country. In 1795 he took the command of the army of Mayence, and attacked the strong camp which the French had formed before that city. This he forced, and made a great number of prisoners. He was following up this victory with ardour, when he received at Mannheim an order to desist. On this he gave in his resignation, and retired to Vienna, where he was well received by the emperor. Some time afterwards, he was made a counsellor of war, and died at Vienna in 1798. Clairfait was a severe disciplinarian, but greatly beloved by his soldiers. Cool and intrepid, he formed his own plans, and saw them punctually executed under his own eye. He was reckoned by the French the ablest general that was opposed to them during the war.—Ibid.

CLAIRON (Clara - Joseph - Hyppolite - Lewis Delatude), a celebrated French actress, was born at Paris in 1724, of poor parents. She early displayed talents for the stage, which being cultivated by mademoiselle Dangeville, an actress of note, she made so great a progress as to appear with applause in a piece entitled The Isle of Slaves, in 1736. The year following she engaged in a company at Rouen, in which she played comic parts and sung. Not long afterwards she returned to Paris, and made her entrance on the French theatre with great applause. She excelled in tragedy; and a few months before her death recited a scene of Phædra before Mr. Kemble, the principal tragic performer in England, who admired the expression, force, and dignity with which this great actress recited, at the age of eighty, the finest verses of Racine. She died at Paris, Jan. 31, 1803.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CLANCY (Michael), a physician and dramatic writer, was a native of Ireland, and settled in Dublin, but having lost his sight in consequence of a cold, he was disabled from following his profession. He then kept a school, and obtained a small pension. Having a taste for poetry, he wrote a tragedy entitled Œdipus, acted for his benefit at Drury-lane, in which he played the part of blind Tiresias with applause. He also wrote Memoirs of his own Life, 2 vols. 12mo. 1746.

CLARA, a Roman catholic saint and the foundress of a religious order, was born at Assisi, in 1193, of a good family. At an early age she resolved to embrace a religious life, and prevailed on her sister Agnes and other young ladies to follow her example. St. Francis d'Assisi gave them the church of St. Damian, whose rule Clara followed, and became abbess of her order, which grew very numerous. She died in 1293, and was canonized by Alexander IV.—Moreri.

CLARIO (Isidore), an Italian bishop, famous for his learning, zeal, and charity. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent, and died at Foligno in 1555. He published Annotations on the Vulgate Translation of the Bible, with corrections of the text in numerous places, which work obtained a place in the Index Expurgatorius.—Tiraboschi.

CLARKE (Samuel), a learned orientalist, was born at Brackley, in Northamptonshire, and educated at Merton college, Oxford. In 1650 he kept a school at Ilkington, and in 1658 became head of the civil law at Oxford, where he died in 1669. He assisted bishop Walton in his Polyglot Bible, and published some learned books.—Wood.

CLARKE (Samuel), a nonconformist divine, was born at Woolston, in Warwickshire, where his father was minister. He received his education first at Coventry, and next at Emanuel college, Cambridge. On entering into orders he settled at Coventry, from whence he removed to Warwick, but afterwards obtained the living of Bene't Fink, London, from which he was ejected for nonconformity, in 1662. He died in 1682, aged 83. He compiled a considerable number of volumes, which were once esteemed; the best known are, his Lives of eminent Persons, in folio; and his Martyrology. A son of both his names published a good commentary on the Bible.—Calamy. Granger.

CLARKE (Samuel), a learned divine, was born in 1675, at Norwich, of which city his father was alderman, and member of parliament. He received his education at the grammar school of Norwich, from whence he went to Caius college, Cambridge. Rohault's Physics was then the text book in natural philosophy at Cambridge; this Mr. Clarke translated into better Latin, with Notes, agreeable to the Newtonian system, at the age of twenty-two. On being ordained, he became chaplain to bishop Moore of Norwich, who gave him the rectory of Draycot, in Norfolk. In 1701 he published his Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. Matthew, which was afterwards extended to the remaining Gospels. In 1704 he preached the Boyle's lecture, and gave such satisfaction that he was appointed to preach the year following. In 1706 he printed a letter to Dodwell on the Immortality of the Soul, a philosophical and learned discourse. This controversy lasted for some time. The same year appeared his Latin translation of sir Isaac Newton's Optics, for which sir Isaac complimented him with 500*l*. About this time he was presented to the rectory of St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf, London, and appointed chaplain to queen Anne. In 1709 he obtained the rectory of St. James's, Westminster, and took his degree of D. D. at Cambridge. In 1712 he published an elegant edition of Cæsar's Commentaries, and the same year came out his celebrated book, entitled The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, which made a great noise, and was not only written against by numerous writers, but complained of by the lower house of convocation. The second edition, corrected and enlarged, appeared in 1719. In 1715, and the following year, he had a dispute with Leibnitz, on the principles of natural philosophy and religion. In 1717 he printed remarks upon Collins's Philosophical Enquiry concerning Human Liberty. About a year afterwards he ventured to make an innovation in the doxology in the singing Psalms, according to the arian doctrine, which gave such offence to doctor Robinson, bishop of London, that he sent a circular letter to his clergy, warning them against the use of these forms. At this time Dr. Clarke was presented to the mastership of Wigston's hospital, in Leicester. In 1724 he published seventeen sermons, preached on several occasions. In 1727 he was offered the place of master of the mint, vacant by the death of sir Isaac Newton, but refused it. In 1729 he published the first twelve books of Homer's Iliad, with a Latin version and annotations. The remaining books were published by his son in 1732. This great man was seized with a pain in his side, Sunday, May 11, 1729, as he was going to preach before the judges at Serjeant's-inn, and being rendered incapable of discharging the duty, he was carried home, and died the Saturday following. The same year appeared his Exposition of the Church Catechism, and 10 volumes of his sermons. Dr. Clarke was a profound scholar, a close reasoner, an acute critic; well versed in mathematics, philosophy, and metaphysics. He was also a man of unaffected manners; mild, amiable and charitable to those who differed from him.—Biog. Brit.

CLARKE (William), an English divine, was born at Haghmon abbey in Shropshire, in 1696, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. Archbishop Wake gave him the rectory of Buxted, in Suffex, and in 1738 he was appointed prebendary of Chichester. He died in 1771. His greatest literary performance is the Connection of the Roman, Saxon, and English Coins, 4to. 1767. His son Edward was fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge; and attended the earl of Bristol to Spain as his chaplain. In 1763 he published letters concerning that nation, in 4to. In 1768 he succeeded to the rectory of Buxted, on the resignation of his father, and died in 1786.—Ibid.

CLARKSON (David), a nonconformist divine, was born at Bradford, in Yorkshire, in 1622, and educated at Clare hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was afterwards minister of Mortlake, in Surry, but was dispossessed in 1662 for nonconformity. He was a pious man, and had the honour, when at college, of having Mr. afterwards archbishop Tillotson, for his pupil. He wrote some controversial pieces, the principal of which is entitled No Evidence for Diocesan Episcopacy in the primitive Times, 4to. 1681. This was completely refuted by doctor Henry Maurice. A volume of his sermons was printed in folio, after his death in 1686.—Culamy.

CLAUDE, a French monk of the celestine order, who lived at the beginning of the 15th century. He wrote a very valuable work on the errors of our sensations, which was published by Oronce Fine, in 1542.

CLAUDE of Lorraine, a famous painter, born in 1600, of poor parents. He was bred a pastry-cook, which business he quitted, and applied to drawing. Going to Rome, he became labourer to a painter, who taught him some principles of his art. He soon proved an admirable landscape painter, and painted in fresco, as well as in oil. He died at Rome in 1682. His works are numerous and inestimable.—Pilkington.

CLAUDE (John), a French protestant minister, was born in the province of Angenois in 1619, and was ordained at Montauban in 1645. He rendered himself famous by his treatise on the eucharist, which occasioned a controversy between him, the gentlemen of the port royal, Arnauld, and other learned men. He was suspended from preaching by order of the court, and obliged to quit the kingdom, on which he went to Holland, where he obtained a pension from the prince of Orange, and preached at the Hague. He died in 1687. His son Isaac, who became minister of the Walloon church at the Hague, and died in 1695, published his father's posthumous works in 5 vols. 12mo. 1688. That on the composition of a sermon has been translated into English.—Bayle.

CLAUDIAN, a Latin poet of the 4th century. His country has been disputed. He came to Rome in 395, and was patronized by Stilico, in whose misfortunes he became involved. But afterwards he rose into favour at court, and was chosen tribune. The best edition of his poems is that of Gesner, 2 vols. 8vo. Leipzig, 1758.—Voss. Poet. Lat.

CLAUDIUS I. emperor of Rome, was the son of Drusus, and succeeded Caligula. His reign was popular at the beginning; he obtained some conquests in Britain, and built several noble structures in Rome; but at last he gave up the government to his creatures, who committed shameful excesses. He was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, who wanted to place her son Nero on the throne, A. D. 54. He was then 63.—Tacitus. Suetonius.

CLAUDIUS II. was a Dalmatian by birth, and succeeded Gallienus. This emperor obtained some great victories over the Goths and other nations, and died generally regretted, after a reign of two years.—Univ. Hist.

CLAUDIUS (Appius), the founder of the Claudian family, was a Sabine, but on account of some differences with his countrymen, he settled at Rome, with several of his kindred and vassals, B. C. 504. He was well received, obtained several grants, and became consul, in which he behaved with great firmness and integrity. The time of his death is not known.—Livy.

CLAUDIUS (Appius), son of the above, was chosen consul B. C. 471, soon after which a war broke out between Rome and the Æqui and Volsci. Claudius marched against the latter, but his troops threw down their arms and fled, on which Claudius, after his arrival on the Roman territory, caused all his officers to be put to death, and decimated the rest of the army. This rendered him very odious at Rome; and he increased his unpopularity by heading the senatorial opposition to an agrarian law. For this he was publicly impeached before the people; but his trial being postponed, he died before it could be brought on.—Ibid.

CLAUDIUS (Appius), the Decemvir, said by some to have been the son of the above, was the first person elected to that office, in which, for a considerable time, he behaved with great reputation. At last falling in love with Virginia, daughter of Virginius, an officer in the army employed against the Æqui, he endeavoured by every base means in his power to prevail over her virtue, but being constantly baffled, he had recourse to the extraordinary expedient of suborning a man named Claudius to demand her, under the pretence that she was the child of his slaves, and brought up by the wife of Virginius, as her own. The claim was brought before the tribunal of Appius, who decreed, that till all the witnesses should appear, Virginia should be delivered to the claimant Claudius. The people opposed this decree; and Virginius being privily sent for, appeared before the tribunal, but being unable to get the iniquitous sentence revoked, he snatched up a butcher's knife and stabbed his daughter to the heart. An insurrection ensued; the army joined Virginius, and the senate being unable to resist them, dissolved the decemvirate, and sent Appius to prison, where he died.—Univ. Hist.

CLAUDIUS (Appius), surnamed Cæcus, or the blind, was a descendant of the last-mentioned, and became celebrated for his knowledge in the civil law. He served the office of censor B. C. 813, in which he rendered great service to Rome, by bringing a supply of water by an aqueduct seven miles long; and by making a noble road from the city to Capua, called the Appian way. He was made consul B. C. 307, and the year following prætor. In his old age he lost his sight. Cicero mentions him with great respect.—Livy. Cicero de Senectute.

CLAVIUS (Christopher), a learned mathematician and jesuit, was born at Bamberg in Germany, 1537, and was employed by Gregory XIII. in the reformation of the calendar. He died in 1612. His works were printed in 5 vols. folio.—Moreri. Hutton.

CLAYTON (Robert), an Irish prelate, was the son of Dr. Clayton, dean of Kildare, and born at Dublin in 1695. He received his grammatical education at Westminster-school; from whence he removed to Trinity college, Dublin, of which he became fellow. On contracting an acquaintance with Dr. Samuel Clarke in London, he embraced arianism; notwithstanding which, he accepted preferment in the church of Ireland, and was successively promoted to the sees of Killala, Cork, and Clogher; to the last of which he was translated in 1745. His first literary performance was an Introduction to the History of the Jews, which was followed by the Chronology of the Hebrew Bible vindicated, 1747, 4to; a Dissertation on Prophecy, in 1749; and, an impartial Enquiry into the Time of the Coming of the Messiah, 8vo. In 1751 he attracted considerable notice by a long dedication to a piece entitled an Essay on Spirit, in which the doctrine of the Trinity was controverted. The whole tract was attributed to the bishop, but he was only the author of the preliminary discourse. After this he published a Vindication of the Histories of the Old and New Testament, against Bolingbroke. In 1756 he made a motion in the house of lords for expunging the Athanasian and Nicene creeds from the Irish liturgy, but it was not seconded. In consequence of this and some other bold attempts to overturn the orthodox faith, a mandate was sent from the king for a prosecution to be commenced against the bishop, which had such an effect on his spirits that he died of a nervous fever, Feb. 28, 1758.—Biog. Br.

CLEANTHES, a Grecian philosopher, and a disciple of Zeno. He maintained himself while pursuing his studies by hard labour. He succeeded his master in the school, and had for pupils king Antigonus and Chryippus. He starved himself to death at the age of 90, B. C. 240.—Diog. Laert. Moreri.

CLEEVE (Joseph), a Flemish painter, whose subjects are generally bankers and misers counting money. He died in 1536. There were other painters of the same name and family.—Pilkington.

CLEGHORN (George), a Scotch physician, born near Edinburgh, and educated at that university under Alexander Monro. In 1736 he was appointed surgeon of the 22d regiment of foot, with which he went to Minorca, and remained there 18 years. In 1750 he published a book on the diseases of Minorca. In 1751 he settled in Dublin, where he read lectures on anatomy. He died in 1789.—Europ. Mag.

CLELAND (John), an English writer, was consul at Smyrna, and afterwards went to the East Indies, but returned without any addition to his fortune. He wrote a well known immoral romance, for which he received only twenty guineas, though the sale of the book has produced as many thousands. He was called before the privy-council for it, and having pleaded poverty as the cause, the earl of Granville procured him a pension of 100l. a year, on condition that he should abstain from such kind of writing for the future. He died in 1789, aged 82.—Ibid.

CLEMANGIS (Nicholas), a French divine, was born in the diocese of Chalons, and studied at Paris, under Gerfon. In 1393 he became rector of that university. He wrote a letter to Charles VI. of France, to put an end to the papal schism; and being suspected of writing the bull of excommunication issued by Benedict XIII. against that monarch, he was obliged to retire into a convent. He afterwards recovered the royal favour, and obtained some preferment. He died in 1440. He wrote a work on the corrupt State of the Church, which is a remarkable exposure of the abuses of popery. It was published by Lydius, a protestant divine, in Holland, in 1613. His treatise against simony is also a strong piece.—Moreri.

CLEMENCET (Charles), a French benedictine, who died in 1778, at a very advanced age. He wrote, 1. l'Art de verifier les Dates, 1750, 4to. this very curious and useful work was reprinted in 1770, and again in 1786; 2. General History of Port-Royal, 10 vols. 12mo. and other works.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CLEMENS (Titus Flavius), a father of the church, usually called Clemens Alexandrinus, from the place of his residence if not of his birth; he succeeded, in 191, Pantænus, in the catechetical school at Alexandria, which office he discharged with great reputation. He was in priests' orders in 195, and in the persecution of Severus he fled to Jerusalem, from whence he removed to Antioch, and afterwards returned to Alexandria, where he died. The best edition of his works is that of archbishop Potter, 2 vols. folio, Oxford, 1715.—Cave. Dupin.

CLEMENS (Romanus), a father of the church, and the companion of St. Paul. He became bishop of Rome, but at what time is uncertain. His Epistle to the Church at Corinth is inserted in Le Clerc's Patres Apostolici, Amsterdam, 1698, and was translated into English by archbishop Wake, 1705. He died in 100.—Cave. Dupin.

CLEMENT II. (pope), was a Saxon, and bishop of Bamberg, elected pope by the council of Sutri in 1046, and died in 1047. He distinguished himself by his zeal against simony.—CLEMENT III. bishop of Preneſte, obtained the chair after Gregory VIII. in 1187, and died in 1191, having published a crusade against the Saracens.—CLEMENT IV. was a Frenchman, had borne arms, afterwards became a civilian, and lastly entered into orders, on which he was made archbishop of Narbonne, and a cardinal. Pope Urban IV. sent him legate to England. He succeeded that pontiff in 1265, and died in 1268. He was remarkable for his liberality and impartiality, and shewed no particular marks of favour to his relations.—CLEMENT V. called before his election Bertrand the Goth, was born in the diocese of Bourdeaux, of which see he was made archbishop in 1300. He succeeded Benedict XI. in 1305, and removed the papal seat from Rome to Avignon in 1309. He was the tool of Philip the Fair of France, at whose desire he suppressed the order of Knights' Templars. This pontiff is accused of incontinence and avarice. He died in 1314.—CLEMENT VI. a doctor of Paris, mounted the pontifical throne in 1342, on the death of Benedict XII. and died in 1352. Writers have differed widely in their characters of this pope; some have charged him with pride, gluttony, and incontinence, while Petrarch represents him as learned, generous, and virtuous, but then he was under obligations to him. CLEMENT VII. (Julius de Medici), succeeded Adrian VI. in 1523. He was a natural son of Julian de Medici, but Leo X. his relation declared him legitimate, on the testimony of several persons, that his father and mother were married. That pope made him a cardinal. He joined the kings of France and England against the emperor Charles V. which was called the holy league. Rome was in consequence besieged and taken, and the pope retired to the castle of St. Angelo, where he was obliged to submit to the conditions imposed upon him by the emperor. He excommunicated Henry VIII. of England, on account of his marriage with Anne Boleyn, which occasioned the separation of England from the Roman see. He died in 1534.—CLEMENT VIII. a native of Fano, was elected in 1592. He absolved Henry IV. of France, but was greatly offended at the expulsion of the jesuits from that kingdom. He died in 1605, aged 69. He was a learned and liberal-minded prelate.—CLEMENT IX. was of a noble family in Tuscany, and succeeded Alexander VII. in 1667. His pontificate was disturbed by the affair of Jansenius, in which he conducted himself with moderation. He died in 1669 of grief for the loss of Candia.—CLEMENT X. (John Baptist Emile Altieri), was made cardinal by Clement IX. whom he succeeded in 1670, and died in 1676, aged 86. All business was done by his nephew, whence it was said, "that there were two popes, one in fact, the other in name."—CLEMENT XI. (John Francis Albani), born at Pefaro in 1649, made cardinal in 1690, and elected pope in 1700. He took three days to deliberate whether he should accept the tiara. His pontificate was disturbed by the disputes between the jesuits and jansenists, to put an end to which, he issued a famous bull in 1705 against the five propositions. In 1713 he issued the celebrated bull unigenitus against Quénel's Paraphrase on the New Testament, a book which the pope himself had before highly praised. He died in 1721, aged 72. His works were printed at Rome in 1729, 2 vols. folio.—CLEMENT XII. a Florentine, succeeded Benedict XIII. in 1730, and died in 1740, aged 88. He reformed the abuses which had crept in under his predecessor, and said to some of the cardinals, who wanted to recommend certain persons to compose his ministry, "It is for the cardinals to elect a pope, but it is for the pope to choose his ministers." The Romans erected a statue to his memory.—CLEMENT XIII. (Charles Rezzonico), was born at Venice in 1693, and made cardinal by Clement XII. in 1737. In 1743 he obtained the bishopric of Padua, in which station he distinguished himself by his piety and liberality. He was elected pope in 1758, and died suddenly in 1769.—CLEMENT XIV. This great man, whose name was John Vincent Antonio Ganganelli, was the son of a physician at St. Arcangelo, near Rimini, where he was born in 1705. At the age of 18 he entered among the Franciscans, and studied philosophy and theology at different universities; at the age of 35 he was called to Rome by his superior, to teach divinity in the college of St. Bonaventure. Benedict XIV. apprized of his extraordinary merit, appointed him one of the council of the holy office, and his successor Clement XIII. raised him to the purple, but he still continued to wear the plain dress of his order, and observed all the mortifications of a friar. On the death of the pope, the choice of a successor was a matter of great difficulty, as at that time most of the catholic kings seemed ready to separate from the Roman see if the jesuits were not suppressed. The cardinals in the interest of the house of Bourbon, knowing that Ganganelli was not particularly attached to that order, procured his election, and the suppression of the jesuits was the consequence. His conduct after his election was still the same, familiar and lowly. When he was told that the papal dignity required a more sumptuous table, he answered, "That neither St. Peter nor St. Francis had taught him to dine splendidly." His liberality appeared by his common saying, "We too often lay aside charity to maintain fifth; without reflecting, that if it is not allowed to tolerate error, it is forbidden to hate and persecute those who have embraced it." He reformed several abuses, particularly quakery, which had risen to a shameful height in the ecclesiastical state. He died in 1775. M. Caraccioli published his Life, and a Collection of Letters said to be Ganganelli's, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1776, but these are generally admitted to be spurious.—Bower. Platina. M. J. im. Moreri. Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CLEMENT, or CLEMENS (David), a learned German, was born at Hof Geismar, where his father was pastor of a French congregation, and whom he succeeded. In 1736 he removed to Brunswick, and afterwards to Hanover, where he died, in 1760. He was a man of universal reading, as appears by two considerable works of his; 1. Bibliothèque curieuse Historique de Livres difficiles à trouver, 9 vols. 4to.; 2. Specimen Bibliothecæ Hispano-Majanzæ, five Idea novi Catalogi critici Operum Scriptorum Hispanorum quæ habet in sua Bibliotheca Gregor. Majanzus, Hanover 1753.—Gen. Biog.

CLEMENT (Francis), the last writer of the congregation of St. Maur, in France, was born at Beze, in Burgundy, in 1714. He was called by his superiors to Paris, in order to continue the Literary History of France, begun by Rivet. He composed the 11th and 12th volumes of that compilation, and was afterwards charged with the continuation of the Collection of the French Historians, begun by Bouquet; of which he published the 12th and the 13th volumes. The greatest service, however, he rendered to the republic of letters was the improvement of the capital work L'Art de verifier les Dates, contrived by Dantine, and afterwards published by Durand and Clementet, in one large vol. 4to. after thirteen years labour, he actually raised it to three large vols. folio, which appeared from 1783 to 1792. He was writing a similar work on the subject of ancient chronology, with the title L'Art de verifier les Dates avant J. C., when he died in 1793.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CLEMENT (Peter), a miscellaneous writer, born at Geneva in 1707, and brought up to the ministry, but his conduct giving offence, he removed to England and became travelling tutor to lord Waldegrave, whom he accompanied to Italy. He afterwards settled at Paris, where he conducted a literary journal from 1749 to 1754, entitled Nouvelles Litteraires de France. In this work he blended much licentiousness with his satire. He affected indeed to unite the two characters, of the man of letters and the man of pleasure. He also published a collection of poems; and produced some plays, particularly Merope, a tragedy, and the London Merchant or George Barnwell, translated from the English. He died in 1767.—Ibid.

CLEOBULUS, one of the seven wise sages of Greece. He went into Egypt to study philosophy, and was the intimate friend of Solon, to whom he wrote an epistle, which is extant. He died about 560 B. C. His daughter Cleobulina was distinguished by her talents and personal charms. She composed enigmas.—Diog. Laertius.

CLEOMBROTUS, the name of two kings of Lacedæmonia. The first made war against the Bæotians, and was slain in a battle fought with Epaminondas at Leuctra, B. C. 371. The second was son-in-law of Leonidas, and for some time usurped the throne during the expulsion of that great man, but when Leonidas was recalled, Cleombrotus was banished, and was attended by his wife, who had accompanied her father in his exile. A philosopher of the same name slew himself after reading Plato's book on the immortality of the soul.—Moreri.

CLEOMENES I. king of Sparta, conquered the Argives, and delivered Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. He slew himself in a fit of insanity, B. C. 491.—CLEOMENES II. succeeded his brother Agisipolis II. and reigned 61 years in the greatest tranquillity.—CLEOMENES III. the son of Leonidas, whom he succeeded, B. C. 230. He poisoned his colleague Eurydamides, and took for an associate in the government his brother Euclidas against the laws. Engaging in a war with the Achæans, he was defeated, and obliged to fly into Egypt, where he put an end to himself, B. C. 219.—Polybius. Plutarch. Univ. Hist.

CLEOPATRA, queen of Egypt, was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and the sister of Ptolemy Dionysius, who deprived her of her share of the kingdom, on which she admitted Cæsar to her arms to gain his interest in her behalf, and by him had a son called Cæstrion. Ptolemy was defeated and accidentally drowned, thus leaving the throne to his sister, who put away her younger brother by poison. She afterwards resided with Cæsar, and was at Rome when he was killed, on which she fled from the city; and after the battle of Philippi she was summoned by Antony to answer the charge alleged against her of having assisted Brutus. When she made her appearance before Antony the charms of her person ensnared him, and he married her, regardless of his connection with Octavia, the sister of Augustus. At the battle of Actium she fled, and her paramour was defeated. He afterwards died in her arms. Cleopatra, to prevent being led as a captive to grace the triumph of Augustus, applied an asp to her breast, and died of the wound, B.C. 30, and of her age 39. She was a woman of great genius, and versed in a number of languages, but of a most ambitious and extravagant spirit, and is said to have discoloured costly pearls in vinegar, to render her entertainments more expensive.—Plutarch. Un. Hist.

CLEOSTRATUS, an ancient astronomer of Greece, who is said to have invented the signs of the zodiac, and to have reformed the Greek calendar. He flourished 536 years B.C.—Voss. de Math.

CLERC (Daniel le), a learned physician, was the son of Stephen le Clerc, Greek professor at Geneva, where Daniel was born in 1652. He studied physic at Paris and Montpellier, and on his return to his native place, exercised his profession with reputation. He was also versed in Greek and Latin antiquities, and particularly in medals. On becoming a member of the council of state in 1704, he quitted practice. He died in 1728. His works are, Bibliotheca Anatomica, seu recens in Anatomia inventorum index-locupletissimus, 2 vols. fol.; Histoire de la Médecine, Geneva, 1696, 8vo. This has been translated into English. Historia Naturalis & Medicamentorum lumbicorum intra hominem, &c.—Moreri.

CLERC (John le), an eminent writer and critic, was brother of the last mentioned, and born at Geneva in 1657. After going through a proper course of study he was ordained a minister; but having embraced the arminian doctrines he left his native country, and in 1682 went to London, where he officiated for some time in two French congregations. The climate of England not agreeing with his constitution, he went to Amsterdam, where he became professor of philosophy, hebrew, and belles lettres in the Remonstrant college. In 1691 he married the daughter of the celebrated Italian writer Gregorio Leti, by whom he had children who all died young. He survived his mental faculties, and died in 1736. In his theological writings Le Clerc was too apt to run into conjecture and hypothesis, yet they may be used with great advantage.

It is impossible here to enumerate his works, or any considerable part of them. In 1686 he commenced a literary journal, which gained great celebrity, entitled Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique, continued to 1693, in 25 vols. 12mo. From 1703 to 1713 he conducted another, entitled Bibliothèque Choisie, 128 vols. 12mo. which were followed by his Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, from 1714 to 1729, 29 vols. 12mo. He also published systems of Logic, Ontology, and Pneumatology. His Art Critica is an admirable work, 3 vols. 12mo. Besides these he published several miscellaneous pieces; editions of ancient and modern authors; a translation of the Bible into French, &c. He was, however, with all his learning and industry, a man of excessive vanity.—Moreri. Life of Le Clerc by himself, 8vo. 1711.

CLERC (John le), a French painter, who resided at Venice, and there obtained the honour of knighthood. He died in 1633, aged 46.—Pilkington.

CLERC (Sebastian le), a French artist of eminence; born in 1637, and died in 1714. Pope Clement XI. knighted him, and Lewis XIV. appointed him his engraver in ordinary. He engraved above three thousand pieces, and was the author of, 1. a treatise of Geometry, 8vo.; 2. a treatise on Architecture, 2 vols. 4to.; 3. another on Perspective.—Moreri.

CLERKE (Gilbert), a socinian writer, was born at Uppington in Rutlandshire, and admitted of Sidney college, Cambridge, in 1641, being then about 15. Of this college he became fellow, and was ordained in the presbyterian way. He was a good mathematician and Grecian, but having embraced socinianism, he quitted the university and retired to a small estate in Northamptonshire. He wrote a book on Mr. Oughtred's Clavis Mathematica, and an answer to bishop Bull's book on the Nicene Faith, in Latin. He died about 1695.—Nelson's Life of Bishop Bull.

CLEVELAND, or rather CLEVELAND (John), an English poet, was the son of a clergyman, and born at Loughborough in 1613, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and became a college tutor. He joined the royal army, and published some satirical poems which did service to the cause in which he was engaged, particularly one, entitled, The Rebel Scot. In 1655 he was taken prisoner, but was released by Cromwell, to whom he sent a moving petition. He died in London in 1659, and his funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Pearson, afterwards bishop of Chester. The best edition of his works is that of 1687.—Biog. Brit.

CLIFFORD (George), earl of Cumberland, a nobleman distinguished by his naval enterprises, was born in Westmoreland in 1558, and educated at Peter-house in Cambridge, under doctor Whitgift, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. He applied diligently to the study of the mathematics, and was distinguished also for his martial spirit. This he manifested at several tournaments before queen Elizabeth, who on one occasion took off her glove and gave it to him; which mark of royal favour he was proud, on public festivals, of wearing in his hat. In 1586 he fitted out a small squadron, with which he sailed for the coast of South America, and after taking several vessels from the Portuguese, but of little value, returned to England. The next enterprise of the earl was more honourable and successful. In 1588 he took the command of a ship, and contributed much towards the destruction of the Spanish armada. In reward for his gallant conduct the queen granted him a commission to make another voyage to the South Sea; but after proceeding as far as the Azores, tempestuous weather obliged him to return. In 1591 he made an unsuccessful expedition to the coast of Spain; but not disheartened by these repeated disappointments he engaged the next year in another adventure, and sailing to the Azores, took the town of Santa Cruz and a rich galleon, valued at 150,000*l*. In 1593 he sailed again, and took some valuable ships, but in consequence of illness he was obliged to return to England, after dispatching the rest of his squadron to the West Indies, where they plundered several Spanish settlements. In 1595 the earl fitted out the largest ship that had ever been sent to sea by an English subject, being 900 tons burthen, but was prevented from going in her himself by an order from the queen. However, in 1598, he sailed with a squadron to the West Indies, where he captured the island of Porto Rico, but lost a prodigious number of his men by sickness. This adventurous nobleman died at the Savoy in 1605, and lies buried at Skipton in Yorkshire. He left a daughter, who was the famous Anne, countess of Dorset, Pembroke, and Montgomery.—Campbell's Admirals. Biog. Br.

CLIFFORD (Martin), an English writer, was educated at Westminster school, and afterwards at Trinity college, Cambridge. After the restoration he was made master of the Charter-house. He wrote a book, entitled a Treatise on Human Reason, 1675, 12mo. in which he makes every man's private fancy the judge of religion. This piece was anonymous, and soon after its appearance Dr. Laney, bishop of Ely, dining with many persons of quality at the Charter-house, was asked what he thought of the book? to which his lordship replied, that it was no matter if all the copies were burnt and the author with them. He is said also to have had a hand in the Rehearsal. Doctor Sprat dedicated to him his Life of Cowley. Clifford died in 1677, and was buried in the chapel belonging to the Charter-house.—Wood's A. O. Granger.

CLINTON (Henry), an English general, and knight of the bath, was the grandson of Francis earl of Lincoln, and became a captain in the guards in 1758. In 1778 he was appointed general in North America, and returned to England in 1782. Soon after, he published a narrative of his conduct, which was replied to by earl Cornwallis, and vindicated by sir Henry. In 1784 he published a farther defence of himself. In 1795 he was made governor of Gibraltar, and died soon after.—Gen. B. D.

CLISSON (Oliver de), constable of France, was a native of Brittany. He became closely attached to John count of Montfort, by whose side he fought at the battle of Aurai in 1364, and lost an eye by the push of a lance, notwithstanding which he still kept the field. He served afterwards under Du Guesclin, who made him his brother in arms. He succeeded that brave man as constable of France in 1380. He commanded at the battle of Rosebec in 1382, and defeated the revolted Flemings. The duke of Brittany, in 1387, committed him to prison, and sentenced him to death, but his orders were disobeyed. Clisson afterwards obtained his liberty by paying a large ransom, and the duke became so much his friend as to leave him guardian of his children. On the derangement of Charles VI. he was deprived of all his honours, in consequence of which he retired to his estate in Brittany, where he died in 1407, leaving a high character for valour and integrity.—Moreri.

CLISTHÈNES, an Athenian, who contributed principally to the expulsion of the family of Pisistratus from the sovereign power, B.C. 511. He is also said to have introduced the mode of banishment by the ostracism. By the influence of Cleomenes, king of Sparta, he was banished from Athens, but was afterwards restored by the citizens. He was the great uncle of Pericles, and the friend of Aristides.—Plutarch.

CLITOMACHUS, an academic philosopher, was a Carthaginian, and lived about 140 B.C. His real name was Asdrubal, which he changed for one more philosophical and attic. He was the disciple and successor of Carneades, and is said to have written above 400 volumes. At a very advanced age he put an end to himself. He held that there is no rule of judging of the truth by the senses; and in morals he maintained a relationship between pleasure and virtue.—Diogenes Laertius in Vit. Phil.

CLIVE (Robert), lord of Plassey, was born at the family seat in Shropshire in 1725, and educated at several schools, but with so little success, being considered as too dull or obstinate to learn, that his father, despairing of his becoming eminent in any profession, obtained him a place as a writer in the India company's service when he was 19. But this situation did not suit his disposition, and he quitted the desk for the army in 1747. He distinguished himself with so much bravery, at the taking of a fort belonging to the rajah of Tanjore, as to obtain the post of commissary general of the army. On his return to Madras he was seized with a nervous fever, and though he recovered, yet the effects ever after remained on his mind. About this time the French, under Duplex, began to display their ambitious views in India, in procuring Chundabheb to be chosen nabob of Arcot, and by that means gaining the grant of a large territory for themselves. This naturally roused the jealousy of the English, and the war was renewed. The French and their allies, however, gained numerous advantages, and their affairs, as well as those of their ally Mohammed Ali Khan, son of the late nabob, appeared to be nearly hopeless, when Clive resumed his military character as captain in 1751. Tritchinopoly, the seat of Ali Khan, was then besieged by the French and Chundabheb, on which Clive's superior genius suggested the advantage of attacking the city of Arcot, and the attempt succeeded beyond expectation. This unexpected circumstance drew off the enemy from Tritchinopoly to retake Arcot, which Clive defended in such a manner that the siege was raised. This success was followed by a series of victories, and the complete overthrow of the enemy. In 1753 Clive embarked for England, where he was presented by the court of directors with a sword set with diamonds. He returned to India as governor of fort St. David, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; and shortly after his arrival he assisted admiral Watson in reducing Angria the pirate. When Calcutta was taken, Clive went to Bengal and took Fort William. He defeated Surajah Dowla at Plassey; and the day following entered Muxadabad, where he placed Jaffier Ali Cawn on the throne. The mogul conferred on him the title of omrah of the empire, with a large grant of lands. In 1760 he returned to England, and was made an Irish peer. In 1764 he went out to Bengal as president, where he soon restored tranquillity, and returned home in 1767. In 1769 he was made knight of the bath. In 1778 a motion was made in the house of commons to resolve, that "in the acquisition of his wealth, lord Clive had abused the powers with which he was entrusted." He defended himself with great spirit and modesty, and the motion was not only rejected, but the house resolved, that "lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country." This treatment, however, had an ill effect on his mind, and in a fit of gloom he put an end to himself in 1774. Lord Chatham called him "a heaven-born general, who, without experience, surpassed all the officers of his time." He represented the borough of Shrewsbury in parliament, from 1760 to his death. He left 70,000*l.* to the invalids in the company's service. His lordship married a sister of Dr. Maskelyne, the astronomer-royal, by whom he had five children.—Biog. Br.

CLIVE (Catherine), a celebrated actress, born in 1711. She entered when very young upon the stage at Drury-lane, and became eminent in the comic line. In 1732 she married a gentleman of the law, and brother to lord Clive, from whom, however, she was separated soon after. In 1769 she quitted the stage, and lived a retired life, upon a competency, at Twickenham, where she died in 1785. Her private deportment was regular and exemplary.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

CLODIUS (Publius), a Roman senator of an infamous character, who committed incest with his sisters, and entered the house of Cæsar, disguised in female apparel, while the women were celebrating the rites of Ceres. For this he was tried, but escaped justice by bribing the judges. He was a bitter enemy to Cato and Cicero, and after committing numerous offences was killed by Milo, 53 B.C.—Plutarch. Unv. Hist.

CLOOTZ (John-Baptist de), a Prussian baron, and a man of considerable fortune, who at the beginning of the French revolution distinguished himself by his impiety and extravagancies. He changed his name to Anacarsis, and assumed the ridiculous epithet of Orator of the Human Race, in which capacity he appeared before the national assembly, accompanied by a motley crew in masquerade, dressed according to the costume of various nations. He gave a large sum to the assembly to make war against all kings, and demanded that a price should be put on the king of Prussia. He also professed open war against Jesus Christ; and in a pamphlet, entitled Le Republique Universelle, avowed himself an atheist. He adhered to the same sentiments on the scaffold March 24, 1794. He was nephew to the learned Cornelius Pauw of Berlin.—Novv. Diß. Hist.

CLOPINEL (or John de Meun), a French poet, born in 1280, and died about 1364. He continued the Romance of the Rose, and wrote some other pieces.—Moreri.

CLOSTERMAN (N), a painter who came from Hanover to London in 1681, and acquired considerable reputation as a portrait painter. In 1696 he went to Spain on an invitation from the king, and returned from thence very rich. He died in 1713 of grief at being abandoned and robbed by a girl whom he kept.—Pilkington.

CLOTAIRE I. king of France, was the son of Clovis and Clotilda. He began to reign in 511, and died at Compiègne in 561, aged 44.—CLOTAIRE II. son and successor of Chilperic I. at the age of four months. His mother maintained the kingdom for him against the efforts of Childbert with great spirit and success. After her death he was defeated by Theodebert and Thierry; but afterwards he reunited the different kingdoms of France under himself. He died in 628.—CLOTAIRE III. king of Burgundy after the death of Clovis II. his father, in 655. Batilda, his mother, governed during his minority with great wisdom. Clotaire died in 670.—Moreri.

CLOVIO (George), a Slavonian painter of history and portrait, whose works are held in high esteem. He excelled in painting figures in miniature. He died in 1578, aged 80.—Pilkington.

CLOVIS I. the founder of the French monarchy, born in 467, and succeeded Childeric his father in 481. His wife Clotilda prepared him for the reception of christianity, which, however, he did not embrace till after a victory obtained over the Germans, and which he attributed to the effect of his prayer to the God of the Christians before the battle. He was soon after publicly baptized with three thousand of his subjects, by St. Remi, archbishop of Rheims. He was a warlike prince, defeated the Goths, and subdued several provinces. He fixed his royal residence at Paris, which ever after became the seat of the French monarchs. He died in 511.—Moreri. Univ. Hist.

CLOVIS II. the son of Dagobert, whom he succeeded in 638. He died in 656, aged 23. He was a mild and benevolent prince, but weak and pusillanimous.—Ibid.

CLOVIS III. the son of Thierry III. king of France, whom he succeeded in 691. He reigned five years under the guardianship of Pepin Heristel, master of the palace, and died in 695, aged 14.—Ibid.

CLOWES (William), an English surgeon of the 16th century. He was surgeon to Bartholomew's and Christ's hospitals; and also to queen Elizabeth. His book on the Venereal Disease was printed in 1596, and again in 1637.—Aikin's Biog. of Medicine.

CLUENTIVS, a Roman, who was accused by his mother of having murdered his father, B. C. 54, and was defended by Cicero in that beautiful oration pro Cluentio.—Mor.

CLUVERIVS, or CLUVER (Philip), an eminent geographer, was born at Dantzic in 1580, and educated at Leyden, where, instead of the law, for which he was designed, he studied geography, and was encouraged therein by Joseph Scaliger. He travelled through England, France, Germany and Italy, and acquired the knowledge of ten languages. He died at Leyden in 1623. He wrote De Tribus Rheni Alveis; Germania Antiqua; Italia Antiqua, Sicilia, Sardinia, & Corfica; Introductio ad Universam Geographiam.—Moreri.

COAS (Samuel), an English poet. He was master of the grammar school of Christ's hospital, and died in 1713. He published a collection of poems in 1700.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

COBDEN (Edward), an ingenious divine and poet, was rector of St. Austin in London, and of Acton in Middlesex, prebendary of St. Paul's, and archdeacon of London. Dr. Cobden was also chaplain in ordinary to king George II. but resigned that situation some years before his death, which happened 1764, aged 80. He published a volume of poems, for the benefit of his curate's widow; and in 1757 a volume of excellent sermons.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

COCCEIUS (Henry), a German civilian, was born at Bremen in 1644. He received his education at Leyden, and afterwards became professor of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg; on the taking of which place he removed to Utrecht, and lastly to Frankfort on the Oder. In 1713 he was created a baron of the empire. He died in 1719. His principal works are Juris Publici Prudentia Compendiose exhibitæ; Prodromus Justitiæ Gentium; Deductiones, Consilia, &c.; Theses, 4 vols. 4to. His son, Samuel Cocceius, was employed by Frederick the Great of Prussia, in drawing up his famous code, and appointed by him grand chancellor. He published an improved edition of Grotius on war and peace. He died in 1755.—Moreri. Nouv. Diß. Hist.

COCCEIUS, or COCK (John), a Dutch divine, was born at Bremen, in 1608, and became Hebrew professor there at the age of 27. He afterwards removed to Franeker, and lastly to Leyden, where he held the theological chair. He rendered himself remarkable by turning the whole of the Old Testament history into a mystical representation of Christ and his church, and by interpreting every word and phrase of scripture into an enigmatical sense. The apocalypse was his favourite study, and he maintained the notion of the millenary reign of Christ upon earth. His notions excited a warm controversy; but he had also many followers, who were called Cocceians. He died at Leyden in 1669. His works make 10 vols. folio.—Moreri. Moßeim.

COCCHI (Anthony), an Italian physician, was born at Mugellano in Tuscany, in 1635, and studied at Pisa. He came to England with the earl of Huntingdon, on purpose to see sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Mead, and other learned men. While here he published an edition of Xenophon's Ephesus Amoribus Anthiæ, & Abrocomæ, translated from the Greek into Latin, 1726. He settled as physician and professor of anatomy at Florence, and was appointed by the emperor his antiquary. He died in 1768, aged 63. He published several medical pieces, particularly one on the Advantages of the Pythagorean Mode of Life.—Fabronii Vita Italor. Doct.

COCHIN (Henry), a French lawyer, was born at Paris in 1687. He was admitted an advocate at the age of twenty, and pleaded his first cause before the great council when he was twenty-two. He is said to have been at the bar, what Bourdaloue was in the pulpit. He died in 1747. His works, consisting of memorials, pleadings, &c. were published at Paris in 6 vols. 4to. 1751.—Moreri. Novo. Dict. Hist.

COCHIN (Charles Nicholas), a celebrated engraver, was a native of Paris. In his youth he practised painting, which he quitted for the burin. His works are highly esteemed for their sweetness, exactness, and spirit. The best are those after Watteau and Le Moine. He died in 1754, aged 66. His son Charles Nicholas, who died in 1790, aged 75, was also an excellent artist and a man of letters. He was keeper of the designs in the Louvre, chevalier of the order of St. Michael, and secretary to the academy of painting. He wrote, Letters on the Pictures of Herculanum; Dissertation on the Effect of Light and Shade; Travels in Italy, or a Collection of Observations on Works of Architecture, Sculpture, and Painting; Letters on the Lives of Slodtz and Deshayes, &c.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

COCHLEUS (John), a Roman catholic divine in Germany, who wrote with great bitterness against the protestants in the 16th century. His best work is Historia Hussitarum, folio. He died in 1552, aged 72.—Moreri.

COCHRAN (Robert), an architect in Scotland, who was employed by James III. in building several great structures. That monarch created him earl of Mar, and distinguished him by so many marks of his favour, that the other nobles rose, seized the favourite in the royal presence, and hanged him on the bridge of Lauder in 1484.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COCHRAN (William), a Scotch painter, born at Strathaven in 1738, and studied at Rome under Gavin Hamilton. He then returned to his own country, where he painted portraits and historical pieces with great success. He died at Glasgow, in 1785.—Ibid.

COCKAINE (Sir Aston), an English poet, was born at Ashbourn, in Derbyshire, in 1608, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, but took his degree of M. A. at Oxford. He suffered much for his loyalty in the civil wars, and died in 1684. He wrote a chain of golden poems, and some plays of no merit.—Wood's A. O.

COCKBURN (Catharine), an ingenious English lady, was the daughter of captain David Trotter, of the navy, and born in London, in 1679. She taught herself writing and French, and acquired some knowledge of the Latin. Logic was also a favourite study, and the disposition to reasoning led her to consider the arguments in favour of the Roman catholic religion, which appeared so plausible, that she renounced the church of England, and embraced popery. At the age of fourteen she wrote verses; and in her seventeenth year produced a tragedy entitled Agnes de Castro. In 1698 another of hers, called Fatal Friendship, was acted with applause at the theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-fields. Metaphysics, however, became her favourite; and she devoted herself assiduously to Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, which she defended against doctor Thomas Burnet, at the age of twenty-two. This brought her acquainted with Mr. Locke, who made her a present of some books. In 1707 she returned to the protestant communion, and the year following married Mr. Cockburn, a nonjuring clergyman. For some years she laid aside her pen, but took it up again in 1726, in defence of Locke, against doctor Holdsworth. This piece, however, was not printed till after her death. In 1747 appeared "Remarks upon the Principles and Reasonings in Dr. Rutherford's Essay on the Nature and Obligations of Virtue," to which the great Warburton gave his sanction, by writing an elaborate preface. Her husband having conquered his scruples against the oaths, obtained the living of Long Horsley in Cumberland, where Mrs. Cockburn died in 1749. In 1751 Dr. Birch published a collection of her works, with her life prefixed, from whence this is taken.

COCKER (Edward), an industrious school-master and peaman. He published fourteen copy books, a small English dictionary, a book for writing, called Cocker's Morals, and a useful treatise on arithmetic. He died in 1677.—Granger.

COCLÆS (Publius Horatius), a valiant Roman, who was defended from one of the Horatii, who fought the Curiatii. When Rome was besieged by Porcenna, king of the Etruscans, he defended a wooden bridge across the Tiber, with two others, and, when they retired, maintained his post till the bridge falling, he leapt into the water, and swam with his armour on amidst a shower of arrows, to the city. He was rewarded with a grant of land, and a statue was erected to his honour.—Livy.

CODRINGTON (Christopher), a liberal encourager of learning and religion, was born at Barbadoes, in 1668; and brought up first at Christ-church, Oxford, but afterwards obtained a fellowship at All Souls. On leaving the university he entered into the army, and having distinguished himself bravely in the West Indies, was made captain-general of the Leeward Islands. He died at Barbadoes in 1701. His remains were brought to England, and deposited in the chapel of All Souls, to which college he bequeathed his books, and 10,000*l.* His estates in the West Indies he left to the se-city for propagating the gospel. He wrote four poems in the Musæ Anglicanæ—Biog. Brit.

COBRUS, the last king of Athens, the son of Melanthus, who rushed disguised into the midst of the army of the Heraclidæ and was slain, B. C. 1070, because the oracle is said to have pronounced that the leader of the conquering party must perish. After this the Athenians changed their form of government into a republic.—Jeslin. Univ. Hist.

COEFFETEAU (Nicholas), a French bishop, was of the dominican order, and died in 1623, just after he had been nominated to the see of Marseilles, aged 49. He wrote a Roman History from Augustus to Constantine, and other pieces.—Moreri.

COEN (John Peterfon), governor of the Dutch settlements in the East Indies, and founder of the city of Batavia, was born at Hoorn, in 1587. He was educated in Italy with a view to commerce, after which he went to India, where he introduced the Italian mode of book-keeping. In 1617 he succeeded to the governorship of Bantam, from whence he removed the factory in 1619 to Batavia, which city was laid out and built by Coen. In 1623 he returned to Europe, but in 1627 he returned to Batavia, which he defended with great bravery against the emperor of Java, who lost such a prodigious number of men before the place, that their dead bodies produced a pestilence, of which Coen died in 1629.—Univ. Hist.

COEUR (James), a wealthy French merchant of the 15th century, who carried on a greater trade than had ever been in the hands of any person in Europe. He had 300 agents in the Mediterranean, and lent 200,000 crowns to Charles VII. which enabled him to conquer Normandy. He was, however, unjustly condemned on a false charge of peculation in his office as administrator of the finances. On obtaining his pardon he removed to Rome, and afterwards to Cyprus. He died at the isle of Chio, in 1456.—Moreri.

COGAN (Thomas), an English physician, was born in Somersetshire, and bred at Oriel college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He took his degree of bachelor in physic in 1574, and the year after was chosen master of the school at Manchester, where also he practised physic with success. He died there in 1607. He wrote, 1. The Haven of Health, made for the Comfort of Students, 1586, 4to.; 2. A Preservative from the Pestilence; 3. Epistolæ Familiarum Ciceronis Epitome, &c.—Wood's Ath. Oxon.

COGESHALLE (Ralph), an English cistercian monk of the 15th century. He belonged to the abbey of the same name, and was at Jerusalem when that place was besieged by Saladin. He died about 1228. He wrote a Chronicle of the Holy-land, printed in 1725 in a collection published at Paris.—Pislaus. Moreri.

COHAUSEN (John Henry), a German physician, and the author of a singular work entitled Hermippus redivivus, five exercitatio physico-medica curiosa de methodo rara ad CXV. Annos prorogandæ senectutis per anhelitum puellarum, ex veteri monumento Romano deprompta hunc Artis Medicæ fundamentis stabilita. This piece was translated into English by Dr. John Campbell, under the title of Hermippus redivivus, or the Sage's Triumph over Old Age and the Grave. Cohausen died at Munster in 1750, aged 85.—Græ. Biog.

COHORN (Memnon), a Dutch engineer, was born in 1632, and entered early on the military line. He fortified Namur, and a number of other places, and died at the Hague in 1704. He wrote a treatise on Fortification.—Ibid.

COIGNET (Giles), called Giles of Antwerp, from the place of his birth, a painter of eminence. He is accused of employing his disciples in copying his works, and after retouching them, selling the pictures as originals of his own. He died in 1600, aged 70.—Pill.

COINTE (Charles le), a French historian, was born at Troyes in 1611, and became a priest of the oratory. Colbert granted him a pension for writing the Annales Ecclesiastici Francorum, in 8 vols. folio. He died in 1681.—Moreri.

COITER (Volchard), a German anatomist, was born at Groningen in 1534, and died in 1600. He published, 1. De Cartilaginibus Tabulæ, 1566, fol.; 2. Externarum & Internarum Principalium Humani Corporis partium Tabulæ, &c. 1573, folio.—Ibid.

COKE (Edward), an English judge, was born at Mileham, in Norfolk, in 1550, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Clifford's-inn, and afterwards to the Inner Temple. The first cause which he pleaded was in 1578, about which time he was chosen reader at Lyon's-inn. Soon after his admission at the bar he married a lady of considerable fortune, who brought him ten children. In 1592 he was appointed solicitor-general to the queen; and, on losing his wife, he married, in 1598, the widow of sir Christopher Hatton and sister of Thomas lord Burleigh, afterwards earl of Exeter. In 1600 he prosecuted, as attorney-general, the earl of Essex, in which he behaved with uncommon rudeness and asperity. Three years afterwards he received the honour of knighthood; and conducted the prosecution of sir Walter Raleigh, whom he treated in a brutal manner. His speeches at the trial of father Garnett, and the other conspirators in the gunpowder plot, are deemed his master-pieces in that way. In 1606 he was appointed chief justice of the common-pleas; and in 1613 removed to the king's-bench, at which time he was sworn of the privy council. In the affair of sir Thomas Overbury's murder, he conducted himself with such spirit as to raise him many enemies, and soon afterwards he fell into disgrace by opposing the king's prerogative, and contending with the chancellor Egerton. In 1616 he was removed from his office. In order to get into favour again, he projected a match between sir John Villiers, brother of the favourite, and his youngest daughter, which occasioned a bitter quarrel between him and his wife. The lady left his house with her daughter, and sir Edward fetched back the latter by force, which occasioned his wife to complain of him to the privy-council. The affair was at last made up, and the marriage concluded. In the parliament of 1621 he joined the popular side; for which he was committed to the Tower, where he lay only a short time, but never recovered the good opinion of king James. In 1628 he was chosen knight of the shire for Buckingham, and distinguished himself by speaking for a redress of grievances, and named the duke of Buckingham as the author of all the calamities of the nation. On the dissolution of that parliament he retired to his seat in Buckinghamshire, where he died in 1634. The first part of his Reports appeared about 1600, and the last, or thirteenth, about 1655. His Institutes of the Laws of England are invaluable; the first is a translation and comment on sir Thomas Littleton's Tenures. There are also other law pieces of his in print.—

COLARDEAU (Charles Peter), a French poet, born in 1735, and died in 1776. He translated Pope's Eloisa to Abelard, and part of Young's Night Thoughts, into French with great spirit and fidelity. He also wrote two tragedies of no particular merit. His works were printed in 2 vols. 8vo. 1779.—Novo. Did. Hist.

COLBERT (John Baptiste), marquis of Sequehei, and an excellent statesman. He was born at Paris in 1619. His father was a silk merchant. In 1648 young Colbert became clerk to Le Tellier, secretary of state, whose daughter he afterwards married. He next entered into the service of cardinal Mazarine, who placed an entire confidence in him, and sent him to Rome on some important business, which he managed with great dexterity. The cardinal, at his death, recommended him to his master, as the most proper person to be appointed intendant of the finances; which post he obtained. In 1664 he was appointed superintendant of the buildings; and he greatly improved Paris, by erecting elegant structures. But architectural pursuits did not engross the whole of his attention. He laboured to improve the state of the arts in general, and to increase the French commerce and manufactures. He instituted the academy of painting and sculpture, and the academy of sciences. It was by his recommendation that the royal observatory was built. In 1669 he was made secretary of state, and marine minister, which offices he discharged to the satisfaction of his sovereign, and the benefit of the people. He died in 1683, leaving six sons and three daughters.—Novo. Did. Hist.

COLBERT (John Baptiste), marquis of Torcy, and son of the above, born in 1665. In 1686 he was appointed secretary of state for the foreign department; and in 1699, director-general of the posts. He died in 1746. He wrote Memoirs of the Negotiations from the Treaty of Ryswick to the Peace of Utrecht, 5 vols. 12mo. 1756.—Ibid.

COLE (William), an English herbalist, was born in Oxfordshire, and educated at Merton college. He became secretary to Dr. Duppa, bishop of Winchester, and died in 1662, aged 36. He wrote, 1. The Art of Simpling, or an Introduction to the Knowledge of the gathering Plants, &c.; 2. Adam in Eden, or Nature's Paradise, containing a History of Plants, &c.—Wood.

COLE (Thomas), a dissenting minister, was brought up at Westminster school, from whence he was elected student of Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degree of M. A. In 1656 he became principal of St. Mary Hall, where he was tutor to the great Mr. Locke. At the restoration he was ejected for nonconformity, on which he kept an academy at Nettlebed, and afterwards settled in London, and became one of the lecturers at Pinner's hall. He died in 1697. His works are, a Discourse of Regeneration, Faith, and Repentance, 8vo.; a Discourse of the Christian Religion in sundry Points, 8vo.; the Incomprehensibility of imputed Righteousness for Justification by human Reason, &c. 8vo. Dr. Pulteney relates an anecdote of a Mr. Thomas Cole, a dissenting minister of Gloucester, who had collected an Herbarium, which, in a spirit of religious zeal and repentance at having mis-spent his time in accumulating, he committed to the flames; an instance of enthusiasm the most absurd, for what can be more conducive to usefulness and piety than the contemplation of the works of God in the creation?—Palmer's Nonconformist's Memorial. Pulteney's Sketches on Botany.

COLES (Elisha), an English lexicographer, born in Northamptonshire, and brought up at Oxford. He afterwards became usher of Merchant Taylors' school, but died in Ireland about 1680. He wrote several useful books, particularly an English-Latin Dictionary, in 8vo. His uncle, Ejba Coles, clerk to the East India company, wrote a famous book, entitled, a practical Discourse of God's Sovereignty; which has oftentimes been printed, and is in great repute among the rigid calvinists. He was a zealous diffenter, and died in 1683.—

Wood's A. O.

COLET (John), an English divine, was born in London in 1466, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of D.D. In 1502 he obtained the deanry of St. Paul's, where, by his preaching and other labours, he greatly advanced the reformation, for which he was complained of by the bishop of London to the archbishop of Canterbury; but the accusation was dismissed without a hearing. He was a great encourager of learning, particularly the Greek language. Erasmus, who did him the honour to call him his master, gives us a hint of his religious opinions in his colloquy entitled Peregrinatio Religionis, ergo, in which Colet is introduced under the name of Gratianus Pullus. He founded St. Paul's school, and died in 1519. He was buried in St. Paul's cathedral, where a handsome monument was erected to his memory, which was destroyed in the fire of 1666. He drew up some grammatical pieces for the use of his school, and was also the author of some religious tracts of a practical nature.—Life of Dean Colet, by Knight.

COLEY (Henry), an astrological writer, was born at Oxford, in 1638. He was bred a taylor, but became an assistant to the celebrated Lilly, who made him a present of the 36th impression of his Ephemeris, which Coley continued many years. He lived in Gray's-inn-lane, and was much followed as an astrologer, and a caster of urine, or a water doctor. He died about 1690. He wrote a Key to the whole Art of Astrology, in much request among the adepts.—Life of Lilly. Granger's Biog. Hist.

COLIGNI (Gaspard de), admiral of France, was born in 1516, at Chatillon sur Loing; and for his gallant services in several actions, was made admiral in 1552. On the death of Henry II. he became the chief of the calvinists against the Guises, and continued formidable even after repeated defeats. When peace was restored in 1571, he appeared at court, and was graciously received; but this generosity was a mask put on to deceive him and his party. He was the first who fell in the infamous massacre of Paris on St. Bartholomew's day in 1572. Catharine de Medicis ordered his head to be brought to her, and then sent it to the pope. Coligni was a great warrior, and possessed all the qualities necessary to constitute a hero, being brave, generous, and humane. His brother, Odet, was archbishop of Toulouse, and a cardinal, but having embraced the protestant religion, he was deposed, on which he retired to England, where he was poisoned by a domestic in 1571.—Moreri.

COLIGNI (Henrietta), countess de la Suze; an ingenious French writer. She married first Thomas lord Hamilton of Scotland, and next the count de la Suze; from whom she was afterwards separated, and died in 1673. Her songs and odes are printed with the poems of Pellisson.—Diâ. des Femmes celebres.

COLLADO (Diego), a Spanish dominican, who was superintendent of the convents in the Philippines. He was shipwrecked in his voyage to Europe in 1608. He wrote Ars Grammatica Japonicæ Lingue; a Dictionary of the Japanese Language, &c.—Gen. Biography.

COLLANGE (Gabriel de), a French writer, who, though a catholic, was murdered in the massacre of Paris by mistake. He was the author of a work entitled "Polygraphy, or Universal Cabalistical Writing, by J. M. Trithemius," Paris, 1561. This book being very mysterious, subjected the author to the charge of magic.—Moreri.

COLLATINUS (L. Tarquinius), a nephew of Tarquin the Proud, and husband of Lucretia. He assisted Brutus in expelling the Tarquins, but finding that the people had conceived an antipathy to all of that family, he went into voluntary exile.—Livy.

COLLIÉ (Charles), a French dramatist, and secretary to the duke of Orleans; born in 1709, and died in 1783. His comedies are lively, but indelicate. His songs are in good esteem. His works make 3 vols. 12mo.—New. Diâ. Hist.

COLLEGE (Stephen), commonly called the protestant joiner, was accused of being concerned in a conspiracy against Charles II. and he was brought to trial at Oxford, upon the testimony of the most infamous impostors. He defended himself with great spirit, and at the place of execution persisted in maintaining his innocence. He suffered in 1681. He was an excellent mechanic, and for his superior talents much respected by persons of rank. His daughter was seamstress to king William, a place worth 300l. a year.—Granger.

COLLEONE (Bartholomew), an Italian adventurer, was born of a noble family at Bergamo in 1400. He first served under de Montone, and then entered into the army of Joan queen of Naples. After this he was in the Venetian service, for whom he destroyed, in an uncommon manner, the army of Nicolas Piccinino. Being disgusted at the treatment which he received, he went over with his troop to the side of Philip Visconti, and next served under Francis Sforza, for whom he gained the battle of Fracati over the French. The Venetians, anxious to regain him, gave him the appointment of generalissimo; and he struck terror into all the enemies of the republic. He was, with his other great qualities, a liberal patron of learning, and very religious. He died in 1475, and the senate honoured his memory by an equestrian statue.—Moreri.

COLLET (Peter), a learned French ecclesiastic, born at Ternay in 1693, and died in 1770. He wrote Theologia Moralis Universalis, in 17 vols. 8vo.; Institutiones Theologicæ ad usum Seminariorum, 7 vols. 12mo.; the Life of Vincent de St. Paul, 2 vols. 4to.; Lives of M. Boudon and John de la Croix, &c. He is not to be confounded with Philibert Collet, an advocate, who died in 1718. He wrote a treatise on Excommunications; on Usury; on Alms; on Tythes; and a volume on the Statutes and Customs of Breffe. He was also a botanist, and wrote two Letters on Lournesfort's History of Plants, and a Catalogue of the Plants in the neighbourhood of Dijon.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

COLLETET (William), a French academician, and dramatic writer, born at Paris in 1598, and died there in 1659. His works were printed in 1653, in 12mo.—Ibid.

COLLIER (Jeremiah), a learned English divine, was the son of a clergyman at Stow Qui in Cambridgeshire, where he was born in 1650. He was educated by his father, and then removed to Caius college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. A. in 1676, at which time he entered into holy orders. In 1679 he was instituted to the rectory of Ampton, in Suffolk, which he afterwards resigned, on being chosen lecturer at Gray's-inn. At the revolution he refused the oaths, and had the courage to write in vindication of the abdicated monarch, for which he was imprisoned in Newgate, but was at length discharged without being brought to trial. When sir John Friend and sir William Perkins were executed for what was called the assassination plot, Mr. Collier and two other non-juring clergymen attended them to the place of execution, where all three joined in absolving them by the imposition of hands. This circumstance made a great noise, and two of the ministers were taken up, but Mr. Collier absconded, and was declared an outlaw. When this storm was a little over, he published three volumes of excellent Essays upon Miscellaneous Subjects. He next directed his attention to the immorality of the stage, which was then very licentious. This drew him into a controversy with several eminent poets; but Dryden made a honest confession of his fault. Mr. Collier came off in this laudable contest completely victorious; the town was on his side, and the dramatic writers began to write with more regard to decency. Our author's next work was a translation and continuation of Moreri's Dictionary, 4 vols. folio. At the accession of queen Anne he had great offers of preferment if he would take the oaths, which he steadily refused. In 1714 he published, in 2 vols. folio, "The Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain," brought down to the death of Charles II. In 1713 he was consecrated a bishop by Dr. George Hickes, who was himself consecrated suffragan of Thetford, by the deprived bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough, in 1694. Mr. Collier suffered severely by attacks of the stone, which brought him to the grave April 26, 1726. Besides the above works, he published a volume of Sermons, a translation of Marcus Antoninus, and numerous pamphlets.—Biog. Brit.

COLLINGS (John), a nonconformist divine, was born in Essex, and brought up at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he proceeded D. D. He settled at Norwich, and at the restoration was one of the presbyterian divines in the famous Savoy conference. He died in 1690, aged 67. His works are numerous, but now obsolete, except one entitled The Weaver's Pocket Book or Weaving Spiritualized, 8vo. 1675.—Calamy.

COLLINS (John), an English mathematician, was born at Wood-Eaton, in Oxfordshire, in 1624, and became a clerk to Mr. Mar, an officer in the household of prince Charles. This gentleman was fond of the mathematics, and under him Mr. Collins made some progress in that study. He afterwards went to sea; and was engaged in the Venetian service against the Turks. After the restoration he was appointed accountant to the excise-office, and in 1667 chosen a fellow of the royal society, to whose Transactions he was a liberal contributor. He was also appointed accountant to the royal fishery company, and was employed in settling difficult accounts for the court of chancery. This ingenious man died in London, Nov. 10, 1683. Mr. Collins kept up a correspondence with the most celebrated mathematicians at home and abroad; as Barrow, Newton, Wallis, Leibnitz, &c. This correspondence appeared in 1712, in a 4to. volume, under the title of Commercium Epistolicum. Besides his papers in the Philosophical Transactions, he wrote, an Introduction to Merchants' Accounts, 4to.; the Sector on a Quadrant, or a Treatise concerning the Description of four different Quadrants, 4to.; the Mariner's Plain Scale new plained; a Treatise of Geometrical Dialling; the Doctrine of Decimal Arithmetic, Simple Interest, &c.; a Discourse on Salt and Fishery, &c.—Biog. Brit.

COLLINS (Anthony), an English writer of note. He was born near Hounslow, in Middlesex, 1676; educated first at Eton, and then at King's college, Cambridge. On leaving the university, he became a student in the Temple, but did not make the law his profession. He cultivated the acquaintance of Locke and other ingenious men. Locke left a letter to be delivered after his decease to Collins, which is full of affection and good advice. He rendered himself famous by some books against christianity, particularly one, entitled A Discourse on Free-thinking, 1713, 8vo.; and a Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, 8vo. 1724; which occasioned a considerable controversy. In 1726 appeared his Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered, in 8vo. which was attacked by a number of able writers, and defended by the author, who died of the stone in 1729. Besides these works, he published several others, as Priestcraft in Perfection, 1709; an historical Essay upon the 39 Articles of Religion, 1724; a philosophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty, 1717, which was answered by Dr. Samuel Clarke.—Biog. Brit.

COLLINS (Samuel), an English physician, who studied at Padua, and took his degree at Oxford in 1659. He wrote the present State of Russia, 1671, 8vo. and a book of anatomy, in folio. He was censor of the college in 1707.—Wood. Granger.

COLLINS (William), an English poet; born at Chichester about 1720, and educated at Winchester school, from whence he removed to Queen's college, Oxford. In 1741 he was chosen demy of Magdalen college, where he took his degree of B.A. and, while there, published his Oriental Eclogues. About 1744 he quitted the university, and went to London, where he suffered extreme poverty. His uncle left him 2000*l.* which saved him from wretchedness, but he did not live to enjoy it. He died at Chichester in 1756, having been reduced to a state of mental imbecility some time. Dr. Johnson paying him a visit at Wlington, found him with a book in his hand, which proved to be the New Testament, on which the poet said, "I have but one book, but that is the best." His odes are sublime, particularly that on the Passions, but they are frequently obscure.—Biog. Brit. Johnson's Lives of the Poets.

COLLINSON (Peter), an ingenious botanist, born near Kendal, in Westmoreland, in 1694. In his youth he discovered a strong inclination to the study of natural history; and, in 1728, was elected a fellow of the royal society. He was the intimate friend of Benjamin Franklin, and received from him his first essays on electricity. He kept up a correspondence with ingenious men in every part of the world, and thereby obtained a noble collection of plants. When Linnæus was in England, he formed a close friendship with Mr. Collinson, and honoured him by giving his name to an American plant of the diandrous class. He died in 1768.—Latham's Memoirs of Forbergill. Biog. Br.

COLLIUS (Francis), doctor of the Ambrosian college at Milan, who wrote de Animabus Paganorum, 2 vols. 4to. 1622, in which he holds the salvation of certain illustrious heathens, and condemns others. He also wrote De Sanguine Christi, a work of considerable erudition, but as singular as the former. He died in 1640.—Morari.

COLLOT-D'HARBOIS (J. M.), a strolling player, who became a ferocious actor in the French revolution, on the breaking out of which he became a member of the jacobin club, and also of the convention. He was the first who moved for the abolition of royalty, and on the trial of the king sat next to Robespierre, to whom he was a fit assistant, but when that monster was on the point of falling, Collot, as president of the convention, joined in impeaching him. Being sent to punish the royalists at Lyons, he committed unparalleled barbarities, for which he obtained the name of Tiger. In 1795 he was transported to Cayenne, where he closed his infamous career the year following. He wrote the almanack of Father Gerard, and some dramatic pieces, the best of which is an imitation from the Spanish of Calderon, entitled Le Pivsan Magistrat.—Nova. Dict. Hist.

COLUTHUS, a priest of Alexandria, who broached, in the 4th century, the strange heresy, that God was not the author of the wicked; and that he had nothing to do with the evils or calamities of life. He also assumed the episcopal function without any authority, and was condemned by a council held at Alexandria in 324.—Cave Hist. Lit.

COLRANE (Henry Hare, lord), was born at Blechingly, in Surry, in 1693, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he wrote a lyric poem inserted in the Musæ Anglicanæ. His lordship died in 1749. His collection of books and prints, pictures and curiosities, was sold after his death.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COLMAN (George), an English writer, was the son of Thomas Colman, esq. resident at the court of the grand duke of Tuscany, and born at Florence about 1793. His mother was sister to the countess of Bath. He received his education at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where he engaged with Bonnel Thornton in writing a periodical paper, called the Connaisseur. On leaving the university, he entered at Lincoln's-inn, and was called to the bar, but never followed that profession. His first dramatic piece, Polly Honeycomb, was performed at Drury-lane theatre, in 1760, with success; and the next year his comedy of the Jealous Wife was acted with great applause. In 1764, lord Bath died, and left him a comfortable annuity, which was enlarged by general Pulteney. In 1768 he became a patentee of Covent-garden theatre, but soon after sold his share, and purchased Mr. Foot's theatre in the Haymarket, which he held to his death in 1794. Besides the above pieces, he wrote the Clandestine Marriage, and some other dramatic performances, and translated Terence, and Horace's Art of Poetry, with elegance and fidelity.—Europ. Mag.

COLUCCI (Angelo), a learned Italian, who, according to a common custom among scholars in his time, assumed the Latin name of Angulus Colatius Bassus. He was born at Jesi, in 1467, of a noble family. After a liberal education he settled at Rome, where he collected a magnificent library, and revived the Roman Academy which had been dispersed. Leo X. made him bishop of Nocera, and Clement VII. appointed him governor of Atcoli. He died at Rome in 1549. His Latin poems are very elegant and classical; but his Italian poetry is of inferior merit.—Tiraboschi.

COLOGNE (Peter de), a protestant divine, was born at Ghent, and educated at Paris and Geneva. At the latter place he gained the friendship of Calvin and Beza. He settled first at Metz, from whence he removed to Heidelberg, where he died in the prime of his life. He wrote on the Eucharist, and in vindication of the protestant doctrines, against the bishop of Metz.—Bayle.

COLOMBIERE (Claude de la), a French jesuit, who instituted a new rite, called the service to be performed to the heart of Jesus, which he is said to have stolen from the works of Thomas Goodwin, chaplain to Oliver Cromwell. He died in 1682, aged 41. His sermons were printed at Lyons, in 6 vols. 12mo 1757.—Moreri.

COLMESIUS (Paul), a learned French protestant, born at Rochelle in 1638. He followed Isaac Vossius to England, and took episcopal orders, after which he was appointed librarian at the palace of Lambeth. He died in 1692. He wrote Theologorum Presbyterianorum Icon; Bibliothèque Choisie, &c. He also edited the Epistles to and from the elder Vossius.—Moreri. Bayle.

COLONNA (Prospero), a military commander of high reputation, was the son of Anthony, prince of Salerno, and born in 1452. He and his relation Fabricio entered into the service of Charles VIII. king of France, and assisted him in the conquest of Naples; but afterwards they left him and contributed to the recovery of that kingdom for the house of Arragon. Prospero distinguished himself in many battles, but at last was made prisoner at Villa Franca, in 1515, and carried to France. On regaining his liberty he attacked the French with new vigour, and after defeating them at the battle of la Bicoque, relieved Milan in 1522. He died the year following.—Guicciardini's Hist. of the Wars of Italy.

COLONNA (Pompeo), a Roman cardinal, was brought up by his uncle Prospero for the church, though his own inclination lay to a military life. After he was bishop of Rieti, he had a quarrel with a Spaniard, and being prevented from fighting him on account of his profession he tore his episcopal dress to pieces. On a false rumour of the death of pope Julius II. in 1512, Colonna with Savilio, a young nobleman, excited the Roman people to a revolt, and seized the capitol, for which he was deprived of his preferments. He recovered the pope's favour afterwards, and in 1517 Leo X. made him a cardinal. In 1526

he engaged in another conspiracy to surprise Rome, and to put the pope to death, which, however, was defeated, and the cardinal again suffered deprivation. But this affair occasioned the terrible sack of Rome by the constable Bourbon. Colonna succeeded in getting the pope set at liberty, for which he was restored to his rank and other dignities. He also became viceroy of Naples, and died in 1532. He wrote a poem De Laudibus Muliebrum.—Guicciardini's Hist. of the Wars of Italy.

COLONNA (Francisco), a Venetian, who wrote a strange book, entitled Hypnerotomachia di Polyphilo, in which there is a mixture of all sciences and all languages, upon the subject of his disappointed passion for a young lady named Lucretia Lelia. It was first printed by Aldus in 1499; and a French version appeared in 1546, but both are now scarce. Colonna became a dominican monk, and died in 1527.—Tiraboschi.

COLONNA (Victoria), an ingenious Italian lady, was the daughter of Fabricio Colonna, duke of Paliano, and born at Marino in 1490. At the age of 17 she was married to the marquis of Pescara, after whose death, in 1525, she went into a monastery, but without taking the veil. She died at Rome in 1547. Her poems have been several times printed, and are much admired.—Tiraboschi.

COLONNA (Fabio), of the same family as the preceding, was born at Naples about 1567. He made a great progress in philosophy, the languages, mathematics, law, and the fine arts; but applied principally to physic and botany. At the age of 24 he published an elegant work, the plates of which he executed himself. It was entitled Phytobasanos, seu plantarum aliquot historia, in qua describuntur Plantæ rariores antiquorum delineationibus respondentes, Naples, 1592, 4to. In 1610 appeared his "Minus cognitum rariorumque nostro cælo orientium stirpium expressis qua non paucæ ab antiquioribus descriptæ disquiruntur et declarantur, 4to.;" it was not, however, completed till 1616. He was the first who distinguished the petals of flowers by names distinct from the leaves, and the method of arrangement, afterwards adopted by Tournefort. He was also the inventor of a musical instrument called a Pentachordon. He died at the age of 80.—Ibid. Halleri Biblioth. Botan.

COLONNA (Marc Antonio) duke of Paliano, served with such reputation in the famous battle of Lepanto, gained over the Turks in 1571, as to be honoured with a triumphal entry into Rome by the pope. He was constable of Naples and viceroy of Sicily. He died in 1584.—Moreri.

COLONNA (Afcanio), son of the above, and a cardinal, was distinguished for his skill in the canon law. He defended the pope's conduct in his famous dispute with the republic of Venice, and died at Rome in 1608.—Moreri.

COLONNA (Francis), an ingenious philosopher, who wrote the Natural History of the Universe, 1734, 4 vols. 12mo. He was burnt, with his house, at Paris, in 1726.—Newsp. Dict. Hist.

COLONI (Adam and Adrian), called the Old and the Young, two Dutch painters of history and landscape. The father died in London in 1685, and Adrian in 1701, aged 53.—Pilkington.

COLSTON (Edward), an eminent philanthropist, was born at Bristol in 1636, and carried on his father's business of a Spanish merchant, by which he acquired a large fortune, and disposed the greatest part of it in acts of charity. He built several almshouses and charity schools in his native city, and gave large sums in his life-time and by will to hospitals, and other beneficent institutions. He died on his birth-day in 1721, and was buried in All Saints church, Bristol where a sermon is yearly preached in honour of his memory.—Biog. Brit.

COLUMBUS (Christopher), a celebrated navigator, was born at Genoa about 1447. His origin was humble, and it is asserted that he was bred to his father's business, which was that of a weaver, but quitted it for the sea. After making some trading voyages in the Mediterranean, he engaged himself in the service of a corsair, but the ship was blown up in an engagement, and he saved himself by swimming. He then went to Lisbon, where his brother Bartholomew was established as a maker of charts. Here Christopher married the daughter of a naval commander, who had been employed in voyages of discovery. From his father-in-law's journals and charts he acquired a considerable share of nautical and mathematical knowledge, and traded several years to the Canary islands and the coast of Africa. By constant application to the study of cosmography he began to entertain the idea, that there must be a new continent beyond the vast Atlantic ocean. The more he considered this subject he was the more confirmed in the persuasion, and after corresponding with a learned Florentine, named Paul Foscanelli, famous for his geographical skill, he communicated his plan and offers to the republic of Genoa, but his proposals were rejected as extravagant and absurd. He next applied to John II. king of Portugal, but this also failed. He then sent his brother Bartholomew to Henry VII. of England, but on the voyage he was taken by pirates. In the mean time Columbus obtained an audience of Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Spain, who received him favourably, and in 1492 granted him three small vessels to prosecute discoveries. The conditions stipulated between him and his royal employers were, * that if he made no discoveries he should have no reward; that if he did he should be viceroy by land, and admiral by sea, and have the tenths of the profits of all the countries discovered by him, and that these privileges should descend to his family." August 2d of that year, Columbus and his little squadron launched into the deep and touched at the Canaries on the 11th, from whence they sailed the 6th of September. When they were out of sight of land the crews began to be very uneasy, and it required no ordinary share of address and prudence to prevent them from breaking out into mutiny. Columbus, however, succeeded in stilling the fears and keeping alive the hopes of his men, and on the 11th of October perceived a light from his own cabin. The next morning he landed in Guana bay, and erected the royal standard. This island, which is one of the Lucas or Bahamas, he called St. Salvador. From hence he sailed to Cuba, and afterwards to Hispaniola. Having discovered other islands, and taken possession in the name of their catholic majesties, Columbus returned to Europe, bringing with him some of the natives. January 24th he arrived at Lisbon, and was well received by the king of Portugal, who, however, seemed to think that the conquests appertained to him, as Columbus had been in his service. Columbus replied, "that he knew of no such agreement, and had carefully abstained from visiting any of the Portuguese settlements." The king was satisfied, and would have sent him to Spain over-land, but the admiral chose rather to go with his ships. On the 15th of March he arrived at Seville, and immediately waited on their majesties at Barcelona, who received him under a canopy of cloth of gold, made him sit beside them, and conferred on him several marks of royal favour. Having obtained letters patent, a larger fleet was fitted out under his command, and people were sent out to colonize Hispaniola. Columbus sailed from Cadiz Sept. 25, 1493, and in this voyage visited the islands of Dominica, St. Mary's, Guadaloupe, Montserrat, Antigua, Hispaniola, Cuba, and Jamaica. In his voyage homewards his men suffered much from want of provisions and sickness, and a difference among the pilots occasioned much disaffection. But Columbus preserved his temper, and by admirable prudence maintained order among his crews. In this voyage he confirmed the result of former observations on the variation of the compass. In 1498 he made a third voyage, in which he discovered the island of Trinidad, and on his arrival at Hispaniola found the colony in a state bordering on a civil war. He succeeded in restoring peace, but some of the settlers, out of envy against him and his brother Bartholomew, whom he had left there as his lieutenant, sent home such accusations, that queen Isabella issued an instrument revoking the appointments of Columbus, and appointing Francis de Bovadilla to be governor in his room. This man, on his arrival, caused the brothers to be ironed, and in that condition sent them to Europe. The captain of the ship would have taken off the fetters, but Columbus nobly refused to be liberated but in the presence of his sovereigns. All Spain felt with indignation the insult offered to so great a man. He was instantly set at liberty, and rewarded with a considerable grant. Columbus, however, always kept the fetters by him, and ordered that they should be buried with him. In 1502 he made another voyage, in which he traced the coast of Darien, thinking to find a passage to the East Indies. He returned to Spain in 1504, and found queen Isabella dead, and the king prejudiced against him. This great man died at Valladolid, May 20, 1506. His remains were magnificently interred in the cathedral of Seville, where a monument was erected to his memory, bearing this inscription: "To Castile and Leon Columbus has given a new world." Yet this brave adventurer had not the honour of giving his name to the world he discovered, but was robbed of it by Amerigo, or Americus Vesputius, a Florentine. Of Columbus's singular sagacity and prudence the following anecdote is related. While he lay off Hispaniola, the Indians neglected to bring him the provisions which he had agreed for: on this Columbus sent for the chiefs, and told them that the God of the Christians was angry at their breach of faith, and as a proof of it, the ensuing night the moon would rise with a threatening and bloody aspect. He knew that there would be an eclipse that night, but the Indians made light of the prediction, till they saw it verified, on which, in great agony, they supplicated his forgiveness, and ever after continued to bring in the stipulated supplies. Bartholomew Columbus died in 1514. Diego, the son of Christopher, was ennobled, and obtained all his father's honours and grants. Ferdinand, another son, embraced the ecclesiastical state, and formed a rich library, which he left to the cathedral of Seville. He wrote the life of his father, and died about 1590.—Moreri. Life of Columbus in Churchill's Voyages.

COLUMBUS (Realdus), an Italian anatomist, was a native of Cremona, and a disciple of Vesalius, whom he succeeded as anatomical professor at Padua in 1542. He afterwards settled at Rome, where he died in 1577. He published in 1559 a work, entitled, De Re Anatomica, in which are excellent observations and some discoveries. He approached very near to the true doctrine on the circulation of the blood, afterwards found out by our countryman Harvey.—Tiraboschi. Haller Bibl. Anat.

COLUMELLA, a Latin writer of the first century. He was a native of Spain, and resided at Rome under Claudius. He wrote some books on agriculture and trees, which are extant, and were published by Gesner, 1735.—Moreri.

COLUMNA (Guy), a Sicilian, who accompanied Edward I. to England, on his return from Palestine, and wrote a history of the siege of Troy, printed first at Cologne in 1477, in 4to.; and several times since.

COLUTRUS, a Greek poet of the 6th century, whose poem on the Rape of Helen is still extant.—Vossius de Poet. Græc.

COLVIUS (Andrew), a Dutch divine, born at Dort in 1594, and died in 1671. He accompanied the embassy from the states general to the republic of Venice, where he contracted an intimacy with father Paul, and translated his treatise on the Inquisition into Latin. Colvius was also a good astronomer and Latin poet. He gathered a museum of curiosities, of which an interesting catalogue was printed in 1655. His son Nicholas was also a learned divine, and died in 1717.—Moreri.

COLWIL (Alexander), a Scotch episcopalian divine, and principal of the university at Edinburgh, who wrote the Scotch Hudibras to ridicule the presbyterians. He died in 1670, aged 58.—Gen. Biog. Diæ.

COMBERIS (Francis), a French dominican, who distinguished himself by publishing editions of some of the Greek fathers, and died in 1679, aged 74.—Moreri.

COMBER (Thomas), a learned divine, was born at Shermanbury in Suffex, of an ancient family, in 1575. He was the twelfth child, and surviving all his elder brothers, inherited the estate. He was educated at Horsham school, from whence he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he made a great progress in all kinds of learning, but especially in the Oriental languages. In 1596 he became fellow of his college, and in 1598 took his master's degree. In 1607 he obtained leave to travel, and resided three years in France, where he contracted a great intimacy with the learned Du Moulin. He took his doctor's degree in 1616, and about the same time became chaplain to the king. Charles I. sent him to Scotland to confer with some of the presbyterian divines about the form of church government; and though nothing was done, the Scotch admired him for his solid quickness and various learning. In 1630 he was promoted to the deanry of Carlisle, and the year following appointed master of Trinity college; at which time he also served the office of vice-chancellor. As master of his college he acquired a great and deserved reputation; but soon after the commencement of the rebellion he was deprived of that and his deanry. He was also imprisoned for his loyalty, and otherwise ill-treated, but bore all his sufferings with calm resignation. He died in 1654, and was buried in the church of St. Botolph, Cambridge.—MS. Memoirs of Dr. Comber, communicated by the Rev. T. Comber, his descendant.

COMBER (Thomas), a learned divine, was of the same family as the preceding, but born at Westerham in Kent, in 1645. After receiving a grammatical education, he was sent to Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, but received that of doctor in divinity from the archbishop of Canterbury. After obtaining different pieces of preferment in the church of York, he was promoted to the deanry of Durham in 1691. He wrote several esteemed works, the principal of which are, A Scholastical History of the Use of Liturgies; a Companion to the Temple, 2 vols. 8vo.; a Companion to the Altar; Discourses upon the whole Common Prayer, 8vo.; Roman Forgeries in the Councils during the first four centuries, 4to. He died in 1699.—Life of Dean Comber by the Rev. Thomas Comber, 8vo. Biog. Brit.

COMENIUS (John Amos), a grammarian and divine, was born in Moravia in 1592; and ordained pastor in 1616, at Fulnek, where also he superintended the school. When the persecution broke out against the protestants he fled to Lesna, in Poland, where he wrote his Janua Linguarum. After visiting England and Sweden, he returned to Lesna, but was obliged to quit it when it was burnt by the Poles. After rambling from place to place, he settled at Amsterdam, where he printed his New Method of Teaching. Here he applied to the study of the Revelations, and began to prophesy the speedy destruction of Antichrist, and the commencement of the millennium, which he fixed for the year 1672, but luckily he died the year preceding. He had the highest opinion and regard for the famous enthusiast madame Bourignon.—Bayle. Moreri.

COMES (Natalis), an Italian writer, whose real name was Natal Conti. He was born at Milan, and died about the year 1590. His Greek and Latin poems were printed at Venice in 1550: but his principal work is a system of ancient mythology, entitled "Mythologiae five Explicationis Fabularum," 1564.—Tiraboschi.

COMIERS (Claude), canon of Embrun, and professor of mathematics at Paris, died in 1693. He wrote two treatises on the Nature of Comets, another on Spectacles, and some other curious pieces.—Moreri.

COMMANDINE (Frederic), an Italian mathematician of a noble family, born at Urbino in 1509, and died in 1575. He translated several of the ancient mathematicians into Latin, with notes, particularly Archimedes, Apollonius, Ptolemy, and Euclid; besides which, he published some books of his own composition.—Ibid.

COMMELIN (Jerome), a French printer, born at Douay, and settled first at Geneva, and next at Heidelberg, where he died in 1598. He printed several of the Greek and Latin fathers, with learned notes of his own.—Ibid.

COMMENDONE (John Francis), a Roman cardinal, born at Venice in 1524. He wrote Latin verses at the age of ten, and his poetry recommended him so effectually to pope Julius III. that he made him his chamberlain. That pontiff employed him in several important embassies; and Paul IV. gave him a bishopric. Pius IV. made him a cardinal in 1565, when he was nuncio in Poland. He was legate at the diet at Augsburg, where he was very zealous against the Lutherans. He died at Padua in 1584. Some of his Latin poems and letters are in print.—Moreri.

COMMERSON (Philibert), physician and botanist to the king of France, was born at Châtillon les Dombes, in Bresse, in 1727; and educated at Montpellier. He died at the isle of France, whither he accompanied Bougainville in his voyage round the world in 1773. His botanical collections were immense, and his application prodigious. He published a complete Ichthyology, in 2 vols. 4to.; and a treatise, entitled the Martirology of Botany, giving accounts of those who have lost their lives in their botanical researches, in which his own name was intended to be placed, and to which, doubtless, it is entitled. His botanical collections, amounting to thirty-two large cases, he left to the king's cabinet.—Eloge de Commerçon par La Lande.

COMMINES (Philip de), an historian, was born in Flanders, of a noble family, in 1445, and became eminent as a statesman at the court of Lewis XI. of France. On the death of that monarch he was sent to prison, and was treated with great severity. He was at last liberated, and died in 1509. His Memoirs of his own Times shew a great knowledge of men and things, an acuteness of judgment in tracing circumstances to their causes, and are enriched with a variety of excellent observations. The best edition of the original is that of Frefnoy, 1747, 4 vols. 4to.; and in English the translation of Uvedale, with curious notes, in 2 vols. 8vo.—Moreri.

COMMIRE (John), a French jesuit, and distinguished for his Latin poetry, was born at Amboise in 1627, and died at Paris in 1702. His fables are accounted equal to Phædrus. An edition of all his poems was published in 2 vols. 12mo. 1754.—Moreri.

COMMODI (Andrea), an historical painter of Florence. He painted a fine picture for pope Paul V. of the angels falling from heaven. He died in 1638, aged 73.—Pil- lington.

COMMODUS (Lucius Aurelius Antoninus), a Roman emperor, was the son of Antoninus the philosopher, whom he succeeded in 180. His disposition was naturally cruel and vicious. He seduced his own sisters, and kept a great number of concubines and castrates. He used also to fight as a common gladiator in the amphitheatre. Having resolved to put his concubine Marcia to death, she discovered it, and poisoned him, A.D. 192.—Herod. An. Crevier. Gibbon.

COMPTÉ (Lewis le), a French jesuit, who was sent to China as a missionary and mathematician, in 1685, and published, on his return to Europe, his Memoirs of that country, which is a respectable book. He died at Bourdeaux, in 1729.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

COMPTON (Spencer), the gallant earl of Northampton, who was slain at the battle of Hopton-heath, in Staffordshire, March 19, 1643, aged 42. His lordship was offered quarter, but he indignantly replied, "that he scorned to accept quarter from such base rogues and rebels as they were;" on which he was basely slain with a halbert. He left six sons and two daughters.—Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion.

COMPTON (Henry), an English prelate, was the son of the above, and born in 1632. He received his education at Queen's college, Oxford; and at the restoration, had a cornetcy in the horse; but he soon quitted the military life, and entered into orders, and was appointed canon of Christ church, Oxford, with the rectory of Cottenham, in Cambridgeshire. In 1674 he was preferred to the bishopric of Oxford, and the year following translated to London. At this time he was sworn of the privy council, and had the charge of educating the princesses Mary and Anne, afterwards queens of England. He resisted popery with great spirit in the reign of James II. and when that monarch ordered him to suspend Dr. Sharpe, rector of St. Giles's in the Fields, he refused, for which he was suspended from his episcopal functions; but a little before the revolution, he was restored. On the landing of the prince of Orange, he conveyed the princess Anne from London to Nottingham. He was very zealous in placing William and Mary on the throne, and performed the office of coronation instead of archbishop Sancroft. He died at Fulham in 1713, and was buried in the church-yard of that parish. He translated the Life of Donna Olympia Maldachini from the Italian; and wrote a treatise on the Holy Communion, besides sermons and letters. He was fond of botany, and had the finest garden of exotics in England. He was also a great encourager of Mr. Ray, Plukenet, and other naturalists.—Biog. Brit. Pulteney's Sketches on Botany.

CONANT (John), an English divine, was born in 1608, at Heanton in Devonshire, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford; where he was chosen fellow, and proceeded to the degree of D.D. He became one of the assembly of divines; and in 1647 was chosen rector of his college; and shortly after, professor of divinity. He was one of the commissioners on the side of the nonconformists at the Savoy conference; but in 1670 he conformed, and became minister of St. Mary Aldermanbury, London, which he exchanged for that of All Saints, Northampton, to which was added the arch-deaconry of Norwich; and, in 1681, a prebend of Worcester. He died in 1693, and was buried in the church of All Saints, Northampton. Six volumes of his sermons have been published.—Biog. Br. Prince's Worthies of Devon.

CONCA (Sebastian), an eminent historical painter; born at Gaeta in 1679, and died in 1761. He painted several fine pictures for the king of Naples.—Pilkington.

CONCANNEN (Matthew), a writer who is chiefly noted by the place he occupies in Pope's Dunciad, and by a letter to him from bishop Warburton. He was born in Ireland, and bred to the law. On settling in London, he became a party writer, in defence of the ministry, for which he was rewarded with the post of attorney-general of Jamaica, where he acquired a good fortune. He died in London in 1749. Some of his poems have merit.—Gen. B. D.

CONCINA (Daniel), a dominican monk, was born in the territory of Venice about 1686. His fame as a preacher was so great that he drew hearers from all parts of Italy. Pope Benedict XIV. consulted him frequently on difficult cases of the canon law. He died at Venice in 1756. He wrote a system of Christian Theology, in 12 vols. 4to.; and numerous pieces on casuistical and practical subjects.—Moreri.

CONCINO CONCINI, more celebrated by the title of marshal d'Ancre, was a Florentine by birth, and went to France with Mary de Medicis, wife of Henry IV. He afterwards obtained a marquissate, and some considerable places, which favours he abused, and was assassinated by the king's directions in 1617, and his body was infamously treated by the mob. His wife GALIGAI was also made a sharer of his misfortunes, and was absurdly accused of witchcraft. When the judges asked her by what arts she had gained an ascendancy over the queen, she well replied, "My sorcery has only been the influence of a strong mind over a weak one." She was burnt to death the same year her husband was murdered.—Moreri.

CONDOMINE (Charles Marie de la), a French mathematician, and chevalier of the order of St. Lazaré, born at Paris in 1701. He was sent in 1736 with Godin and Bonguer to Peru, to measure a degree at the equator, where he suffered great hardships. On his return to Europe he married his niece, by dispensation from the pope. He died in 1774. He wrote a journal of the abovementioned voyage; Travels through Italy, and some other works.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CONDE (Lewis, the first prince of), was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, and born in 1530. He signalized himself when very young, at the battle of St. Quintin, and behaved with great gallantry till the death of Henry II. and then he became a leader of the discontented hugonots. In the civil wars he was very active, and took a number of places, but he was wounded at the battle of Dreux, in 1562, and slain in that of Jarnac, in 1569. His Memoirs of his own Times were printed after his death. The last edition is that of 1743, in 6 vols. 4to.—Moreri.

CONDE (Henry, prince of), was born in 1588. He turned catholic at the request of Henry IV. In 1616 he was committed to the Bastille, and remained there three years. After the death of Lewis XIII. he recovered his footing at court, and was minister of state under the regent. He served his country with fidelity, and died at Paris in 1646.—Ibid.

CONDE (Lewis, prince of), duke of Eng-hien, the illustrious son of the preceding, and commonly called the great, was born at Paris in 1621. Cardinal Richelieu entering into conversation with him when he was a boy, said, "that he certainly would be the first general in Europe, and the greatest man of the age." At the age of 22 he gained the battle of Rocroi against the Spaniards, which victory was followed by the capture of Thionville, and other places. He next entered Germany, where he gathered innumerable laurels. Being recalled from thence, he was sent into Catalonia, where he failed in his attempt to take Lerida. In 1648 he defeated the Imperialists in Flanders with prodigious slaughter. In the civil war, occasioned by the mal-administration of cardinal Mazarine, and the conduct of the queen mother, Condé adhered to the court, and effected a reconciliation. He afterwards joined the malcontents, in consequence of the ungrateful treatment he had experienced from the cardinal, and in 1652 a civil war broke out, in which Condé opposed the court, but without success. A peace was made up, and the prince refusing to accede to it, entered into the service of the Spaniards in the Low Countries; and though his military exploits were uncommonly splendid in this new relation, yet the circumstance of his joining the enemies of his country is an indelible stain on his memory. At the peace of the Pyrenees, in 1659, he obtained his pardon, though much against the will of Mazarine. He now served his country with his wonted activity and success. He contended with the prince of Orange in the Netherlands, and was wounded at the famous passage of the Rhine. The conquest of Franche Compté was also chiefly owing to him. After the death of Turenne, he carried on the war against Germany with advantage. At last the gout obliged him to retire to Chantilly, where he died in 1686, leaving by his wife, niece of Richelieu, two sons.—Moreri. Nov. Dict. Hist.

CONDOR (John), a dissenting minister, and D.D. was born in Cambridgeshire in 1714. In 1755 he became principal of the academy at Mile-end; and in 1761, pastor of the congregation in Moorfields. He died in 1781. Doctor Conder wrote an essay on the Ministerial Character, and some sermons.—Genl. Mag.

CONDILLAC (Stephen), a French metaphysician, member of the academy, and tutor to Ferdinand, prince of Parma. He died in 1780. He wrote, 1. an Essay on the Origin of Human Knowledge; 2. a Treatise on the Sensations, 2 vols. 12mo.; 3. a Treatise on Animals, 12mo.; 4. a Course of Study drawn up for the Instruction of the Prince of Parma, 16 vols. 12mo.; 5. Commerce and Government considered relatively to each other, 12mo.—Nov. Dict. Hist.

CONDORCET (John Anthony Nicolas Caritat, marquis of), a French philosopher, was born at Ribemont, in Picardy, in 1743, of a noble family. He was educated at the college of Navarre, where he studied mathematics, and soon distinguished himself among the geometers. In 1765 appeared his first work, Sur le Calcul Integral (On Integral Calculations), which was received with approbation by the academy. In 1767 he published a treatise, Of the Problem of the Three Bodies; and the year following, his analytical Essays. In 1769 he was chosen member of the academy, and in 1773 secretary, in which capacity he distinguished himself by the elegance and accuracy of his eulogies. His Life of Turgot is reckoned an admirable piece of biography; but that of Voltaire is bombastic and flattering beyond all bounds. In 1791 he became a member of the national assembly, and devoted himself wholly to political affairs, becoming a member of the Jacobin club. He also offered many gross insults to the king, though he was against his being brought to trial. When Robespierre established his authority, Condorcet was marked as a victim, and concealed himself in Paris for some days. He then went to an acquaintance at Fontenai, but his friend was not at home. In this state of suspense, he spent one night in a quarry, and another in an open field. On the third day he was seized and committed to prison, as a suspicious person, but was found dead in his bed the next morning, March 28, 1794. He left behind him, a Sketch of the Progress of the Human Mind; a Treatise on Calculation; and an Elementary Treatise on Arithmetic. Condorcet was a good analyst, and an ingenious man, but he was weak and indecisive, and, what was worse, he had neither the proper feelings of humanity, nor the slightest respect for religion.—Life by La Lande. Anct. of th. Founders of the French Repub. Nov. Dict. Hist.

CONDREN (Charles de), a French priest of the congregation of the Oratory and doctor of the Sorbonne, was confessor to the duke of Orleans, in which capacity he did essential service, by effecting a reconciliation between that prince and the king. He was offered an archbishopric and a cardinalship, both which he refused, and accepted only the dignity of general of his order. He died in 1641. He wrote Discourses and Letters, 2 vols. 12mo.—Moreri.

CONFUCIUS, or CONG-FU-TSE, a Chinese philosopher, was born in the province of Chan-long, about 551 years B.C. Wonderful things are told of the precocity of his talents, and of his extraordinary virtue, particularly his dutifulness to his ancestors, a point of the highest consequence in the moral system of the Chinese. He lost his father, who was a mandarin, at the age of three years; but his grandfather, a learned and holy man, lived long enough to impart his instructions to his grandson. When he was nineteen he took a wife, by whom he had a son, who died at the age of 50, and left a son called T'ou-tse, whose character stood high for wisdom and virtue. Confucius never kept any concubines, though it was the custom of his country. At the age of 23 he formed the project of a general reformation, and had great success, being equally respected by king and people. A great change was brought about in the kingdom of Lu, where he lived, which alarmed the neighbouring princes, who sent the king several tempting girls to allure him from virtue and Confucius. The scheme succeeded, and our philosopher withdrew from court in disgust. He then travelled in search of a country disposed to attend to his maxims. He went through several countries spreading his doctrines, and endeavouring to make men wise and happy. His followers became very numerous, out of whom he selected ten as his chosen disciples, to whom he imparted the treasures of wisdom. He died in the 73d year of his age. The king of Lu, when he heard of his death, burst into tears, and said, "that heaven being displeased with him, had taken away Confucius." From that time, his memory was cherished as that of a saint, and several magnificent structures have been raised to his honour. His books are regarded by the Chinese as the fountain of wisdom, and they appear to deserve the praise which has been bestowed upon them, as far as they regard pure morality. His descendants enjoy the title of mandarins of the first order to this day.—Du Halde's Hist. of China. Moreri.

CONGREVE (William), an English dramatic poet, was born in Staffordshire in 1672, but brought up in Ireland, first at Kilkenny school, and then at Trinity college, Dublin; after which, he went to the Middle Temple, but never followed the law. His first literary production was a romance, called Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled, written at the age of seventeen. In 1693 appeared his comedy of the Old Batchelor, which was received with applause, and recommended the author to the earl of Halifax, who made him a commissioner in the Hackney coach office, to which was afterwards added other places. His next performance was the Double Dealer; and in 1695 he brought out his Love for Love. About this time he was engaged in a controversy with Collier respecting the immorality of his pieces, in which Congreve was completely foiled. He died in 1729, and left a large fortune behind him. His remains were interred in Westminster abbey. Besides the pieces above mentioned, he wrote the Mourning Bride, a tragedy; the Way of the World, a comedy; and some poems. He left all his fortune to Henrietta, duchess of Marlborough.—Biog. Brit. Johnson's Lives of the Poets.

CONNOR (Bernard), an Irish physician, was born in the county of Kerry about 1666, and brought up at Montpellier and Paris. He resided for some time at Warsaw, which enabled him to write the History of Poland, in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1695 he came to England, and became a fellow of the royal society. In 1697 he printed a book in Latin, on the Miracles of our Saviour, which made a great noise, as having an unfavourable aspect to christianity. He died the year following in the communion of the church of England.—Funeral Sermon for Dr. Connor, by Dr. Hayley, rector of St. Giles in the Fields. Biog. Br.

CONON, an Athenian general, who was defeated in a naval engagement by Lysander. He then went into solitary exile, and put himself under the protection of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, by whose aid he was enabled to defeat the Spartans near Cnidos, where their commander was slain. After having fortified Athens, and restored its liberty, he was betrayed into the hands of Tiribazus, a Persian, who put him to death, B.C. 393.—Plutarch. Xenophon.

CONON, an astronomer of Samos, who to gain the favour of Ptolemy Euergetes affirmed that his queen Berenice's locks were formed into a constellation. He was the friend of Archimedes, and flourished 247 B.C.—Vossius de Mathem.

CONRAD I. count of Franconia, elected king of Germany in 912. His title was acknowledged by all, except Arnoul duke of Bavaria, who engaged the Huns to ravage Germany. Conrad got rid of the invaders by the promise of a yearly tribute, and died in 918.—Univ. Hist.

CONRAD II. the son of Herman duke of Franconia, elected king of Germany in 1024. Several of the princes revolted against him, but were defeated. In 1027 Conrad went to Rome, where he was crowned emperor. He also obtained the kingdom of Burgundy, by the will of king Rodolphus, in 1033. Conrad died in 1039.—Ibid.

CONRAD III. emperor, was before his election duke of Franconia, and the son of Frederick duke of Suabia. His election was attended with civil wars, which raged with great violence a long time. When peace was restored, Conrad made an expedition into the Holy Land, where he nearly lost the whole of his army, chiefly through the Greeks poisoning the fountains. He returned into Germany, and died at Bamberg in 1152.—Ibid.

CONRAD IV. duke of Suabia. He was elected emperor of Germany after the death of his father Frederick II. in 1250. Pope Innocent IV. who claimed to himself the right of disposing of the crown, preached a crusade against him. Conrad marched into Italy, took Naples, Capua, and other places, but died soon after in the flower of his age, not without suspicion of poison, in 1254.—Ibid.

CONRADIN, or CONRAD the Younger, the son of the last-mentioned, was but three years old at the death of his father, who left the regency of the kingdom of Naples to Mainfroi his uncle. Urban IV. gave that crown to Charles of Anjou, who passed into Italy, and defeated Conradin in 1268. He then conducted his unfortunate rival to Naples, where he caused him to be beheaded at the age of 16 years.—Ibid.

CONRART (Valentin), one of the founders of the French academy; born at Paris in 1603, and died in 1675. He was a liberal man, and an encourager of letters, though not learned himself. He printed some letters and tracts.—Morari.

CONRI (Florence), a franciscan friar, was born in the province of Connaught in Ireland in 1560. He was educated in Spain, and when Philip III. attempted the conquest of Ireland, Conri was sent thither to bring over his countrymen; and to give him the greater influence, the pope made him titular archbishop of Tuzm. The design however failed, and he had the good fortune to get back safe to Madrid, where he died in 1629. He wrote, the Mirror of the Christian Life; an Irish Catechism, printed at Louvain in 1626; and some pieces in Latin, on the works of Augustine.—Morari.

CONRINGIUS (Hermannus), a learned physician and antiquary, was born in East Friesland in 1606, and studied at Leyden. He became professor of physic and politics at Helmstadt, and died senior of that university in 1681. He wrote some philosophical treatises on the Aristotelian System; others on Law, and German Antiquities; all of which were collected in 7 vols. folio, 1790.—Ibid.

CONSTANT (David), a learned divine, was born at Lausanne in Switzerland in 1638, and after studying at various universities, settled at his native place, as professor of moral philosophy and Greek, and afterwards of theology. He died there in 1738. He published an Abridgment of Politics; on the Passage through the Red Sea; De Uxore Lothi, rubo Moisi & Serpente æreo; Systema Ethico Theologicum, and some editions of ancient authors.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, emperor of the Romans, was the son of Constantius Chlorus, by Helena, and born about the year 274. On the death of his father at York, in 306, he was immediately proclaimed emperor there by the army. He defeated the Franks, after which he crossed the Rhine and committed dreadful ravages in Belgium. He married Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, in 307. His father-in-law taking advantage of his absence from Arles, where he held his court, seized on the treasury and assumed the imperial title. Shortly after he was taken prisoner by Constantine, and strangled himself. A war now broke out between Constantine and Maxentius, the son of Maximian, on which the former marched into Italy, which he completely reduced, and in a battle near Rome Maxentius was defeated and drowned in the Tiber. It is at this period that the æra of Constantine's conversion to christianity by the supernatural appearance of a luminous cross in the heavens is fixed. But though the emperor himself related the circumstance to Eusebius, it stands on too weak a foundation to be believed. After the death of Maxentius, he entered Rome in triumph, and received from the senate the rank of Augustus, in conjunction with Licinius and Maximin, the former of whom married his sister, Constantia. A civil war shortly after broke out between Licinius and Maximin, in which the latter was slain. Licinius then formed a conspiracy against Constantine's life, which being discovered, war ensued between those remaining masters of the empire, in which Constantine was successful, and a peace was concluded. A second war broke out in 323, and terminated in the total defeat of Licinius, and his resignation of the Imperial dignity. Not long afterwards he was strangled. Having obtained full possession of the empire, Constantine began to shew his regard for the religion which he had adopted, by building numerous churches, and taking a journey to Jerusalem to discover the holy sepulchre. While in the Holy Land he erected a magnificent church at Bethlehem. At this time the christian world was much disturbed by the disputes between the orthodox or catholics, and the arians. At the head of the first stood the famous Athanasius, to whom Constantine shewed but little favour, and consented to his banishment; but afterwards he condemned the doctrines of Arius, and steadily adhered to the Nicene confession. With this zeal for religion he blended the great personal qualities, courage and justice. He conquered the Goths, and gave an asylum in his dominions to a great number of Samaritans who had been driven from their own country. He founded Constantinople, and performed many actions that entitle him to the name of Great. Yet he sullied his character by the murder of his son Crispus. He died in 337, aged 66.—Crevier. Univ. Hist.

CONSTANTINE II. son of the above, was born at Arles in 316. On the death of his father he obtained Gaul, Spain, and Britain, to his share; but envying the part possessed by his brother Constans, he marched against him, and was slain at Aquilæ, in 340.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE IV. surnamed Pogonatus, or the bearded, was the son of Constans II. and succeeded him in 668. His first act was an expedition to Sicily, to avenge the murder of his father, and to depose the usurper, in which he succeeded. The army having set up his two brothers as coadjutors with him in the empire, he caused their noses to be cut off. He defeated the Saracens, and called a council at Constantinople in 680, in which the heresy of the monothelites was condemned. He died in 685.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE V. was the son of the emperor Leo the Isaurian, whom he succeeded in 752. He was a great enemy to image worship, for which his memory has been ill treated by the Romanists. He defeated the Saracens, and his brother-in-law, Artavasdes, who had taken the advantage of his absence, to assume the title of emperor. Constantine was afterwards defeated by the Bulgarians, whom, in a future battle, he completely routed in his turn. He died in 775.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE VI. son of Leo IV. by Irene, was born in 770, and succeeded his father in 780, under the guardianship of his mother. Irene was ambitious, and wished to keep the power from her son, who struggled hard to assume the reins of government. After many contests, she was obliged to yield, and retired to a private station; still however intriguing in secret for the resumption of authority. An invasion of the empire by the Bulgarians aided her views, and she was called to court. She caused her son to be deprived of his eyes in 792. He lived in obscurity some years after this leaving the throne to his unnatural mother.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE VII. (Porphirogenitus), son of Leo the Wise, born in 905, and came to the throne at the age of seven years, under the guardianship of his mother Zoe. He defeated the Lombards, and obliged the Turks to quit Italy. He was poisoned by his son Romanus in 959. Constantine was a learned prince, and wrote the Life of the Emperor Basilus the Macedonian; the Geography of the Empire; on State Affairs, &c.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE IX. was the son of the emperor Romanus, and succeeded to the imperial title, with his brother Basil II. on the death of John Zimisces in 976. The power, however, was principally possessed by Constantine, who died in 1028.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE X. surnamed Monomachus, or the gladiator, was a noble Greek, and the husband of Zoe, daughter of Constantine IX. He ascended the throne in 1042. His reign was disturbed by several insurrections, which he quelled; but the Turks took from him several places. He died in 1054.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE XI. surnamed Ducas, was adopted by Isaac Comnenus as his successor in 1059. The Scythians ravaged the empire in his reign, and several cities were destroyed by an earthquake. He died in 1067.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE XIII. was the son of the emperor John Paleologus, and succeeded his brother John in 1448. He was killed in bravely defending Constantinople against the Turks in 1453, and with him ended the Greek empire.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE (Flavius Julius), a private soldier, who was raised by the army in Britain to the imperial dignity in 407, on which he crossed over to Gaul and conquered that country and Spain. He fixed his court at Arles, where he was besieged by Constantius, the general of the emperor Honorius. Constantine surrendered, upon the promise that his life should be spared, which, however, was safely violated, and both he and his son were put to death by the emperor's orders, A.D. 411.—Ibid.

CONSTANTINE, pope, was born in Syria, and elected to the papal chair in 708. He made a voyage into the east, where he was received with great splendour, and died in 715. There was an antipope of the same name, who opposed Stephen III. but being driven from Rome, retired into a monastery.—Bower. Platina.

CONSTANTINE, called the African, a physician of the 11th century, was a native of Carthage, and well versed in the oriental languages. He left his own country and settled at Salerno, where he entered into a monastery, and composed several medical pieces, chiefly translations from the Arabic writers. He died in 1087. His works were printed at Basil in 1539, folio.—Moreri.

CONSTANTINE (Robert), a learned French physician, and professor of the belles lettres at Caen; born in 1502, and died in 1605. He wrote a Greek and Latin Lexicon, and some books on Grecian Antiquities.—Ibid.

CONSTANTIUS (Chlorus), the son of Eutropius, and father of Constantine the Great. He obtained the title of Cæsar, from his victories in Germany and Britain; and on the abdication of Dioclesian was chosen the colleague of Galerius. He died at York in 306.—Univ. Hist.

CONSTANTIUS (Flavius Julius), the se-second son of Constantine the Great, was born in 317, made Cæsar in 323, and elected emperor in 337. The soldiers, to secure the throne to the three sons of Constantine, massacred the uncles and cousins of those princes, with the exception of Julian the apostate, and his brother Gallus. After this the sons of Constantine divided the empire, Constantius taking the east to his share. Magnentius, governor of Rhætia, murdered Constantius, who had reigned over Italy thirteen years, on which Constantius marched against the murderer, whom he defeated, and his elder brother being also dead, he became sole emperor. He died on his march against Julian, who had assumed the purple in 361.—Univ. Hist.

CONTARINI (Gaspard), a Roman cardinal, was born at Venice, the senate of which employed him in several embassies. He obtained the cardinalship in 1538, and in 1541 was appointed legate to the council of Trent. He died at Bologna in 1542. He wrote De immortalitate Animæ; De Septem Ecclesiæ Sacramentis; De optimi antisititis officio; Consutatio Articulorum Lutheri, &c. His works are written with nerve and elegance.—Moreri.

CONTARINI (Giovanni), a Venetian painter of great merit, who died in 1605, aged 56. He imitated Titian with success.—Pilkington.

CONTARINI (Vincent), professor of eloquence at Padua. He died at Venice in 1617, aged 40. His works are, 1. De re Frumentaria; 2. De Militari Romanorum Stipendio; 3. Variz. Lectiones: all in 4to.—Moreri.

CONTE (Jacopino dal), a painter of Florence, who was patronized by pope Paul III. He excelled in portraits, and died in 1598, aged 88.—Pilkington.

CONTI (Armand de Bourbon, prince of). He was born in 1629, and brought up to the church, but on the death of his father he quitted the ecclesiastical state, for a military life; and in the dissensions which broke out in France he sided with the malcontents, in opposition to his brother the great Condé. Afterwards these two princes were sent to the prison of Vincennes, by Mazarine. In 1654 he was made governor of Guienne, general of the armies in Catalonia, and in 1662 governor of Languedoc. He died in 1668. He wrote, Traité de la Comedie & des Spectacles selon la Tradition de l'Eglise; Devoirs des Grands, avec un Testament; Devoirs des Gouverneurs de Province, Paris 1667, 3 vols. 12mo.—Moreri.

CONTI (Giusto di), an Italian poet of the 16th century, whose poems were printed by Salvini at Florence, in 1715, and in 1753 at Verona.—Tiraboschi.

CONTI (Anthony), a Venetian writer, who died in 1749, aged 81. He was personally acquainted with sir Isaac Newton, and ever retained a profound admiration for that great man. His works in verse and prose were printed at Venice in 2 vols. 4to. 1739, and his posthumous pieces in 1756.—Novæ. Diss. Hist.

CONTO-PERTANA (don Joseph), a Portuguese poet, who died at Lisbon in 1735. He ranks next to Camoens.—Ibid.

CONYBARE (John), an eminent English bishop. He was born at Pinhoe, in Devonshire, in 1692, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, obtained a fellowship, and in 1730 was chosen rector. In 1792 he published an answer to Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation, for which he was rewarded the same year with the deanry of Christchurch, Oxford. In 1750 he was made bishop of Bristol, and died in 1755. His remains were interred in Bristol cathedral. Two volumes of his sermons were published after his death.—Biog. Br.

COOK (James), a celebrated navigator, was born at Marton in Yorkshire, in 1738. His parents were in humble circumstances of life, and at an early age he was apprenticed to a shopkeeper at Snaith, but having an inclination to the sea his master gave up his indentures, and he bound himself to Mr. Walker, a ship-owner in the coal trade at Whitby. He served near seven years in this line, after which he became mate in the same employ. On the breaking out of the war in 1755 he entered on board the Eagle man of war, and distinguishing himself by his sobriety and diligence, obtained, in 1759, a warrant as master. He served in that capacity at the reduction of Quebec, and while on that station was employed in taking the soundings of the river St. Lawrence; afterwards he was engaged in making a complete chart of the same river, which he executed with great accuracy. He was next with lord Colvil, in the Northumberland, at the retaking of Newfoundland, of which coast he also made a survey. On his return to England in 1762 he married a respectable young woman at Barking, in Essex, for whom he had always the tenderest regard. The year following he accompanied captain Graves, governor of Newfoundland, in the quality of surveyor, where he made many curious researches, and observed a solar eclipse, an account of which he transmitted to the royal society. It being resolved upon to send out persons properly qualified to Otaheite, a newly discovered island in the South sea, for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus, in 1769, Mr. Cook was pitched upon to have the command, and accordingly was raised to the rank of lieutenant. In August 1768, he sailed in the Endeavour, accompanied by Mr. Green, an astronomer, Mr. now sir Joseph Banks, and doctor Solander. The transit was accurately observed, and July 13th our navigator left Otaheite on a voyage of discovery, in which he fell in with a number of islands, to which he gave the name of Society islands. October 6th he anchored at New Zealand, which he circumnavigated, and thus disproved the idea of its being a southern continent. From thence he sailed to New Holland, his account of which occasioned a settlement at a place there, named by him Botany Bay, and which colony will, in all probability, be attended with vast effects in those regions. He now shaped his course homewards, and arrived, after many dangers, June 12, 1771, and in August following he was rewarded by being appointed a commander in the navy. An interesting account of this voyage was afterwards published from the captain's journals and those of Mr. Banks, by doctor Hawkiworth. The existence of a southern continent being still an undecided question, captain Cook was employed in another voyage to ascertain the point, and he accordingly sailed with two ships, the Resolution, commanded by himself, and the Adventure, by captain Furneaux, July 13, 1772. During this voyage they explored the southern hemisphere as high as latitude $71^{\circ} 10'$, amidst immense fields and mountains of ice, where a ship had never been; but in the course of it the two vessels parted, and never joined each other again. Captain Cook, after refreshing at Otaheite, sailed to the westward, and fell in with a groupe, which he called the Friendly isles. He next fell in with the islands discovered by Quiros, and having surveyed them all, denominated them the New Hebrides. He next discovered a large island, which he called New Caledonia; and to the southward another, named by him Norfolk island, which has since been colonized. After various other additions to our geographical knowledge, but without attaining the main object, he arrived safe at Spithead, July 30, 1775, during which long and perilous voyage, only one man had died out of 118 on board the Resolution, owing to the excellent means adopted by him for preserving the health and comfort of his crew. Of these he gave an account in a paper transmitted to the royal society, of which body he was chosen a member, and had the gold medal awarded him in 1776. He was now raised to the rank of post captain, and appointed to a post at Greenwich hospital. The admiralty board having resolved to determine the disputed question, whether there be a northern communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, Captain Cook willingly volunteered his services on the occasion, and July 12, 1776, sailed from Plymouth in the Resolution, accompanied by another vessel called the Discovery. He carried out with him a native of the Society islands, named Omai, whom he had brought to England at his own request. After touching at Otaheite, the captain's favourite spot, he sailed to Huahine, where Omai was landed with his cargo of resents, which he had received in England. Sailing from thence our navigators fell in with a large groupe of islands, to which, out of compliment to the first lord of the admiralty, was given the appellation of the Sandwich islands. Then steering for the north-west coast of America, they arrived at a place called Nootka Sound, which some years afterwards had like to have involved this country in a war with Spain. On this coast they discovered a vast inlet, which at first seemed to indicate the very opening of communication they were in search of, but it proved to be only a large river, which was called Cook's river. After sailing as high as lat. $74^{\circ} 44' N$. and being opposed by an impenetrable mass of ice, the ships were obliged to shift their course to the south, and November 26, 1778, reached the Sandwich islands. Here they met at first with a kind reception from the natives, but the daring thefts committed by the savages produced quarrels, and threatened hostilities. At length the islanders proceeded so far as to steal the cutter belonging to the Resolution, which being a serious object, captain Cook armed two boats, and went on shore with a design of seizing the person of the king, which had been his custom on these occasions, and always answered. But in the present instance it proved fatal, for the natives were so irritated that they speedily armed themselves, and gathered in such numbers, that the captain renounced his purpose, and hastened to his boats. The savages, however, pressed on, throwing stones; the marines then fired, but four of them were knocked down and killed. In this dreadful scene of confusion captain Cook preserved his wonted coolness, and remained the last man on shore; but just as he reached the water side he received a blow from a club, which brought him down on one knee, and as he was rising he received a stab with a dagger and fell prostrate. He was soon dispatched by the savages, who carried off his body in triumph. Some of his bones were afterwards recovered, the flesh in all probability having been feasted on by the savages, who are known to eat the dead bodies of their enemies. Such was the melancholy fate of this great man, February 14, 1779. He left a widow and several children, who were all handsomely provided for by the royal bounty. Captain Cook was a tall robust man, yet of the most placid temper; modest, affable, and persevering; a father to his crew, by whom he was regarded with the greatest veneration. His name is revered throughout Europe, for having enlarged the stock of valuable knowledge, and he will ever be regarded as a honour to his country.—Eng. Brit.

COOKE (sir Anthony), tutor to Edward VI. was a native of Essex, and supposed to have been educated at Cambridge. In Mary's reign he lived abroad, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth, and died full of age and honour at his feat in 1576. His daughters were eminently learned, and very fortunate in their marriages. One was united to lord Burleigh, a second to sir Nicholas Bacon, a third to sir John Ruffel, and a fourth to sir Henry Killebrew.—B. B.

COOKE (Thomas), an English poet, was born at Braintree in Essex, about 1707. He was patronized by the earl of Pembroke, who assisted him in his translation of Hesiod. Cooke also translated Cicero de Natura Deorum; and Terence, with part of Plautus. He also wrote the life of Andrew Marvel, and was honoured by Pope with a place in the Dunciad. He died very indigent, about 1750.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COOPER (Anthony Ashley), earl of Shaftesbury, was born at Winborne in Dorsetshire, 1621, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1640 he was elected into parliament for Tewkesbury. At the beginning of the troubles he inclined to the side of royalty, but soon quitted it for the other party, and accepted a commission in its service. When Cromwell assumed the reins of government, he opposed him with warmth, and contributed much towards the restoration of the king. Soon after that event he was sworn of the privy-council, and created lord Ashley; appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the commissioners of the treasury. In 1672 he was created earl of Shaftesbury, and the same year made lord chancellor, which office he resigned the year following. He opposed the Test Bill, brought into the house of lords by the earl of Danby, on which account the parliament was prorogued. The earl contended in the next session that the parliament ought to be considered as dissolved, for which he was sent to the Tower, where he continued thirteen months. On the change of ministry, in 1679, he was made president of the council, but resigned the place shortly after. In 1681 he was tried for high treason, and acquitted. On this he went to Holland, where he died in 1683. His private life did not answer his great talents, and Charles II. once said to him, "I believe, Shaftesbury, thou art the wickedest fellow in my dominions;" to which his lordship gravely replied, "May it please your majesty, of a subject, I believe I am;" at which the king laughed heartily.—Biog. Br.

COOPER (Anthony Ashley), earl of Shaftesbury, grandson of the above, was born in 1671. He was educated under the inspection of his grandfather, and then went on his travels. In 1693 he was elected member of parliament for Poole, in which capacity he distinguished himself by a memorable speech for granting counsel to prisoners in cases of high treason. The ill state of his health obliged him to decline the honour of a seat in the ensuing parliament. He then went to Holland, where he pursued his studies under a borrowed name. Shortly after his return to England he succeeded to the family title, but rarely attended the house of lords. In 1704, the French prophets occasioned so much disturbance, that steps were proposed for suppressing them, which occasioned his lordship, who was a great enemy to persecution, to write his letter concerning Enthusiasm. In 1709 appeared his Moralists, a philosophical rhapsody. The year following he married, and in 1711 he went to Italy for the recovery of his health, but died the year following at Naples, in the 42d year of his age. His lordship left one son. The complete edition of his Characteristics, which appeared immediately after his death, comprises all that he intended for the press; but in 1716 came out his Letters written to a young Man at the University; and in 1721, Toland published Letters from the Earl of Shaftesbury to Robert Molesworth, Esq. His style is in general clear and strong; but though he professed himself a believer in christianity, he was undoubtedly a sceptic, and endeavoured to undermine revealed religion by the most insidious means. His brother Maurice Ashley Cooper translated Xenophon's Cyropædia into English.—Ibid.

COOPER (Thomas), an English prelate, was born at Oxford, and educated at Merton college, of which he was elected fellow in 1540. In 1546 he quitted his fellowship, and during the reign of Mary practised physic; but on the accession of Elizabeth, he returned to his former profession, and was made bishop of Lincoln, from whence he was translated to Winchester, where he died in 1594. He wrote a Chronicle from the 17th year after Christ to 1540, and thence to 1560; Theaurus Lingue Romanæ Britannicæ; sermons, and controversial pieces against the puritans.—Biog. Brit.

COOPER (Samuel), a celebrated English painter, who excelled in miniature portraits, inasmuch that the French king offered 150*l.* for his picture of Oliver Cromwell. He was called Van Dyck in little; and died in London, 1673, aged 73. His brother Alexander Cooper became painter to queen Christina of Sweden.—Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting.

COOPER (John Gilbert), an English writer, was born in Nottinghamshire, in 1723, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge. On leaving the university he went to reside at his country seat, and died in 1769. He wrote a Life of Socrates, printed in 1759; some papers in the World's Letters on Taste; and poems.—Biog. Brit.

COOPER (Miles), an ingenious divine, was brought up at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degree of LL.D. He became president of the college at New York, which place he quitted on the breaking out of the disturbances, and settled at Edinburgh as minister of the episcopal chapel. He died in 1785. The doctor printed a volume of poems in 1758, and some sermons.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COOTE (Sir Eyre), an eminent general, was born in 1726. He served against the rebels in 1745; and in 1754 went to the East Indies, where he distinguished himself in many important actions, particularly at the siege of Pondicherry, for which the directors presented him with a diamond-hilted sword. In 1769 he was made commander-in-chief of the company's forces; but he quitted Madras at the end of the following year, and returned to England, where he was appointed governor of fort St. George, and made knight of the bath. He again went to India as commander-in-chief in 1781, and defeated Hyder Ally with 10,000 men, though Hyder's forces amounted to 150,000. He died at Madras in 1783, and his body was brought to England, and interred at Rockwood in Hampshire. There is a fine monument to his memory in Westminster abbey, erected by the India company.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COPERNICUS (Nicholas), a famous astronomer, born at Thorn in Prussia in 1472. At the age of twenty-three he went to Italy, where he improved himself in astronomy and painting; and at Rome he obtained the professorship of mathematics. He returned to his own country after an absence of some years, and then set about reforming the system of astronomy, and the result was, that he completely overthrew the Ptolemaic system. His great work is entitled De Revolutionibus Orbium Cælestium. He died soon after its publication in 1543, aged 70. Copernicus was a canon of Worms, and well versed in the Greek and Latin languages, in mathematics and philosophy.—Life by Gassendi.

COQ (Peter le), a French ecclesiastic, born in 1728, and died in 1777, leaving a very respectable character for humility, learning, and industry. He wrote on the Usury of commercial Loans, 12mo.; Letters on ecclesiastical Discipline, 12mo.; a Treatise on different Kinds of Property; another on Funds, &c.—Norw. Dict. Hist.

COQUES (Gonzalo), a Flemish painter of portraits and conversations, born in 1618, and died in 1634. He imitated Vandyck with great success, and he acquired both riches and fame.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CORAM (Thomas), an English philanthropist. He was born about 1618, and was bred to the sea in the merchant's service. The foundling hospital owes its institution to his exertions, besides which he procured an establishment to be formed in North America, for the education of Indian girls. Captain Coram spent all that he had on these and other benevolent schemes, so that in his old age he was obliged to be supported by the contribution of several noble patrons, among whom was Frederick prince of Wales. He died in 1751, and was buried under the foundling hospital.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CORAS (John de), a French lawyer, born in 1513. He studied at Toulouse, where he read lectures at the age of eighteen; and afterwards became professor. The queen of Navarre appointed him her chancellor, and he was also made a counsellor of the parliament of Toulouse. On the breaking out of the war of religion, he and some other protestant counsellors were apprehended and thrown into prison. The king's orders were, to put them to death; but while the parliament were deliberating upon the inhuman decree, a band of assassins broke open the prison and put all the protestants to death, amounting to above two hundred, of whom Coras was one. His works on the Civil Law were printed at Lyons in 1558, in 2 vols. fol.—Moreri.

CORBET (Richard), an English divine and poet. He was born in Surrey, and educated at Christchurch, Oxford. James I. made him one of his chaplains, and in 1620 gave him the deanry of Christchurch. In 1629 he obtained the bishopric of Oxford, from whence in 1632 he was translated to Norwich, where he died in 1635. A collection of his poems was printed in 1648, 8vo. and again in 1672 in 12mo.—Biog. Br.

CORBET (John), a nonconformist divine, was born at Gloucester, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, after which he settled in his native county. He next obtained the living of Bramshot in Hampshire, from whence he was ejected in 1662. He had a conference with bishop Gunning at Chichester, on the terms of conformity, which ended without affording satisfaction to either side. He died of the stone, at London, in 1680. He wrote an Historical Relation of the Military Government of Gloucester, in the Time of the Rebellion, 4to.: but his principal performance is entitled Self-Employment in Secret, 12mo. 1681. and lately reprinted. It is a good practical book.—Calamy.

CORBULO (Domitius), a Roman general, who took several places from the Armenians, destroyed Artaxata their capital, and set Tigranes on the throne of Armenia. He also subdued the Parthians. Nero, jealous of his reputation, directed him to be murdered; Corbulo hearing of it, fell upon his own sword, A. D. 67.—Tacitus.

CORDEMOI (Gerard de), a French academician, and reader to the dauphin; died in 1684 at an advanced age. He wrote the General History of France, in 2 vols. folio. His son, Lewis Gerard, was abbot of the cistercian monastery at Femieres, in the diocese of Clermont in Auvergne. He was a zealous defender of the Romish tenets, and wrote a great number of controversial pieces. He also assisted his father in the History of France, He died in 1722.

—Moreri.

CORDEY (Charlotte), an extraordinary young woman, was born of a good family near Sees in Normandy in 1768, and lived chiefly at Caen, where she was greatly admired for her beauty and spirit. She had a lover named Bellune, a major in the army, who being massacred by the soldiers, his fate animated Charlotte with sentiments of vengeance against Marat, whom she regarded as the tyrant who oppressed her country. She hastened to Paris, and on being introduced to his presence, while he was reading a paper she had given to him, stabbed him to the heart with a dagger, July 12, 1793. Far from attempting to escape, she confessed the action, was condemned and guillotined. This extraordinary circumstance was attended by another equally extraordinary, for as she was conducting to the scaffold, a deputy of the city of Mayence, named Adam Lux, a young man, was so transported with admiration of her beauty, that he hastened to the tribunal and demanded to suffer death under the same instrument, and he was accordingly condemned and executed.——
Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CORDUS (Aulus Cremutius), a Roman senator and historian, who lived under Augustus and Tiberius. He wrote the history of the Civil Wars of Rome; for some free opinions in which, he was accused to Tiberius, by means of Sejanus, and finding his condemnation certain, he starved himself to death. The senate caused his books to be burnt. He is highly spoken of by Tacitus and Seneca.—Voss. de Hist. Lat.

CORDUS (Euricius), a German physician and botanist, was born at Simmerhuys, in Hesse. He took his doctor's degree at Ferrara, and settled at Bremen, where he died about 1536. He wrote, a Botanologia, Cologne, 1534, 8vo. and Paris, 1551, 12mo. He was also the author of some medical pieces and Latin poems. His son Valerius devoted himself to the study of physic and botany, on which he wrote several valuable works, as Dispensatorium, seu Pharmacorum Conscientiarum ratio; Adnotationum in Dioscoriden; Historia Plantarum, &c. He died in 1544, aged 29.—Moreri.

CORELLI (Arcangelo), a celebrated musician, born at Fusignano, a town of Bologna, in 1653. His principal instrument was the violin, on which he was supposed to be the first player in the world. After visiting several places he settled at Rome, where he was patronized by cardinal Ottoboni. He died in 1713, and was buried in the church of the rotunda, called the Pantheon. He left his collection of pictures, and about 6000*l.* in money, to his patron, who kept the collection, but distributed the cash to Corelli's relations. His solos and concertos are in high esteem among the lovers of music.—Burney. Hawkins.

CORINNA, a Grecian poetess, was born in Boeotia, and called by the Greeks the Lyric muse. She gained the prize of lyric poetry five times from Pindar. Only some fragments have come down to us, to be found in Fabrizii Bibl. Græc.

CORIO (Bernardine), an Italian historian, born at Milan, of which country he wrote the history, and died in 500. The best edition of that work is that of Milan in 1503, folio.—Tiraboschi.

CORIOLANUS (Caius Martius), an illustrious Roman, who obtained that name from his valour at Corioli, where from a private soldier he was raised to military honour. When Celo king of Sicily sent a quantity of grain to Rome as a present, Coriolanus imprudently advised that it should be sold, and not distributed gratis. For this he was tried and banished. He then went to Tullus king of the Volsci, whom he advised to make war upon the Romans. He became the general of the Volscian army, and upon his march was met by several ambassadors from Rome, who offered him liberal terms if he would return to his country; but he was inexorable, till his mother and wife, attended by the matrons of Rome, came to him in deep mourning. Their tears and entreaties prevailed, and he marched from the neighbourhood of Rome; for which Tullus caused him to be murdered, B.C. 488.—
Plutarch.

CORNARIUS, or HAGENBOT (John), a German physician, born at Zwickow in Saxony. He employed himself in restoring the Greek physicians, and translating them into Latin. He also practised physic with great success, and died in 1558, aged 58.—Moreri.

CORNARO (Lewis), a noble Venetian, who rendered himself remarkable by protracting his life to a considerable length, by a strict course of regimen. He was born in 1467, and in his youth lived very freely, which brought him into a bad state of health. On this, he formed the resolution of confining himself to twelve ounces of food and fourteen of wine daily, by which means and exercise he acquired a vigorous constitution. At an advanced age he wrote his popular book on Health and Long-life, which has been translated into most languages; he also wrote a treatise on Waters, particularly the Lagoon about Venice. He died at Padua in 1565, aged 98. His wife, who survived him, lived to about the same age.—Tiraboschi.

CORNARO (Helena Lucretia), a learned lady of the same family, who was educated at Padua, where she obtained the degree of doctor. She divided her time between intense study and the most mortified devotion; and died in 1685, aged 38. A funeral solemnity was celebrated in honour of her at Rome, of which a pompous description was printed at Padua in 1686. Her works, were printed at Parma in 1688, 8vo.—Moreri.

CORNAZZANI (Antony), an Italian poet, born at Placentia in the 15th century. He died at Ferrara, but the time is not ascertained. He wrote the Lives of the Virgin Mary and Jesus Christ, in verse; but his sonnets are most valued.—Tiraboschi.

CORNEILLE (Peter), a French poet of eminence, born at Rouen in 1606, and brought up to the bar, which he abandoned. His first dramatic piece was called Melite, after which he produced several celebrated performances, the most famous of which is the Cid, in 1637. In 1647 he was chosen member of the French academy. He died in 1684.—Moreri.

CORNEILLE (Thomas), brother of the above, and also a poet, a member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions. He wrote several plays which were well received. They were published with those of his brother in 1738, in 11 vols. 12mo. He died in 1709, aged 84. He likewise wrote a Dictionary of Arts, in 2 vols. folio, and a Geographical and Historical Dictionary, in 3 vols. folio.—Ibid.

CORNEILLE (Michael), a French painter, born at Paris in 1642. He had the king's pension, and went to Rome, where he studied with success. On his return he was chosen professor in the academy at Paris, and was employed in the great works at Versailles and Trianon. He died in 1708. His brother, John Baptist, was also a good painter, and member of the academy.—D'Argenville.

CORNELIA, a celebrated Roman lady, was the daughter of Scipio Africanus the elder, and the wife of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, who was consul B.C. 177. On being left a widow, with twelve children, she devoted herself solely to their education, and rejected the most splendid offers of marriage. All her children died young except the two famous tribunes Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, and a daughter, who married Scipio the younger. A pleasing anecdote is related of her; on being visited by a lady of high rank, the stranger displayed to her with much ostentation, her jewels and other ornaments, expecting that Cornelia would do the same, but the Roman matron brought out her children as her brightest jewels. She bore the death of her sons with heroic fortitude, and said that the woman who was the mother of the Gracchi, could not be called unfortunate. The Roman people erected a statue to her honour.—Plutarch.

CORNELIUS (Lucas), an eminent painter of Leyden in the 16th century. He came to England in the reign of Henry VIII. and was appointed principal painter to that monarch. At Penshurst in Kent are the portraits of the constables of Queenborough castle, from the reign of Edward III. to Henry VIII. painted by him.—Pilkington.

CORNELIUS (James), a Dutch painter of the 16th century. In the old church at Amsterdam is a picture of his, representing the descent from the cross, admirably executed.—Pilkington.

CORNELIUS (Cornelius), a native of Haerlem. His colouring in portraits as well as in history was very fine.—Ibid.

CORNELIUS, bishop or pope of Rome, who succeeded Fabian in 251; was opposed by Novatian, which gave rise to a schism which long disturbed the peace of the church. On the persecution of the christians by Gallus, Cornelius was banished, but died soon after in 252.—Euseb. Hist. Eccl. Boetius.

CORNETO (Adrian), a Roman cardinal, who was sent by Innocent VII. in the quality of nuncio to England, where he became so great a favourite with Henry VII. as to be promoted by him to the bishopric of Hereford and Bath and Wells. He was afterwards nuncio at the court of France. On his return to Rome he was raised to the cardinalate by Alexander VI. who, however, in a few months, laid a scheme for poisoning him at supper, in which the pope fell himself a victim. On the advancement of Julius II. Corneto retired from Rome, but was recalled by Leo X. against whom he intrigued, and was again obliged to go into exile. When he died is unknown. He was one of the first restorers of the Latin language to its purity, on which subject he wrote an elaborate work, entitled De Sermone Latino. He was also the author of another, De vera Philosophia, a poem on the chace, &c.—Moreri.

CORNUTUS, a stoic philosopher, who was put to death by Nero, A.D. 44. He was the tutor of the poet Persius, and is himself ranked among the poets and grammarians.—Moreri.

CORNWALLIS (sir Charles), an ingenious English gentleman, was the second son of sir William Cornwallis, and a man of distinguished abilities. He was sent by James I. ambassador to Spain, where he resided several years. He was afterwards treasurer to Henry, prince of Wales, whose life he wrote with elegance. He died about 1630. His son, sir William Cornwallis, was the author of a small volume of "Essays," 1632, 8vo.—Granger.

CORNEL (Paul), a learned Spanish divine, was born at Segovia, and became professor at Salamanca. He was employed by cardinal Ximenes in publishing his famous Polyglot Bible. He died in 1524.—Moreri.

CORNELLI (Vincent), a Venetian geographer, who acquired a great reputation by making globes. In 1685 he became cosmographer to Lewis XIV. of France; and died at Venice in 1718. He published many geographical books and charts.—Tiraboschi.

CORRADINI DE SEZZA (Peter Marcellinus),

a Roman cardinal, born in Sezza in 1658, and died at Rome in 1743. He wrote a book entitled Vetus Latium profanum et sacrum, 2 vols. folio; and a History of Sezza, 4to.—Moreri.

CORRADIUS (Sebastian), a grammarian of the 16th century. He was professor of belles-lettres at Bologna, and died in 1556. He wrote, 1. Quæstura in qua Ciceronis vita refertur; 2. De Lingua Latina.—Ibid.

COZZOGGIO (Antonio Allegri da), a famous painter, so called from the place of his birth in the Modenese, 1494. His real name was Allegri. It is not known under whom he studied, and it is supposed that he was principally self-taught. He lived in obscure circumstances, and never visited Rome or Venice; yet his manner is beautiful, and his ideas uncommonly grand. No one ever excelled him in expressing the delicacy of flesh, and his knowledge of the clair-obscur was surprising. The occasion of his death was remarkable. Having received at Parma a payment of sixty crowns in copper money, he carried it home on his back, about twelve miles in the heat of the day, which, with drinking cold water, threw him into a fever, of which he died at Correggio in 1534.—D'Argenville.

CORSINI (Edward), an Italian monk, born at Fanano in 1702, and died in 1765, at Pisa, where he was professor of philosophy. He wrote, 1. Philosophical and Mathematical Institutions, 6 vols. 8vo.; 2. Elements of Practical Geometry, 2 vols. 8vo.; 3. Fasts of the Archons of Athens; 4. A Course of Metaphysics; 5. Some tracts on Grecian Antiquities.—Novæ Diss. Hist.

CORTES (Ferdinand), a celebrated Spanish adventurer, was born in Estremadura in 1485. His family was respectable but not opulent, and he was bred at Salamanca for the profession of the law, which he renounced, and embraced the military life. The governor of Hispaniola was his relation; and Cortes in 1504 went out to St. Domingo, where he was well received by him, and immediately appointed to several valuable posts. In 1511 he accompanied Velasquez in his expedition to Cuba, where he displayed so much skill and bravery as to be rewarded with the grant of a considerable quantity of land. The conquest of Mexico being resolved upon, Cortes was chosen to conduct the enterprise, and he embraced it with ardour. He left Cuba on this great design in February 1519, with a fleet of eleven small vessels, and 617 men, soldiers and sailors. Thirteen soldiers only were armed with firelocks, but they had ten small field pieces, and sixteen horses; such was the army for the conquest of an extensive and populous empire. The Spaniards first landed at Tabasco, where, after several bloody battles, they compelled the natives to submit to their yoke. From thence they sailed to St. Juan de Ulva, at the bottom of the bay of Mexico, where Cortes was met by several messengers from the governors of the province; but he assumed to himself the title of ambassador of the king of Castile, and insisted on being introduced to Montezuma, the emperor, for which purpose he intended to march to the capital. The governors, alarmed, endeavoured to dissuade him from this purpose, but in vain, and the rich presents sent by the emperor only served to inflame the avarice of the Spaniards still more, to possess themselves of Mexico. After several negotiations, Montezuma perceiving the treacherous designs of the Spaniards, broke off all intercourse with them. Cortes in the mean time had erected a settlement on the coast, to which was given the name of Vera Cruz. Here he formed a civil government, and declared himself independent of the governor of Cuba. The Zempoallans and some other tribes of Indians being dissatisfied with the government of Montezuma, courted an alliance with the strangers. Thus strengthened, Cortes destroyed his ships, thereby compelling his men to exercise all their fortitude and valour, as well as confidence in the skill and courage of their leader. At the head of five hundred Spaniards indifferently armed, with fifteen horses, Cortes marched up the country, where he was opposed by the Tlascalans, a warlike nation, who were the enemies of Montezuma, but who were yet resolved to defend their country against these invaders. After several battles, in which the Spaniards met with no loss, peace was concluded, by which the Tlascalans acknowledged themselves vassals to Spain. Cortes, flushed with this success, proceeded to Cholula in the Mexican empire, where he was received with hospitality, which he rewarded by massacring all the inhabitants. From thence the Spaniards pushed on to Mexico, at the gates of which they were met by Montezuma himself most splendidly arrayed, who gave them an amicable reception. Soon after, Cortes adopted the bold and most audacious plan of seizing the emperor, and actually carried it into effect. For five months was Montezuma kept prisoner in his own capital, by a handful of men, and solemnly acknowledged himself a vassal of the king of Castile. While Cortes was at Mexico, Velasquez, irritated at his having thrown off dependence upon his authority, sent out an armament under Narvaez, with orders to seize Cortes and send him prisoner to Cuba. When Cortes heard that Narvaez was landed, he left a small force under Alvarado to take charge of the emperor, and hastened towards Vera Cruz, where he succeeded, by a stratagem, in making the army sent against him prisoners. By his lenient conduct on this occasion he prevailed upon these men to enter into his service, and thus acquired, at a most seasonable time, a great accession of strength. During his short absence from Mexico Alvarado had massacred a number of Mexicans, at a religious festival, which occasioned open hostilities, and several of the Spaniards were killed. Cortes hastened back to his old quarters, and the war raged with the greatest fury. Though the artillery swept off prodigious numbers, the Mexicans, roused to a pitch of frenzy, attacked the Spanish quarters with so much fury, that Cortes began to be alarmed, and caused the emperor in his royal robes to appear upon the battlements, in hopes, by this stratagem, that the assailants, out of reverence to their monarch, would yield or retire. But this sight served the more to encourage them, and they renewed the attack with additional fury, in which Montezuma received a mortal wound. In the night, Cortes made a silent retreat from Mexico, but as soon as it was found that the Spaniards were gone, the Mexicans sallied after them, and committed a dreadful slaughter. Reduced to half his men, and having lost most of his baggage, Cortes retreated towards Tlascala, but by the way met with a prodigious army, which he charged with impetuosity, and completely routed. This is called the battle of Otumba. He then safely entered the country of his allies. The disasters he had experienced did not damp the ardent spirit of Cortes, who made every effort to recruit his shattered forces, and having collected 550 Spanish infantry and forty horse, with a large body of Tlascalans, began his march towards Mexico in December 1520. Montezuma was succeeded by Guatimozin, his son-in-law, a brave young prince, who had made every preparation against the expected return of the Spaniards. After taking Texeuco, the second city of the empire, Cortes sat down before Mexico, and proceeded by a regular siege; during the progress of which, he received a considerable reinforcement from Vera Cruz. The Mexicans were driven to a hopeless state, and Guatimozin was taken in a canoe, in the act of making an escape. On this the capital surrendered, and the empire of Mexico ended. Though the plunder was immense, the avarice of the Spaniards was not satisfied, and Cortes put the unhappy emperor to the torture, to make him confess where he had concealed his treasures. Guatimozin, however, endured his sufferings with fortitude, and nothing could wrest from him a complaint or a discovery. He was afterwards hung with two of his great officers, on a pretended charge of a conspiracy. While Cortes was thus engaged in settling his conquests, a commission came from Spain, to deprive him of his command, but this he contrived to elude, and afterwards obtained from Charles V. the appointment of governor of New Spain. His conduct to the poor natives was infamous, and in one execution he committed sixty caciques and 400 other principal persons to the flames. A new commission at last arrived against him, on which he returned to Spain to vindicate himself in 1528. Having made his defence to the satisfaction of Charles, he was created a marquis, and obtained a large grant of land in New Spain, whither he made a new voyage in 1530. He returned to his own country in 1540, and died in 1547, leaving several legitimate children, and some by his Indian mistresses, Marina, and a daughter of Montezuma.—D' Herrera's Hist. of the Conquest of Mexico: Moreri. Robertson's Hist. of America.

CORTESI (William), a French painter, born in Franche-Comté in 1628, and died in 1679. He studied at Rome, and composed historical subjects in an excellent style. Pope Alexander VIII. employed him in painting the gallery of his palace, and rewarded him liberally.—Pitkington.

CORTESI (Giovanna), a paintress of Florence, born in 1670, and died in 1736. She was very excellent in painting portraits in miniature.—Ibid.

CORTI (Matthew), an Italian physician, was born at Pavia in 1475. He was professor of physic at his native place many years; after which, he removed to Pisa, and lastly to Padua, where he gained so great a reputation, that pope Clement VII. invited him to Rome, to be his physician. After the death of that pontiff he went to Bologna, and finally became professor at Pisa, where he died in 1544. He wrote, De Curandis Febribus; De Venæ Sectione, tum in aliis Affectibus, tum vel maxime in Pleuritide, and other works.—Turbeschi.

CORTICELLI (Salvatore), an eminent philosopher of the last century. He was a Bolognese and a Bernabite monk. He was also professor of belles lettres in the college of St. Paul in Bologna, fellow of the academy of Crusca, and provincial of his order. In 1745 he published his celebrated Italian Grammar, accounted the best work of the kind in Italy, for which the amiable and learned pontiff Benedict XIV. his townsman, alluding to the bad pronunciation of the inhabitants of Bologna, said in a letter to him, It is strange that our country should speak Italian so ill and teach it so well. Corticelli published some other valuable works in the same line, and died about the year 1770.—Nuovo Giornale d'Letterati, Modena, 1733.

CORYATE (Thomas), an English traveller, born at Odcombe in Somersetshire, in 1577, and educated at Gloucester hall, Oxford. He afterwards became a servant to the prince of Wales, and in 1608 went on his travels, an account of which he printed after his return, under the title of Coryate's Crudities, reprinted in 1776, in three vols. 8vo. In 1612 he set out again with a design of spending ten years in the east. He rambled through Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, Perfia, and died at Surat in 1617.—Wood. Granger.

COSZERS (John), an historical painter, born at Antwerp in 1603. His compositions are in a masterly style, and his figures well designed and grouped.—Pilkington.

COSIMO (Andrew and Peter), two Italian painters. The first excelled in claro oscuro, and the other in whimsical compositions. Peter had for a disciple Andrea del Sarto, and died in 1521, aged 80.—The Pict.

COSIN (John), a learned prelate, was born at Norwich in 1594, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge. In 1627 he became prebendary of Durham, and soon after fell under the displeasure of the puritan party, for publishing a collection of private devotions, which they said favoured popery. In 1634 he was chosen master of Peterhouse, Cambridge and in 1640 became dean of Peterborough; but in 1642 he was sequestered by the house of commons, and ejected from the mastership of Peterhouse, in consequence of which he went to Paris, where he remained during the civil wars, and had liberty to officiate to the protestants of the queen of England's household. At the restoration he was made bishop of Durham, in which see he behaved with great liberality, and spent yearly above 2000*l.* in pious and charitable uses. He died in 1672. He wrote a scholastic history of the Canon of the Holy Scripture, 4to.; History of Transubstantiation; and other learned works.—Biog. Brit.

COSME (Frere), a feuilant friar, whose family name was John Bafeillac. He was the son of a surgeon, and though he embraced a religious life, distinguished himself by his skill in lithotomy. He invented the lithotome cache for dividing the neck of the bladder in the lateral operation, which instrument was first described in the Journal des Savans for 1748; it is now laid aside. He also invented a forceps for breaking stones in the bladder. The surgeons were so jealous of him as to solicit the king to banish him. He died at Paris in 1786.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

COSMO I. grand duke of Tuscany, was the son of John de Medici, and born in 1519. On the murder of Alexander, head of the house of Medici, Cosmo hastened to Florence, where, with the aid of the soldiers, he procured himself to be elected chief of the republic. In 1553 he assisted the emperor in reducing Sienna, which country Philip II. annexed to Cosmo's territories. Several conspiracies were formed against him by the Florentines, which by his prudence and bravery he suppressed. He revived the university of Pisa, and liberally encouraged letters and the arts. In 1569 pope Pius V. created him grand duke of Tuscany. But though he was fortunate in public life, he was not so in his family. He had two sons, John and Garcia; the former was a cardinal and remarkable for his attachment to learning; the other was violent and revengeful. One day, in hunting and separated from their attendants, Garcia stabbed his brother to the heart, and afterwards rejoined his company. The dead body being found, was taken to the palace; and the father suspecting the truth, charged Garcia with the murder, which for some time he denied but at last confessed it; Cosmo then stabbed him with the same dagger. The mother of the youths survived this tragic scene but a few days. Cosmo died in 1574, leaving several children.—Med. Univ. Hist. Moreri.

COSMO II. grand duke of Tuscany, was the grandson of the above, and succeeded his father Ferdinand in 1609. He was a mild and benevolent prince, and expended large sums in the encouragement of the fine arts. He died in 1621.—Ibid.

COSMO III. grand duke of Tuscany, was the son of Ferdinand II. whom he succeeded in 1670, at the age of 32. He married the daughter of the duke of Orleans, from whom he was afterwards separated. He obtained from the emperor the title of royal highness, which was confirmed by the pope. He was very superstitious, and when at the jubilee at Rome, entered into orders for the sake of saluting the pretended handkerchief which our Saviour gave to Veronica impressed with his image. Cosmo was one of the richest princes in Europe, and very fond of chemistry. He died in 1723.—Ibid.

COSSE (Charles de), marshal de Brissac, a celebrated French commander, was born of a noble family in Anjou in 1506. He greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Perpignan in 1541, and acquired so high a reputation, that nobles and princes volunteered themselves under him on purpose to learn the art of war. For his various exploits he was made grand master of the artillery, governor of Piedmont, and in 1550 marshal of France. He died in 1563. He was as generous as brave; and when the tradesmen who had advanced supplies for the army, were refused payment by the government, Brissac sold a great part of his property for the purpose of discharging the debt.—Moreri.

COSTANZO (Angelo di), an Italian nobleman who wrote the History of Naples, which was printed in 1582, folio. He was the author of some elegant sonnets in Italian, printed in 1752. He died in 1591.—Moreri.

COSTARD (George), a learned English divine, was born about 1710, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1783 he took his degree of M.A. and the same year published Critical Observations on the Psalms, 8vo. In 1746 appeared his Letter to Martin Folkes, esq. president of the royal society, concerning the rise and progress of astronomy among the ancients, 4to.; to this work he added a Supplement, in three Letters, to the same gentleman in 1748. About the same time he also published Observations tending to illustrate the book of Job, which he makes to be no older than the Babylonish captivity. This was also the hypothesis of the learned Warburton. His other works are, Two Dissertations, 1. on the word Kephah, 2. on the signification of the word Hermes, 8vo.; Dissertationes II. Critico-Sacræ quarum prima explicatur Ezek. xiii. 18. altera vero, 2 Reg. x, 22, 8vo.; an edition of Hyde's Historia Religionis Veterum Persarum, 4to.; the Life of Astronomy, History, and Chronology, 4to.; Philological Conjectures on a Passage in Homer, 4to.; a Letter to Mr. Halhed, containing Remarks on his Preface to the Code of Gentoo Laws, 8vo. Mr. Costard was presented to the vicarage of Twickenham in Middlesex in 1764, and died there in 1782. He was a man of extensive learning and great benevolence.—Biog. Br.

COSTE (Peter), a learned French protestant, who resided many years in England, and translated into French Locke on the Human Understanding, on the Reasonableness of Christianity, and Newton's Optics. He also wrote the Life of the great Condé, and other works. He died at Paris in 1747.—Ibid.

COSTER (Lawrence), a Dutch printer, born at Haerlem, and died about 1440. The Dutch pretend that he discovered printing ten years before his death, but this is controverted by the Germans.—Moreri.

COTA (Rodriguez), a Spanish poet, who flourished about 1540. He was a native of Toledo, and wrote an esteemed work entitled Tragicomedia de Calisto & Melibea, which has been translated into Latin and French.—Ibid.

COTELERIUS (John Baptist), a learned Frenchman, and professor of Greek at Paris, was born at Nîmes in 1627, and honoured with the degree of M. A. at the age of 16, in consideration of his uncommon talents. In 1649 he became a member of the Sorbonne. He applied himself chiefly to the Greek fathers, and published the works of those who lived in the apostolic age, in 2 vols. folio, 1672. In 1675 appeared the first volume of a Greek work, entitled Monumenta Ecclesiæ Græcæ; but he did not live to finish it, being carried off by an inflammatory disease in 1686.—Ibid.

COTES (Roger), an English mathematician, was born in 1682 at Burbage in Leicestershire. After receiving a preparatory education, he was removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which society he became fellow in 1705, and at the same time was tutor to the sons of the marquis of Kent, to which family he was allied. The next year he was chosen Plumian professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy. In 1706 he took his degree of M. A. and in 1713 entered into orders. The same year he published a new edition of sir Isaac Newton's Principia, with a learned preface. He died in 1716, and was buried in the chapel of Trinity college. His Harmonia Mensurarum was printed at Cambridge in 1722, 4to.; and his Hydrostatical and Pneumatical Lectures in 1737.—Biog. Brit.

COTES (Francis), an English painter, was the scholar of Knappton, and painted portraits in a good stile, both in oil and crayons. He died in 1770, aged 45.—Pilkington.

COTIN (Charles), a French divine, and member of the academy, who wrote some tolerable pieces in prose and verse; but he was severely satirized by Boileau and Molière. He died at Paris in 1682.—Moreri.

COTOLENDI (Charles), a French author at the beginning of the 18th century, who wrote the Life of St. Francis de Sales, 4to.; the Life of the Duchess of Montmorency; and other works of merit.—Ibid.

COTTA (John), a modern Latin poet, born near Verona, and died at Viterbo in 1511, aged 28. Some of his effusions are in a collection, entitled Carmina quinque Poetarum, Venice, 1548, 8vo.—Tiraboschi.

COTTE (Robert de), a French architect, was born at Paris in 1656. He became vice-president of the academy of painting, and in 1708 first architect to the king. He erected a number of superb edifices in France, the chief of which are, the grand altar of the cathedral of Paris; the Ionic colonnade of Trianon; and the chapel of Versailles. He died in 1735, and was succeeded by his son Jules Robert.—D'Argenville Vie des Archit.

COTTEREL (sir Charles), an ingenious English gentleman, who was master of the ceremonies to Charles II. which he resigned in 1686 to his son Charles Lodowick Cotterel. He translated the romance of Cassandra into English, and other books, and died about 1687.—Granger. Wood.

COTTINGTON (Francis, lord), chancellor of the exchequer, and afterwards high treasurer in the reign of Charles I. He was for several years minister at the court of Spain, where he acquired all the Spanish solemnity with no small degree of political dissimulation. On the breaking out of the rebellion he retired to that country, and died at Valladolid about 1651, aged 77.—Birch's Lives of Illustrious Persons.

COTTON, or COTON (Peter), a French jesuit, born in 1564. He became confessor to Henry IV. who put so much confidence in him that it became a saying among the courtiers, "Our king is good, but he has Cotton in his ears." He died in 1626. He wrote some controversial books, and a volume of sermons.—Moreri.

COTTON (sir Robert Bruce), a famous English antiquary, was born at Denton in Huntingdonshire in 1570, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, from whence he removed to London, and became a member of the society of antiquaries then just formed. James I. honoured him with knighthood; and in 1608 he was made one of the commissioners to enquire into the state of the navy. In 1611 he was created a baronet by James I. who employed his pen on several historical and legal subjects. He was a member of the first parliament of Charles I. and joined the opposition party. In 1639 he was brought before the privy council on a charge of having lent a dangerous manuscript, in which a method was laid down how the kings of England might oppress the liberties of their subjects. This MS. was, in fact, in his library, and had been lent by his librarian without his knowledge. His library, however, was sealed up, and he was sent to the Tower; but soon released. He died in 1631. His inestimable library is now deposited in the British Museum.—Biog. Brit.

COTTON (Charles), an English writer, was born in Staffordshire of a good family in 1630. He rendered himself remarkable by a Travesty of Virgil; a Burlesque of Lucian; a Poem on the Wonders of the Peak in Derbyshire; and a Translation of Montaigne's Essays. He died about 1687.—Ibid.

COTYS, the name of four kings of Thrace. The first, cotemporary with Philip father of Alexander, was slain for his cruelties about 356 B. C. The second sent his son with 500 horse to the assistance of Pompey. The third lived in the time of Augustus, and was murdered by his uncle Rsecuporis. He is the same to whom Ovid addressed one of his elegies. The fourth was the son of the last mentioned, and ceded the kingdom to his cousin Rhemetalces by order of Caligula, and had in exchange Little Armenia, and part of Arabia. A. D. 38.—Novæ. Diss. Hist.

COUDRETTE (Christopher), a French ecclesiastic, who defended the fathers of the Port Royal against the Jesuits, on the subject of the famous bull Unigenitus, for which he was thrown into the Bastille in 1798. After a confinement of about twelve months, he was released, and died in 1774. He wrote, Memoirs relating to the Formulaire, 2 vols. 12mo.; History and Analysis of the Action of God on the Creatures, &c.; but his greatest work is a general History of the Jesuits, 6 vols. 12mo.—Novæ. Diss. Hist.

COVELL (John), an English divine, was born in Suffolk, in 1638, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow. In 1670 he went to Constantinople as chaplain to the embassy. On his return in 1679 he became D. D. and lady Margaret's professor of divinity at Cambridge. He also obtained the rectory of Littlebury, Essex; and the chancellorship of York. He died master of Christ's college in 1722. He wrote the Antient and Present State of the Greek Church, folio.—Biog. Br.

COVERDALE (Miles), an English prelate, was born in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge. Edward VI. made him bishop of Exeter, but in the reign of Mary he went abroad. At the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England, but refused the bishopric. However he accepted the living of St. Magnus, London, but was at last deprived of it for nonconformity. He died in 1567, aged 81. He assisted Tindal in his translation of the Bible, and the edition of 1540 goes under his name.—Biog. Brit.

COULON (Lewis), a French priest, who left the society of jesuits in 1640, and died in 1664. He wrote an Historical Treatise of all the Rivers in France, 2 vols. 8vo. 1644, and several other books.—Moreri.

COUPERIN (Francis), a French musician, who excelled on the organ and harpsichord. He became organist in the chapel of Lewis XIV. and died in 1793. He composed pieces for the harpsichord, 4 vols. folio. His brothers, Lewis and Charles, were also good performers; and his two daughters were proficient in music.—Novæ. Diss. Hist.

COUPLET (Philip), a French jesuit, who went to China as a missionary in 1659, and returned in 1680. He undertook a second voyage, and died on the passage in 1693. He wrote a curious book entitled Confucius Sinarum Philosophus; five Scientia Sinica Latine exposita, 1687, folio; and some other works.—Moreri.

COURAYER (Peter Francis), a French divine, born at Vernon, in Normandy, in 1681. He became canon regular and librarian of the abbey of St. Genevieve, at Paris; and in 1727 published a Defence of English Ordinations, which made a great noise, and brought upon him a severe persecution, in consequence of which he fled to England, where he was well received, honoured with a doctor's degree by the university of Oxford, and obtained a pension from the crown. He died in 1776. This learned and amiable man did not absolutely renounce the Roman church, though he approved the liturgy and principles of that of England, and used to attend her service occasionally. He also translated father Paul's History of the Council of Trent into French, 2 vols. folio; and after his death was published, in the same language, Declaration des mes dernières Sentimens sur les differens Dogmes de la Religion; which sentiments are not very orthodox.—Biog. Br.

COURCELLES (Stephen de), a protestant divine, born at Geneva in 1596. He succeeded Episcopius in the theological professorship at Amsterdam, and published his works with his life prefixed. He was also the author of several pieces in divinity, printed by Daniel Elzevir in 1675, in one vol. folio. He died in 1658.—Moreri.

COURT DE GEZELIN (N.), a French protestant divine, was born at Nismes in 1725. He was for some time a minister at Lausanne, but quitted that place for Paris, where he became superintendant of one of the museums, and died there in 1784. He is chiefly known as the author of a singular work entitled the Primitive World analyzed and compared with the Modern World, 9 vols. He was a great enthusiast for the impotence of animal magnetism.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

COURTEN (William), an eminent merchant of the 16th century, who fled from the Netherlands with his family at the time of Alva's tyranny, and settled in London, where he carried on an extensive trade, and died at the beginning of the reign of James I. leaving two sons, William and Peter, who carried on the concern in partnership with such success, as to receive the honour of knighthood. Sir William experienced considerable losses by the murder of his factors at Amboyna, and by the seizure of his plantations in the West Indies, and died in distressed circumstances in 1626.

—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COURTEN (William), an ingenious naturalist, was the last male descendant of the above family; and born in London in 1642. His father was obliged to go abroad, and died at Florence in 1655. This son, when he came of age, returned to London, where he had a long lawsuit; after settling which, he altered his name to Charleton, and then went to Montpellier, where he studied natural history, and collected a cabinet of curiosities. He returned to England, and died in 1702. His collection was purchased for 20,000*l.* and added to the British museum.—Ibid. Biog. Br.

COURTILZ (Garién de), a French soldier and author, of a noble family, who wrote the Life of Coligni, 12mo.; Memoirs of Rochfort, 12mo.; History of the Dutch war; and other works. He was confined in the Bastille nine years, and died in 1712, aged 68.—Moreri.

COURTIVRON (Gaspard), a French marquis, who distinguished himself as a soldier and mathematician. He wrote a treatise on Optics, 1754, 4to. and other works; and died in 1785, aged 70.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

COURTNEY (William), archbishop of Canterbury, was the fourth son of Hugh Courtney, the great earl of Devonshire, by Margaret, grand-daughter of Edward I. and born in 1341. He received his education at Oxford, and on entering into orders obtained several valuable preferments. At the age of twenty-eight he was promoted to the bishopric of Hereford, from whence he was translated to London, in which see he distinguished himself by his zeal for the papal authority, and in opposition to some court measures; but he was particularly noticed by citing Wickliffe before him in St. Paul's cathedral in 1377. That divine accordingly appeared, supported by John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, and the lord Percy, both of whom behaved with such excessive rudeness to the bishop, that the citizens of London were exasperated, and a tumult ensued. In 1381 he was made lord chancellor, and raised to the archiepiscopal chair, in which he behaved with great spirit, but also with severity. He caused Wickliffe's tenets to be condemned in a synod, and persecuted many of his followers. He died at Maidstone in 1396. Biog. Brit.

COURTOIS (James), a celebrated painter, commonly known by the name of le Bourguignon, was born in Franche Comté in 1621. He studied under his father, who was also a painter; after which he followed the French army in Italy, and painted a number of battle pieces from designs taken by himself when the actions happened. After this Guido took him to Bologna, and introduced him to Albano, and both those great artists readily gave him instructions. He next settled at Florence, where he married the daughter of a painter, of whom he was very jealous. On her death he fell under a suspicion of having poisoned her, which induced him to enter among the Jesuits at Rome, but still continued to exercise his talents. He died in 1676.—D'Argenville.

COURTOIS (William), brother of the above, was born in 1628, and on going to Rome became the disciple of Pietro di Cortona, whose manner he equalled. He painted some fine pictures for pope Alexander VII., particularly one of the battle of Joshua. He died by taking a quack medicine for the gout in 1673.—Ibid.

COUSIN (John), an eminent French painter of history, who excelled chiefly in painting on glass. He was also a good sculptor and mathematician, and wrote treatises on Geometry and Optics. He died about 1593.—D'Argenville.

COUSTOU (Nicholas), a French sculptor, born at Lyons in 1658, and died at Paris in 1733. He executed several great works, particularly a marble groupe in the sanctuary of Notre Dame, representing the Virgin with the infant Jesus, and a number of angels.—D'Argenville Vies des Artistes.

COUSTOU (William), brother of the above, and director of the royal academy of painting and sculpture, died at Paris in 1746, aged 69. Several capital pieces by him are scattered over France, the finest of which are, two horses on the terrace of Marli. His son William succeeded him in his honours in the academy, and gained a great reputation in the same line. He died in 1777.—Ibid.

COUVREUR (Adrienne le), a famous French actress, was born at Fismes in Champagne in 1700. She made her first appearance on the stage at Paris in 1715, in the character of Electra, and distinguished herself by her uncommon force of expression. She was one of the mistresses of marshal Saxe, whom she once relieved from embarrassment by pawned her jewels. She died in 1730.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

COWARD (William), an English physician, born at Winchester about 1657. After taking his degree at Oxford, he settled in London. He brought himself into note by a book entitled Second Thoughts on the Human Soul, in which he denied its immateriality. This work was ordered, by the house of commons, to be burnt by the common hangman. Coward also wrote Ophthalmia, or a treatise on the Organs of Vision. He died about 1725.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COWELL (John), an English civilian, born in Devonshire about 1554, and brought up at Cambridge, where he became professor of civil law, and master of Trinity hall. In 1607 he published his Interpreter, or an Explanation of Law Terms. The house of commons caused this book to be burnt on account of its being too favourable to the regal prerogative. He died in 1611. Dr. Cowell also wrote Institutes of the Laws of England, 1605.—Prince's Worthies of Devon.

COWLEY (Abraham), an English poet, born in London in 1618, and educated at Westminster school. At the age of 15 he published a small collection of poems, entitled Poetical Blossoms. From Westminster he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he wrote several of his pieces. In 1643 he was ejected from the college for his loyalty, and then went to Oxford, where he materially served the royal cause. He afterwards removed to France in the family of the earl of St. Alban's. In 1656 he returned to England, and was soon after committed to prison, from whence he was bailed by Dr. Scarborough. Next year he went to Oxford, and obtained the degree of M. D. On the death of Cromwell he again visited France, but returned at the restoration, and obtained a lease of a farm at Chertsey, valued about 300l. a year, where he died in 1667. His remains were deposited in Westminster abbey, where is a monument to his memory. Dr. Johnson places Cowley at the head of those whom he calls metaphysical poets; but though he is sometimes very sublime, always moral, and frequently witty, yet his poems are tedious and affected. The anacrenatics are reckoned the best. He also wrote a comedy called the Cutter of Colman-street, and some pieces in prose, particularly a Discourse on the Government of Cromwell, and a Proposition for the Advancement of Experimental Philosophy.—Johnson's Lives of the Poets. Biog. Br.

COWPER (William), a Scotch divine, who after being a violent presbyterian, became bishop of Galloway. He died in 1617, aged 53.—Life prefixed to his Works, in folio.

COWPER (Spencer), an English divine, was the son of earl Cowper, and educated at E.eter college, Oxford, where he proceeded D. D. After obtaining several benefices, he became dean of Durham, and died in 1774. He was a good astronomer, and compiled lunar tables; he was also the author of some sermons.—Gen. Mag.

COWPER (William), an English physician, who made some collections towards a History of Chester, his native city, and published a few tracts on the subject. He died in 1767.—Gen. Mag. Dict.

COWPER (William), an excellent English poet, was the son of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II. rector of Berkhamstead in Herefordshire, and nephew to the lord chancellor Cowper. The subject of the present sketch was born Nov. 26. 1731, at Berkhamstead, and lost his amiable mother when he was only six years old. His constitution was remarkably delicate from his infancy, and his mind was so tender as to be easily depressed into melancholy. He received the rudiments of learning at Market-street, Hertfordshire, from whence he was removed to Westminster school, which he quitted at the age of eighteen, having laid in a rich store of classical knowledge. Being designed for the law, he was placed under an eminent attorney: on quitting whom he entered of the Inner Temple, where he renewed an intimacy with his old schoolfellows Colman, Thornton, and Lloyd, and contributed three papers to the Connoisseur, conducted by the two former. At the age of thirty-one he was nominated a clerk in the house of lords; but an unconquerable timidity prevented him from taking it. He was next appointed clerk of the journals, a situation which, it was supposed, would require no personal attendance; but an occasion occurring which rendered it necessary for the clerk to appear at the bar of the house, it had such an effect upon his nerves, that he was obliged to resign the place. A morbid melancholy seized him, and it was found necessary to place him under the care of Dr. Cotton, who kept a lunatic asylum at St. Alban's. By the care of that benevolent physician he gradually recovered his mental faculties, and from this time his ideas of religion were changed to a system of comfort and serenity. In 1765 he settled at Huntingdon, where he formed an acquaintance with a clergyman of the name of Unwin, in whose family he became an inmate. That gentleman was killed by a fall from his horse in 1767, on which Cowper and Mrs. Unwin retired from Huntingdon, and settled at Olney in Buckinghamshire, where they contracted an intimacy with Mr. Newton, then curate of that parish, and well known as a popular preacher and calvinistic writer. To a collection of hymns published by that gentleman, our poet contributed sixty-eight, some of which are truly sublime. In 1782 appeared a volume of his poems, which did not excite much attention; but the second volume, in 1785, stamped his reputation as a first-rate poet, particularly by that exquisite piece "the Task." Lady Austin, for whom the poet had a tender regard, being a great admirer of Milton, requested him to try his powers in blank verse; and, on his asking her for a subject, she said, "Oh, you can write upon any; let it be this sofa." Thus originated one of the finest poems in our language. The same lady was also the occasion of the popular ballad of John Gilpin, which story she related to amuse Cowper in one of his gloomy moments, and it had such an effect upon him, that he turned it into verse. About the same time he engaged in translating Homer into Miltonic verse, and, though the version is not so pleasing as that of Pope, it certainly exhibits a more faithful picture of the original. In 1786 he removed to Weston in Northamptonshire, with Mrs. Unwin, whom he regarded as a mother, and who, the same year, had the misfortune to lose her only son. After the publication of his Homer he was persuaded to undertake the life of Milton, and the care of a complete edition of his poetical works. Mr. Hayley was engaged in a similar design, and this brought about an intimacy between them, which continued till Cowper's death. In consequence of this connection and increased infirmities our author abandoned this project. In 1794 his majesty granted him a pension of 300*l.* per annum, but the royal bounty yielded pleasure only to his friends, for he was now sunk into a state of complete dejection, from which he never fully emerged. In December 1796 Mrs. Unwin died, but the condition of Cowper was such, that he seemed not to feel the loss of a person whom he had so long loved. He continued, however, occasionally to write, and also finished a revival of his Homer, which has since been printed. This amiable man and extraordinary genius died at Dereham in Norfolk, April 25, 1800, and lies buried in the parish church, where a monument is about to be erected to his memory.—Life of Cowper by Hayley.

Cox (Richard), an English prelate, born at Whaddon in Buckinghamshire, about 1500. He was admitted at Eton, from whence he was elected to King's college, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow, but afterwards he removed to Wolfey's new college at Oxford. Here he embraced the principles of the reformation, for which he was thrown into prison, but obtained his release by means of Cranmer. He was then chosen master of Eton school, and in 1545 obtained the deanry of Christ-church, Oxford. On the accession of Edward VI. to whom he had been tutor, he was made privy counsellor, and dean of Westminster; but when Mary came to the throne he was deprived of his preferments, and imprisoned. Now he obtained his release does not appear; but he immediately went abroad and settled at Strasburgh. There was another English congregation at Frankfort, where Knox prevailed in setting aside the liturgy, on which Doctor Cox went thither, and by his spirited exertions restored conformity. At the accession of queen Elizabeth he returned home, and was made bishop of Ely, in which station he conducted himself in a most exemplary manner. He died in 1581. He assisted in forming the first liturgy, and in the review of it in 1559. He also had a considerable share in the Bishops' Bible.—Biog. Br.

Cox (Sir Richard), chancellor of Ireland, was born at Bandon, in the county of Cork, in 1650. He was at first an attorney, which profession he quitted for the bar. In 1690 he was made a judge of the Irish court of common pleas, and about the same time appointed by king William military governor of Cork. In 1703 he was raised to the chancellorship, and in 1706 created a baronet. The year following he was deprived of his office, on which he retired to private life, but afterwards accepted the place of chief justice of the queen's bench. On the accession of George I. he was dismissed from his post, and from the privy council. He died in 1733. He wrote Hibernia Anglicana, or the History of Ireland, folio; An Address to those of the Roman Communion in England, 12mo; An Enquiry into Religion, and the Use of Reason in reference to it, 8vo.—Ibid.

Cox (Leonard), a grammarian of the 16th century, was a native of Wales, and educated at Cambridge, after which he became schoolmaster at Reading. He died in 1549. He wrote a Commentary on Lilly's Grammar.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

COTETER (Thomas), an English critic, was born at Lechlade in Gloucestershire, in 1682, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford, but never adopted any profession. He was a great collector of old books, and in 1739 published a new edition of Bailey's Life of Bishop Fisher. He engaged in publishing a collection of old plays, which scheme was adopted by Dodsley. He died in 1747.—Ibid.

COXIS (Michael), an historical and portrait painter of Mechlin, born in 1497, and died in 1592. He studied under Raphael, whose manner he imitated with success.—Pilgrimage.

COYER (Gabriel Francis), a French writer, born in 1707. He was for some time a jesuit, but quitted the society in 1736, and became tutor to the prince of Turenne, afterwards duke of Bouillon. He published a number of fugitive pieces, but his principal works are the History of John Sobieski, 3 vols. 12mo.; Travels into Italy and Holland, 2 vols. 12mo.; Treatise of Public Education, 12mo.; he also translated Blackstone's Commentaries into French. He died at Paris in 1782.—Nov. Diss. Hist.

COFFEL, a celebrated family of painters in France. 1. Noël Coffel was born in 1628, and became the disciple of Quilleier. In 1663 he was admitted into the academy, of which he was chosen professor. The king gave him apartments in the Louvre, and nominated him director of the French academy at Rome, which institution flourished greatly under his care. He executed a prodigious number of great works, and died in 1707. 2. Anthony Coffel, eldest son of the above, was born at Paris in 1661. He accompanied his father to Rome, where he greatly improved himself. He succeeded his father in his honours, and in 1715 was appointed first painter to the king. Besides his professional talents he had a taste for literature, and wrote a poetical epistle on painting in a style of elegance. He died in 1722. 3. His son Charles was also a very eminent artist, and likewise a dramatic poet. He died in 1752, aged 58. 4. Noël Nicholas Coffel, another son of Noël Coffel, and brother of Anthony, was born at Paris in 1692. He had not the same advantages of instruction as his brother, owing to his father's dying while he was young; but he acquired great knowledge by his own application, and produced a picture for a royal prize, which was highly admired. He also painted some fine church pieces. In 1738 he was appointed a professor in the academy, and died in 1735.—D'Argenville.

COYSEVOX (Anthony), a French sculptor, born at Lyons in 1640, and died in 1720. There were many of his works at Versailles; besides which he executed the tomb of the great Colbert.—Ibid.

COYTIER (James), physician to Lewis XI. king of France. He acquired a great ascendancy over the mind of that weak monarch, who was afraid of dying; and this timidity Coytier turned to his own advantage, by procuring several grants for himself.—Moreri.

COZZA (Francesco), a disciple of Domenichino. He was a native of Palermo in Sicily, and was employed in several great works at Rome, as well in oil painting as in fresco, and died there in 1664.—Pill.

CRASBECK (Joseph van), a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1608, and died in 1668. He was the disciple of Brouwer, and painted scenes in public-houses, which he executed very happily.—Ibid.

CRABS (Habakkuk), a dissenting minister, born at Wattisfield in Suffolk, and educated under Dr. Ashworth at Davenry. After officiating at different places, he settled in his native village; from whence he removed to Roydon. He died in 1795. His sermons were published after his death.—Gen. Mag.

CRADOCK (Samuel), a nonconformist divine, who was ejected from the living of North Cadbury, in Somersetshire, in 1662. He died in 1706, aged 86. He wrote a History of the Old and New Testament; a Harmony of the Four Evangelists; and other works.—Calamy.

CRADDOCK (Luke), an English painter, whose pictures once sold for a good price. His birds were much valued. He died in 1717.—Pilkington.

CRAIG (Nicholas), a learned Dane, born in 1541, and died in 1602. He wrote an esteemed book on the Republic of the Iaccedemonians, in Latin, reprinted at Leyden, in 1670, 8vo.; also the Annals of Denmark, reprinted at Copenhagen in 1737, folio.—Moreri.

CRAIG (Sir Thomas), an eminent Scotch lawyer. He was born at Edinburgh in 1548, and died there in 1608. His book on the feudal law has been often printed, and is still held in high repute.—Gen. B. D.

CRAIG (James), a Scotch divine, born at Clifford in East Lothian, 1682, and educated at Edinburgh, where he became a popular preacher. He published 3 vols. of Sermons, and died in 1744.—Ibid.

CRAIG (John), a Scotch mathematician, who settled at Cambridge about the year 1680, and in 1685 had a dispute with John Bernoulli on the method of the quadrature of curved lines, and curvilinear figures. He had afterwards another difference with that great mathematician on an algebraic question, but finding himself wrong he candidly acknowledged it in the Philosophical Transactions. He wrote several able pieces on mathematical subjects; but the most extraordinary one is entitled, Theologice Christiane principia Mathematica, first printed in 1699, at London, and at Leipzig, with a learned preface, in 1755, 4to. The object of this curious tract is to apply mathematical calculation to the credibility of the gospel history; and he maintains on his principle, that the christian religion must end, according to the doctrine of chances, A.D. 8190, at which time our Lord will make his second appearance to judgment. This work was answered by the abbe Houteville, in a work entitled, The Christian Religion proved by Facts. It is not known when Craig died.—Novo. Dict. Hist. Gen. Biog.

CRAIG (William), a Scotch divine, born at Glasgow in 1709, and educated in the university there. In 1734 he commenced preacher, and in 1737 settled as minister of Cambusnethan, from whence he afterwards removed to Glasgow, where he officiated as minister of St. Andrew's church. He died in 1783. Dr. Craig wrote an Essay on the Life of Jesus Christ; and a volume of sermons.—Biog. Br.

CRAKANTHORPE (Richard), an English divine of considerable learning, was born in Westmoreland, and educated in Queen's college, Oxford. He died at his rectory of Black Notley in Essex, in 1694. He wrote some able pieces against the Romanists, particularly Baronius.—Wood's A. O.

CRAMER (Daniel), a learned German divine, was born at Retz, in Brandenburg, in 1568. He became professor of eloquence at Wittenberg, and afterwards dean and consistorial professor at Stettin, where he died in 1598. He wrote on the logic and metaphysics of Aristotle; Scholæ Prophetiæ; Arbor Hereticæ Conflagrantis, &c. — Moreri.

CRAMER (John James), a Swiss divine, and professor of the Oriental languages at Zurich, from whence he removed to Herborn, where he united to the same station the professorships of theology and ecclesiastical history. He died in 1702. His principal works are, Exercitationes de Ara Exteriori Templi secundi, 4to.; Theologia Israelis, 4to. — His brother John Rodolphus was professor of Hebrew and divinity at Zurich, and dean of the college of Canons. He wrote some able works on the Hebrew antiquities, and died at Zurich in 1737. — Moreri.

CRAMER (John Andrew), a famous metallurgist, born at Quedlinburg in 1710, and died near Dresden in 1777. He was the first who formed the art of assaying into a system: on which subject he wrote an esteemed work, entitled, Elementa Artis Docimasticæ, 1739, 8vo. He was also the author of an introduction to the Care and Management of Forests, with a complete Description of the Method of burning Charcoal, 1766, fol; the Elements of Metallurgy, 2 parts, folio. — Gen. Biog.

CRAMER (John Andrew), a German writer, born in 1723. He studied at Leipzig, where he gave lectures, and published a weekly paper, called the "Guardian Spirit." In 1748 he became a preacher, and in 1754 removed to Copenhagen as chaplain to the court, and in 1765 was appointed professor of theology there; but when Struensee fell into disgrace, Cramer was deprived of his places on which he retired to Lubeck; but in 1774 he was re-established in Denmark, and appointed divinity professor at Keil. He died there in 1788. He translated a great part of the works of Chrysostom into German; and Bossuet's Universal History, with Dissertations. He also published an animated poetic version of the Psalms; sermons; odes; the Life of Gellert, and a number of miscellaneous pieces. His poems are much admired. — Ibid.

CRAMER (N.), a Flemish painter, born in 1670, and died in 1710. He had a good taste for design, and his portraits have a great resemblance to nature. — Pittington.

CRAMER (John Frederic), a learned man, who was professor at Duisbourg, and resident for the king of Prussia at the Hague, where he died in 1717. He wrote Vindiciæ nominis Germanici contra quosdam obstrictatores Gallos. — Moreri.

CRAMER (Gabriel), a mathematician of Geneva, born in 1694. He became professor of mathematics, and a member of most of the learned societies in Europe. He died in 1752. He wrote some pieces, and edited the works of James and John Bernoulli. — Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CRANE (Thomas), a nonconformist divine, was born at Plymouth, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, after which he had a living in Dorsetshire, from which he was ejected in 1662. He died in 1714. There is by him a treatise on Divine Providence. — Calamy.

CRANIUS (Luca), a painter, born in Bamberg in 1470, and died in 1553. He painted historical subjects and portraits, but his pieces are not now held in high esteem. He had a son who painted exactly in the same manner. He died in 1586, aged 76. — Pittington.

CRANMER (Thomas), archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Allacton, in Nottinghamshire, 1489, and educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, where he proceeded to the degree of D.D. The opinion which he gave on the question of Henry VIIIth's divorce recommended him to that monarch, who employed him to vindicate the measure, and sent him to the foreign universities to obtain their opinion upon the point. At Rome he presented his book on the divorce to the pope, and offered to justify it in a public disputation, but none was appointed. In Germany he married a niece of Osiander; and during his abode there, archbishop Warham died, on which the king immediately nominated Cranmer to that dignity, which for a considerable time he endeavoured to decline. In 1533 he was consecrated, and though he received the customary bulls from the pope, he protested against submission to his authority. The first service he was employed in was to pronounce the divorce between the king and Catherine; and the next to marry him to Anne Boleyn. He furthered the reformation with great zeal, tempered with judgment and moderation. That valuable work, the Erudition of a Christian Man, was set forth by him, and by his means the Bible was translated and read in churches. Though he was justly esteemed by the king for his piety and integrity, he occasionally offended him by his opposition to the six bloody articles, and to the alienation of the abbey lands to secular uses. The wish of the archbishop was to appropriate them to purposes agreeable to the intention of the original donors, namely, the advancement of learning and religion. Bishop Gardiner, and others, accused him to the privy council of heresy and faction, and after being ignominiously suffered to remain among the footmen for some time, he was called in, and the lords were about to send him to the Tower, when the archbishop confounded them, by producing the king's own ring, which had been given him for that purpose. By Henry's will he was appointed one of the regency, and as Edward VI. was brought up chiefly under the archbishop's care, the reformation in his reign assumed a vigorous and consistent form; the liturgy, homilies, and articles of religion, were framed; in all of which Cranmer had a principal hand. He also published an excellent work, entitled, "The true and Catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ." When Edward, in his last illness, was prevailed on to alter the succession in favour of lady Jane Grey, the archbishop opposed it for a considerable time, and it was not till the judges had given their opinion in favour of its legality, that he subscribed his name, with the other members of the council, to the deed. On the accession of Mary, our prelate had nothing to expect but death. He was condemned first for treason, and pardoned; but another charge was brought against him of heresy; and he was sent to the Tower, from whence, with Ridley and Latimer, he was removed to Oxford, to hold a public disputation. This was a solemn mockery, for the fate of these holy men was already fixed. The archbishop was tried by the pope's commissioners, and of course convicted, after which he was degraded by Bonner and Thirlby with insolent rudeness. He was kept in prison three years, and after the most rigorous measures had been made use of to prevail upon him to abjure his errors, more lenient ones were adopted. These were again changed, and he was removed to a filthy prison, where he suffered such uncommon hardships, that he was induced to sign the instrument of abjuration, on the promise of life. But this was a mere act of treachery, to procure the papists a momentary triumph, which turned to their own confusion and disgrace. The archbishop was brought into St. Mary's church to read his recantation in public, where, after a long sermon preached by Dr. Cole, a noted persecutor of that reign, Cranmer, instead of doing what was required of him, with many tears beseeched God's forgiveness for the apostacy of which he had been guilty, and exhorted the people against the errors of Rome. This greatly enraged his adversaries; who after vilifying him as a hypocrite and heretic, dragged him to the stake, opposite Baliol college, which he approached with a cheerful countenance, and endured the fire with patience and fortitude, holding his hand in to the flame, and often exclaiming, "This unworthy hand!" and raising his eyes to heaven, expired with the dying prayer of the first martyr of the christian church, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," March 21, 1555. He was a man of great learning, deeply read in the canon law, of unimpeachable integrity, and of so meek and generous a temper, that it was a common saying, "Do my lord of Canterbury an ill turn, and he will be your friend ever after."

CRASHAW (Richard), an English poet, was born in London, and educated at Cambridge; but being inveigled to popery he went to Paris, where he was in great distress when Cowley met with him, in 1646, and relieved his necessities. He afterwards became secretary to a cardinal, and a canon of the church at Loretto, where he died about 1650. He wrote several poems, chiefly religious, which were much esteemed, and sometimes imitated by Pope. They were reprinted in 1785.—Bio. Brit.

CRASSUS (Lucius Licinius), a famous Roman orator, was born of a noble family, about B. C. 140. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the impeachment of the consul Papinius Carbo; but his modesty was so great, that he always turned pale and trembled at the commencement of his speeches. Cicero gives him a noble character. He was consul B. C. 95, and lastly censor. He died at the age of 48.—Cicero de oratore. Univ. Hist.

CRASSUS (Marcus Licinius), of the same family with the preceding. He acquired immense riches by dealing in slaves. When Cinna filled Rome with his cruelties, he went to Spain, and from thence to Africa, where he served under Sylla. He was sent against the revolted gladiators, who were headed by Spartacus. In this battle 12,000 of the slaves were killed, and Crassus was honoured with an ovation. He served as consul with Pompey, and entertained the Roman populace at 10,000 tables. He accepted the government of Syria, where he was slain by the Parthians, B. C. 53.—Plutarch.

CRATES, the disciple of Diogenes the cynic. He is said to have sold his estate, the produce of which he gave to the poor, that he might study philosophy without disturbance. Though excessively ugly and filthy, a lady of family, named Hipparchia, fell in love with him, and became his wife. Some of his apophthegms and letters are extant. He flourished B. C. 328.—Stanley's Hist. Phil.

CRATES, an academic philosopher, who flourished 272 B. C. He was greatly esteemed by the Athenians, who sent him on several embassies.—Ibid.

CRATESIPOLIS, queen of Sicyon, who signalized herself by her valour after the death of her husband Alexander. She marched with an army against her revolted subjects, and restored subjection after severely punishing the leaders. This was B. C. 314.—Moreri.

CRATINUS, a poet of Athens, who invented or improved comic poetry. He wrote 21 plays, and was very satirical on public characters. Though intemperate in his life, he attained the age of 97, and died B. C. 431.—Voss. de Poet. Græc.

CRATIPPUS, a peripatetic philosopher, and tutor to the younger Cicero at Athens, where his lectures were attended by the most eminent persons. He wrote some treatises, which are lost.—Bayle.

CRATO, or DE CRATHEIM (John), physician to the emperor Ferdinand I. He was a native of Breslaw, where he died in 1585, aged 66. He wrote some medical works and Latin poems. From his notes was collected the work entitled, Luther's Table Talk; he having been an inmate in the family of that great reformer.—Moreri.

CRAWFORD (David), a Scotch lawyer, and historiographer royal of Scotland. He wrote Memoirs of that kingdom under the four regents; the History of the Stuart Family; a Topographical Description of Renfrew; and a Peerage of Scotland. He died in 1726, aged 61.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CRAWFORD (William), a Scotch divine, born at Kello in 1676, and educated at Edinburgh, after which he became a minister. He died in 1742. His sermons have been printed in 2 vols. 12mo.—Ibid.

CRAYER (Gaspard de), a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1585. He was the disciple of Coxis the Younger, whom he far surpassed. The king of Spain settled upon him a pension; and Rubens held his talents in high esteem. He painted a number of fine pictures for churches, and he was also excellent in portraits. He died in 1669.—D'Argenville.

CREBILLON (Prosper Joliot de), a French dramatic poet, was born at Dijon in 1674. He was placed under a solicitor, but being fond of attending theatrical exhibitions, his master advised him to commence dramatic writer. He did so, and succeeded, ranking, till Voltaire distinguished himself, next to Corneille and Racine. His first popular performance was Atreus, which had a prodigious success: as also had his Electra and Rhadamistus. He died in 1762, having led for several years a secluded life. His works have been published in 12 vols. 4to. His son Claude Prosper Joliot de Crebillon, born in 1707, and died in 1771, was also a man of letters, and wrote several esteemed novels, the principal of which is entitled, Les Egaremens du Cœur et de l'Esprit.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CREDI (Lorenzo di), an Italian painter; born at Florence in 1452, and died in 1530. He had for a fellow-pupil, under Verocchio, the celebrated da Vinci, whose manner he adopted with great success.—Pilkington.

CREECH (Thomas), an English poet, was born at Blandford, in Dorsetshire, in 1659, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. and in 1696 that of B.D. In 1699 he obtained the living of Welwyn in Hertfordshire, but the following year he put an end to himself at Oxford; the cause of which is not exactly known. He translated Lucretius into English verse, 1682; Horace, in 1684; Theocritus, in the same year; and various other authors.—Biog. Brit.

CRELL (Lewis Christian), a German divine, was born at Neustadt in 1671. He studied at Leipzig, where he became rector of the school of St. Nicholas, and professor of philosophy. He died in 1735. He wrote De Civis Innocentis in manus hostium ad nervum traditione;—De Scytala Laconica; De Providentia Dei circa Reges Constituentos, &c.—Moreri.

CRELLIUS (John), a socinian writer, born in Franconia in 1590. He received his education at Nuremberg and at Altdorf, but having embraced notions very different from Lutheranism, he withdrew to Racow in Poland, where he became professor of Greek and wrote a number of books in defence of Socinianism, which make 2 vols. folio. He died in 1693.—Moreri.

CREMONINI (Cæsar), an Italian philosopher and professor at Ferrara and Padua, born at Cento in the Modenese in 1550, and died at Padua in 1630. He wrote some philosophical treatises on the aristotelian system.—Moreri.

CRENIUS (Thomas), a voluminous writer of Brandenburg, who died at Leyden in 1728, aged 89. He wrote chiefly on philosophical subjects.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

CREQUI (Charles de), prince of Foix, and duke of Lesdiguières. He rendered himself remarkable by his exploits in Savoy and against the Spaniards. He was killed at the siege of Bremen in 1638, aged 60.—Moreri.

CREQUI (Francis, marquis of), great grandson of the above, was a man of great courage and activity. He defeated Charles V. duke of Lorraine, in Alsace; took Luxembourg and several other important places. He died in 1687, aged 63.—Ibid.

CRESCIMBENI (John Mario), an Italian poet, born at Macerata in Ancona, 1603. He was the founder of the Arcadian society, of which he was made director. Having entered into orders, he obtained from the pope some ecclesiastical preferments, and died in 1728. He wrote a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. Istoria della Volgare Poesia. 7 vols. 4to. which contains much interesting and curious biographical matter; 2. History of the Academy of Arcadi, with the Lives of its principal members, 7 vols. 4to. His principal work is an History of Italian Poetry, Venice, 1731, 6 vols. 4to.—Moreri. Tirab. lib.

CRESCENS, a cynic philosopher of the second century, wrote some infamous calumnies against the christians, and was answered by Justin, for which Crescens prevailed with the magistrates to put that father to death.—Eusebius Eccl. Hist.

CRESCENTIUS (Peter de), a French advocate, who at the age of 70 retired from his profession for a country life. He wrote a work on Agriculture, entitled Opus Ruralium Commodorum, printed at Louvain in 1474; at Florence 1481, fol. It is also in the Rei Rusticæ Scriptores, by Gesner, in 2 vols. 4to. The author lived in the 14th century.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

CRASPI (Daniel), an Italian painter, born at Bologna in 1592, and died in 1630. His portraits are painted in an admirable style; and there are several church paintings by him which possess uncommon merit.—Pilkington.

CRASPI (Giuseppe Maria), a painter of Bologna, born in 1665, and died in 1747. He accustomed himself to paint in a chamber, so contrived as to admit only a ray of the sun, or the light of a flambeau, to enable him to give a greater roundness and relief to his paintings, by a nice observation of the force of light and shadow.—Id.

CRASST (Hugh Paulin, or Serenus), an English catholic divine, was born at Wakefield in Yorkshire, in 1605, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and became fellow. Afterwards he was chaplain to lord Falkland, whom he attended to Ireland, and obtained the deanry of Leighlin, to which was added a canonry of Windsor. In 1644 he went to Rome, where he publicly renounced the protestant religion. He entered among the benedictines at Douay, on which occasion he changed his christian name to Serenus. At the restoration he returned to England, and became chaplain to the queen of Charles II. He died at East Grinstead in Sussex, in 1674. He wrote several controversial pieces in defence of the Romish faith, one of which was ably answered by the great lord Clarendon. He was also the author of "The Church History of Brittany," folio, 1664. It exhibits great labour and learning, but is full of legendary fables.—Wood. Biog. Brit.

CRASSTI (Domenico), a painter who received the name of Passigiano, from the place of his birth, a village near Florence. He was a disciple of Zuccherro, and painted history and portrait. He died in 1638, aged 80.—Pilkington.

CREVIER (John Baptist Lewis), a French historian, was born at Paris in 1693. He studied under Rollin, whose Roman history he completed; but his principal work is the History of the Roman Emperors to Constantine, 12 vols. 12mo. He was also the author of a History of the University of Paris, 7 vols. 12mo.; French Rhetoric, 2 vols. 12mo.; and he published an edition of Livy. He died in 1765.—Novo. Diss. Hist.

CREW (Nathaniel), an English prelate, was the son of John lord Crew, and born at the family seat in Northamptonshire, in 1633. He received his education at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and complied with the presbyterian party; but at the restoration he took orders in the established church, and in 1669 was made dean of Chichester. In 1671 he was advanced to the bishopric of Oxford, from whence in 1674 he was translated to Durham, for which preferment he was indebted to James duke of York, all of whose measures, after his accession to the throne, he supported, and was one of the commissioners appointed in the ecclesiastical commission in 1686, in which capacity he was guilty of many arbitrary and scandalous actions. But when the bishop saw that his master's ruin was approaching, he began to alter his conduct, and in the convention parliament was one of those who voted that James had abdicated the throne. Notwithstanding these acts of meanness he was excepted by name out of the pardon granted by William and Mary. On this he absconded for some time; at last he obtained his pardon, and was suffered to retain his dignity. In 1691 he succeeded to the family title by the death of his brother. He died in 1721. With all his faults he was liberal and munificent, and bestowed considerable sums in works of charity.—Wood. Biog. Br.

CRICHTON (James), a celebrated Scotchman, of whom so many wonderful things are related as to have procured him the name of "the admirable Crichton." He was born about 1550, in the county of Perth, of a good family, and educated at St. Andrews, where he made a rapid progress in the languages and sciences. At the age of twenty he visited Paris, where he acquired uncommon reputation as a disputant, and for his skill and activity in games of all sorts, as well as martial exercises. He next went to Rome, and displayed his talents in the presence of the pope and cardinals. From thence he travelled to Venice, where he became intimate with the learned Aldus Manutius, who dedicated to him the paradoxes of Cicero, in a strain of high-flown panegyric, which borders on the ridiculous. At Padua he held disputations with the most learned professors, on a number of subjects, but particularly on the aristotelian philosophy. We next find him at Mantua, where he is reported to have slain a famous fencing-master in a duel, who had never been foiled before. The duke of Mantua was so pleased with Crichton as to appoint him tutor to his son, who was a very licentious young man. This appointment, however, proved fatal to him; for one night, as he was walking through the streets in carnival time, he was attacked by six assassins, and after a gallant defence lost his life. It is said that the person who gave him the fatal stroke was the prince, his pupil. This event is placed in the year 1583. Four of his latin poems are extant, but so very wretched as to stamp the marvellous character of him, given by some biographers, with the charge of imposture.—Biog. Br.

CRILLON (Lewis de Berthon de), &c.

brated French general, and knight of Malta, was born in 1541. He was present at several battles, particularly that of Lepanto, where he was wounded. Henry IV. called him the brave Crillon, and doubtless he deserved the appellation. His generosity was also equal to his courage. He died in 1615.—Moreri.

CRILLON-MAHON (N. duke de), a celebrated general, who distinguished himself in the seven years' war, and afterwards quitted the French service for that of Spain, where he was made a grandee of the first rank. He was general in chief of the Spanish armies in 1780, and commanded at the famous siege of Gibraltar, where after all his formidable exertions and skill, he was defeated by the superior talents of general Elliot. In 1782 he took Minorca, and from thence assumed the surname of Mahon, the name of the capital of that island. He died at Madrid in 1796, aged 80.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

CRJNESIUS (Christopher), a Bohemian divine, born in 1584, and died in 1626. He wrote on the Confusion of Tongues; Exercitationes Hebraicæ; Gymnasium, & Lexicon Syriacum; Lingua Samaritica, &c.—Ibid.

CRINITUS (Peter), professor of the belles-lettres at Florence, was born in 1465. He was a learned man, but very profligate, and died in 1505. He wrote the Lives of the Latin Poets, and a piece entitled De Honestâ Disciplina.—Moreri.

CRISP (Tobias), an English divine, was born in London in 1600, and educated first at Eton, and next at Cambridge, from whence, after taking the degree of B. A. he removed to Balliol college, Oxford, where he proceeded to his degree of D.D. In 1627 he obtained the rectory of Brinkworth in Wiltshire. On the breaking out of the rebellion he went to London, where he died in 1649. The name of this divine is famous, by his being the leader of a sect of antinomians, who adhere to the dangerous tenet laid down by him in his sermons, entitled Christ alone exalted, that the work of salvation was completed for the elect upon the cross, and that they have nothing therefore to do but simply to believe. These sermons have often been printed, and occasioned frequent controversies.—Wood's A. O.

CRISPUS (John Baptist), an Italian divine, who died in the kingdom of Naples in 1595. He wrote the Life of Sannazarus, and De Ethicis Philosophis cautè legendis, folio, 1594.—Moreri CRITIUS, one of the thirty tyrants of Athens. He was an eloquent and spirited man, but insidious and cruel. He had been the disciple of Socrates, whom, however, he persecuted and prohibited from teaching. He was slain in battle 400 B. C.—Ibid.

CRITO, one of the disciples of Socrates, who was with that great man at his death, and composed Dialogues, which are now lost.—Diog. Laert. Xenophon.

CRITOBULUS, an ancient physician, who drew an arrow so dextrously out of the eye of Philip of Macedon, that the wound could not be perceived.—Pliny Nat. Hist.

CRITOLAUS, a Greek historian, who wrote a treatise on the Epirots, mentioned by Plutarch; also one on astronomy.—Mor.

CRITOLAUS, a citizen of Tegea, in Arcadia, who with his two brothers fought against an equal number of Pheneans, to put an end to the war between the two nations. His brothers were slain, and yet he vanquished his antagonists. On his return from the combat, he was met by his sister, who lamented the death of one of the persons whom he had slain, as he was her lover. This provoked Critolaus, and he killed her: for this offence he was pardoned. He afterwards became general of the Achæans, but being defeated by the Romans, he poisoned himself, 146 B. C.—Plutarch. Livy.

CROSE (Gerard), a Dutch divine, who wrote the History of the Quakers, and other works. He died in 1710, aged 68.—Moreri.

CRJESUS, the last king of Lydia, and the first who brought the Greeks into subjection to the Lydians. He was a great patron of learned men, and entertained Æsop the fabulist. He amassed prodigious wealth, and thereby rendered his name proverbial. Cyrus, king of Persia, defeated him, B. C. 548, and commanded him to be burnt alive. When on the pile, the unfortunate monarch thrice repeated the name of Solon, on which Cyrus had the curiosity to ask him the meaning. He told the conqueror, that Solon had maintained that poverty was a happier state than riches, and that he found now his words were true. Cyrus was so touched, that he gave him his life, and made him his friend.—Plutarch. Herodotus.

CROFT (Herbert), an English bishop, born in Oxfordshire of a good family in 1603. His father turned papist, and took his son with him to St. Omers, where he placed him in the English college of jesuits. A little before his father's death he was sent to England, to settle some affairs, where he became acquainted with Dr. Morton, bishop of Durham, who brought him back to the protestant communion. He then went to Oxford, and was admitted of Christchurch. On entering into orders, he obtained a living in Gloucestershire, and in 1639 he was presented to a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury. In 1644 he was made dean of Hereford; but the troubles coming on he suffered much for his loyalty. At the restoration he was made bishop of Hereford; and in 1667 dean of the chapel royal, which place he soon after resigned, and retired to his diocese. In 1675 he printed, but without his name, a tract entitled Naked Truth pleading for Toleration of Protestant Dissenters; which was answered by several writers. In 1685 he wrote Animadversions on Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth. He died at Hereford in 1691, and was buried in the cathedral. Besides the above pieces he printed some sermons and religious tracts. His son Herbert was created a baronet in 1671, and died in 1710.—Biog. Br.

CROFT (William), an English musician, was born at Nether-Eaton in Warwickshire, in 1677, and educated under Dr. Blow, whom he succeeded as master of the children, composer to the chapel royal, and organist of Westminster abbey. In 1712 he published his Divine Harmony; and in 1715 was created Dr. in music by the university of Oxford. In 1724 appeared his Musica Sacra, in 2 vols. He died in 1727, and was buried in Westminster abbey.—Bacon. Hawkins.

CROMWELL (Zachary), a nonconformist divine, born in Ireland, and educated at Dublin. At the time of the Irish rebellion he removed to England, and obtained the living of Wrenbury in Cheshire, of which he was afterwards deprived for refusing to subscribe the engagement. He then went to London and had the living of St. Botolph, Aldgate, from whence he was ejected by the act of conformity. After the restoration he was so imprudent as to write in defence of the solemn league and covenant, for which he was sent to the Tower, but recovered his liberty by petitioning the king. In 1667 he set up a school in Aldgate, and died about 1672. He printed several controversial pieces.—Calamy.

CROUS, or DE CROI (John), a learned French protestant, was born at Uzez, where he became a minister, and died in 1659. He wrote, Specimen Conjecturarum & Observationum in quodam Origenis, Irenæi & Tertulliani loca, 1632; Observationes sacre & historice in Novum Testamentum, 1644; and other works.—Boyle.

CROIX DU MAINE (Francis Grudé de la), a French writer, who published, in 1583, the French Library, or an Account of all the Authors in that language. He was assassinated at Tours, in 1592.—Moreri.

CROIX (Francis Petit de la), a learned Frenchman, who prepared for the press Thevenot's Voyages to the East Indies. He also wrote a Catalogue of the Turkish and Persian books in the king's library, and two Dictionaries of the French and Turkish languages. He died in 1713.—Novv. Dia. Hist.

CROKE (sir George), an English judge, was born at Chilton, in Buckinghamshire about 1561, and educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and in due course was called to the bar. He rose to the rank of chief justice of the king's bench, and died at his seat in Oxfordshire in 1641. His reports were published by his son-in law, sir Harbottle Grimston, in 3 vols. folio.—Wood. Granger.

CROMPTON (William), a nonconformist divine, born at Barnstaple, in Devonshire, and educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. He obtained the living of Columpton in his native county, from whence he was ejected in 1662 for nonconformity, but continued to preach till his death in 1696. He wrote, a Remedy against Superstition, and other pieces.—Calamy.

CROMWELL (Thomas), earl of Essex, was the son of a blacksmith at Putney, in Surrey, and born about 1490. Early in life he became clerk to the English factory at Antwerp, which situation he soon left, and went into several countries as the secret agent of his sovereign. On his return to England, he was taken into the service of cardinal Wolsey, who obtained him a seat in the house of commons, where he defended his master with great spirit. On the fall of the cardinal, the king took Cromwell into his own service, and gave him several valuable and important places. He was very instrumental in the dissolution of the monasteries, and greatly promoted the reformation. For these services he obtained the title of earl of Essex, with many manors and estates, chiefly the spoils of the church. At length his affairs took an adverse turn. He had the imprudence to advise the marriage of the king with Anne of Cleves, which not proving agreeable to the tyrant, he wreaked his vengeance on the adviser of the marriage, and caused him to be tried for high treason and heresy. To be so accused was certain death; and he accordingly suffered decapitation on Tower-hill, in 1540. He was a man of a grateful and liberal mind, and promoted more men of merit while he was in power than any of his predecessors. He left a son who was created lord Cromwell, which title continued in the family many years.—Biog. Br.

CROMWELL (Oliver), a character of considerable note in the English history, was born of a good family at Huntingdon, in 1599, and educated first at the grammar school in that town, and then at Sidney college, Cambridge, where his conduct was very dissipated. From the university he removed to Lincoln's-inn, where he addicted himself to gaming and pleasure. At the age of 21 he married Elizabeth, daughter of sir James Bouchier of Essex, and about the same time turned puritan. That this change was merely hypocritical appears from an attempt of his to get into his hands the estate of his maternal uncle sir Thomas Stuart, by soliciting a commission of lunacy against him. The project, however, failed; and though sir Thomas was justly provoked at such infamous conduct, he left his nephew, at his death, an estate of about 600*l.* a year. In 1625 he was elected into parliament, and again in that which met in 1628, where he distinguished himself by his zeal against the bishops. When that parliament was dissolved, he retired into the country, and took a farm, which did not answer. His circumstances becoming indifferent, he resolved to go to New England, from the execution of which he was prevented by a proclamation restraining those migrations. Afterwards he removed to Ely, where he acquired a great reputation by his gifts in prayer and preaching. In 1640 he was returned to parliament for the borough of Cambridge by the puritan interest. In the house he was a frequent speaker, vulgar, and vehement, always opposing the court, and attacking the church. He was in a great measure the cause of the war, as he was continually by his plots and contrivances urging matters on to that extremity. In 1642, when parliament determined upon hostilities, Cromwell went to Cambridge, where he raised a troop of horse, and behaved with great inhumanity to the loyal members of the university. He soon acquired the rank of colonel, and a great reputation for military skill and valour. His men were well disciplined, and animated with a strong portion of religious fanaticism, which their commander encouraged and directed in such a manner that they acquired at the battle of Marston Moor, in 1644, the name of Ironsides. At the second battle of Newbury, Cromwell's behaviour was so distinguished as to obtain for him, from his party, the title of favourite of the nation. This party consisted of the independents, who had gained so great an influence in parliament as to pass the famous self-denying ordinance, by which all members of either house were excluded from commands in the army, with the particular exception of Cromwell, who, by this masterpiece of policy, acquired an ascendancy over the army, and thus paved the way for his future advancement. He was now constituted lieutenant-general, and it was by his management the battle of Naseby was gained in June 1645, which decided the fate of the royalists. This victory was followed by a series of successes, for which he was voted a pension of 2500*l.* per annum, and the thanks of the house. When the king was betrayed by the Scotch to the parliament, Cromwell determined to get him into his own power. This he effected by means of cornet Joyce in 1647. The same year he purged the house of commons, that is, he turned out those members who he thought were not likely to be gained over to his purpose. The share he had in the murder of the king is too plain to need detail. He acted in it, however, with his wonted hypocrisy, but was present at the trial, and signed the warrant of execution. Soon after this a mutiny broke out in the army, which threatened dangerous consequences; but Cromwell, by seizing and punishing the ringleaders, put an end to it. In 1649 he went to Ireland, which he subdued completely, and, leaving Ireton as his deputy, returned to England in 1650; but his cruelties are regarded with horror and detestation in that kingdom to this day. He was now appointed commander-in-chief against the Scots, who had armed to restore Charles II. September 3, 1650, he gained the battle of Dunbar; and that day twelvemonth he defeated the king at Worcester. From this time he kept his eye on the sovereign power. He began this favourite project by moulding the army to his will; and having a party subservient to his wishes, he struck a bold stroke by dismissing the parliament, and locking the door of the house. He then dissolved the council of state; after which, he called a council, composed of his officers. He next convened a mock representation of the nation, consisting of 142 persons, called, from one of the members, Barbon's parliament. This assemblage being a motley crew of ignorant fanatics, and the creatures of Cromwell, agreed to resign their authority; on which the council of officers again assembled, and drew up an instrument declaring the general to be protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; accordingly, Dec. 16, 1653, he was invested with this dignity in the court of chancery. The following year he called a parliament, but finding that instead of supporting him, the members began with questioning his authority, he placed a guard at their door, and then made each member as he entered take an oath of allegiance to him. This parliament still continuing refractory, he dissolved them after sitting five months. A war broke out between England and Spain in 1655, in which Jamaica was taken, and Blake gained several splendid victories, and caused the English flag to be respected in the Mediterranean. One consequence was an alliance between the protector and France, and the delivery of Dunkirk to England, after its being taken by the united forces of the two countries. In 1656 he called another parliament, which gratified the protector by confirming his title and sanctioning his proceedings. He wanted now to have the title of king, but this was rejected by his most zealous friends; and finding the object unattainable, he abandoned it. However, he had the privilege granted him to make a sort of lords; and the title of protector being solemnly recognized, he was inaugurated with all the pomp of a coronation in Westminster hall. In 1658 he convened the two houses, and addressed them in the language usual for the kings of England; but none of the hereditary nobles would attend his mock parliament. Finding that he could not form any thing like a regular establishment, he dissolved the assembly. In August of that year his favourite daughter, Mrs. Claypole, died, bitterly reproaching him for his conduct, which, with the publication of a pamphlet, at this time, by colonel Titus, entitled Killing no Murder, intended to prove the assassination of the tyrant a duty, produced a slow fever, of which he died September 3, 1658. His corpse was interred in Henry VIth's chapel, from whence at the restoration it was taken and exposed on, and afterwards buried under, the gallows at Tyburn. He had six children, viz. Richard, Henry, Bridget, Elizabeth, Mary, and Frances. Richard succeeded him in the protectorate, but when affairs turned, and he found his post no longer tenable, he resigned and went abroad. He died at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in 1712. Henry went to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and bore a good character. He died in 1674. Bridget married first Ireton, and afterwards Fleetwood. Elizabeth, his favourite daughter, married John Claypole, esq. of Northamptonshire. Mary was married to lord Fauconberg, and is supposed to have assisted in the restoration of Charles II. She died in 1712. Frances married first a grandson of the earl of Warwick, and secondly sir John Russell of Cambridgeshire. Elizabeth, the wife of Cromwell, was a woman of strong mind, and a constant spur to her husband in the career of his ambition. She also governed her household with great address. She died in 1672.—Biog. Brit. Noble's Memoirs of the House of Cromwell.

CRONECK (John Frederic baron de), a German poet, born at Anspach in 1731, and died in 1758. His works were printed at Leipzig in 1763.—Gen. Biog. Diet.

CRONSTEDT (Axel Frederick), a Swedish mineralogist, was born in Sudermania in 1722, and educated at the university of Upsal, where he principally studied natural history. In 1742 he entered into the college of Mines, and in 1744 was employed to inspect the mines of Sweden. In 1753 he was admitted a member of the royal academy of sciences at Stockholm, and in 1758, was appointed inspector of all the western mines of the kingdom. He died in 1765. He published an attempt towards an arrangement of minerals, or of the different substances of the mineral kingdom, and other works on that subject.—Gen. Biog.

CROSBY (Brass), lord-mayor of London, was born at Stockton upon-Tees in 1725, and bred to the law, which profession he practised in London with success. In 1758 he became a common-council-man. In 1764 he served the office of sheriff, and the year following was elected alderman. In 1770 he was chosen mayor, in which office he distinguished himself by his opposition to the court in the affair of Wheble and other printers, for which he was sent to the Tower. After his release he was complimented by the corporation with a vote of thanks, and a cup of 100l. value. He died in 1793.—Gen. Biog. Diet.

CROSS (Michael), an English painter, who is said to have been sent by Charles I. to copy several pieces in Italy, and that having obtained leave from the doge of Venice to copy Raphael's madonna in St. Mark's church, he left his own piece behind him, and carried off the original, which was bought when the king's furniture was sold by the Spanish ambassador, and is now in the Escurial. Lewis Cross was also a good copyist, and died in 1724.—Walpol's Anecdotes of Painters.

CROUSAZ (John Peter de), a Swiss philosopher and divine, was born at Lausanne in 1663. He received an excellent education in his own country, and then went on his travels. In 1706 he became rector of the academy of Lausanne; and was afterwards appointed tutor to prince Frederic of Hesse Cassel. He died in 1748. He wrote a treatise on logic; another on education; a Commentary on Pope's Essay on Man; and several pieces on philosophy, and mathematics.—Novæ. Diet. Hist.

CROWNE (John), an American poet, was born in Nova Scotia, and came to England in the reign of Charles II. He wrote several comedies, particularly Sir Courtly Nice, the plot of which was dictated to him by that monarch; but just as the piece was ready for performance, the king died, and Crowne was ruined. His death happened at the beginning of the 18th century.—Biog. Dramat.

CROXALL (Samuel), an English divine, born at Walton-upon-Thames, in Surrey, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. While at the university he wrote the Fair Circassian, a poem, which is a licentious imitation of Solomon's Song. On entering into orders he obtained the living of Hampton, in Middlesex, several preferments in Hereford cathedral, and the united livings of St. Mary Somerset and St. Mary Mountfaw, London. He died in 1752. Dr. Croxall was a strenuous whig, and wrote a book called Scripture Politics. He also translated Æsop's Fables, and wrote some poems.—Biog. Brit.

CROZE (Mathurin Veyssiere la), a French benedictine, which order he renounced, and became a protestant in 1696. The king of Prussia made him his librarian, and professor of philosophy at Berlin, where he died in 1739, aged 78. He wrote an Armenian Dictionary, and several other learned works.—Novæ. Diet. Hist.

CRUCIER (Gaspard), a protestant divine of Leipzig, who died in 1548 at Wirtemberg, aged 45. He wrote commentaries on several books of the Scripture.—Moreri.

CRUDEN (Alexander), an industrious compiler, was educated at Aberdeen, where he obtained the degree of M. A. In 1738 he came to London, and settled as a bookseller. In 1737 he published his Concordance to the Bible, a book of great merit. Cruden was a very pious man, but at times deranged in his mind. He died in the act of prayer, in 1774, aged 70.—Biog. Brit.

CRUSIUS, or KRAUS (Martin), a learned German, born in the diocese of Bamberg in 1526; chosen professor of belles-lettres at Tübingen, and died at Estingen in 1607. He wrote, 1. Turco Græcia libri octo, Basil, 1584; 2. Annales Suevici ab initio rerum ad annum, 1549; 3. Germano Græcia libri vi., 1585.—Moreri.

CRUZ (Juana Inez de la), an ingenious lady, was born in Mexico in 1651. She displayed, when very young, an uncommon taste for learning, and studied, with avidity, philosophy, mathematics, history, and poetry. She was also remarkably modest and devout, and died at the age of 44, in the convent of St. Geronimo, where she had lived twenty-seven years. Her poetic compositions are highly spoken of by the Spanish critic, father Feyjoo.—Sketches on the Genius of Women.

CRYOPYLLUS (Metrophanes), a Greek, who came to England, and was entered of Balliol college, Oxford, where he studied divinity and the Latin and English languages. About the year 1622 he returned to his own country, and became chancellor to the patriarch of Constantinople. On the translation of Cyril Lucar he was made patriarch of Alexandria, and is supposed to have written The Confession of Faith, which went under Cyril's name, published in Greek, in 1629. He was living in 1640.—Wood.

CTESIAS, a Greek physician, who accompanied Cyrus, the son of Darius, in his expedition against Artaxerxes, by whom he was taken prisoner, and who treated him with great respect. He wrote the History of Persia, and the History of the Indies, of which we have only an abridgment remaining, by Photius.—Vossii Hist. Græc.

CTESIBIUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished 135 B. C. He invented the pump, and a clepsydra, or water-clock. He is not to be confounded with Ctesibius of Chalcis, a cynic philosopher.—Vossius de Mathem.

CTESIPHON, an Athenian, who proposed that a golden crown should be given to Demosthenes for his public conduct. This was opposed by Æschines, who charged Ctesiphon with seditious motives. Demosthenes vindicated his friend, and Æschines was banished. There was an architect of the same name, who drew the plan of Diana's temple at Ephesus.—Moreri.

CUDWORTH (Ralph), a learned divine, was born at Aller in Somersetshire, in 1617, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. About 1641 he obtained the rectory of North Cadbury, in his native county, and in 1642 appeared his Discourse on the Lord's Supper. Two years afterwards he was appointed master of Clare hall, Cambridge, to which was added the Hebrew professorship. In 1651 he took the degree of D. D. and in 1654 was chosen master of Christ's college. At the restoration he was presented to the vicarage of Ashwell in Hertfordshire; and in 1678 he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Gloucester. The same year came out his famous book entitled The true Intellectual System of the Universe, in which he has completely overthrown atheism. He died at Cambridge in 1688. In 1731 bishop Chandler published Dr. Cudworth's treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality; and in 1743 appeared a complete edition of his Intellectual System, with some additional pieces, edited by Dr. Birch. His daughter married sir Francis Masham, and died in 1708.—Biog. Brit.

CUERENKERT (Theodore van), a Dutch engraver of great merit. He fell into some strange notions concerning religion, and maintained it unlawful to attend public worship, for which he was sent to prison, and at length banished from Haerlem. He died at Tergout in 1590, aged 68.—Gen. Biog. Diët.

CURVA (Alphonfus de la), commonly called Bedmar, ambassador of Philip III. of Spain, to the state of Venice. In 1618 a conspiracy was discovered to seize on that city for the Spaniards, and Bedmar being suspected of it, was forced to quit Venice secretly, for fear of being torn in pieces by the populace. He next became president of the council in Flanders, and obtained a cardinalship. He died at Rome in 1665.—Moreri.

CUFF (Henry), an unfortunate English gentleman, was born in Somersetshire in 1560, and educated at Oxford, where he was chosen fellow of Merton college. Afterwards he obtained the Greek professorship, and served the office of proctor. He quitted the university, and became secretary to Robert earl of Essex; and when his patron was condemned, Cuff was apprehended and executed at Tyburn, in 1601. He wrote a book entitled the Differences of the Ages of Man's Life, together with the Original Causes, Progress, and End thereof, 1607, 8vo.—Wood.

CUJACIUS, or CUJAS (James), a French lawyer, born at Toulouse in 1520. He became professor at Bourges, where his lectures were attended by students from all parts. He was called the father of his scholars, because he treated them with the greatest kindness and familiarity. He died at Bourges in 1590. His works were printed at Paris in 1659, in 10 vols. folio.—Moreri.

CULLEN (William), an eminent physician, was born in the county of Lanerk in Scotland in 1713, and served his apprenticeship to a surgeon at Glasgow. On the expiration of his time he went as a surgeon in a merchant-ship to the West Indies, and on his return to his own country he established himself in business, and had Dr. William Hunter for a partner. In 1740 he took his degree of M. D. and in 1746 he was chosen lecturer in chemistry at Glasgow. In 1751 he was appointed king's professor of medicine in the same university. In 1756 he was elected professor of chemistry at Edinburgh, where, in 1766, he was chosen to the medical chair, in which he raised the reputation of that university to an unequalled height in physical science. He died in 1790. His First Lines of Physic, 4 vols. 8vo. are too well known to need praise in this place; besides which, he was the author of Synopsis Nosologiae Methodicae, 2 vols. 8vo., a class book for medical students; Lectures on Materia Medica, 2 vols. 4to.; and a pamphlet on the recovery of persons drowned and seemingly dead, 8vo.—Encyclop. Brit.

CULLUM (John), an English baronet and divine, was born in 1733, and educated at Catharine hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and was chosen fellow. In 1774 he was instituted to the living of Great Thurlow in Suffolk. He died in 1785. He was the author of the History and Antiquities of Hawsted in Suffolk.—Gent. Mag.

CULMER (Richard), a fanatical divine, was of Magdalen college, Cambridge, where he proceeded to the degree of M. A. after which he became minister of Goodneston in Kent, from whence he was ejected for refusing to read the Book of Sports. He afterwards was a lecturer at Canterbury, and on the breaking out of the rebellion, was appointed by the parliament to purge the churches of idolatrous images and pictures, which commission he discharged with all the fury of a zealot. He broke in pieces the fine painted window in Canterbury cathedral, of which proceedings he published an account. For these services he obtained the sequestered living of Minster in Kent, of which he was deprived in 1660. When he died does not appear. He was a quarrelsome fellow, and much given to fighting, on which account the country people called him blue skin. Dick.—Calamy. Grey's Answer to Neale.

CULPEPPER (Nicholas), an English astrologer and herbalist, was the son of a clergyman, and bred an apothecary; after which he settled in Spitalfields, where he practised physic and astrology with great success. He died in 1654. He wrote several books, the most celebrated of which is a Herbal, wherein he describes the good and bad qualities of plants according to the fœderal influences.—Granger.

CUMBERLAND (Richard), a learned English prelate, was born in London in 1632, and educated at St. Paul's school, from whence he was removed to Magdalen college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered into orders. In 1658 he obtained the rectory of Brampton in Northamptonshire, and in 1667 was presented to the living of All-hallows, Stamford. In 1672 he published a work entitled De Legibus Naturæ Disquisitio Philosophica, &c. of which two translations have appeared in English. In 1680 he took his degree of D. D. In 1686 appeared his essay on Jewish Weights and Measures. In 1691 he was made bishop of Peterborough. He discharged the duties of the episcopal function in the most exemplary manner; and when he was desirous to relax a little from his labours, on account of his infirmities, he made this reply, "it is better to wear out than to rust out." He died in 1718, and lies buried in the cathedral of Peterborough. After his death were published two books by him, one entitled Sanctionation's Pronunciation History, translated from the first book of Eusebius de Preparatione Evangelica, &c. and the other, Origines gentium antiquissimæ, or Attempts for discovering the Times of the first Planting of Nations.—Diet. Brit.

CUMBERLAND (William duke of), second son of George II. was born in 1721. He was with his father at the battle of Dettingen, where he was wounded in the leg. When young, some officers, as he passed, said, "What a charming boy!" The young hero, thinking they said a German boy, exclaimed, "I am not a German but an English boy; and I desire, gentlemen, that you will never call me so any more." He commanded the British army at the battle of Fontenoy, where he would have gained a victory if the Dutch troops had behaved as they ought to have done. He put an end to the rebellion in 1746, by defeating the pretender at Culloden, for which he received the thanks of both houses. The year following he lost the battle of Val, owing to the treachery of the Dutch. He died in the year 1765.—Annual Register.

CUMBERLAND (Henry Frederick duke of), the son of Frederick prince of Wales, was born in 1745, and created duke in 1766. In 1771 he married the hon. Anne Horton, widow of Mr. Horton, and daughter of the earl of Carhampton. He became grand master of free masons, and died in 1790.—Eur. Mag. Gent. Mag.

CUMING (William), a learned physician, born at Edinburgh in 1714. On taking his degree, he removed to London, and from thence went to Dorchester, where he continued to his death in 1788. Dr. Cuming was a man of learning and integrity, and assisted Hutchins in compiling the History of Dorsetshire.—Gent. Mag.

CUNÆUS (Peter), professor of law in the university of Leyden, was born at Flushing, in 1586, and died in 1638. He wrote, 1. De Republica Hebræorum; 2. Satyræ Menippææ in sui Seculi homines inepte eruditus; S. Remarks on Nominus's Dionysia.—Moreri.

CUNINGHAM (William), an English physician. In 1559 he resided at Norwich, but in 1563 he read lectures in Surgeons' hall, London. He was a man of eminence in his profession, and also ingenious in engraving upon copper.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CUNITIA (Maria), an extraordinary female of the 17th century, was born in Silesia, and attained to a great eminence in astronomy. In 1650 she published astronomical tables under the title of Urania Propitia. She was also well acquainted with the learned languages, and several of the modern. She married a Dr. Lewen, and died in 1664.—Martin's Biog. Philosophica.

CUNNINGHAM (Alexander), a Scotch writer, was born at Ettrick near Selkirk, in 1654, and educated in Holland, from whence he came to England with the prince of Orange. He became travelling tutor to several noblemen and gentlemen; by which means he obtained the appointment of resident, envoy at Venice, where he continued five years. He died in London in 1737. In 1787 appeared his History of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the Accession of George I. two vols. translated from the Latin MS. by Dr. William Thompson. There was one Alexander Cunningham who published an edition of Horace at the Hague, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1721, which is held in great esteem. It is not quite certain whether he be the same person with the preceding or not. All the particulars in the character of the one comport with those of the other.—Biog. Br.

CUNNINGHAM (John), an Irish poet, was born in Dublin, and became a strolling player. He died at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1773, aged 42. He wrote a farce called Love in a Mist, from which Garrick made his Lying Valet.—Biog. Dram.

CUPER (Gisbert), a learned burgomaster of Davenport, and professor of history, who wrote a History of the three Gordians; Apotheosis of Homer, and other works. He died in 1716, aged 72.—Moreri.

CURZUS (Joachim), a German physician, born in Silesia. He visited most parts of Europe, and on his return to his own country practised physic with reputation. He died in 1573, aged 41. He wrote in Latin the Annals of Silesia and Breslaw, in folio.—Melch. Adami Vit. Med.

CURCELLANUS (Stephen), a learned divine of Geneva, born in 1586, and died at Amsterdam in 1658. Being an Arminian, he succeeded Episcopius in the divinity professorship. He published an edition of the New Testament in Greek, with various readings from ancient MSS. He also wrote several theological pieces.—Moreri.

CURIO, a Roman orator, who called Cæsar, in the senate, "the man of all the women, and the woman of all the men." His son Caius Scribonius CURIO was tribune of Rome, and likewise an eminent orator. He courted the favour of the people by public shows. He was the intimate friend of Cæsar, whom he defended against the senate. Being sent to command in Africa, he defeated Varus, but afterwards fell in an ambuscade, B. C. 48.—Plutarch. Moreri.

CURIO (Cælius Secundus), a learned man of the 16th century, was born at San Chirico in Piedmont, and having embraced lutheranism, underwent considerable persecution on that account. He escaped from the inquisition at Turin, and settled at Basle, where he died in 1569, aged 67. He wrote, de Amplitudine Beati regni Dei, 1550, 8vo, and other works.—Moreri.

CURRUS DENTATUS MARCUS ANNIUS, a Roman consul famous for his fortitude and frugality. He gained several important victories, and defeated Pyrrhus. The Samnites sent ambassadors to tempt him into their service. When they came to his cottage they found him boiling some vegetables for his dinner, yet he refused all their offers, chusing poverty and honesty rather than wealth and infamy. He lived 272 B. C.—Livy. Plutarch.

CURL (Edmund), a noted bookseller, rendered memorable by Mr. Pope. He kept a shop in the purlieu of Covent garden, and had his ears cut off in the pillory for publishing some obscene books. He died in 1748.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

CURPALATE (John), a Greek author, who was a domestic in the imperial palace. He wrote a History of the Empire from 813 to 1081, which has been pillaged by Cedrenus, Syncellus, and Theophanes, without acknowledgement.—Moreri.

CURRADI (Francesco), an historical and portrait painter of Italy, born in 1570, and died in 1660. He had a delightful manner, great correctness of design, and a complete knowledge of the chiaro-obscuro.—Pilk.

CURSON, or CORAZONE (Robert), a cardinal, was an Englishman by birth, and studied at Oxford and Paris, of which last university he became chancellor. Innocent III. created him a cardinal in 1212. He was very zealous in promoting the crusades, and died at Damietta in 1218. He wrote a book, now lost, on the question, Whether Origen be saved or not?—Moreri.

CURTIUS (M.), a famous Roman, who is said to have sacrificed his life for his country, B. C. 362. The ground in the forum being opened, as it is to be supposed, by an earthquake, the oracle declared that the Roman state would be immortal if that was thrown into the gulph in which the Roman strength consisted. While the people were consulting on this mysterious response, Curtius, completely armed, mounted his horse and leaped into the chasm, which immediately closed upon him.—Livy.

CURTIUS (Quintus Rufus), a Latin historian, who wrote the History of Alexander the Great, in ten books, of which the two first are lost. His age is very uncertain; some authors placing him under Vespasian, and others under Trajan. His style is excellent, and he writes with impartiality. Freinhemius has supplied the two books that were wanting, in an admirable manner.—Vossius Hist. Lat.

CUSA (Nicholas de), a Roman cardinal. He rose from a mean condition by his merit. Nicholas V. made him a cardinal in 1448, and in 1451 he was sent legate into Germany, to preach up a crusade against the Turks. He died at Todi in Umbria, in 1464, aged 63. His works were printed at Basil in 1565, in 8 vols. folio.—Moreri.

CUSPINIAN (John), a German physician, who was employed by the emperor Maximilian I. in several important negotiations. He died at Vienna in 1529, aged 56. He wrote a History of the Roman emperors from Julius Cæsar to the death of Maximilian I. and other able works.—Ibid.

CUTHBERT (St.), an English saint. He was born in the north, and brought up under the Scottish monks at Icolmkill, after which he went to Lindisfarne, or Holy-island, near Berwick, from whence he removed to the court of Egfrid king of Northumberland, whom he baptised; and was made bishop of that district. However, he soon returned to Lindisfarne, where he founded a monastery, and died in 686.—Bede Vit. St. Cuthberti.

CUTTS (John Lord), an English general, was born at Matching in Essex, and entered early into the army under the duke of Monmouth. He afterwards went into the service of the duke of Lorraine in Hungary, and was at the taking of Buda. He returned to England soon after the restoration, and was created an Irish peer. On the accession of queen Anne he was made lieutenant-general of the forces in Holland. In 1705 he served in Ireland, but soon after he was deprived of his military command, which broke his heart, and he died in 1707. His lordship had also a genius for poetry, and wrote Poetical Exercises, printed in 1687.—Granger. Gen. Biog. Diß.

CYAXARES I. king of the Medes, succeeded his father Phraortes, 635 B. C. He became very powerful, and subdued all Asia beyond the river Halys. He died B. C. 585.—Herodotus.

CYAXARES II. is supposed to have been Darius, the Mede, and died B. C. 536.—Xenophon.

CYNÆIRAS, an Athenian soldier, who distinguished himself at the battle of Marathon by an act of madness, which some may call courage. He followed the fugitive Persians to their ships, and seized one of their vessels with his right hand, which was instantly cut off; he then seized her with his left hand, which was also severed in two. He lastly laid hold of the vessel with his teeth, on which a Persian soldier cut off his head. He was brother to Æschylus the poet.—Justin. Valerius Maximus.

CYNEAS, an eminent philosopher and orator of Thessaly. He was the disciple of Demosthenes, and minister of Pyrrhus. Extraordinary things are told of his memory, and it is said that the day after his arrival at Rome as ambassador from Pyrrhus, he saluted all the senators and knights by their names. He abridged the book of Æneias on the Defence of Places, which was published by Casaubon in his edition of Polybius.—Plutarch. Moreri.

CYPRIAN (Thascius Cæcilius), a learned father of the church, was born at Carthage, and embraced christianity in 246, on which he wrote his book, de Gratia Dei, addressed to Donatus. The bishop of Carthage conferred on him the order of priesthood, and when that prelate died he was chosen to succeed him: soon after which, the Decian persecution commenced, and Cyprian, to avoid its fury, fled, on which his property was confiscated. He was not inactive in his concealment, but wrote a great number of pastoral letters to his clergy, full of excellent instructions. When the storm was over he returned to Carthage, but another persecution broke out in 258, in which he was beheaded. His works were edited by bishop Fell. at Oxford, in 1682; and rendered into English by Dr. Marshall, in one vol. folio.—Eusebius. Cave. Dupin.

CYPRIANI, a celebrated Italian painter, who died at London in 1785. His pieces, though small, are very elegant. They are universally known and admired by having been engraved by Bartolozzi.—Gent. Mag.

CYRANO (de Bergerac), a French writer and soldier, born in Gascony about 1620. He served at several sieges, and received some severe wounds. At length he abandoned the army in disgust, and commenced author. His pieces are mostly humorous and satirical. His History of the States and Empires of the Sun has been translated into English. He died in 1655.—Moreri.

CYRIL, of Jerusalem, a christian father, succeeded Maximus bishop of Jerusalem about 350, by the interest of Acacius of Cæsarea; but afterwards these two prelates fell out about their prerogatives, and Acacius called a synod, which deposed Cyril for having sold the treasures of his church, and applied the money to support the poor in the time of famine. After several disputes he regained his situation, and died in 386. Some of his works are extant, printed at Paris in Greek and Latin, fol. 1720.—Cave. Dupin.

CYRIL, of Alexandria, bishop of that see in 412. He commenced his episcopate by banishing the Novatians and Jews from Alexandria, which occasioned fierce contentions between Orestes the governor and the bishop. The people, who were in general attached to the bishop, seized Hypatia, a pagan lady of great accomplishments, who was very intimate with the governor, and tore her in pieces; but it does not appear that Cyril was accessory to this horrid act. Violent disputes next broke out between Cyril and Nestorius, which occasioned the council of Ephesus, by which the bishop was deposed and sent to prison. However, he soon recovered his liberty and his see, and died in 444. His works were printed at Paris in 7 vols. fol. Greek and Latin, 1638.—Cave. Dupin.

CYRIL-LUCAR, patriarch of Constantinople, was born in the isle of Candia in 1572. He went to Germany, after having studied at Padua. On his return to the east he was elevated to the see of Alexandria, and in 1621 to the patriarchate of Constantinople. He held a correspondence with the protestant churches, particularly that of England, and having endeavoured to reform his clergy, was deposed and banished to Rhodes. However, he was re-established, and still continued the work of reformation, for which he was again deposed, and in 1638 strangled by order of the grand seignior, who had been prejudiced against him by the artifices of his enemies. His Confession of Faith and Letters were printed at Amsterdam in 1718.—Smith's Account of the Greek Church, Oxford, 1680.

CYRUS, king of Persia, the son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of Media. It is said that Astyages gave his daughter to an obscure Persian on account of a dream, in which he was told, that he should be dethroned by his grandson. Cyrus, therefore, was exposed as soon as born, but a shepherdess preserved him, and brought him up as her own son. His birth being afterwards discovered, Cyrus levied troops and deposed his grandfather. He then extended his conquests on all sides, and took the city of Babylon by drying the channel of the Euphrates: but marching against Tomyris, queen of the Scythians, he was defeated, and put to death by the heroine herself, B.C. 530.—Herodotus. Xenophon.

CYRUS the Younger, was the son of Darius Nothus, and brother of Artaxerxes. On the death of his father he attempted the life of his brother, in order to obtain the throne. He would have been put to death by Artaxerxes, had not his mother Parysatis interceded for him. He then obtained the governorship of Lydia, where he mustered an army and marched against his brother. The battle was obstinately fought, but it ended with the death of Cyrus, B.C. 400. The 10,000 Greeks who came with Cyrus made good their retreat in spite of all the force of the Persians, and returned safe to their own country.—Plutarch. Xenophon.

CYRUS of Panapolis, a Latin poet, and soldier, in the time of Theodosius the Younger. He was made consul and prefect of Constantinople. He afterwards embraced Christianity, and was made a bishop in Phrygia, where he died.—Moreri.

D.

DAC (John), a German painter, born at Cologne in 1556. He was employed by the emperor Rodolphus, who bestowed upon him honours and riches. His pieces are very grand.—De Piles Vies des Peintres.

DACIER (Andrew), a learned Frenchman, was born of protestant parents at Castres, in 1651, and educated at Saumur under Tanaquil Faber, or Le Fevre, whose learned daughter he married. He published at Paris, in 1681, an edition of Pompeius Festus, for the use of the dauphin. His translation of Horace came out the same year. In 1691 he published his translation of the Reflections of Marcus Antoninus; and the next year Aristotle's Poetica. For his services to literature he was appointed perpetual secretary to the academy, rewarded with a pension of 2000 livres, and made keeper of the cabinet of the Louvre. He died in 1722. Dacier and his wife renounced the protestant religion in 1685. Besides the works abovementioned he translated the works of Plato into French; the Lives of Plutarch; the Manual of Epictetus; &c.—Moreri.

DACIER (Anne), wife of the preceding, daughter of Le Fevre, professor of Greek at Saumur, where she was born in 1651.

Her father discovered her turn for learning, indulged her wish, and gave her a liberal education. In 1674 she published an edition of Callimachus, which gave so much satisfaction, that she was employed to prepare editions of Latin authors for the use of the dauphin, the first of which was Florus. In 1681 she published a translation of Anacreon and Sappho, which was followed by versions of some of Plautus's comedies, and of the Phutus and Clouds of Aristophanes. In 1683 she married M. Dacier, and soon after they renounced the protestant religion. In 1711 came out her translation of the Iliad; and in 1714 she defended Homer against M. de la Motte, in a book, entitled The Causes of the Corruption of Taste; this was followed in 1716 by another against father Hardouin. The same year came out her version of the Odyssey, which closed her literary labours. She died in 1790. She had two daughters and a son. One of the daughters became a nun, the other died at the age of 18, and the son when he was a child. Madame Dacier was as remarkable for her modesty as her erudition. A learned German having paid her a visit, begged that she would write her name and sentence in his book.

She excused herself as long as she could, but being strongly importuned she complied, and added to her signature a verse from Sophocles, importing that silence is the ornament of the female sex.—Moreri.

D'AGAR (Jacopo), a French painter, born at Paris in 1640, and died in 1716. He was the disciple of Vouet, from whom he learned to paint history and portrait, but he excelled in the latter. He resided a long time in Denmark at the court of Christian V. after which he came to London, where he was well received. He went back to Denmark, and died there.—Pilkington.

DAGOBERT I. king of France, the son of Clotaire II. whom he succeeded in 628, obliging his younger brother, Caribert, to accept of Aquitain. The first part of his reign was popular and praise-worthy, but at last he gave way to dissolute habits, divorced his first wife, and took two more, besides a number of concubines. He also greatly oppressed his subjects by taxes, and caused 9000 Bulgarians, who had put themselves under his protection, to be massacred. He was very successful in his foreign wars, conquered the Gascons, and compelled the count of Brittany to be his vassal. He died in 638, and was the first king of France interred in the abbey of St. Denis. The other princes of this name are not worth noticing.—Moreri.

DAGOUER (William), rector of the university of Paris, died in 1745. He was the author of, 1. A Course of Philosophy in Latin; 2. A Tract against the Advertisements of Languet, Archbishop of Sens.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DAHL (Michael), a Danish portrait painter, who died in England in 1743. He was in great repute, and had the honour to paint the portrait of queen Anne.—Walpole's Anecd. of Painters.

DAHLBERG (Eric), a Swedish general, was born in 1625. He lost his parents when young, and in consequence had a very narrow education, which he compensated for by his own perseverance and genius. He studied fortification, and in 1648 was appointed an engineer. Gustavus Adolphus sent him to superintend the works for the defence of Thorn, and he attended that monarch in the war of Poland. It was by his advice that the king undertook the bold enterprise of marching his army over the Great Belt, when frozen over, in 1657, whereby he extended his conquests to the walls of Copenhagen. In 1660 Dahlberg was ennobled, and in 1669 was appointed commandant of Malmo, and superintendant of the fortifications. He so greatly improved these as to be called the Vauban of Sweden. In 1690 he was made governor of Livonia, and died at Stockholm in 1703. He published Suecia antiqua & hodierna, 3 vols. folio, 1700.—Grazelius's Biography of eminent Swedes.

DAILLÉ (John), a learned French divine, born at Châtellerault in 1594, and educated at Saumur. In 1612 he was appointed tutor to the grandsons of du Mornay, with whom in 1619 he went to Italy, where one of them died. He continued on his travels with the other, and, after passing through Germany and England, returned to France in 1621. He became a minister in 1623, but still remained in the family of du Mornay, who died in his arms. In 1625 he was appointed minister of the church of Saumur, and the year following he removed to that of Paris. In 1631 appeared his famous book on the Use of the Fathers. In 1633 he published an Apology for the reformed Churches. These books excited considerable controversy. He died in 1670. His son became a minister in 1653, and was chosen colleague with his father. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he went to Zurich, where he died in 1690.—Dailly wrote several other books besides the above.—Ba-le. Moreri.

DALE (Samuel), an English physician, was born in 1659. He was originally an apothecary at Braintree, in Essex, and in 1730 became a licentiate of the college of physicians, and a fellow of the royal society. He then settled as a physician at Bocking, where he died in 1739. He wrote Pharmacologia, seu Manuductio ad Materiae Medicam, several times printed; he also published The Antiquities of Harwich and Dover Court, 4to. written by Silas Taylor, but greatly enlarged and improved by Dr. Dale. He was a good naturalist, and has some papers in the Philosophical Transactions.—Pulteney's Sketches on Botany.

DALECHAMPS (James), a French physician, born at Caen in Normandy in 1513, and died at Lyons in 1588. He wrote a general History of Plants, and some other books. He also published Pliny's Natural History, with notes.—Moreri.

DALEN (Cornelius van), a Dutch engraver, born about 1640. He engraved a great variety of portraits, and a set of antique statues in a masterly style.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

DALENS (Theodore), a landscape painter of Amsterdam, born in 1659, and died in 1688. His pieces are faithful and spirited copies of nature.—Houbraken.

DALIN (Olaus), a Swedish historian and poet, born at Winsberg in 1708. He wrote a poem, entitled, The Liberty of Sweden, and a tragedy entitled Brunhilda. He was also the author of the General History of Sweden, and other works. He became preceptor to prince Gustavus, and chancellor of the court; and died in 1763.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DALLINGTON (sir Robert), an English author, was born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he proceeded M. A. Afterwards he became secretary to the earl of Rutland, and master of the Charter-house. Charles I. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He died in 1637. He wrote a Survey of the great Duke's state in Tuscany, 4to.; a Method for Travel, or a State of France as it stood in 1598, 4to.; Aphorisms civil and military, amplified with authorities, folio.—Wood.

DALMATIN (George), a lutheran divine, who translated the Bible into the Slavonian language in 1584. He obtained a benefice at Laybach in Carniola, but being persecuted by the Romanists, sentence of banishment was pronounced against him in 1598. The baron of Aursperg, however, afforded him an asylum in his house, where it is supposed he died.—Bayle.

DALMATIUS, bishop of Cyzicum, who wrote the Acts of the Council of Nice, and assisted at the council of Ephesus.—Moreri.

DALRYMPLE (sir David), a Scotch judge, was born at Edinburgh in 1726. His father was auditor of the exchequer, and his mother daughter of the earl of Haddington. He was educated first at Eton, and next at Utrecht. In 1748 he was called to the Scotch bar, and in 1766 appointed a judge, on which occasion he took the title of lord Hailes. He died in 1792, leaving two daughters. He wrote and published a number of books, as Memoirs and Letters relating to the History of Britain in the Reign of James I. and Charles I. 2 vols. Remarks on the History of Scotland, 12mo.; Annals of Scotland, 4to. 2 vols.; Remains of Christian Antiquity, 3 vols.; several Memoirs intended for a Biographia Scotica; Papers in the World and Mirror, &c.—Encyclop. Brit.

DALTON (Michael), an English lawyer, who wrote a book on the Office of a Justice of the Peace; and another on the Duties of Sheriffs. He died about 1620.—Granger.

DALTON (John), an English divine, was born at Dean in Cumberland in 1709, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of D.D. and became tutor to lord Beauchamp. He adapted Milton's Comus for the stage, and wrote some songs in it, which piece was performed for the benefit of a grand-daughter of Milton. He obtained the rectory of St. Mary-at-Hill, London; and a prebend of Worcester, where he died in 1763. He published a volume of sermons in 1757, and some poems. His brother Richard was librarian to the king; and published prints from drawings made by himself of the procession to Mecca, &c.—Hutchinson's Hist. of Cumberland. Biog. Dram.

DALZIEL (Thomas), a Scotch general, who was with Charles II. at the battle of Worcester, after which he entered into the service of the czar of Russia, but was recalled at the restoration, and made commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland. After the murder of Charles I. he never would shave his beard, but suffered it to grow down to his girdle, and he wore a beaver hat, the brim of which was about three inches broad. His dress was so singular that he never appeared in public without a crowd of boys after him. He was in great favour with Charles II. When he died is uncertain.—Granger.

DAMASCENUS (John), a learned father of the church, so called from the place of his birth. He succeeded his father as counsellor of state to the caliph, and at the close of life was ordained priest, on which he went into a monastery. He died about 750. His works were printed at Paris in 2 vols. folio, 1712.—Cave. Dupin.

DAMASCIUS, a philosopher of the stoic sect, or according to others of the peripatetic. He wrote the life of his master and predecessor Iſidorus the logician of Athens, of which only a few fragments remain. He flourished A.D. 540.—Cave. Hist. Lit.

DAMASUS I. pope, was a native of Spain, and placed in the pontifical chair in 366. He was opposed by an antipope called Ursin, but was acknowledged by the bishops of Italy, and the council of Aquileia condemned Ursin to banishment. Damasus opposed the arians with great zeal, and died in 384, aged 80. Several of his letters are extant.—Bower. Platina.

DAMASUS II. pope, was elected the same day that Benedict IX. abdicated the chair, and died 23 days after his being chosen, in Palestine, in 1048.—Ibid.

DAMIANO (Peter), a Roman cardinal, born at Ravenna, of a noble family. In 1057 he was raised to the cardinalate, and appointed bishop of Ostia against his own inclination. He endeavoured to effect a reform in the manners of the monks and priests, and remonstrated against the pope's interfering in the temporal concerns of princes; but finding all his efforts fruitless, he resigned his preferments, and retired to a monastery, from whence he was recalled, and employed as legate in France and Germany. He died in 1073. His works were printed at Paris in 1663.—Moreri.

DAMIENS (Robert Francois), a French assassin, who was executed in 1757, for an attempt upon the life of Lewis XV. He had been a domestic in the college of jésuits.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DAMO, the daughter of Pythagoras, at whose desire she devoted herself to a life of celibacy, and may therefore be called the first of nuns. Her father imparted to her the secrets of his philosophy, on condition that she should never divulge them.—Stanley's Hist. Plil.

DAMON, a pythagorean philosopher, rendered memorable for his friendship with Pythias. Dionysius the tyrant having condemned him to death, he obtained leave of absence to go home and settle his affairs; Pythias pledging himself to endure the punishment in his stead if he did not return at the appointed time. Damon was punctual, and this instance of friendship so pleased the king that he pardoned Damon, and requested to become one of their friends.—Valerius Maximus.

DAMON, a musician of Athens, the instructor of Pericles, and friend of Socrates. He formed a system of music, and wonderful things are related of his harmonic powers.—Moreri. Burney.

DAMOCLES, a sycophant at the court of Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse. He was one day admiring the happy condition of princes, on which the tyrant invited him to an entertainment, and caused a naked sword to be hung over his head by a hair. Damocles, frightened at the perilous condition in which he sat, begged the king to dismiss him into a safe though mean station of life.—Moreri.

DAMOCRITUS, a Greek historian of an unknown age; who wrote two books, one on tactics, and the other on the Jews, in which he accuses them of worshipping the head of an ass, and offering human sacrifices.—Vossius Hist. Græc.

DAMPIER (John), a French poet, was a native of Blois, and after being an advocate in the great council, became a cordelier; and died in 1550. His Latin poems are in the Deliciæ Poetarum Gallorum.—Moreri.

DAMPIER (William), an English navigator, was born at East Coker, in Somersetshire, in 1652, and went to sea early in life. He sailed with captain Cook, who commanded a Bristol ship sent out against the Spaniards. After cruising a considerable time on the American coast, and taking several prizes, captain Cook died, and was succeeded by Mr. Davis, whom Dampier left, and went aboard another buccaneering ship, commanded by captain Swan. Not meeting with much success, they sailed for the East Indies, where Dampier left Swan, and proceeded to the English factory at Achen. He then engaged with a captain Weldon, and afterwards became gunner to the factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he embarked by stealth for England, and arrived there the same year. He afterwards went out from Bristol with captain Woodes Rogers to the South Sea, and returned in 1711. When he died is unknown. His voyages are well known, and are very accurate. There is a portrait of him in the Trinity-house.—Dampier's Voyages.

DAMPIERRE (N.), a distinguished officer in the service of the French republic. He had been a captain in the regiment of Chartres; but when the revolution broke out he joined the popular standard, and was major-general at the battle of Jemappe. He was shot by the English gunners, as he was reconnoitring at the battle, or retreat, of Famars, May 8, 1793.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DAN, the son of Jacob by the servant of Rachael, and the father of a warlike tribe, whose portion was on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, from Jeppa on the north to Alcalon on the south.—SS.

DANCER (Daniel), an extraordinary miser, was born in 1716, near Harrow, in Middlesex. In 1736 he succeeded to his family estate, which was considerable; but as his father before him were too great lovers of money to lay out any in improvements, Daniel followed their example, and the farm went worse and worse. He led the life of a hermit for above half a century; his only dealing with mankind arose from the sale of his hay; and he was seldom seen, except when he was out gathering logs of wood from the common, or old iron, or sheeps' dung under the hedges. He was frequently robbed, to prevent which, he fastened the door up, and got into his house through the upper window, to ascend which he made use of a ladder, which he carefully drew up after him. His sister, who lived with him many years, left him at her death a considerable increase to his wealth, on which he bought a second-hand pair of black worsted stockings to put himself in decent mourning. This was an article of luxury, for at other times Daniel always wore hay-bands on his legs. He died in 1794, and left his estates to lady Tempest, who had been very charitable to the poor man and his sister.—Annual Necrology, 1798.

DANCHET (Anthony), a French poet, born in 1671, and died at Paris in 1748. He wrote for the theatre with great success, and his works were published in 1751, in 4 vols. 12mo. He was a member of the French academy.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DANDINI (Jerome), an Italian jesuit, born at Cesena in 1554. He became a celebrated professor of philosophy, and rector of several colleges. Clement VIII. sent him as nuncio to the Maronites of Libanus. Of this journey he wrote an account, which was translated into French, and printed in 1675. He died at Forli in 1634. He wrote a Commentary on Aristotle's three books de Anima.—Ibid.

DANDINI (Pietro), a painter of Florence, born in 1646, and died in 1712. He was in the service of the grand-duke, so that few of his pictures are to be found out of his own country. He was very successful in imitating great masters.—Gen. B. D.

DANDINI (Cesare), an historical painter of Florence. He was uncle to the preceding. There are several noble pictures of his in the churches of Florence.—Ibid.

DANDINI (Hercules Francis), an Italian count, and professor of law at Padua; born in 1691, and died in 1747. He wrote, 1. De Forensi scribendi ratione. 2. De servitutibus prædiorum interpretationes per epistolas, &c.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DANDOLO (Henry), doge of Venice, to which office he was elected in 1192, being then 84 years old. He raised the Venetian state to a considerable height, by the vigour and wisdom of his government. In 1261 he engaged in the crusade, and conquered Zara, which had revolted against the Venetians. He greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Constantinople, on the taking of which he was created despot of Romania. He died in 1295.—Moreri.

DANDOLO (Andrew), doge of Venice, was born about 1310. He extended the commerce of the republic by a union with Egypt, which produced a war between the Venetians and the Genoese, which lasted several years. He was a man of letters, and wrote the History of Venice; and corresponded with Petrarch. He died in 1354.—Trabeschi.

DANDRE BARDON (Michael Francis), a French writer and painter, born at Aix, in Provence, in 1700, and died in 1747. He was a member of the academy of painting, and wrote, 1. The Life of Carlo Vanloo. 2. A treatise on Painting, and another on Sculpture, &c.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DANDRIEU (John Francis), a French musician, who died at Paris in 1740, aged 56. He excelled on the organ and harpsichord. He also had great merit as a composer, particularly church music.—Ibid.

DANEAU (Lambert), called in Latin Daneus, a French protestant divine, born about 1530, and died at Castres in 1596. He wrote Commentaries on the Gospels of Matthew and Mark; A Poetical System of Geography; Aphorismi Politici et Militares.—Moreri.

DANES (Peter), a French prelate of considerable piety and learning. He was present at the council of Trent, where he made an eloquent speech on the abuses of the court of Rome. While there he was made bishop of Lavaur. He died at Paris in 1577, aged 80. His works were printed in 1731.—Moreri.

DANET (Peter), a French abbé, who published an edition of Phædrus, for the use of the dauphin, also a Dictionary, and other works. He died at Paris in 1709.—Ibid.

DANGEAU (Lewis Courcillon de), a French abbot, who died at Paris in 1723, aged 80. He invented several games for teaching young persons geography, history, and grammar. He also wrote Dialogues on the Immortality of the Soul.—Ibid.

DANGEAU (Philip de Courcillon, marquis de), brother of the above, born in 1638, and died at Paris full of honours in 1720. He wrote, Memoirs in MS. from which Voltaire, and other authors, have gleaned many curious particulars.—Ibid.

DANHAWER (John Conrad), a German divine of the lutheran persuasion, was born in the Brigaw in 1603. He became professor of eloquence at Strasburgh, where he died in 1666. He zealously opposed a projected union between the lutherans and calvinists, and wrote some theological treatises.—Ibid.

DANICAN (Andre), better known by the name of Philidor, a celebrated player, on chess, was born at Paris, and resided several years in England, where he published his Analysis du jeu des Echecs, in 1749. He also composed music with good success. He died in 1795.—Europ. Mug.

DANIEL, the fourth of the greater prophets. He was of the blood royal of Judah, and carried captive to Babylon 606 B.C. He obtained a situation at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, and had his name changed to that of Belteshazzar. His progress in learning, and his sagacity of mind, rendered him a favourite with the monarch, and he was appointed governor of the provinces of Babylon. Under the reign of Belteshazzar he explained the famous writing upon the wall, and the event confirmed the truth of his prediction. Darius made him his prime minister; but some of the courtiers envying his situation, contrived to have him thrown into a den of lions for refusing divine honours to Darius. He escaped from the furious beasts by a miracle, and regained the favour of his master. His prophecy is written partly in Hebrew and partly in Chaldee.—SS. Univ. Hist.

DANIEL (Arnold), a provençal poet in the twelfth century, whose poems were imitated by Petrarch. He died about 1189.—Moreri.

DANIEL (Peter), a learned Frenchman, who died at Paris in 1603. He published, 1. An edition of the Aulularia of Plautus. 2. Commentaries of Servius on Virgil, &c.—Ibid.

DANIEL (Samuel), an English poet and historian, was born in Somersetshire, in 1562, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford; on leaving which, he became groom of the privy chamber to the queen of James I. At the close of his life he retired to a farm in his native county, where he died in 1619. His poems were collected, and printed in 2 vols. 12mo. 1718. He wrote the History of England to the end of the reign of Edward III. which, according to some authors, is the best of all his works.—Biog. Br.

DANIEL (Gabriel), a French historian, was born at Rouen in 1649, and entered among the jesuits at the age of 18. One of his first productions was a Voyage to the World of Des Cartes, which has been translated into several languages. His greatest performance, however, is, The History of France, published at Paris in 3 vols. folio, 1713; but afterwards enlarged to 7 vols. 4to. 1722. He also wrote several miscellaneous and theological treatises. He died at Paris in 1728.—Moreri.

DANTE (Alighieri), an Italian poet, born at Florence in 1265. He was of an ambitious turn, and joined one of the factions which then disturbed Florence; but the party to which he belonged proving the weakest, he was banished. He then prevailed on the prince of Verona to make war on the Florentines, which did not answer his expectations; neither could he get himself recalled. He died at Ravenna in 1321. He wrote in his exile a satirical poem on Paradise, Purgatory, and Hell, to which he gave the singular title of Commedia. It is in the form of a vision, and full of extravagancies, though oftentimes very sublime. The best edition is that of Venice, 1757, 3 vols. 4to. He also wrote some works in Latin, particularly one on Monarchy; and another, entitled De Vulgari Eloquentia.—Tiraboschi.

DANTE (Peter Vincent), a native of Perouse, who imitated the style of the preceding poet with so much success, that his performances have frequently gone under his name. He was also a good mathematician, and died in 1512.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

DANTE (Vincent), grandson of the above, was a mathematician, sculptor, and painter. His statue of Julius III. is esteemed a master-piece. He died in 1576, aged 46. He wrote the lives of men eminent in designing for statues.—Ibid.

DANTE (Ignatius), a dominican of the same family as the poet. He was a celebrated mathematician, and drew several maps for Gregory XIII. who gave him the bishopric of Alatri. He drew in 1576 the famous meridian line in the church of St. Petronius at Bologna, which was afterwards perfected by Cassini. He died in 1586. He wrote a treatise on the Astro-labe, and some other works.—Tiraboschi.

DANTE (John Baptist), a mathematician of the same family, who is said to have made himself a pair of wings, with which he flew over the lake Trasimenus; but on exhibiting himself over the city of Perugia, he fell on a church and broke his thigh. He afterwards became professor of mathematics at Venice; and died at the end of the 15th century.—Bayle. Moreri.

DANTON (George James), a leading man in the French revolution. He was a lawyer, and rose to notice in that storm which brought forth a number of extraordinary persons to view, who would otherwise have passed their days in obscurity. He displayed talents in the national convention, and was a powerful speaker. Robespierre, however, supplanted him, and he fell under the guillotine in 1794, aged 34.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

DANTZ (John Andrew), a lutheran divine, born at Sandhufen, near Gotha, in 1654. He became professor of theology at Jena, where he died in 1727. He wrote a Hebrew Grammar, a Chaldee Grammar; and several dissertations on the Hebrew Scripture, and the rabbinical writings.—Moreri.

DARAN (James), a celebrated French surgeon, was born at St. Frajon, in Gascony, in 1701. He became surgeon-major in the imperial army, and practised with great reputation at Milan and Turin, where the king of Sardinia, Victor Amadeus, made him considerable offers, if he would remain in his service. After passing through Italy he returned to France, where he died in 1784. Daran was famous for his operations in diseases of the bladder and urethra. He wrote a treatise on the virulent Gonorrhœa; Surgical Observations on the Diseases of the Urethra; and other pieces.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

DARCEY (N.) a French chemist and physician, who published several ingenious papers on the management of potteries, and the nature of different earths fit to be used in those manufactories. He also gave analyses of several minerals; and published the State of the Pyrenees, and of the causes of their wasting. He was professor of chemistry in the national institute, and died in 1801.—Ibid.

DARCI (count), an eminent engineer, born in Ireland in 1725, of a family attached to the Stuarts, in consequence of which he entered into the French service. At the age of 17 he distinguished himself as a geometrician. In 1760 he published an essay on Artillery. In 1765 appeared his memoir on the Duration of the Sensation of Sight; which is very ingenious. He died in 1779. Besides the writings above mentioned, he wrote a number of mathematical memoirs of great merit.—Gen. B. D.

DARGONNE (Dom Bonaventure), a carthusian monk, born at Paris in 1640, and died in 1704. He wrote Un Traité de la Lecture de Pères de l'Eglise, and some other works.—Moreri.

DARIUS, surnamed the Mede, is the same, according to some, as Cyaxares, son of Astyages, and maternal uncle to Cyrus. He died at Babylon about 348 B. C.—Univ. Hist.

DARIUS I. king of Persia, the son of Hystaspes. He entered into a conspiracy with six others against the usurper Smerdis, and having slain him, they agreed that he should have the crown whose horse should neigh first in the morning. The groom of Darius, on the night preceding, brought his master's horse to a mare on the spot fixed upon. The next morning, when the candidates came to the place, the horse of Darius suddenly neighed, in consequence of which he was saluted king. He took Babylon after a siege of ten months, rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem, and sent the captive Jews to their own country. His forces suffered a terrible defeat from the Greeks at Marathon; on which he resolved to carry on the war in person; but died in the midst of his preparations, B.C. 485.—Herodotus. Univ. Hist.

DARIUS II. surnamed Ochus, or Nothus, because he was the bastard son of Artaxerxes by a concubine. After the murder of Xerxes he ascended the Persian throne, and espoused Parisatis, his sister, a cruel princess, by whom he had Artaxerxes, Memon, Amestris, and Cyrus the younger. He died after a reign of 19 years, B.C. 404.—Univ. Hist.

DARIUS III. or Codomannus, the last king of Persia of that name. He was the son of Artanes and Siliqambis, and descended from Darius Nothus. Bagoas, the eunuch, placed him on the throne; and afterwards attempted to poison him. Darius, however, made him swallow the deadly draught himself. Alexander the Great defeated him near the Granicus, and a second time, near the Issus, where his family were taken prisoners, but Darius himself escaped in disguise. Having gathered another army, he marched against the Macedonian hero, and experienced a third overthrow at Arbela, on which he fled to Medela. Bessus, governor of Bactriana, slew him in his chariot, in hopes of being his successor, B.C. 331.—Ibid.

DARWIN (Erasmus), an English physician and poet, was the son of a gentleman at Newark, in Nottinghamshire, and born there in 1732. After receiving a preparatory education, he was sent to St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in medicine, in 1755, and in his thesis on that occasion maintained the doctrine, that the movements of the heart and arteries are immediately produced by the stimulus of the blood. In the Cambridge Collection of Verses on the Death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1751, is a poem by him, which, however, does not rise above mediocrity. From Cambridge he removed to Edinburgh, where he completed his medical studies, and took his doctor's degree, after which he settled at Litchfield, where he practised with considerable reputation, and in 1757 married miss Howard, an amiable young lady of that city, who died in 1770, leaving three sons. His second wife was the widow of colonel Pole, who brought him a good fortune, on which he removed to Derby, in 1781, where he passed the remainder of his life. He died suddenly, April 18, 1802. Dr. Darwin's literary fame rests upon the Botanic Garden, with philosophical notes, in two parts; 1. The Economy of Vegetation; 2. The Loves of the Plants, 2 vols. 8vo.; Zoonomia, or the Laws of Organic Life, 4 vols. 8vo.; Phytologia, or the Philosophy of Agriculture and Gardening, 1 vol. 4to. In these works the poet, botanist, and philosopher appear to great advantage, though in many respects the author sacrifices too much to imagination; and he evinces a contempt for all religion. Besides these works, he was the author of some philosophical and medical papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and a tract on Female Education, 4to. He had also a principal share in the formation of the System of Vegetables of Linnæus, published in the name of the Botanical Society at Litchfield.—Life of Darwin by Ann Seward. Europ. Mag. vol. xxvii. Monthly Mag. vol. xiii.

DARWIN (Charles), son of the preceding, was born at Litchfield in 1758. After receiving a preparatory education, he went to Christ-church college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Edinburgh, where he assiduously applied to the study of medicine, and obtained the first prize medal offered by the Esculapian society for the best essay on the means of distinguishing pus from mucus. He died a few months after, in 1778. He left behind him an Account of the retrograde Motions of the absorbent Vessels of animal Bodies in some Diseases, in Latin; a translation of which was published by his father.—Ibid.

DASSIER (John), medalist to the republic of Geneva, who struck a series of the English kings in order to obtain a situation in the mint, but was disappointed. His nephew, however, was employed in that office as engraver, and returned to Geneva in 1745.—Gen. Biog. Diß.

DASSOUCI, a French poet and musician of the 17th century, who wrote his own life in a ludicrous style; in which he freely says, that his father was an impostor by pretending to be a magician. He had a happy talent at song-writing, in the humorous style. He died at the close of the 17th century.—Novv. Diß. Hif.

DATAMES, a general of the army of Artaxerxes king of Persia, to which station he was raised from the ranks. Some persons out of envy accused him to the king as a traitor, on which he fled to save his life. Afterwards he raised an army and defeated Artabases, general of Artaxerxes, but was assassinated by Mithridates 361 B. C.—Cornelius Nepos.

DATI (Augustine), a learned Italian, was born at Sienna in 1420. He became teacher of rhetoric and the classics in that city, and at last attained the office of first magistrate. He died of the plague in 1478. His works, consisting of a treatise on the Immortality of the Soul; Orations; Epistles; and the History of Sienna, were printed in one volume folio, 1503.—Tiraboschi.

DATI (Charles), professor of belles-lettres at Florence, his native city. He wrote some Italian poems, and miscellaneous essays, particularly one on the discoveries of Galileo and Torricelli; but his Lives of ancient Fathers are most known. He died in 1675.—Ibid.

DAVANZATI (Bernard), a learned Italian, was born at Florence in 1529, and died in 1606. He translated Tacitus into Italian, and wrote on Tuscan Agriculture; History of the English Schism, and an Account of Exchanges.—Tiraboschi.

DAUBENTON (M.) a French anatomist and naturalist, was born at Montbard in Burgundy, in 1716. He became assistant to Buffon in the royal garden, and keeper of the king's museum. In 1744 he was admitted a member of the academy of sciences, and contributed several valuable papers to their memoirs. He had also a considerable concern in Buffon's Natural History. His Instructions to Shepherds, 1784, 8vo. is an excellent work. He was likewise the author of a Methodical View of Minerals. In 1799 he was elected a member of the conservative senate, but died in December the same year.—Account of Dabenton by Fourcroi.

DAUBENTON (William), a French jesuit, who was appointed confessor to Philip V. king of Spain, but having meddled too much in political concerns, he was dismissed, and returned to France in 1706. Ten years afterwards he was recalled, but again fell into disgrace, by betraying the king's secrets to the French court. He died in 1723. His works, principally sermons, were printed in 2 vols. folio, one of which contains an account of the miracles of John Francis Regis, a jesuit.—Moreri.

DAVENANT (John), an English prelate, was born in London, and educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of D.D. and became fellow. He was afterwards elected master of that college, and in 1618 was sent by James I. to the synod of Dort. In 1621 he was made bishop of Salisbury, and died in 1641. His remains were interred in Salisbury cathedral. He wrote an Exposition of the Epistle to the Colossians, in Latin; and Animadversions upon Hoard's treatise, entitled, God's Love to Mankind, 1641, &c. He was a strong calvinist.—Biog. Br.

DAVENANT (sir William), an English poet, was born in 1605 at Oxford, where his father kept an inn. The first part of his education he received at the grammar-school of that city, and then was entered of Lincoln college. He did not remain long at the university, but became page to the dukes of Richmond, and afterwards to lord Brook. In 1637 he succeeded Ben Jonson as poet-laureat, and in 1643 was knighted. On the decline of the royal cause he went to France and changed his religion, which recommended him to the patronage of the queen, who sent him to England on a mission to the king. He was next engaged to convey a number of artificers from France to Virginia, but the ship was taken and carried to England, where he would have been executed if Milton and some others had not interceded for his life. He now set up a sort of operas, to support himself, plays being forbidden; but at the restoration he obtained a patent for erecting a playhouse in Lincoln's-inn-fields. He died in 1668, and was interred in Westminster abbey.

His works were published together in 1678, consisting of plays and poems.—Biog. Brit.

DAVENANT (Charles), a political writer, the son of the preceding, was born in 1656, and educated at Oxford. At the age of 19 he wrote Circe, a tragedy, which was performed with great applause. He afterwards applied to the civil law, and took his doctor's degree in that faculty at Cambridge. He sat in the parliament of 1685, and became a commissioner of excise. He was afterwards appointed inspector-general of the exports and imports, and died in 1714. He was deeply versed in political knowledge, and affairs of finance. His works were collected and published in 6 vols. 8vo. 1771.—Biog. Brit.

DAVENANT (William), the fourth son of sir William, was brought up to the church, and obtained a living in Surrey. He went abroad with an English gentleman, and was drowned in a river near Paris, as he was swimming, in 1681. He translated Le Vayer's Animadversions on the Greek and Latin Historians, from the French.—Ibid.

DAVENPORT (Christopher), a priest of the Romish communion, was born at Coventry about 1598, and educated at Oxford, but at the persuasion of a Romish priest, he went to Douay, and entered among the Franciscans. He returned to England as a missionary under the name of sancta Clara, and became chaplain to the queen of Charles I. He wrote a book called Deus, Natura, Gratia, &c. the object of which went to shew, that the English confession and liturgy are reconcilable to the tenets of his church. At the restoration he became chaplain to the queen, and died in 1680.—Wood. Moreri.

DAVENPORT (John), elder brother of the preceding, was born at Coventry in 1597, and educated at Merton college, Oxford. He entered into orders and became a zealous puritan: after serving a church in London for some time he went to Amsterdam. About 1641 he went to New England, where he died in 1669. He wrote some sermons and religious tracts.—Wood's A. O. Neal's Hist. Puritani.

DAVID, king of Israel, was born at Bethlehem, 1085 B.C. He was anointed while a youth and a shepherd, by the prophet Samuel. His valour in killing Goliath; a gigantic Philistine, procured him a place at the court of Saul, who afterwards endeavoured to take away his life, on which David fled from place to place. When that prince fell, David was recognized king by the tribe of Judah; but the other tribes, at the instigation of Abner, placed Ishbosheth, the youngest son of Saul, on the throne, which occasioned a civil war; but on the death of Ishbosheth, all the contending parties united in submission to David, who reigned over them thirty years with great glory. He took Jerusalem from the Jebusites, with the fortress of Zion, to which he gave the name of the city of David. He also gained considerable victories over the Philistines, and other neighbouring nations, thereby extending his dominions and enriching his subjects. His glory, however, was tarnished by taking Bathsheba from Uriah, her husband, and putting him to death. He also suffered by causing the people to be numbered. A rebellion was excited against him by his son Absalom, which, however, was quelled, and Absalom slain by Joab. When the news of this was brought to David, he lamented the untimely fall of his son in affecting terms. At the close of life he resigned the throne to his son Solomon, and died with the character of a great and good monarch, B. C. 1015, at the age of 70. A considerable part of the book of Psalms having been composed by him, occasions the whole to be called by his name. It is an exquisite collection of devotional poetry.—SS. See also Gibb's Life of David.

DAVID I. king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Alexander the fierce, in 1124. He was bred up in England, and married Maud, grand niece of William the Conqueror. He was earl of Northumberland and Huntingdon, when called to the Scottish throne, which he filled to the satisfaction of his subjects. On the death of Henry I. king of England, he maintained the claim of his daughter, the empress Maud, against Stephen, and passing the border seized Carlisle, but was defeated at the battle of North Allerton in 1138. A negotiation was entered into the following year, by which Carlisle was suffered to remain in the possession of David. He died there in 1153.—Buchanan.

DAVID II. king of Scotland, was the son of Robert Bruce, at whose death he was only five years old. On the invasion of Scotland by Baliol, he was sent to France, but his party prevailing, after a bloody contest, he returned home in 1332. He made several incursions on England, but was at last taken prisoner after a stout resistance, and conveyed to the Tower of London, and did not recover his liberty till 1357, on paying a heavy ransom. He died in 1371, aged 47.—Ibid.

DAVID (St.), one of the most celebrated of the British saints, was in the middle of the 5th century bishop of Caerleon, in Monmouthshire, then the metropolitan of the Welsh church. But he removed his see to Mynyw, which afterwards came to be called Ty Dewi, or the house of St. David. There are many churches dedicated to him in Wales; but the notion of his being the patron saint of that country is treated as a modern invention, and so is the symbol of the leek attributed to him. The wearing of this on St. David's day probably originated from the custom of Cym- bertia, or the friendly aid, practised among farmers: in some districts of South Wales all the neighbours of a small farmer appoint a day when they attend to plough his land, and the like; and at such time it is the custom for each to bring his portion of leeks with him, to be used in making pottage.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

DAVID of Hirazug, surnamed the black, a Welsh divine, poet, and grammarian, who flourished about the year 1350. He modified the grammar and system of prosody of Edeyrn, agreeable to the alterations and new regulations which took place on the conquest of Wales, by Edward I. for that event affected even the literary compositions of the Welsh. There are several copies of a Missal in Welsh, or the Office of the Virgin, translated by him.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

DAVID, an armenian philosopher, of the 5th century, who translated into his native language several of the Greek philosophers.—Moreri.

DAVID EL DAVID, a pretended Messiah, was a Persian jew in the 12th century, and being a man of great abilities, persuaded a number of his countrymen to acknowledge his pretensions. After resisting the Persian forces for some time, he was defeated, and beheaded in the king's presence, after which an inhuman massacre of the jews took place throughout that country.—Ibid.

DAVID AB GWILYM, one of the most celebrated of the Welsh poets. He died at the close of the 14th century. He composed a great variety of beautiful poetry, under the patronage of Ivor, surnamed the Generous. The subject of the greater part of his poems is love; and he dedicated one hundred and forty-seven poems to the fair Morvid, his mistress; but his suit was unsuccessful, as she was married, through the influence of her relations, to Rhys Gwgan, a captain in the English army at the battle of Cressy. His works were printed at London in 1789.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

DAVID, of the imperial family of Comnenes, the last emperor of Trebizonde, succeeded John his brother. He was dethroned by Mahomet II. emperor of the Turks, who gave him his choice either to turn Mahometan, or to suffer death. He preferred the latter, and endured dreadful torments. This was in 1461.—Moreri.

DAVID (ab Edmund), a Welsh poet, who lived in the 15th century. He was a native of Hammer in Flintshire, and presided at a congress of bards at Caermarthen, which was assembled by virtue of a commission from Edward IV. At this meeting a body of canons of Welsh poetry was formed, which was opposed by the bards of another province.—Owen's Camb. Biog.

DAVID (George), a fanatic of Ghent, who about 1525 pretended to be the Messiah, the third David, and nephew of God. He eb-tained followers, but was forced to quit his own country, on which he went to Basil, where he died in 1566. His corpse was afterwards taken up and burnt with his writings.—Mosheim.

DAVID (Gantz), a Jewish historian of the 16th century, who wrote a chronicle in Hebrew, printed at Prague, 1542, 4to. Vorstius translated part of it into Latin with notes, Leyden, 1644.—Moreri.

DAVID (Francis), a fociinian of Hungary, who was first a Roman catholic, next a Lutheran, afterwards a Calvinist, and lastly a Unitarian. He was very fond of disputing, and at length differed from Socinus and Blandrata on the subject of worshipping Jesus Christ, which he held was wrong. For this and some other notions they charged him with Judaizing, and caused him to be thrown into prison, where he died in 1579. He wrote on the millennium and other subjects.—Moreri. Mosheim.

DAVID (de Pomis), a Jewish physician, of the 16th century, who pretended to be a descendant of the royal tribe of Judah. He wrote, 1. De Senum Affectibus, 1588, Venice; 2. a Hebrew and Rabbinical Dictionary, Hebrew and Italian, Venice, 1587.—Moreri.

DAVIES (Sir John), an English poet and judge, was born at Chisgrove in Wiltshire in 1570, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple, and in due course was called to the bar. James I. conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and made him his attorney-general in Ireland. He afterwards returned from thence, and became an English judge. In 1626 he was appointed chief justice of the king's bench, but died shortly after of an apoplexy. He married Eleanor Touchet, daughter of lord Audley, by whom he had a son, who died young, and a daughter called Lucy, who married the earl of Huntington. Lady Davies pretended to be a prophetess, and printed several strange pamphlets filled with predictions and revelations. She died in 1652. Sir John wrote a valuable book on the State of Ireland, 1612, and several times reprinted; his poetical works, of which that entitled Noſte Teipſum is the principal, were collected and published in 1773, 12mo. His prose works were printed in one vol. 8vo. 1786.—Blog. Br.

DAVIES (Dr. John), a learned Welsh divine, was born at Llanveres in Denbighshire, and educated at Ruthin school, from whence he went first to Jesus college, and afterwards to Lincoln college, Oxford. He obtained the living of Malwyd in Merionethshire, took his doctor's degree in 1616, and died in 1644. He published a curious grammar of the Welsh language in Latin, 1631; a dictionary, Welsh and Latin, 1632, &c.—Wood. Green's Camb. Biog.

DAVIES (John), a learned divine, born in London in 1679, and educated at Queen's college, Cambridge. In 1711 he obtained a living in Cambridgeshire, and a prebend of Ely. In 1717 he was chosen master of his college, and took the degree of D.D. He died in 1732. He edited several Greek and Latin authors, as Maximus Tyrius, Julius Cæsar, Minutius Felix, and some of Cicero's works.—Biog. Brit.

DAVIES (Samuel), an American divine, born in 1724, in the county of Newcastle, in Delaware. In 1759 he became president of the college of New Jersey. He died in 1761. Three volumes of excellent sermons by him have been several times printed.—Life by Dr. Gibbons.

DAVIES (Thomas), a bookseller and writer, was brought up at Edinburgh, and in 1736 became an actor at the Haymarket theatre. He afterwards turned bookseller, but not succeeding in that line, turned strolling player. About 1762 he commenced book-selling again in Russel-street, Covent-garden, but in 1778 he became a bankrupt, and was relieved by the exertions of Dr. Johnson. In 1780 he published the Life of Garrick, which had a good sale. He also wrote Dramatic Miscellanies; the Life of Henderson the Player; and several fugitive pieces. He died in 1785.—Gen. Biog. Diſt.

DAVILA (Henry Catherine), an eminent historian, was born in the territory of Padua, in 1576. His father was constable of Cyprus, when that island was taken by the Turks, in consequence of which he lost all his property. The son was taken to France, and brought up by the marshal d'Hemery, who had married his aunt. When he was 18 he entered into the military service, and gave eminent proofs of his bravery. In 1599 he went to Padua, and soon after engaged in the service of the Venetians, and was employed in several honourable stations. In 1631 he was appointed to command the garrison of Crema; but in going thither was shot by a man whose business it was to provide carriages; but the murderer was instantly killed by Davila's son. The year preceding he published his "History of the Civil Wars of France," in the Italian language, a work of high reputation. The best edition is that of London, 2 vols. 4to. 1755.—Moreri. Tiraboschi.

DAVILA (Peter Francis), a Spanish naturalist, who died at Madrid in 1785. The catalogue of his cabinet was published in 3 vols. and is held in great request.—N. D. H.

DAVIS (John), an English navigator, was born at Sandridge in Devonshire, and went to sea early in life. In 1585 he had the command of an expedition sent out to discover a north-west passage to the East Indies, in which voyage he discovered a strait called by his name. The year following he sailed again on the same design, and having explored the coasts of Greenland and Iceland, proceeded as far as latitude 73 N. In 1591 he went out as second in command to Mr. Cavendish, in his unfortunate voyage to the South Seas. After this he made five voyages to the East Indies, but at last was killed in an engagement with some Japanese on the coast of Malacca in 1605. He wrote an account of his voyages.—Biog. Br. Prince's Works.

DAVIS (Henry Edward), an English divine, born at Windsor in 1756, and educated at Balliol college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. and was elected fellow. He died in 1784. Mr. Davis wrote an Examination of Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, and was the only one of his antagonists whom the historian chose to answer.—Gent. Mag.

DAVISON (Jeremiah), an English portrait painter. He was a disciple of Sir Peter Lely, and died in 1745.—Walpole.

DAUMIUS (Christian), a learned man of the 17th century. He was regent of the college of Zwickau, and died there in 1685, aged 75. He wrote, 1. Tractatus de causis amissarum quarundam Linguarum Latinæ radicum, 8vo.; 2. Indagator & restitutor Græcæ Linguæ radicum; 3. Epistolæ, &c.—Moreri.

DAVN (Leopold count), a celebrated general, born in 1705. He was a colonel in 1740, and served the empress queen Maria Theresa with the greatest zeal and glory. The next war he added new laurels to those which he had already acquired. In 1757 he obtained a great victory over the king of Prussia at Chotchemitch; after a series of good fortune, however, the marshal met with a defeat at Torgau, in 1760. He died at Vienna in 1766.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DAURAT (John), a French poet, born in 1507. He made so great a progress in his studies at Paris, that he was appointed one of the Greek professors in that university. Charles IX. made him poet-laureat, and took great pleasure in his conversation. At the age of 80 he married a young girl, who brought him a son. His poems in Greek, Latin, and French, are exceedingly numerous. He died at Paris in 1588.—Moreri.

DAWES (Sir William), an English prelate, born at the seat of his father, Sir John Dawes, near Braintree in Essex, in 1671. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' school, from whence he went to St. John's college, Oxford, but after a stay there of two years he removed to Catherine hall, Cambridge. In 1696 he took the degree of D. D. and obtained the mastership of his college, to which he was a great benefactor. The same year he was made chaplain to the king, and prebendary of Worcester. In 1698 he obtained the rectory and deanry of Bocking. In 1707 he was promoted to the bishopric of Chester, from whence in 1714 he was translated to York. He died in 1724, and was buried in the chapel of Catherine hall. His sermons and other works were collected into 3 vols. 8vo. 1733.—Biog. Brit.

DAWES (Richard), a learned critic, was born in Leicestershire in 1708, and educated at Market Bosworth, under Anthony Blackwell, after which he was removed to Emmanuel college, Cambridge, where in 1731 he became fellow, and in 1733 M. A. In 1736 he published proposals and a specimen of a Greek translation of Paradise Lost, which was never completed. In 1738 he was appointed master of the grammar school at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. In 1745 he published his Miscellanea Critica, or a Collection of Remarks on various ancient authors, a work of high value, a new edition of which was printed at Oxford in 1781, by the rev. Mr. Burgess, since bishop of St. David's. In 1749 Dawes resigned his school, and died at Heworth, near Newcastle, in 1766.—Biog. Br.

DAY (John), an English printer. He had a shop under Aldergate, and another at the west door of St. Paul's. He printed the Bible, Fox's Martyrs, Latimer's Sermons, Tyndal's Works, and many other books. He died in good circumstances in 1585. He deserves a place here by having been a considerable promoter of the reformation.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

DAY (Thomas), an English writer, was born in Wellclose-square, London, in 1748. His father, who was a collector of the customs, died while he was an infant, and left him a fortune of twelve hundred a year. He received his education first at the Charter-house, from whence he was removed to Corpus Christi college, Oxford, after which he entered of the Middle Temple, but never followed the law as a profession. His manners were very eccentric, and his opinions romantic. He and his friend Mr. Bicknel took two orphan children from the workhouse at Shrewsbury to educate them in the ancient Roman manner, and afterwards to marry them. The project, however, failed, and Mr. Day married, in 1778, a Miss Mills of Derbyshire. He wrote against the American war and the slave trade; and was a strenuous advocate for parliamentary reform; but the only work by which his name will be perpetuated is the History of Sandford and Merton, a romantic tale, for young persons, pleasing, but fanciful, and of much the same stamp as Rousseau's Emilius. Mr. Day's notions were theoretical, and though marked with a good deal of sentiment, had little of experience or religion in them. His death was occasioned by his disregard of common customs. Having a favourite foal, he would not suffer it to be broke in, because it was cruel, but undertook the management of it himself, the consequence of which was, that the animal threw him and gave him a violent kick on the skull, of which he died September 8, 1789.—Biog. Brit. Life of Darwin, by Miss Seward.

DEACON (James), an English gentleman, who had a great skill in music, and drew portraits in miniature in an admirable style. He died in 1750.—Walpole

DEAGANT DE ST. MARCELLIN (Guichard), a French politician. He was an able negociator, but a bitter enemy to the calvinists. After enjoying the sunshine of court favour many years, he was disgraced and banished to Dauphiny, where he died in 1639. He published Memoirs down to 1624, which contain many curious facts.—Moreri.

DEBORAH, a Hebrew prophetess, who by her exhortations prevailed on Barak to march against Sisera, general of the troops of Jabin. In consequence of this victory she composed a sublime ode, B. C. 1285.—Book of Judges.

DECEBALUS, king of the Dacians, who resisted the Romans in the reign of Domitian. He entered the province of Mœsia, defeated and slew Oppius Sabinus, the Roman commander, and took a number of places. Afterwards he was defeated himself, but still resisted till Domitian agreed to pay him a tribute yearly, which was continued by Nero, but refused by Trajan, who entirely subdued Dacia, on which Decabalus put an end to himself, A.D. 105.—Univ. Hist.

DECEMBRIO (Peter Candido), an Italian writer, born at Pavia, in 1399. He became secretary to the pope, and to Alphonfus king of Arragon; and died at Milan in 1477. He wrote the lives of Philip Maria Visconti, and Francis Sforza, dukes of Milan; and translated into Italian Quintus Curtius and Livy, and into Latin, Appian's History, Diodorus Siculus, and part of Homer.—Trabocchi.

DECIO (Philip), an Italian lawyer, born at Milan in 1453. He became lecturer at Pisa and Pistoia, and was so eminent at disputation that at last no one would enter the lists with him. After being professor at several places, he settled in France, where he was honourably entertained. He died at Pisa in 1535.—Ibid.

DECIUS, a celebrated Roman, who served as a military tribune under the consul Cornelius Cossus, B. C. 343; and when the army was in danger of being cut off by the Samnites, he volunteered his services with his party, and completely routed them, for which a crown of gold was awarded him by the consul, an obdional crown of grass by the army, and a civic crown of oak by his own detachment. Two years afterwards he was chosen consul with Manlius Torquatus, at which time the Romans were at war with the Latins. On this occasion it was agreed on between the two consuls, that he whose army first receded from the enemy should devote himself for the good of his country. The division under Decius being hard pressed, gave way, on which he stripped himself of his military habit, and having devoted himself to the infernal deities, he rushed into the midst of the enemy and was slain. The army under Manlius then gained a terrible victory, and the body of Decius being found, was buried with military honours.—Livy.

DECIUS, the son of the above, was consul three times, and also censor. Being engaged against the Gauls and Samnites, and victory dubious, he imitated his father, by devoting himself, and was slain, after which the Romans defeated the enemy, with great slaughter.—Ibid.

DECIUS, a Roman emperor, was born in Pannonia. The emperor Philip sent him to quell a sedition in Mœsia, but instead of obeying his directions, he turned his arms against him, and on his death assumed the imperial diadem. He distinguished himself by an expedition against the Persians, and by persecuting the christians. In his march against the Goths he entered a morass, where he and his army perished by the attack of the enemy, A. D. 251.—Univ. Hist.

DECKER, or DEKHER (John), a learned jesuit, and chancellor of the university of Gratz in Stiria, where he died in 1619, aged 69. He wrote, 1. Velificatio, seu theorematum de anno ortus ac mortis Domini, &c. 1616.—Moreri.

DECKER (Thomas), an English dramatist of the 17th century. He was cotemporary with Ben Jonson, who satirised him in his Poetaster under the name of Crispinus, but Decker retorted in his Satyromastix, or untrussing of a humorous poet. He wrote several plays, some of which possess considerable merit. He died after 1638.—Biog. Dramat.

DEDEKIND (Frederick), a German writer of the 16th century, who wrote a piece of irony in praise of ill manners, under the title of Grobianus, sive de incultis moribus et inurbanis gestibus, Frankfort, 1538, 8vo.—Moreri.

DEE (John), an English mathematician, born at London in 1527, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. On the founding of Trinity college he was chosen one of the fellows. Falling under the suspicion of magical practices, he went to Louvain, where he took his doctor's degree in civil law. He read lectures in the mathematics there, and at other universities, with applause. In 1551 he returned to England and obtained the rectory of Upton-upon-Severn. His application to the mathematics brought upon him the accusation of magic, and in the reign of Mary he was imprisoned for some time on a suspicion of treasonable practices. He was in great favour with queen Elizabeth, who visited him at Mortlake, where he collected a great library. In 1581 he and Edward Kelly began their magical operations, which lasted two years, in which they were joined by a Polish nobleman called Laski, who persuaded them to go to Poland, where they remained some time. Their adventures abroad made so much noise that the queen thought proper to order Dee home. In 1596 he was made warden of Manchester college, and died at Mortlake in 1608. He published several mathematical works in Latin and English, and wrote many more which were never printed; but in 1659 Dr. Meric Casaubon published, A true and faithful Relation of what passed for many years between Dr. John Dee and some Spirits, &c.—Biog. Br.

DEZZECI (William), a German musician, who came to England and was leader of the band at Marybone gardens; he also composed for Vauxhall. He excelled in playing on the violin. His death happened about 1750.—Hutchins. Bury DE FOE (Daniel), an English writer, was the son of James Foe, a butcher of London, and born in 1660. How he came to alter his name does not appear, nor what was his original occupation. In 1688 he kept a hofier's shop in Cornhill, but becoming a bankrupt, he had recourse to his pen for a subsistence. In 1695 he was made acc-comptant to the commissioners of the glass duty, which office he held till that impost was taken off. In 1701 he produced his True-born Englishman, a satire, coarse and bold, but characteristic. The year following appeared his Shortest Way with the Dissenters, for which he was sentenced to the pillory, fined and imprisoned. On regaining his liberty he retired to St. Edmund's Bury, where he continued to exercise his pen. He was instrumental in promoting the union of England and Scotland. In 1713 he was again committed to prison for some political pamphlets, but lord Oxford procured him the queen's pardon. In 1715 he published his Family Instructor, a religious performance of merit; and in 1719 his greatest work, the romance of Robinson Crusoe, supposed to have been founded on the story of Alexander Selkirk's being left on the island of Juan Fernandez. De Foe wrote a prodigious number of other books, and died in 1731, leaving a daughter who married Mr. Baker the naturalist.—Biog. Brit.

DEJOTARUS, a tetrarch of Galatia, who was created by the Romans king of that country, with the addition of Lesser Armenia. He joined Pompey, but on his defeat he submitted himself to Cæsar, who deprived him of Armenia, and afterwards entirely dethroned him.—Univ. Hist.

DELAMET (Adrian Augustin de Buffy), a learned French ecclesiastic, was born of a noble family in Picardy, about 1621. He was related to cardinal de Retz, whom he accompanied in his travels. On his return to Paris he settled in the college of the Sorbonne, where he died in 1631. His principal work is "a Refolution of numerous Cases of Conscience," 1714, which was afterwards republished by M. Treuve, in a new form, entitled a Dictionary of Cases of Conscience, 2 vols. folio.—Morri.

DELANY (Patrick), a learned divine, was the son of a farmer in Ireland, and born in that kingdom about 1686. He became first a fizar, and afterwards fellow of Trinity college, Dublin. He obtained some church preferment from lord Carteret; and in 1732 published in London his work entitled Revelation examined with Candour; and the same year he married a widow of large fortune. In 1738 appeared his Reflections upon Polygamy. His next publication was the Life of David, king of Israel, which is an ingenious and elaborate performance. In 1743 he married a second wife, who was the widow of a Cornish gentleman, and the year following he obtained the deanry of Downe. In 1754 he published Observations on Lord Orrery's Remarks on the Life and Writings of Swift, in which there are many curious anecdotes of that singular genius. He continued publishing something or other nearly till his death, which happened at Bath in 1768. His sermons on Social Duties are very excellent.—Biog. Br.

DELANY (Mary), the second wife of the above, was the daughter of lord Lansdowne. At the age of 17 she was married to a Cornish gentleman, who died in 1724, from which time she continued a widow till 1743, when she became the wife of Dr. Delany. On his decease she went to live with her friend the duchess dowager of Portland; and when that lady died the king gave her a house at Windsor, with a pension of 300*l.* a year. She died in 1788. Mrs. Delany was a very ingenious woman, and painted several pictures of great merit. She also completed a flora in a superior style, consisting of 980 plants.—Biog. Br.

DELAUNE (Thomas), a nonconformist, who in 1683 published a reply to Dr. Benjamin Calamy's discourse concerning a scrupulous conscience. Delaune's book was called a Plea for the Nonconformists, and gave so much offence, that the author was sent to Newgate. He was afterwards brought to trial, and sentenced to pay a heavy fine, which being unable to do, he remained in prison till his death.—Neale's Puritans.

DELSYNE (Alexander), an ingenious French writer, born at Bourdeaux. He acquired reputation by a very able analysis of the works of lord Bacon, in 3 vols. 12mo. He also wrote the Genius of Montesquieu; the Spirit of St. Evremond; several articles in the Encyclopedie; and assisted the Abbé Raynal in his History of the Commerce of the Indies. He died in 1797.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DELFT (Jacob), a portrait painter of the city of Delft, born in 1619, and died in 1661. He was the grandson of Mirevelt, and equalled him in the force and delicacy of his productions.—Houbraken.

DELIVIA (Christopher Traugott), a mineralogical writer, was born at Walhausen in Thuringia. He served in the army some time, and on leaving it was appointed to a place in the establishment of the Hungarian mines. Afterwards he was called to Vienna in the department of the mines and mint. He died in Italy, in 1799, aged 51. He wrote, a Dissertation on Mountains, 8vo.; an Introduction to the Art of Mining, 4to; both highly esteemed.—Gen. Biog.

DELMONT (Deodat), a painter of history, born at St. Tron in 1581, and a disciple of Rubens, who highly valued him for his genius. He died in 1634.—M. veri.

DELRIO (Martin Antony), a learned jesuit, was born at Antwerp in 1551. He took his doctor's degree at Salamanca, and afterwards became professor of divinity at several universities. He died at Louvain in 1608, aged 57. He wrote, 1. Disquisitiones Magicæ; 2. Commentaries on some Books of the Old Testament; 3. Explanations of difficult Passages of Scripture.—Ibid.

DEMADES, an Athenian orator, who was at first a mariner, and taken prisoner by Philip of Macedon, who was greatly pleased with his conversation. He was put to death by Cassander 322 B. C. An oration of his may be found in the Rhetorum Collectio, Venice, 1513.—Plutarch.

DEMARATUS, king of Sparta, who accused Clemens before the ephori as the disturber of Greece, for which he retorted upon Demaratus the charge of illegitimacy, and having bribed the priests of Delphos; the oracle, when consulted, confirmed the charge. Demaratus then resigned the crown, and afterwards entered into the Persian service, where he was entertained by Darius Hytastes and Xerxes as a king.—Herodotus.

DEMESTR (John), a divine and physician. He was chaplain and surgeon-major to the army of the prince bishop of Liege, in which city he died in 1783, aged 38. His Letters on Chemistry were printed at Paris in 1779.—Novv. Diss. Hist.

DEMETRIUS, king of Macedon, and surnamed Poliorcetes on account of the many places which he destroyed, was the son of Antigonus. At the age of twenty-two his father entrusted him with an army against Ptolemy, by whom he was defeated near Gaza. However, he soon regained the loss, and with a fleet of 250 ships sailed to Athens, which he delivered from the hands of Demetrius Phalereus. He afterwards defeated Cassander at Thermopylae. For these exploits the Athenians raised statues to his honour, and even went so far as to deify him. The successors of Alexander, alarmed at his progress, collected their forces, and marched against him. They met at Ipsus, B. C. 301; and after an obstinate battle, the army of Demetrius was defeated, and his father slain, but he himself fled to Ephesus, the ungrateful Athenians having refused him an asylum after this change of fortune. However he mustered a new army, and generously relieved Athens from the tyranny under which it groaned. He then slew Alexander the son of Cassander, and seated himself on the throne of Macedonia. At the end of seven years he was obliged to quit his dominion and retire into Asia, where he was reduced to great distress; on which he went to the court of Seleucus, his son-in-law, but after some time a difference broke out between them, and war ensued, in which Demetrius was defeated and taken prisoner. Seleucus confined him in a castle, but allowed him to take the diversion of hunting. He died in consequence of excessive drinking, B. C. 286. His posterity reigned on the Macedonian throne till the time of Perseus, who was vanquished by the Romans.—Plutarch.

DEMETRIUS I. king of Syria, surnamed Soter, was the son of Seleucus Philopator. He was sent hostage to Rome by his father, on whose death Antiochus Epiphanes, and after him his son Antiochus Eupator, the one the uncle, and the other the cousin of Demetrius, usurped the throne of Syria. He applied to the Roman senate for assistance to recover his right, but in vain. The Syrians, however, recognised him for their lawful prince, and at last he obtained the throne. He then declared war against the Jews, in which Judas Maccabæus lost his life bravely fighting for the liberties of his country. A confederacy of the neighbouring kings was formed against Demetrius, who, after numerous acts of valour, was slain, B. C. 150.—Univ. Hist.

DEMETRIUS II. called Nicator, the son of the preceding. Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, placed him on the throne of his father, after expelling the usurper Alexander Balas, B. C. 146. He married Cleopatra, the wife of the same Alexander, and daughter to Ptolemy. After this he abandoned himself to dissipation, and left the reins of government to the management of his flatterers. He formed an alliance with the Jews, and marched to the east, where he was taken prisoner by the king of Parthia, who bestowed his daughter upon him in marriage, which so incensed Cleopatra, that she married Antiochus Sidetes her brother-in-law. Sidetes, however, fell in battle, and Demetrius recovered his throne. His reign then became so intolerable, that his subjects solicited the king of Egypt to grant them another sovereign. Demetrius fled, and was killed by the governor of Tyre, B. C. 127.—Ibid.

DEMETRIUS (Phalereus), a philosopher of the peripatetic sect, and disciple of Theophrastus. The Athenians were so charmed with his eloquence, as to erect statues to his honour. He afterwards fell into disgrace, and his life being threatened, he fled to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, whose son banished him from his dominions, and he soon afterwards died by the bite of an asp, 284 B. C. He wrote a number of books, and furnished the library of Alexandria with 200,000 volumes. The treatise on Rhetoric attributed to him, is generally allowed to be of more modern date.—Vossius de Hist. Græc.

DEMETRIUS, a cynic philosopher, who lived in the time of Caligula, who sent him a large present to gain him to his interest, but the sage refused it, saying, "If Caligula wishes to bribe me, let him give me his crown." Vespasian banished him on account of his insolence. Seneca, however, gives him a high encomium.—Moreri.

DEMETRIUS, czar of Russia, commonly called the false Demetrius, was, according to most historians, a native of Jaroslaw, and a novice in a monastery, where he was tutored by an old monk to personate Demetrius, son of the czar John Basilowitz, which prince had been murdered by Boris Gudenow. Having learnt his tale, he went into Lithuania, where he was taken into the service of a nobleman named Wiefnowitski, to whom he revealed his story, and who espoused his cause. Boris hearing of this rival, sent assassins to dispatch him; of which his patron being informed, conveyed him to Mniieski, palatine of Sandomir, who promised to assist him in his design on the Russian throne, on condition of his embracing the Roman catholic religion, which terms were gladly accepted, and he was married to the palatine's daughter. In 1604 Demetrius marched into Russia at the head of a small army, and was soon joined by a number of Russians and Cossacs. He defeated an army sent against him, and an insurrection took place in his favour. On the death of Boris the people strangled his son, and placed Demetrius on the throne; but his partiality to the Poles and contempt of the Greek religion occasioned an insurrection, and he was assassinated in 1606, after reigning about eleven months. Though the greater number of historians account him an impostor, there are some writers, among whom is Mr. Coxe, who reckon him to have been the real prince Demetrius.—Coxe's Travels in Russia.

DEMISSY (Cæsar), a Prussian divine, born at Berlin in 1703. After living some years in Holland, he came to London, and was appointed preacher at the French chapel in the Savoy, and chaplain to the king. He died in 1775. He assisted Wetstein in his edition of the Greek Testament, and Dr. Jortin in his Life of Erasmus.—Gen. Biog. Dic.

DEMOCEDES, a famous Grecian physician, was a native of Crotona, and the son of Calliphon. Being displeased with his father's rigour, he went to Ægina, thence to Athens, where he had a public salary, and lastly he served Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. On the death of that prince Democedes and his family became captives to the Persians, and was carried to Susa in chains, where he worked with the other slaves. But happening to cure the leg of Darius, he was liberally rewarded and admitted to the royal table. He at last got back to his own country by stratagem, and married the daughter of Milo the famous wrestler.—Herodotus. Ælian. Var. Hist.

DEMOCRITUS, a famous philosopher, was born at Abdera in Thrace, about 460 B. C. His father was a man of great wealth, but Democritus preferred philosophy to riches, and spent the whole of his patrimony in travelling to acquire knowledge. There was a law in his country, that whoever reduced himself to poverty should be deprived of the rights of sepulture. Democritus had incurred this rigid sentence, but his talents were such, that the magistrates decreed he should be buried at the public expence. Some, however, charged him with insanity, and Hippocrates was sent for to cure him, but the physician declared, that they who had sent for him were more mad than the patient. He was constantly laughing at the follies of mankind, and therein was more to be commended than Heraclitus, who was always weeping on the same pretence. He died at the age of 109. None of his writings have come down to us. He was the author of the atomical philosophy, and the precursor of Epicurus.—Stanley's Hist. Phil. Moreri.

DEMONAX, a philosopher of Crete, in the reign of Adrian. He paid no regard to riches, nor to any particular sect, but gathered what he thought good from them all. When he was hungry he used to go into the first house he met with, without ceremony, and partake what it afforded. He died at the age of 100.—Moreri.

DEMOSTHENES, the greatest orator of antiquity, was the son of an Athenian, who acquired great wealth by manufacturing sword blades, and born about 380 B. C. Having lost his father when a child, his education was neglected, but at the age of seventeen he determined to study eloquence, though his lungs were weak, his pronunciation inarticulate, and his gestures awkward. These impediments, however, he conquered by perseverance, by declaiming as he walked up the side of steep hills, also on the sea-shore, when the weather was rough, and by putting pebbles in his mouth. To acquire a good gesture he used to practise before a mirror, and to correct a bad habit of shrugging up one of his shoulders, he placed a sharp pointed sword just over it in the place where he stood. The principles of his art he acquired under Ælius, and he attended also the lectures of Plato. Not being ready at first in making extemporaneous harangues, he studied his orations with great care in a cave, on which account his enemies used to say, that they smelt of the lamp. When he first came into public life, the encroachments of Philip of Macedon alarmed all the Grecian states, particularly Athens. Demosthenes was forward in rousing his countrymen to a proper sense of their danger. He depicted the ambitious designs of Philip in the most glowing colours, and with so much effect, that similar orations are to this day called Philippics. When that monarch was about to invade Attica, Demosthenes was sent as ambassador to prevail on the Boeotians to assist them, in which mission he succeeded. He was also at the battle of Cheronea, where the orator played the coward and fled, for which several accusations were preferred against him, but he was acquitted. On the death of Philip he appeared in public with a garland on his head, though he had but just lost his daughter. Demosthenes thought this a favourable opportunity to destroy the Macedonian power, and by his exertions a new confederacy was formed among the Grecian states; which was soon broken by the activity of Alexander. The influence of Demosthenes being now on the decline, Æschines took advantage of it to bring an accusation against him on the subject of his conduct at Cheronea, and his having had a crown of gold awarded him; but the orator so well defended himself in his celebrated oration De Corona, that he was honourably acquitted, and his adversary sent into exile. Shortly after this, however, Demosthenes was convicted of receiving a golden cup and twenty talents from Harpalus, one of Alexander's generals, who had retired to Athens with a quantity of plunder, which he had gathered in Asia. To avoid punishment he fled to Ægina, where he remained till the death of Alexander, when he was recalled by his countrymen, and brought home in triumph. But this change of fortune was of short duration. The victory of Antipater was followed by an order to the Athenians to deliver up Demosthenes, who fled to the temple of Neptune at Calurnia, and being pursued, poisoned himself, B. C. 322. The Athenians erected a statue to his memory, and maintained his eldest child at the public expence. Out of sixty-five orations only a few have reached us; the best edition of which is that of Keiske, 8vo. 1720. — Plutarch in Vit. Demosth.

DEMSTER (Thomas), a Scotch writer, who studied at Cambridge, from whence he removed to Paris, where he married. He was afterwards professor of philology at Pisa, where his wife eloped from him with one of his scholars. He died at Bologna in 1625. He wrote several books, the most curious of which are a Martyrology of Scotland; a List of Scottish Writers; and a History of the Etruscans, but all of them are deficient in veracity. — Bayle.

DENHAM (Sir John), an English poet. He was born in 1615 at Dublin, where his father was chief baron of the exchequer, but afterwards became a judge in England. In 1631 he was sent to Trinity college, Oxford, from whence he went to Lincoln's-inn, but he made little or no progress in the law. In 1641 appeared his tragedy of Sophy, and soon after he was made governor of Farcham castle for the king. In 1643 he published his Cooper's Hill, the best of all his works. He attended Charles II. in his exile, and was sent by him ambassador to Poland. At the restoration he was appointed surveyor-general of the royal buildings, and created knight of the Bath. He died in 1668, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His Cooper's Hill is a very descriptive poem, and gave rise to a new species of composition, which, says Johnson, may be denominated local poetry. Pope has bestowed on him the compliment of the majestic Denham. — Biog. Brit. Johnson's Lives of the Poets.

DENMARK; the peninsula which forms the principal part of this kingdom, and which is now called Jutland, was the ancient seat of the Cimbri, and in the following ages was named Chersonesus Cimbrica. We have no accounts of this country prior to 714, when Gormo is said to have been king of it. It has never been conquered, or made tributary. — Uain. Hist.

DENNER (Balthasar), a portrait painter, born at Hamburg in 1685, and died in 1747. He painted the portrait of an old woman, for which he was offered 500 guineas and refused it. — Pilkington.

DENNIS (John), an English critic, was born in London in 1657. He received his education at Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. In 1692 he wrote a pindaric ode on king William, after which he published several other poems, two of which, on the battles of Blenheim and Ramilies, procured him the favour of the duke of Marlborough, who gave him 100*l.* and procured him a place in the custom-house. In 1704 appeared his tragedy of Liberty asserted: which being chiefly an invective against the French nation, became popular. When the treaty of Utrecht was negotiating, the author thought himself of so much consequence, that he went to the duke of Marlborough, and begged he would use his interest that he might not be delivered up to the French king. The duke gravely told him, that "he had made no provision for himself, though he could not help thinking, but he had done the French almost as much mischief as Mr. Dennis." In 1713 he attacked Mr. Addison's Cato, which occasioned a whimsical pamphlet, called The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable frenzy of Mr. John Dennis. He died in 1734. — Biog. Brit.

DENNY (Sir Anthony), a favourite of Henry VIII. was born of a good family in Hertfordshire, and received his education at St. John's college, Cambridge. At an early age he became a courtier, and was honoured with the rank of privy counsellor and knighted. He also had a large share of the plunder of the church lands. Henry had so great an opinion of him, that he constituted him one of his executors, and left him a legacy of 800*l*. He died in 1550.—Granger.

DENTON (John), an English divine, educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he contracted an intimacy with Mr. Tillotson, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. He was ejected in 1662 from the living of Oswaldkirk, in Yorkshire; but he conformed afterwards and obtained the living of Stonegrave, in Yorkshire, and a prebend in York cathedral. He died in 1708, aged 83. He wrote some religious and polemical tracts.—Gen. Mag. Dict.

DENTRECOLLES (Francis Xavier), a French jesuit, who went to China as a missionary, and died there in 1741, aged 77. He wrote several books in the Chinese language.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DENYS (James), a painter of Antwerp, born in 1645. He studied in Italy, where he improved himself by copying the works of the greatest masters. He afterwards returned to his native city, where he died. He painted history and portrait.—Pill.

DEPARCIEUX (Anthony), a French mathematician, was born in the diocese of Uzes, in 1708. He was distinguished for constructing sun-dials on a new plan, and meridian lines. He wrote a Treatise on Trigonometry, 4to.; Essays on the Probabilities of the Duration of human Life, 4to. which gained him admittance into the academy of sciences. He also wrote a memoir on the Inundations of the Seine, and other works. He died in 1768.—Eloge par M. François.

DERBY (James Stanley, earl of), a gallant English nobleman, who gave many signal proofs of his courage and loyalty in the civil war, particularly in the action at Wigan in Lancashire, where, with 600 horse, he bravely withstood a body of 3000 horse and foot, commanded by colonel Lilburne. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and safely beheaded, in violation of a promise of quarter which had been given him, October 15, 1651. The heroine, his countess, who so bravely defended Latham house, with no less valour maintained the Isle of Man, where she regarded herself as queen, and defied the regicides and usurpers. She was the last person in the British dominions who yielded to the rebels.—Granger. Clarendon.

DERCYLLIDAS, a Lacedemonian general, who about 400 B.C. took several cities from the Persians. He recovered the liberties of Greece, and delivered Cherfoneus from the incursions of the Thracians, by building a wall across the country.—Moreri.

DERING (Edward), an English divine of the 16th century. He was a native of Kent, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge. Afterwards he became preacher at St. Paul's, and died in 1576. He wrote lectures on the Hebrews, and sermons.—Granger.

DERHAM (William), an English divine and philosopher, was born at Stowton, near Worcester, in 1657, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. On entering into orders he obtained the vicarage of Wargrave, in Berkshire. In 1689 he was presented to the rectory of Upminster, in Essex. Here he devoted himself to philosophical pursuits, became a member of the royal society, and contributed largely to the Philosophical Transactions. In 1713 he published his Physico Theology, being the substance of his Boyle's Lectures, with curious notes; and in 1714 appeared his Astro Theology, which was also delivered at the same lecture. In 1716 he was made canon of Windsor, and in 1730 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. He assisted various writers, and published some pieces of Mr. Ray. The last thing he published of his own was Christo-Theology, or a Demonstration of the divine Authority of the Christian Religion, 1730. In his younger days he published a treatise, entitled The Artificial Clockmaker, in 12mo. which has been several times reprinted. He died at Upminster in 1735.—Biog. Brit.

DERING (sir Edward), a native of Kent, who distinguished himself in the reign of Charles I. by his zeal for the reform of abuses, as he called them, particularly in the church, for which purpose he brought in a bill to abolish bishops, deans, and chapters. However he afterwards joined the king with a regiment of horse, at his own expence, and was a considerable sufferer for the royal cause. He died before the restoration. His speeches in parliament are in print in one volume, 4to.—Granger. Clarendon.

DERYCK, or DERICK (Peter Cornelius), a painter of Delft, born in 1568, and died in 1630. He was the disciple of Hubert Jacobs, after which he went to Italy, where he studied with great success. He excelled in landscape paintings.—Pilkington.

DERYKE (William), a painter of Antwerp, who died in 1697. He painted historical subjects in a bold manner.—Ibid.

DESAIGUIERS (John Theophilus), an ingenious philosopher, was born in 1683 at Rochelle, from whence his father, who was a minister, brought him to London, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was educated at Christchurch, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of LL.D. and entered into holy orders. In 1710 he succeeded Dr. Keil as lecturer in experimental philosophy at Oxford. He afterwards practised that profession in London, and continued it with great reputation to his death. He had the honour of delivering a course before George I. and the royal family, but never received any other preferment than the living of Edgeware, given to him by the duke of Chandos, and a small one in Essex by the king. He published, a Course of Experimental Philosophy; a Dissertation on Electricity; Fires Improved, being a new Method of building Chimneys, so as to prevent their smoking: he also translated into English, Gravesande's Mathematical Elements of Natural Philosophy. He was a useful member of the royal society, and contributed several papers to their Transactions. He died in 1749.—Biog. Brit.

DESAIX (Louis Charles Anthony), a French general, was born near Riom, in 1768. He entered early into the army, and rose to the rank of lieutenant. In the early part of the revolution he became aid-du-camp to general Custine. He was severely wounded at the battle of Lauterbourg, but still kept the field, rallying the battalions which were in disorder. Named successively general of brigade and of division, he contributed greatly, by his talents, to the famous retreat of Moreau. In the battle of Rastadt he commanded the left wing of the French, and forced the archduke Charles to retire. He afterwards defended the bridge of Kehl with great bravery, and was wounded. He served with Buonaparte in Egypt, where he distinguished himself greatly, and was appointed governor of the upper part of the country. He signed the treaty of El-Arish with the Turks and English, and then returned to Leghorn, where he was detained by admiral Lord Keith, as prisoner of war. He afterwards obtained his parole, and went to France. He accompanied Buonaparte to Italy, and was killed at the battle of Marengo, to which victory he principally contributed, June 14, 1800.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DESAULT (Peter), a French physician, was born at Arzac, in 1675, and died at Bourdeaux in 1787. He published an esteemed treatise on the venereal disease, and a method of curing it without salivation, and another on the stone in the kidneys and the bladder, with an answer to a critique by Astruc, on the above mentioned treatise.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DESAULT (Peter Joseph), an eminent French surgeon, was born in 1744, at Magni Vernois, near Macon, and educated at the Jesuits' college, with a view to the priesthood, which profession he declined, and became an apprentice in the military hospital at Besfort. At the age of twenty he removed to Paris, where he applied with uncommon assiduity to the study of anatomy and surgery. In 1766 he commenced teacher of anatomy, and his fame soon spreading, he had three hundred pupils under him. In 1778 he was admitted a member of the corporation of surgeons, and in 1782 was appointed surgeon-major to the hospital of Charity, after which he became head surgeon of the hotel Dieu. In 1791 he commenced his Journal de Chirurgie, a work of considerable reputation. During the violence of the revolution he was confined some time in the Luxembourg prison, but his usefulness saved his life. He died while attending the dauphin, June 1, 1793, which induced a suspicion in some, that he was dispatched because he would not poison that unfortunate prince. He left a work entitled Traité des Maladies chirurgicales, &c. 2 vol. 8vo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DES BARREAU (James de Vallec, lord), an ingenious French nobleman, born at Paris in 1602. He was for some time counsellor in the parliament of Paris, of which place he was deprived by cardinal Richelieu. Des Barreaux was a great libertine, but in the latter part of his life he devoted himself to religious studies, and composed that beautiful sonnet, Grand Dieu, tes jugemens, &c. He died in 1647.—Ibid.

DESSILONS (Francis Joseph), a French Jesuit, born at Chateaufort in 1711, and died at Manheim in 1788. He wrote 2 vols. of Fables, and some Latin poems; he also published an edition of Phædrus, with notes.—Ibid.

DESBOIS (Francis Alexander), a French writer, born in 1699, and died in 1784, in the hospital at Paris. He published a Military Dictionary, 3 vols. 8vo.; a Dictionary of Agriculture, 2 vols. 8vo.; a Dictionary of Animals, 4 vols. 8vo., and several others.—Ibid.

DES CARTES (René), a celebrated French philosopher, was born of a noble family at La Haye, in Touraine, in 1596. He received his education at the Jesuits' college at La Fleche, where he acquired a considerable knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages. On leaving that seminary he removed to Paris, where he contracted an acquaintance with the celebrated father Mersenne, at whose instance he applied to the study of mathematics. In 1616 he entered into the army of the prince of Orange; and, while serving in the garrison at Breda, solved a difficult mathematical problem which had been posted up in the public streets. This introduced him to the acquaintance of the learned Isaac Beckman, principal of the college of Dort. While at Breda, he wrote in Latin, a treatise on music, and projected some other works. He next served in the army of the duke of Bavaria, but soon after quitted the military life, and travelled into Italy, where he saw the famous Galileo at Florence. In 1629 he settled at Amsterdam, and applied assiduously to the mathematical sciences, particularly dioptrics, in which he made some important discoveries. About this time he visited England, and during his stay made some observations on the declination of the magnetic needle. His philosophy now became the subject of much discussion, and met with an extensive reception, though with considerable opposition. Gilbert Voet, rector of the university of Utrecht, wrote against it, and Des Cartes replied with a virulence unbecoming a philosopher. At the invitation of Christina, queen of Sweden, he went to Stockholm, where he obtained a pension and an estate. He died in that city in 1650, and in 1666 his remains were taken up and conveyed to Paris, where they were interred with great pomp in the church of St. Genevieve. The philosophy of Des Cartes has long since sunk into contempt, because it was merely a visionary hypothesis. But he was unquestionably a man of great parts, and of a vigorous imagination. His principal works are, 1. Principia Philosophiæ; 2. Dissertatio de Methodo recte regendæ Rationis, &c.; 3. Dioptrica; 4. Meditationes; 5. Geometry; 6. Letters.—Moreri.

DESERICIUS, or DESERITZ (Joseph Innocent), an Hungarian divine, was born at Nitra, in 1702. Being called to Rome, he was created a cardinal, and appointed by pope Benedict XIV. ambassador to the hospodar of Wallachia. He died in his native country in 1765. He wrote, 1. Pro cultu Litterarum in Hungaria, ac speciatim civitate Dioecesi que Vindictio, 4to.; 2. De Initii ac majoribus Hungarorum Commentaria, 5 vols. fol.; 3. Historia Episcopatus Dioecesis et civitatis Vacienfis, fol.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DESODOTS (Anthony), a French architect, was born at Paris in 1653. On his passage to Rome in 1674, he was taken by the Algerines, and kept in slavery sixteen months. On being exchanged he repaired to Rome, where he composed a work entitled "The antient Edifices of Rome drawn and measured with the greatest exactness," folio. A new edition of this appeared in 1779. At his return to Paris he was constituted comptroller of the royal buildings, and afterwards architect to the king. He died in 1728. Two works of his on architecture were published after his death.—Ibid.

DESHAYS (John Baptist Henry), a celebrated French painter, born at Rouen in Normandy, in 1729. In 1751 he gained a prize of the academy, and became a pupil in the king's school, under Carlo Vanloo. After studying there and at Rome, he was elected into the academy. He died in 1765.—Ibid.

DESIDERIUS, or DIDIER, the last king of Lombardy, succeeded Astolphus in 756. His daughters were married to the two sons of Pepin, king of France, Carloman and Charlemagne. Desiderius invaded the papal territories, on which the pope called in Charlemagne to his aid, who marched into Lombardy, took his father-in-law prisoner, and sent him with his family to France, where they died.—Moreri.

DESMARIS (Joseph), a French dramatic writer, born at Sully-sur-Loire in 1722, died in 1761. His comedy of the Impertinent was received with applause. A complete edition of his works appeared in 1777, in 2 vols. 12mo.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DESMAIZEAUX (Peter), a biographical writer, was the son of a protestant minister at Auvergne in France, where he was born in 1666. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he took refuge in England, and became fellow of the royal society. He died in London in 1745. He translated into English Bayle's Dictionary, and wrote the Lives of Chillingworth and John Hales. He had also a concern in the great historical Dictionary, 10 vols. folio.—Moreri.

DESMARES (Toussaint), a French priest, of the jansenist persuasion, who was sent by his partizans to defend their opinions before pope Innocent X. The duke de Liancourt took him to be his domestic chaplain at his country seat, where he died in 1687, aged 87. He composed the Necrologe de Port Royal, printed in 1723, and some other works.—Ibid.

DESMARETS (Nicholas), a French statesman. He was nephew of the great Colbert, and had the place of comptroller-general of the finances. He died in 1721. There was published after his death an account of his administration, which is very curious.—Moreri.

DESMOLETS (Peter Nicholas), a French ecclesiastic, born at Paris in 1677, and died in 1760. He continued Sallengre's "Memoirs of Literature," 11 vols. 12mo. and edited Lamy's Treatise "De Tabernaculo Fœderis Sancta Civitate Jerusalem et Templo ejus," folio: and Pouget's "Institutiones Catholicæ in modum Catechesos," 2 vols. fol.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DESPARD (Edward Marcus), a character of some notoriety, was a native of Queen's county in Ireland, where his family lived in considerable repute. He early embraced a military life as an ensign, and became an excellent engineer. At the close of the American war he served in the West Indies, where he distinguished himself by an expedition on the Spanish main, in which he had for a coadjutor, captain, since lord, Nelson. For his services there he was made lieutenant-colonel, and in 1784 was appointed superintendent of the English affairs in the bay of Honduras; but his conduct giving offence to the settlers, complaints were sent home against him, and he was suspended, and arrived in England in 1790. He applied to government for an investigation of his conduct, which was rejected, as also were his claims. He now became a violent democrat, and in consequence of his inflammatory conduct was apprehended and sent, during the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, to Cold Bath Fields prison, from whence he was removed to the House of Industry at Shrewsbury, and next to Torchill-fields bridewell. After wards he was liberated on his own recognition. His long confinement, however, had not the proper effect in making him prudent. He endeavoured to seduce the soldiery, and having collected some followers, held secret meetings at different alehouses, to which no persons were admitted without taking a treasonable oath. At these assemblies various plans were devised for the murder of the king; and at last it was determined to make the attack when his majesty should go to the parliament house. The plot being discovered by some of the conspirators, the colonel and several others were taken up, and after a confinement of some time, were brought to trial by a special commission at the sessions house in Southwark, February 5, 1803. The charges being clearly proved, Despard and nine others were found guilty, and on Monday the 21st were all executed on a scaffold on the top of the prison gate, and after their heads were cut off, the remains were delivered to their friends for interment. The colonel betrayed no signs of repentance or concern for the misery which he had brought upon himself and his misled companions, but gloried in the cause to the last.—Public Characters, IV. Monthly Mag.

DESPAUTERE (John), a grammarian, born at Ninove in Flanders, and died at Comines in 1520. He wrote several grammatical treatises, which were once very popular on the continent.—Moreri.

DESPIERRES (John), a benedictine monk, and superior of the college of that order at Douay, where he died in 1664, aged 67. He was distinguished for his mathematical and mechanical talents, and constructed an iron sphere which exhibited the planetary motions. He wrote, on the Roman Calendar; a Commentary on the Psalms; a Defence of the Vulgate Translation of the Bible, and other works.—Moreri.

DESPLACES, a French engraver, who died in 1749. He executed several fine pieces after the paintings of Jouvenet, Guido, and other great masters.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

DESPORTES (Francis), a French painter, born at Champagne in 1661, and died at Paris in 1743. He excelled in painting animals and hunting pieces.—D'Argenville.

DESTOUCHES (Andre), a French musician, born at Paris in 1672. The king was so pleased with his opera of Isle, that he gave him 200 louis-d'ors. He died in 1740.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

DESTOUCHES (Philip Mericault), a French dramatic writer, born at Tours in 1680. He was sent to London in 1717, to aid the negotiations then carrying on. He continued there seven years, and married. On his return to his own country he refused the offer of being sent ambassador to Russia, but retired into the country, where he devoted himself to agriculture and the belles-lettres. He died in 1754. His two best pieces are "Le Philosophe Marié," and "La Glorieux;" the last of which is esteemed one of the best comedies in the French language, after Voltaire. His works were printed at the Louvre in 4 vols. 4to. 1757, and since in 10 vols. 12mo.—D'Alembert Eloges. Acad.

DEVAUX (John), a French surgeon, born at Paris in 1649, and died in 1720. He wrote several esteemed works, particularly one on Preserving Health by Instinct, and another on making Reports in Surgery. He also translated several medical books into French.—Novo. Dict. Hist.

DEVREUX (Robert), earl of Essex, was the son of Walter earl of Essex, and born in 1567, at Netherwood in Herefordshire. Lord Burleigh was his guardian, and Dr. Whitgift his tutor at Cambridge. In 1585 he accompanied the earl of Leicester to Holland, where he behaved with great bravery at the battle of Zutphen. On his return to England he was made master of the horse, and rose rapidly in the royal favour. In 1589 he went with sir Francis Drake and sir John Norris, in an expedition to Portugal, which gave great displeasure to the queen, as it was without her consent. Her majesty was also offended with him soon after for marrying privately a daughter of sir Francis Walsingham, and the widow of sir Philip Sidney. In 1591 he commanded the forces sent to the assistance of Henry IV. of France, which expedition was unsuccessful. In 1596 he was appointed joint-commander with lord Howard in an expedition against Spain, where he contributed greatly to the capture of Cadiz. After this he had the command of a fleet sent out to intercept the Spanish plate fleet, but nothing was done except the taking of Fayal by a separate division of the squadron, commanded by sir Walter Raleigh, which produced a dispute between him and the earl. In 1597 Essex was made earl marshal of England and in the following year spoke vehemently against a peace with Spain, which measure was supported by Burleigh, who keenly rebuked his opponent, by quoting the verse in the Psalms which says, "men of blood shall not live out half their days." On the death of that great statesman Essex succeeded him as chancellor of Cambridge. About this time he incurred the queen's displeasure in a remarkable manner: at a private council held respecting the appointment of a proper person to govern Ireland, he had the imprudence to oppose her majesty with rudeness, on which she gave him a box on the ear. The violent earl instantly laid his hand on his sword, and swore he would not have taken such treatment even from her father Henry VIII. He then withdrew, and instead of making his submission, continued to complain of the treatment he had received. At length a reconciliation was effected, and the earl went to Ireland, where he met with bad success. His enemies in the mean time gave it out that he meant to invade England, and an army was in consequence raised under the earl of Nottingham. Hearing of those proceedings he returned to England, and waited on the queen, who gave him a better reception than could have been expected. However he soon after fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned. In 1600 he regained his liberty, but instead of conducting himself with caution, he began to vent his indignation in virulent terms, and said, that "the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was become as crooked as her carcase." His enemies having intelligence of all his actions and speeches, sent for him to attend the council, which he refused, and began to arm in his own defence. Some blood was shed before he surrendered, upon which he was made close prisoner, tried, and beheaded, February 25, 1601. A popular story is told of the queen's having given him a ring as a pledge of security and favour, on his sending of which, at any time, he should receive his pardon. This ring, it is said, he gave to the countess of Nottingham, his relation, but the wife of his inveterate enemy the admiral, in obedience to whose orders the countess kept it, and the unhappy Essex suffered. On her death-bed she is stated to have confessed the fact to Elizabeth, who bitterly reproached her, and said, that "God might forgive her, but she never would." The foundation of this story is uncertain; but it has served to embellish highly a tragedy called the Earl of Essex.—Biog. Brit.

DEVEREUX (Robert), earl of Essex, and son of the above, was born in 1592. He was educated under sir Henry Savile, at Merton college, Oxford, and James I. restored him to his family honours. He married, when young, lady Frances Howard, daughter of the earl of Suffolk; but the contracting an affection for the royal favourite, Robert Carr, afterwards earl of Somerset, instituted a shameful suit against her husband for impotency, and obtained a divorce. In 1620 Essex served under sir Horatio Vese in the Palatinate, and afterwards under prince Maurice in Holland. On his return to England he appeared as a member of the opposition against the court; and on the breaking out of the rebellion had the command of the parliamentary army. He fought the king at Edge-hill, after which he took Reading, raised the siege of Gloucester, and fought the first battle of Newbury. In 1644 he marched into the west, but was so completely hemmed in in Cornwall, that he and his principal officers were glad to escape by sea. By the self-denying ordinance in 1645 he was deprived of his command, and died in the year following at Essex house, in the Strand.—Ibid. Chron.

DEWEES (sir Symonds), an English antiquary, was born in 1602 at Corden, in Dorsetshire, and educated at Cambridge. He employed a considerable part of his time in collecting materials for a history of Great Britain. He received the honour of knighthood from Charles I. and in 1641 was created a baronet. On the breaking out of the civil war he took the solemn league and covenant. He died in 1650. He compiled the Journals of all the Parliaments during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, published in 1682, folio, and wrote his own Life, which is in Peck's Desiderata Curiosa.—Biog. Brit.

DEYNUM (John Baptist van), a painter of Antwerp, who excelled in painting portraits in miniature. He was born in 1620.—Moreri.

DEYSTER (Lewis), a painter and engraver of eminence at Bruges, who died in 1711, aged 55. His pictures are excellent. His daughter was also a good artist, and died in 1746. She excelled in landscape, but died in poverty by quitting painting for constructing organs and harpsichords.—Newsp. Hist.

DIACONIUS (Paulus), a monkish historian of the 8th century. He resided in the monastery of Monte Casino, where he wrote the History of the Lombards, in six books, which is very accurate. He died in 770.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

DIAGORAS, surnamed the Atheist. He was born in the isle of Melos, one of the Cyclades, but resided at Athens, where he taught philosophy with reputation, till his avowal of atheism occasioned him to be summoned before the council. Diagoras, fearing that he should be put to death, fled; on which a proclamation was issued for taking him. He perished afterwards by shipwreck, about 412 B. C.—Suidas. Bayle.

DIAZ (Bartholomew), a Portuguese navigator, who discovered the cape of Good Hope, to which he gave the name of the Stormy Cape; but on his reporting it to John II. king of Portugal, he altered it to Cabo del Bueno Esperanza, or the cape of Good Hope. This was in 1486.—Robertson's America.

DIAZ (John), a young Spaniard, who was murdered on account of his religion in a most extraordinary manner. He studied at Paris, where, by reading the works of Luther, he became a protestant. He then quitted France, and visited Calvin at Geneva; afterwards he went to Strasbourg, and lastly, to Neuberg, whither he was followed by his brother, Alphonsus, who remained a zealous catholic. Alphonsus, finding that all his exhortations were in vain to reclaim him, got into his room early in the morning with a companion, and murdered him with an axe. The assassins were pursued and taken, but just as they were about to be brought to trial, Charles V. took the affair into his own hands. This horrid deed was perpetrated in 1546.—Bayle.

DICARCHUS, a peripatetic philosopher of Messina in Sicily. He was an excellent mathematician; and part of his treatise on the Geography of Greece was published by H. Stephens in 1589, and again by Hudson in his collection of old writers on geography, in 1709.—Voss. Hist. Græc.

DICENEUS, an Egyptian philosopher, who travelled into Scythia, where he was greatly in favour with the king, and by his instructions promoted a considerable degree of civilization among the people. So great indeed was the change, that the Scythians destroyed their vines to prevent intemperance; a vice to which they had been remarkably addicted. He lived in the time of Augustus.—Moreri.

DICETO (Ralph de), dean of St. Paul's, London, about 1210. He wrote Abbreviationes Chronicorum, being an epitome of the English history down to the conquest; also, Imagines Historiarum, or the Lives of some of our Kings.—Pitt.

DICK (sir Alexander), a physician of Scotland. He was the son of sir William Cunningham of Capington, by the daughter and heiress of sir James Dick, of Prestonfield, and born in 1703. He pursued his studies at Edinburgh and Leyden under Boerhaave; and having taken his degree of M. D. returned to his own country. He afterwards made the tour of Europe, and on his return to Britain settled in Pembrokeshire, where he practised with great success. On the death of his eldest brother, sir William Dick, without issue, he succeeded to the title, estate, and name of Dick. He then went to his family seat of Prestonfield, where he resided for the remainder of his days. In 1756 he was chosen president of the college of physicians at Edinburgh, to which he was a liberal benefactor. He died in 1785. He was the first who paid attention to the culture of the true rhubarb in Britain; for which he received, in 1774, the gold medal from the London society for promoting arts and commerce.—Hutchinson's Biog. Med.

DICKINSON (Edmund), an English physician, born at Appleton, in Berkshire, 1624, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. In 1655 he published a curious book, called Delphi Phazicizantes, &c. to which were added some other tracts. His chief design in this work is to prove that the heathen mythological stories were corruptions of the scripture histories of the Old Testament. In 1684 he settled in London, and was appointed physician to the king. In 1702 he published his Physica Vetus et Vera, five Tractatus de Naturali veritate hexæmeri Mosici, &c. in which it is proved that the method of the creation of the universe, according to the principles of true philosophy, is, in a concise and general way, laid down by Moses. He died in 1707, and was buried in the church of St. Martin-in-the-fields.—Biog. Br.

DICKSON (David), a Scotch divine; born at Paisley in 1591, and educated at Glasgow. His zeal for presbytery occasioned his being imprisoned several times. About 1640 he became professor of divinity at Edinburgh, and in 1643 was sent to the assembly at Westminster. He died in 1664. He wrote Commentaries on part of the Old and New Testament, and other theological pieces.—Gen. Biog. Diæ.

DICTYS CRETENSIS, an ancient historian, who served under Idomenus, king of Crete, at the siege of Troy; of which expedition he wrote an account. This work is said to have been the foundation of Homer's Iliad. The book which is extant under his name is a forgery.—Voss. Hist. Græc.

DIDEROT (Denys), a French writer, was born at Langres in 1713. He settled early at Paris, where he soon procured friends by his wit and talents. In 1740 he published Pensées Philosophiques, which book was afterwards reprinted under the title of Etrennes aux Esprits forts. In 1746 he was concerned in a Medical Dictionary, which suggested to him the idea of a Dictionnaire Encyclopédique; which, with the assistance of powerful associates, he at length completed. His share in this work was very large, and the whole of the articles on arts and trade were furnished by him. While he was engaged in the Encyclopédie he wrote some other works, as a licentious novel, called Bijoux Indiscrets, and two comedies, the Fils Natural, and the Père de Famille. In 1749 appeared his Letters to the Blind, the free sentiments in which occasioned his being imprisoned for six months at Vincennes. On recovering his liberty he wrote a Letter on the Deaf and Dumb, in which he throws out a variety of reflections on miscellaneous subjects. His other works are: 1. Principles of Moral Philosophy. 2. Reflections on the Interpretation of Nature. 3. The Code of Nature. 4. The sixth Sense. 5. Of public Education. 6. Panegyric on Richardson. 7. Life of Seneca. He died in 1784. Diderot was a lively and an ingenious writer, rather than a useful one. His works are chiefly fanciful, and are, besides, full of strong prejudices against religion.—Novæ. Diæ. Hist.

DIDIUS JULIANUS (M. Salvius Severus), a Roman emperor, was born at Milan of an illustrious family. He was consul in 179. Covetousness was his prevailing passion, and this enabled him to purchase the imperial diadem of the soldiers at an enormous rate in 193. But shortly afterwards Severus was declared emperor by the prætorian bands, and Didius was slain, having reigned only sixty-six days.—Cæsar.

DIDO or ELISSA, queen and founder of Carthage, was the daughter of Belus, king of Tyre. She married Sichæus, priest of Hercules, who was murdered by Pygmalion, the successor of Belus, for the sake of his riches. Dido, disconsolate at the loss of her husband, sailed with a number of Tyrians, and settled on the coast of Africa, where she purchased a tract of land of the inhabitants, on which she built a citadel called Byrsa. This place soon increased, and her dominions extended. Iarbas, king of Mauritania, courted her, and on her refusal threatened to invade her territories. She took three months to consider of it, and in the interval caused a funeral pile to be erected, on which she stabbed herself in the presence of her subjects. Virgil and Ovid have represented this action as the effect of grief, occasioned by the departure of Æneas, with whom she was enamoured. This event was about 953 B.C.—Justin. Herodian. Ptol. Patere.

DIDOT (Francis Ambrose), a celebrated printer, was born in 1730. He invented stereotype printing, and executed several elegant works with uncommon accuracy and beauty. He also improved the construction of paper mills; and invented many curious and useful machines relative to the art of printing. The fine editions of the classics, published by order of Louis XVI. for the education of the dauphin, were the productions of his press. At the age of 73 he read over five times, and carefully corrected, every sheet of the stereotype edition of Montaigne, printed by his sons. He had likewise projected, and partly executed an index to that writer. He died at Paris July 10, 1804.—Gleif du Cabinet. Gent. Mag.

DIDYMUS of Alexandria, surnamed Chalcætreus, an ancient grammarian, who lived in the reign of Augustus, and composed 4000 books, none of which have reached us.—Voss. Hist. Græc.

DIDYMUS of Alexandria, an ecclesiastical writer of the 4th century. Though he became blind at the age of five years, he acquired an extensive knowledge of the sciences and theology. Nothing of his remains but a Latin translation of his treatise on the Holy Spirit, some remarks on the Canonical Epistles, and a book against the Manichees. He died in 395, aged 85.—Dupin. Cave.

DIECMANN (John), a Lutheran divine, was born at Stade in 1647. He became superintendent of the duchies of Bremen and Verden, and rector of the university of Stade, where he died in 1720. He published an improved edition of Luther's Bible at Stade, and several works, theological, philosophical, and metaphysical.—Moreri.

DIEMEN (Anthony van), governor of the Dutch East India possessions, was born at Kuilenberg, of which place his father was a burgo-master. He went out in an inferior station to India, where he was employed as accountant to the government. In 1625 he became a member of the supreme council. In 1631 he returned to Holland as commander of the India fleet, but the year following went out again as director general.

Not long after he was appointed governor general, and he greatly extended the Dutch interest and power in the east. In 1642 he sent Abel Tasman on a voyage to the south, the consequence of which was the discovery of that part of New Holland, called Van Diemen's land. He died in 1645.—Laifcus's Gen. Hist. Diæ.

DIEMERBROEK (Hbrand), professor of physic at Utrecht, where he died in 1674, aged 65. He wrote several esteemed books upon medical subjects, the principal of which is that on the plague.—Moreri.

DIERPENBECK (Abraham), a Dutch painter, born in 1607, and brought up under Rubens. He died at Antwerp in 1675. His drawings are held in great estimation, and many engravings have been published from his designs.—Houbraken.

DIERZ (Adrian van), a painter of landscapes, born at the Hague in 1655, and died in 1704. He lived the greatest part of his life in England, and formed his taste by imitating the views in the western part of that island.—Pilkington.

DIETRICH (John Conrad), a Lutheran divine, was born at Butzbach, in Wetteravia, in 1612. After studying at various universities, he became professor of Greek and history in his own country, and in 1653 removed to Gießen, where he died in 1667. He wrote, 1. De Peregrinatione Studiorum; 2. Antiquitates Romanæ; 3. Lexicon Etymologico-Græcum; 4. Antiquitates Biblicæ; 5. Antiquitates Novi Testamenti, &c.—Moreri.

DISTRICH (John William Ernest), an excellent painter, was born in 1712 at Weimar, where his father was painter to the court, and celebrated for his portraits and battles. After studying under his father, he went to Dresden, where he was instructed in landscape painting by Alexander Thiele. He afterwards visited Italy, and in 1763 became one of the first professors in the academy of Dresden, and director of the school of painting at Meissen. He died in 1774. He painted landscape, scripture pieces, portraits, rustics, and conversations with great force and life. He also engraved in a good style.—Gen. Biog.

DISTAT, an eminent landscape painter, born at Dresden in 1730, and died there in 1775. His views near Rome are very beautiful.—Pilkington.

DIEU (Lewis de), a learned divine, was born at Flushing in 1590. He became minister of Leyden, and professor in the Walloon college. He died there in 1642. He published, 1. A Commentary on the Gospels and the Acts; 2. The Apocalypse in Hebrew and Syriac, with a Latin version; 3. The History of Jesus Christ, written in the Persian language by Xavier, with a Latin translation.—Moreri.

DROBY (Sir Everard), an English gentleman, was born of protestant parents in 1681; but his father dying when he was young, he fell into the hands of Romanists, who brought him up in their religion. Soon after the accession of James I. he received the honour of knighthood. But though he was in favour at court, he became a partisan in the gunpowder plot, for which he was condemned and executed in 1607. He pleaded guilty at his trial, and endeavoured to extenuate his crime by pleading conscience as his motive.—Biog. Brit.

DIGBY (sir Kenelm), son of the preceding, was born at Gothurst, in Buckinghamshire, in 1603. He was brought up in the protestant religion, and educated at Gloucester hall, Oxford, where he chiefly studied philosophy; after which he made the tour of Europe, and on his return received the honour of knighthood. About this time he distinguished himself by a nostrum, which he had met with on his travels, called the sympthetic powder. In the reign of Charles I. he received several places, and on occasion of some difference between England and the Venetians, was sent with a fleet into the Mediterranean, where he attacked the fleet of the republic in the bay of Scanderoon. About 1636 he quitted the church of England for that of Rome, and vindicated this change in a piece, entitled A Conference with a Lady about the Choice of Religion. At the commencement of the civil war he was imprisoned by the parliament in Winchester-house, but in 1643 regained his liberty, and went to France, and soon after travelled into Holland to visit Descartes, when a close friendship was established between them. When Cromwell assumed the reins of government, he ventured to visit his native country, and paid great court to that usurper. He became a member of the royal society, and one of the council. He died in 1665, and was buried in Christ-church, Newgate-street. With his son the males of that branch of the Digby family became extinct. He wrote a great number of books; as, 1. A Treatise of the Nature of Bodies; 2. Another on the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul; 3. Institutionum Peripateticarum Libri quinque. cum Appendice Theologica de Origine Mundi, &c.—Biog. Brit.

DIGBY (John), earl of Bristol, an English nobleman, born at Colehill, in Warwickshire, in 1580, and educated at Oxford. On his return from his travels he was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to James I. who in 1611 sent him ambassador to Spain. In 1618 he was made lord Digby, and in 1621 sent ambassador to the emperor of Germany. In 1623 he was again sent to Spain to negotiate a marriage between prince Charles and the infant, and the same year was created earl of Bristol. On his return to England, he and Buckingham preferred counter-charges against each other in parliament, which ended without trial. When the civil wars broke out he went abroad, and died at Paris in 1653. He wrote some poems.—Ibid.

DIGBY (lord George), an eminent English nobleman, was the son of the above, and born at Madrid in 1612. He received his education at Oxford, and became a member of the long parliament, wherein he at first opposed the court, but afterwards joined the royal party, and was expelled. He exerted himself very much in the service of Charles I. and when that monarch was put to death, his lordship was exempted from pardon, on which he went abroad. At the restoration he was made knight of the garter. He died in 1676.—Ibid.

DIGGERS (Leonard), an English mathematician, born at Barham, in Kent, and educated at University college, Oxford. He wrote a treatise on Surveying, another on Geometry, and one entitled, Prognostication everlasting of right good Effect; or, Choice Rules to judge the Weather by Sun, Moon, and Stars, &c. He died about 1574.—Biog. Brit.

DIGGERS (Thomas), son of the preceding, was educated at Oxford, after which he became muster-master-general of the forces sent to the Netherlands. He wrote, 1. Alae five Scalæ Mathematicæ, containing Demonstrations for finding the Parallax of any Comet, or other celestial Body, 4to.; 2. An Arithmetical Treatise, named Stratagemæ, requisite for the Perfection of Soldiers, 4to.; 3. Perfect Descriptions of the Celestial Orbs, 4to.; 4. Humble Motives for Associations to maintain the Religion established, 8vo.; 5. England's Defence, a Treatise concerning invasion, fol. He died in 1595.—Ibid.

DIGGERS (sir Dudley), the eldest son of the last mentioned, was born in 1583, and educated at University college, Oxford. He received the honour of knighthood from James I. who sent him ambassador to Russia; but in the parliament of 1621 he resisted the court measures, and so continued to do in the next reign, for which he was sent to the Tower; but in 1636 he was bought over by the grant of the mastership of the rolls. He died in 1639. He wrote, 1. A Defence of Trade, 1615, 4to.; 2. A Discourse concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subject, 4to.; 3. Sundry Speeches in Rushworth's Collections. His son Dudley, who died in 1643, was a loyal and learned man, and wrote some tracts against rebellion.—Ibid.

DILLENIUS (John James), an eminent botanist, was born at Darmstadt, in Germany, in 1687, and educated at the university of Gießen. He contributed several curious papers to the Miscellanea Curiosa and, in 1721, accompanied Dr. Sherrard to England, where he spent the remainder of his days. Soon after his arrival he undertook a new edition of Ray's Synopsis Stirpium Britannicarum. He was appointed the first botanical professor at Oxford, on Dr. Sher-rard's foundation, and in 1735 the university admitted him to the degree of M. D. He died in 1747. He published an elaborate work, entitled Hortus Elthamensis, and a History of Mosses.—Pulney's Sketches on Botany.

DULLEN (Wentworth), earl of Roscommon, was born in Ireland about 1633, and received his first education at his uncle the great earl of Strafford's seat in Yorkshire, after which he was sent to Caen, in Normandy, where he had for a tutor the famous Bochart. At the restoration he was made captain of the band of pensioners, which post he afterwards resigned and went to Ireland, where he was appointed a captain in the guards; but dissipating his property by gaming, he returned to the English court, and was made master of the horse to the duchess of York. He now altered his conduct, married a daughter of the earl of Burlington, and applied to poetry. He died in 1684. His poems are of the minor class, but very correct.—Johnson's Lives of the Poets.

DILWORTH (Thomas), an industrious schoolmaster, who served his apprenticeship to Mr. Dyche, at Stratford-le-Bow, and then set up for himself at Wapping, where he had great success. He died in 1781. He published a Spelling-book, a Treatise on Arithmetic, another on Book-keeping, and one on the Use of the Globes.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

DIMSDALE (Thomas), a celebrated English physician, was the son of a surgeon and apothecary at Thoydon Garmon, in Essex, where he was born in 1712. The family were quakers, and his grandfather went with William Penn to America. He was brought up under his father, and after studying at St. Thomas's Hospital, settled at Hertford. In 1745, to divert his mind on the loss of his wife, he accompanied the duke of Cumberland's army as assistant surgeon, and continued in that capacity till the surrender of Carlisle, when he returned to Hertford, and married again the year following. In 1761 he commenced physician, and became celebrated by his successful mode of inoculating for the small-pox. In 1768 he went, accompanied by his son, to Russia, and inoculated the empress and grand duke, for which Dr. Dimsdale was created a baron of the empire, physician to her majesty, and counsellor of state. A gratuity of 12,000*l.* was given him for his journey, and a pension for life of 500*l.* a year. On his son was also conferred the rank of baron, and a present made to him of a gold snuff-box, set with diamonds. In 1781 the baron again visited Russia, to inoculate the two sons of the grand duke, in which he experienced the same success as before. The year preceeding he was elected into parliament for Hertford, and again in 1784, on which he quitted practice. About this time he had the misfortune to lose the sight of both eyes by cataracts, but which were successfully extracted by baron Wenzel. In 1790 he retired from parliament. He died in 1800. Baron Dimsdale wrote Tractions on Inoculation, 8vo. 1781, in which is an Account of his First Journey to Russia.—Gen. Biog.

DINARCHUS, an orator of Greece, the son of Sostratus, and the pupil of Theophrastus. He was accused of taking bribes from the enemies of Athens, on which he went into voluntary exile about 340 B. C. Only three of his orations are extant, to be found in Stephens's Collection, 1575.—Plutarch. Mureri.

DINO, a celebrated law professor at Bologna, who compiled the Sixth Book of Decretals, for which he expected to be made a cardinal, but was disappointed, after taking priest's orders for the purpose, and divorcing his wife. He died about 1307. His Commentary on the Rules of Law has been highly esteemed.—Moreri.

DINOCRATES, an architect of Macedonia, who made a proposal to Alexander the Great, of converting Mount Athos into the figure of a man, the left hand of which should contain a great city, and all the rivers of the mount should flow into the right, and from thence into the sea. But Alexander was too intent upon other projects to attend to this romantic scheme. However he employed him in building the city of Alexandria, in Egypt. He also rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus.—Pliny. Vitruvius.

DINOSTRATES, a mathematician, who lived in the time of Plato, and attended his academy. He invented the quadratrice or curve, which is called by his name.—Moreri.

DINOUART (Anthony Joseph Touffaint), a French writer, born at Amiens in 1715, and died at Paris in 1786. He was canon of the chapter of St. Benedict, in the latter city, and wrote an Ecclesiastical Journal, or Library of Ecclesiastical Knowledge; also Embryologia Sacra, 12mo.; the Manual for Pastors, 3 vols. 12mo.; the Rhetoric of Preachers, &c.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DIO CHRYSOSTOM, a famous orator, born at Prusa, in Bithynia. He fell under the displeasure of Domitian in 94, for defending a person whom that tyrant had put to death, and to avoid a similar fate he went into voluntary exile. The emperor Trajan had a great regard for him, and treated him as a friend. Eighty of his orations and discourses are extant.—Moreri.

DIOCLES, an ancient mathematician of the fifth century, who invented a curve line, called the cissoid of Diocles, which Newton places among the defective hyperbolae.—Hutton's Math. Dict.

DIOCLETIAN (Caius Valerius), a Roman emperor, was born of an obscure family in Dalmatia. He rose from being a common soldier to the rank of general, and on the death of Numerian in 284 was chosen emperor. He took Maximian to be his colleague, and created two subordinate emperors, Constantius and Galerius, whom he styled Cæsars. He was a great commander, and a liberal patron of learning; but his reign was stained by a bloody persecution of the christians. He renounced the crown at Nicomedia in 304, and retired to Salona, where he died in 313.—Crevier. Gibbon.

DIODATI (John), a protestant divine, was born at Lucca in 1589. He became professor of divinity at Geneva, where he died in 1652. He translated the Bible into Italian, 1607, 4to. and into French, 1644. He also gave a version of father Paul's History of the Council of Trent.—Moreri.

DIONORUS (Siculus), a native of Argyrum, in Sicily, who wrote an Historic Library, or a Universal History, of which only 15 books and a few fragments remain. Though his chronology is erroneous, and he is too superstitious, his collection is valuable. He flourished about 44 B. C. The best edition of his work is that of Wesseling, in 2 vols. folio, Amsterdam, 1746.

DIONORUS, bishop of Tarsus in the 4th century, was a native of Antioch, where he distinguished himself as an instructor of youth, and had, among many other eminent men, the famous John Chrysostom for a pupil. He was one of the first, who, in explaining scripture, adhered to the literal sense, in opposition to the allegorical. There are only a few fragments of his remaining in the Catena Patrum Græcorum.—Cave. Dupin.

DIOGENES, a famous cynic philosopher, was born at Sinope, a city of Pontus, B. C. 414. Being forced to leave his native country for coining false money, he went to Athens, where he applied to the study of philosophy under Antisthenes, the founder of the cynics. He carried the austerities of his sect to a great extreme, wearing a coarse ragged cloak, living on the meanest food, and lodging under porticoes and other public places. It is said that he also took up his residence in a tub, and that this became at last his favourite place of abode. He distinguished himself by the excessive rudeness of his manners, with which was blended a great knowledge of human nature, and a zeal for the interests of virtue, on which account Plato called him the "mad Socrates." Being on a voyage to Ægina the vessel was taken by pirates, who sold Diogenes at Crete to a rich Corinthian citizen, named Xenides, who entrusted to him the care of his sons. At Corinth he used to harangue in the Craneum, where he was visited by Alexander, who, on approaching him, said, "I am Alexander the king;" to which the other replied, "and I am Diogenes the cynic." The monarch then asked him if he could render him any service: "Yes," said he, "not to stand between me and the sun." The independence of mind shewn by the philosopher struck the king, and he said, "If I was not Alexander, I would be Diogenes." He is supposed to have died at Corinth, and a public funeral was decreed him by the Athenians, and the people of Sinope erected statues to his memory.—Stanley's Hist. Phil.

DIOGENES, surnamed the Babylonian, a Stoic philosopher, who flourished about 200 B. C. He was a disciple of Chrysippus, and succeeded Zeno as teacher of philosophy. He accompanied Carneades and Critolaus on the embassy from Athens to Rome. His works are lost.—Bayle.

DIOGENES LAERTIUS, a Greek historian, was born in Cilicia. He wrote the Lives of the Philosophers, in ten books. He died A. D. 222. The best edition of Laertius is that of Amsterdam, 1692, 2 vols. 4to.—Voss. Hist. Græc.

DIOGENES, a Cretan philosopher, who succeeded his master Anaximenes in his school of Ionia, about 500 B. C.—Moreri.

DIOGNETUS, a philosopher and preceptor to Marcus Aurelius. It is supposed that he is the same to whom St. Justin addressed a letter, to be found in his works.—Cove Hist. Lit.

DION, a celebrated patriot of Syracuse, who was the disciple and friend of Plato when that philosopher was at the court of Dionysius, whose daughter Arete he married. The courtiers, out of envy, accused him of treason, on which he was banished by Dionysius, and went to Athens, where he acquired considerable popularity; which so provoked the tyrant, that he confiscated his estates, and compelled his wife to marry another man. Dion, irritated at this treatment, resolved to attempt the deliverance of his country. With a small force he landed in Sicily during the absence of Dionysius, and entered Syracuse in triumph. The tyrant informed of this hastened to Sicily, and made a violent assault on the citadel, in defending which Dion was wounded. Being supplanted by Heraclides, the commander of the Syracusan fleet, who had defeated that of Dionysius, Dion retreated to Leontium, from whence he was recalled when the city was besieged by another force sent by the tyrant. He relieved the place, pardoned his enemies, and then retired to a private station. Heraclides, putting himself at the head of a democratic faction, was assassinated by the directions of Dion, who was himself the victim of a conspiracy, headed by one Calippus, an Athenian, who had been supported by him. His wife and sister, with his infant child, were also murdered. This was B. C. 354.—Plutarch. Vit. Dion. Carn. Nep.

DION CASSIUS, an historian of the 3d century, was born in Bithynia. His father was proconsul of Cilicia, from whence Dion went to Rome, where his pleadings recommended him to notice, and he at length obtained the consulship. He wrote in Greek the History of Rome, from the building of the city to the reign of Alexander Severus, the greatest part of which is lost; that which remains was printed by Robert Stephens at Paris in 1548, and afterwards by Xylander, with a Latin translation. He died in his native country at the age of 70.—Vossius Hist. Græc.

DIONIS (Peter), a French surgeon, who died in 1718. He wrote the Anatomy of the Human Body, and some other valuable works in the line of his profession.—Moreri.

DIONYSIUS I. king or tyrant of Syracuse, who, from being a plain citizen, became commander of the forces, and by ingratiating himself with the soldiers, overthrew the government, and assumed the title of king, B. C. 404. Some time after this, while he was engaged in an expedition against Carthage, a body of his forces deserted, and returning home, took possession of the citadel, plundered his riches, and violated his wife. Dionysius hastened thither with his mercenaries, and having defeated his enemies, took upon them a severe revenge. He now concluded a peace with the Carthaginians, and employed himself in defending the city; and having defeated another insurrection, disarmed all his subjects. He conquered several cities, and after a long war with the Carthaginians, succeeded in driving them from Sicily. Dionysius affected a taste for polite literature, and stood candidate repeatedly for the poetical prize at the Olympic games, but without success. To raise money for his expeditions he plundered the temples, and committed dreadful cruelties. Being ever suspicious, he caused a subterraneous prison to be constructed, all the sounds produced in which were conveyed to his private apartment by tubes, so that he was enabled to hear what the prisoners said to each other. He invited Plato to his court, but being displeased with his moral discourses he sent him away in disgrace, and ordered the master of the ship to sell him for a slave. He died of excessive drinking B. C. 366.—Plutarch. Univ. Hist.

DIONYSIUS II. or the Younger, the son and successor of the above, whom he excelled in cruelty, but not in policy. He sent for Plato to his court, though he profited little by the conversation of that philosopher. He banished his brother-in-law, Dion, and obliged his wife to marry again, which so enraged him, that he gathered an army, and drove the tyrant from Syracuse, B. C. 348. Dionysius returned about ten years afterwards, and was expelled by Timoleon, on which he fled to Corinth, where he supported himself as a schoolmaster.—Ibid.

DIONYSIUS (Periegetes), an ancient geographer, who was sent by Augustus to survey the eastern part of the world. His Periegesis, or Survey of the World, in Greek verse, was printed by Henry Stephens, 4to.

1577, and at Oxford in 1710.—Kess. Hist. et Poet. Græc.

DIONYSIUS, an historian and critic of Halicarnassus, in Caria, who came to Rome about 30 years B. C. and there wrote his Roman Antiquities, only eleven books of which are now extant. He is deservedly esteemed for his impartiality, and particularly for his chronological accuracy. Besides this work, we have one of his entitled A Companion of some ancient Historians, and another on the Structure of Language. The best edition of all his works is that of Oxford, in 1704, 2 vols. folio.—Moreri.

DIONYSIUS, called the Tyrant of Heraclea, in Pontus, who married the niece of Darius, and greatly enlarged his territories. He was of a most corpulent habit. It was impossible to awake him without piercing his flesh with pins. He died 304 B. C. aged 55.

DIONYSIUS (the Areopagite), a native of Athens, and a member of the Areopagus, where he sat when St. Paul was brought before it, and made his famous speech respecting the "unknown God," which was the means of his conversion. According to some accounts, he was consecrated bishop of Athens, and suffered martyrdom. There were printed at Antwerp, in 1634, 2 vols. purporting to be his works, but their authenticity is questionable.—Cave. Fabric. Bib. Eccl.

DIONYSIUS, bishop of Corinth, who suffered martyrdom about 178. He wrote several epistles, some account of which may be found in Eusebius.—Ibid.

DIONYSIUS, bishop of Alexandria, who from being a heathen was converted to christianity, and became the disciple of Origen. On the death of Heracles, bishop of Alexandria, in 248, he was elected his successor. In the Valerian persecution he was banished to Lybia, where he remained three years, and then returned to his diocese. He opposed the Novatians and Sabellians, and died in 267. Some fragments of his are preserved by Eusebius.—Ibid.

DIONYSIUS, bishop of Rome, and the successor of Sixtus in 259. He summoned a synod to condemn the heresy of Sabellius, and died in 269.—Bower Platina.

DIONYSIUS, surnamed the little, a Romish monk in the 5th century, who drew up a body of canons, called Collectio five Codex Canonum Ecclesiasticorum, translated from the Greek; he also compiled a body of decretals. To him is attributed the invention of the Victorian period, or chronological mode of computing the time of Easter.—Fabricius. Cave.

DIOPHANTUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, to whom is attributed the invention of algebra. Six books of his on arithmetic were published in Greek and Latin at Paris in 1621. When Diophantus lived is not settled, some placing him before the christian era, and others afterwards.—Moreri.

DIOSCORIDES (Pedacus), a physician and botanist in the time of Nero, who wrote five books on the Materia Medica, containing the medical virtues of plants; the best edition of which is that of Saracenus, folio, Franc. 1598.—Moreri.

DIPPEL (John Conrad), a German physician, was born near Darmstadt, in 1672. He studied theology at Gießen, and afterwards read medical lectures at Strasburg: but took his doctor's degree at Leyden in 1711. Being much attached to alchemy, he pretended to have discovered the philosopher's stone, and other wonderful secrets. After rambling from place to place, he settled at Hamburg, but was given up to the Danish government, by whom he was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the island of Bornholm, for the freedom he had taken with the administration of that country. After seven years' confinement he was set at liberty, and about the same time was invited to Sweden, to attend the king, who was dangerously ill; but the influence of the clergy, whom he had ridiculed, procured his expulsion in 1727. He then went to Germany, and in 1733 gave out publicly that he would not die till 1808, but the year following he was found dead in his bed. He denied the inspiration of the scriptures, and wrote a number of wild enthusiastic books, under the name of Christianus Democritus.—Gen. Biog.

DIDOTIS (Francis), a French priest and doctor of the Sorbonne, who wrote a famous book entitled "Preuves & Prejuges pour la Religion Chrétienne & Catholique, contre les fausses Religions & l'Atheïsme," and another on ecclesiastical history. He died about 1700.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DISNEY (John), an English divine and magistrate, was born in 1677 at Lincoln, and educated first at the grammar school in that city, and afterwards at an academy among the dissenters, his father being of that persuasion. He next removed to the Middle Temple, where he studied the law, but did not follow it as a profession. Retiring to his paternal estate, he distinguished himself as an active magistrate, especially in the laudable but unpopular work, the suppression of vice and immorality, for which he repeatedly received the thanks of the judges on the circuits. At the age of 42 he took orders, and was presented to the vicarage of Croft, and the rectory of Kirkby-super-Baine, in Lincolnshire. In 1722 he obtained the living of St. Mary in Nottingham, where he died in 1730. He wrote, 1. Two Essays upon the Execution of the Laws against Immorality and Profaneness, 8vo.; 2. Primitive Sacre, the Reflections of a devout Solitude, 8vo.; 3. Flora, prefixed to a translation of Rapin's poem on Gardens; 4. Remarks upon a Sermon preached by Dr. Sacheverell; 5. The Genealogy of the most ferene and most illustrious House of Brunswick Lunenburg; 6.

A View of antient Laws against Immorality and Profaneness, folio.—Biog. Br.

DITHMAR, bishop of Merzburg, who died in 1028. He wrote a chronicle of the emperors Henry I. and II. and Otho I. II, and III.—Moreri.

DITHMAR (Justus Christopher), professor of history at Frankfort, who died in 1737. He wrote some books on the history of Germany, which possess great merit.—Ibid.

DITTON (Humphrey), a learned mathematician, born at Salisbury, in 1675. He was brought up to the ministry among the dissenters, which profession he quitted, and became master of the mathematical school at Christ's hospital. He died in 1715. He wrote several papers in the Philosophical Transactions, but he is best known by a treatise on the Law of Fluids, and another on the Resurrection of Jesus Christ.—Biog. Br.

DIVINI (Eustachius), an Italian who distinguished himself by his skill in making telescopes. He contended with Huygens the merit of discovering Saturn's ring, and died somewhat about 1663.—Moreri.

DLUGOSS (John), archbishop of Leopold, in Poland, who died in 1480, aged 65. He wrote a history of his native country in Latin, printed at Frankfort in 1711, folio.—Ibid.

DORSON (William), an English painter, born in 1610. He imitated the manner of Vandeyck, who introduced him to Charles I. He died poor in 1647. He painted both in history and portrait with great excellence.—Walpole's Anecdotes of Painters.

DON (John), a pious nonconformist, was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was a man of great learning, particularly in the Hebrew language, which he taught the famous Mr. John Gregory, of Oxford. He died in 1645. He was, from his Exposition of the Ten Commandments written in conjunction with Robert Cleaver, called the decalogist. His sayings or pious observations have been printed in several forms, and were once in great repute among the lower classes of the people, being well adapted for the instruction and edification of the poor.—Neale. Granger.

DODART (Denys), a French physician, born at Paris in 1643, and died in 1707. He followed the notions of Sanctorius on insensible perspiration, and made a number of curious experiments on the subject. He had a principal concern in the Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Plantes, Paris, 1676, folio. His son, John Baptist Claude, was physician to the king, and died at Paris in 1720.—Moreri.

DODD (William), an unfortunate divine, born in 1729, at Bourne, in Lincolnshire, of which parish his father was vicar. In 1745 he went to Clare hall, Cambridge, where he proceeded to his degrees in arts. In 1753 he entered into orders, and soon became a popular preacher in the metropolis, where he obtained a considerable reputation by his zeal in promoting charitable institutions, particularly the Magdalen hospital. Dr. Squire, bishop of St. David's, made him his chaplain, and gave him a prebend in the church of Brecon. In 1766 he took the degree of LL.D. at which time he was chaplain to the king. In 1771 he published Sermons to Young Men. The year following he obtained the living of Hockliff in Buckinghamshire. The rectory of St. George, Hanover-square, becoming vacant in 1774, he sent an anonymous letter to the chancellor's lady, offering the sum of 3000*l.* for the presentation. The letter being traced, and the writer discovered, his majesty caused him to be struck out of the list of chaplains. On this he went abroad, and meeting his pupil, the present earl of Chesterfield, at Geneva, he gave him the living of Winge in Buckinghamshire. But the shame and disgrace he had suffered did not cure him of his extravagance, and his difficulties increasing, he forged lord Chesterfield's name to a bond for 4200*l.*, in hopes of being able to take it up before it was due, but the fraud being discovered, he was tried and condemned, February 24, 1777. Great exertions were made to save his life, but in vain, and he was executed at Tyburn, June 27th following. He expressed the deepest contrition for his crimes, and for the scandal which he had brought on his sacred profession. He published a translation of the poems of Callimachus; four volumes of sermons on the Miracles and Parables of our Saviour; a collection of Poems; Reflections on Death, 12mo.; Comfort for the Afflicted, 8vo.; and after his death appeared his Thoughts in Prison, with his Life prefixed.

DODDRIDGE, or DODERIDGE (sir John), an English judge, was born at Barnstaple in Devonshire, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. about 1576. He then entered of the Middle Temple, and in 1603 was made serjeant at law. The year following he became solicitor-general to James I. In 1612 he was appointed one of the justices of the common pleas, and afterwards of the king's bench. He died at Egham in Surry, in 1628, and was interred in Exeter cathedral, where there is a monument to his memory. He wrote, 1. The Lawyer's Light, or due Direction for the Study of the Law, 4to. 1629; 2. A Complete Parson, or Description of Advowsons and Church Livings, &c. 4to. 1670; 3. History of the antient and modern Estate of the Principality of Wales, Duchy of Cornwall, and Earldom of Chester, 4to. 1630; 4. The English Lawyer, 4to. 1631; 5. Opinion touching the Antiquity, Power, Order, &c. of the high Court of Parliament in England, 1668, 8vo. [This was published by John Doddridge, esq. recorder of Barnstaple, and a relation of the judge.]—Wood's A.O. Prince's Worthies of Devon.

DODDRIDGE (Philip), an eminent divine among the protestant dissenters, was born in London in 1702, and educated at dissenting schools, and lastly under Mr. Jennings, who kept an academy for instructing young persons designed for the ministry, at Kibworth in Leicestershire. In 1723 he became minister at that place, from whence in 1725 he removed to Market Harborough, where he opened an academy in 1729; but shortly after he settled at Northampton as minister and tutor, and acquired a great and deserved reputation by his learning, candour and piety. A considerable number of eminent persons were educated under him, and he was in habits of friendship and correspondence with the greatest dignitaries of the established church. Though tender in his constitution, he published a number of excellent works, the principal of which are, his Family Expositor on the New Testament, 6 vols. 4to.; the Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, of which numerous editions have been printed; the Life of Colonel Gardiner; and sermons on the Evidences of Christianity. His single sermons and tracts were collected in 3 vols. 12mo after his death; also his Hymns, Lectures on Pneumatology, Ethics, and Divinity, and a volume of his Letters, by Mr. Stedman of Shrewsbury. A pulmonary complaint brought on a consumption, for which he was advised, to try the Bristol waters; and these proving ineffectual, he went to Lisbon, where he died Oct. 26, 1751.—Life of Doddridge by Mr. Orton. Biog. Brit.

DODONÆUS, or DODONÆUS (Rembert), a physician and botanist of Malines, born in 1518. He became physician to the emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolph II. and died professor at Leyden in 1585. He wrote the History of Plants, and other botanical works.—Moreri.

DONSLY (Robert) an author and bookseller, was born at Mansfield in 1703. His parents being of a mean condition, he received but a scanty education, and became footman to a lady. While in this station he published a volume of poems by subscription, entitled "The Muse in Livery." His next piece was a dramatic trifle called "The Toyshop," which had the approbation of Mr. Pope, and was brought upon the stage with so much success, that the author was enabled thereby to commence bookseller in Pall Mall, where he carried on a very extensive business for many years, and then left it to his brother. He wrote a popular entertainment called the King and Miller of Mansfield, which was followed by a sequel to it, named Sir John Cockle at Court. But his greatest dramatic effort was the tragedy of Cleone, which was acted with success at Covent garden theatre. His moral little book, for youth, entitled the Economy of Human Life, written in imitation of the Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus, had a great sale, owing to a notion which prevailed at its first publication, that it was the production of the earl of Chesterfield. In 1760 he published the select fables of Esop and other fabulists; to which he prefixed an essay on fable. He also edited a well known and valuable collection of poems by different authors, 6 vols.; a collection of old plays, 12 vols. Mr. Doddsley was likewise the projector of the Preceptor, a useful book for youth, 2 vols. 8vo.; and the Annual Register, a work of high and deserved reputation. His own miscellaneous pieces were collected and published in 2 vols. 8vo. He died at Durham in 1764.—Biog. Br.

DODSON (Michael), a learned English writer, was the son of a dissenting minister at Marlborough, in Wiltshire, where he was born in 1732. He was brought up to the law under his maternal uncle, sir Michael Foster, one of the justices of the court of king's bench, but was not called to the bar till 1783. In 1770 he was appointed a commissioner of bankrupts by lord Camden. Mr. Dodson was versed in theological studies, and published, in 1790, a translation of Isaiah, with notes and remarks, and a pamphlet in defence of it, in answer to Dr. Sturges. He also wrote a Life of Judge Foster, to appear in the sixth volume of the Biographia Britannica; another of the rev. Hugh Farmer, lately published; and some papers in a collection of Commentaries and Essays, printed by a society for promoting the knowledge of the scriptures. He died in 1799.—Gen. Biog.

DODSWORTH (Roger), an English topographer, born in Yorkshire in 1585, and died in 1654. He collected the antiquities of his native county in 162 folio volumes, which are in the Bodleian library at Oxford.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

DODWELL (Henry), a learned and pious writer, was born at Dublin in 1641. His father having suffered the loss of his property in the Irish rebellion, came to England in 1648 with his wife and child, and settled at York, where their son was educated. His father going back to Ireland, to recover some of his effects, died of the plague, and his mother was soon after carried off in a decline. Being thus left destitute, the orphan was maintained first by sir Henry Slingsby, his mother's brother, and next by Mr. Henry Dodwell, his paternal uncle, who was rector of Newbourn and Henley, in Suffolk. That gentleman sent him to Trinity college, Dublin, where he afterwards became fellow, but quitted it in 1666, on account of the statute compelling all fellows to take orders. Soon after this he visited England, and resided some time at Oxford, but went back again to Dublin, and in 1672 wrote a preface to a posthumous treatise left by his tutor Dr.

Stearne. His next publication was two excellent Letters on taking Holy Orders, and on Theological Study. In 1674 he returned to England, and settled in London, where he employed himself in writing against the Romanists and dissenters. In 1688 he was appointed Camden's professor of history at Oxford, but was deprived of that place in 1691, for refusing the oaths to king William, on which he retired, first to Cookham and afterwards to Shottesbrooke in Berkshire. In 1694 he married, and became the father of ten children. In 1701 he published an account of the ancient Greek and Roman cycles, a quarto volume, of which Dr. Halley had a high opinion. To follow him through his numerous publications would far exceed our limits. He wrote against occasional communion, and opposed his brethren the non-jurors, in continuing the separation after the deaths of the deprived bishops; but his most famous book was on the Natural Mortality of the Soul, in which he endeavoured to prove, from scripture and the fathers, that "it is immortalized actually by the pleasure of God, to punishment or reward, by its union with the divine baptismal spirit;" this book made a great noise, and was answered by several writers, particularly Mr., afterwards Dr., Samuel Clarke. He wrote and edited several other works, and died at Shottesbrooke, in 1711. Two of Mr. Dodwell's sons attained to eminence. Henry, the eldest, was bred to the law, and was an active promoter of the society for the encouragement of arts, manufactures, and commerce. He wrote an insidious pamphlet, but without his name, entitled "Christianity not founded on Argument," in which, under the pretence of friendship, he endeavoured to undermine the Christian religion. It was answered by Dr. Leland, Dr. Doddridge, and the author's brother. William, the second son, was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and became D. D. rector of Shottesbrooke, prebendary of Salisbury, and archdeacon of Berkshire. He wrote an answer to Dr. Middleton's Free Enquiry, and a Defence of the Answer against Mr. Toll, both in 1751; a Dissertation on Jephtha's Vow; Practical Discourses, in 2 vols., and an Answer to his brother's pamphlet above-mentioned.—Biog. Br.

DOES (Jacob vander), a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1623, and died in 1673. He studied at Rome, where he adopted the manner of Bamboccio. His pictures are very dark, but in the composition of his landscapes his taste was noble, and the figures done with great justness and delicacy. He had two sons, Jacob and Simon, both good artists; the first, in historical pieces, died in 1673, the latter excelled in landscapes and cattle. He died in 1717.—Hubrahen.
DOGGET (Thomas), an actor and dram.

matic poet. He performed comic characters at Drury-lane theatre with applause, and at last became joint manager of that house. He died in 1721. He left a legacy to provide a coat and badge to be rowed for, from London bridge to Chelsea, by six watermen, yearly on the first of August, the day of the accession of George I. He wrote a comedy called the Country Wake, since altered to a farce entitled Flora, or Hob in the Well.—Biog. Dram.

DOISSIN (Louis), a French jesuit, who wrote two elegant Latin poems on the Art of Sculpture, and on Engraving, printed in one vol. 12mo. 1752. He died the year following, aged 32.—New. Dict. Hist.

DOLABELLA (P. Cornelius), the son-in-law of Cicero, who attached himself zealously to Julius Cæsar, by whom he was made consul. On the death of Cæsar he obtained the government of Syria, but having slain Trebonius, he was declared an enemy of the republic. Cassius besieged him in Laodicea, where he killed himself in the 27th year of his age.—Moreri.

DOLBEN (John), an English prelate, was born at Stanwick, in Northamptonshire, in 1625, and educated at Christchurch college, Oxford. He served as a volunteer in the royal army, and at the restoration was rewarded with a canonry of Christchurch, and the deanry of Westminster. In 1666 he was preferred to the see of Rochester, from whence in 1683 he was removed to York. He died in 1686. Some of his sermons on public occasions are in print.—Wood. Biog. Brit.

DOLCE (Carlo), a painter of Florence, was born in 1616, and died in 1686. He rose to a great height in his profession, and his pictures fetch a considerable price. He excelled on religious subjects.—Pilkington.

DOLCE (Lewis), a Venetian writer, was born in 1508, and died in 1568. He translated into Italian the Satires of Horace, Ovid's Metamorphoses, the tragedies of Seneca and Euripides, &c.; and he was the author of a popular tragedy entitled Marianna; but his most curious performance is a collection of heroic Poems, under the title of L'Achille e l'Enea, taken from the Iliad and Eneid. His dialogue on painting is in good request. He also wrote the Life of the Emperor Charles V.—Moreri. Tiraboschi.

DOLÉT (Stephen), a learned Frenchman, was born at Orleans in 1508. He received his education at Paris, from whence he went to Padua, where he made a great progress in literature. He was for some time secretary to the French ambassador at Venice, and on his return to France settled at Toulouse, where he was imprisoned for some reflections on the parliament of that place, after which he was banished the city. He then retired to Lyons, where his proud and disputatious spirit engaged him in several contests, one of which ended seriously, by Dolét's killing his antagonist. On this he fled to Paris, where he obtained the king's pardon, and then returned to Lyons and commenced printer and bookseller. He greatly improved the study of the Latin language, and restored it to Ciceronian purity, by several valuable publications. In 1545 he was seized for venting atheistic notions, and being carried to Paris, was there condemned to be burnt, which was executed the year following. Notwithstanding his suffering death for infidelity, he wrote some books on theology, and translated others.—Moreri.

DOLOMIEU (Deodat), commander of the order of Malta, and member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and afterwards of the national institute. He served with Bonaparte in Egypt, but on his voyage back was taken prisoner and confined at Messina. Sir Joseph Banks, president of the royal society, interested himself successfully for his release. He died in 1802. Dolomieu was an able mineralogist, and travelled much to improve himself in his favourite pursuit. His principal works are, 1. Voyage to the Isles of Lipari in 1781; 2. Memoir on the Earthquake of Calabria in 1783; 3. On the Origin of the Basaltes; 4. A mineralogical Dictionary.—New. Dict. Hist.

DOMAT (John), a French advocate, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, in 1625. He reduced the principles of law to a natural and perspicuous order, in 3 vols. 4to. for which Lewis XIV. allowed him a pension. He died at Paris in 1696. After his death appeared three volumes more on public law, and a new edition of the whole was published in 1777, folio.—Moreri.

DOMENICHINO, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1681. He studied in the school of the Caracci, where his fellow pupils, from his slowness, called him in derision, the "Ox;" but one of his masters told them, that "this ox would in time make his ground so fruitful, that painting would be fed by what it produced." He was also skilled in architecture, and pope Gregory XV. appointed him his architect. He died in 1641.—D'Argenville.

DOMINIC (de Gusman), a Spanish priest, who is memorable for having founded the order of the preaching friars, called Dominicans, and the abominable inquisition. He was born in 1170, and died at Bologna in 1221. He was canonized by pope Gregory IX.—Moreri.

DOMINIS (Mark Antony de), archbishop of Spalato, in Dalmatia, who has procured a name by his unsettledness in religion. He was at Venice when sir Henry Wotton was ambassador there from James I. and becoming acquainted with Mr. Bedell, sir Henry's chaplain, he gave him a copy of his books, De Republica Ecclesiastica, that they might be printed in London. When Bedell returned to England, de Dominis came with him, and was received by the English clergy with great respect. James I. gave him the mastership of the Savoy, and deanry of Windsor, but being disappointed of higher preferment, he accepted an invitation from pope Gregory XV. and went to Rome where he abjured his errors, and expected a cardinal's hat, instead of which he was sent to the castle of St. Angelo, where he died in 1625. Some time after his death his body was dug up and burnt with his books in Flora's fields. Besides the above, he wrote "De Radiis visus et lucis in vitris perspectivis et Iride Tractatus," in which he was the first who gave a true explanation of the colours of the rainbow.—Moreri.

DOMITIAN (Titus Flavius), a Roman emperor, was the son of Vespasian. He obtained the imperial dignity on the death of his brother Titus, A. D. 81, and the commencement of his reign seemed auspicious to the happiness of the Romans; but he soon shewed the wickedness of his disposition, and gave way to incestuous and unnatural indulgences. He assumed the title of deity, and at the same time amused himself in catching flies, and sticking them on a bodkin. His cruelties rendered him so odious, that he was afraid of his own shadow, and took a number of precautions to secure himself from assassination, which fate, however, he could not avoid, A. D. 96, in the 45th year of his age. He was the last of the twelve Cæsars.—Crevier. Univ. Hist.

DOMITIANUS DOMITIUS, general of Diocletian's army in Egypt. He caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Alexandria in 288, and died a violent death two years afterwards.—Ibid.

DONATO, an architect and sculptor of Florence of the 15th century. He executed some fine statues and elegant works for Cosmo de Medicis, and some of the Italian states. He died in 1466, aged 83. Rafaele's Lorenzo de Medici.

DONATO (Alexander), an Italian jesuit, who wrote a description of ancient and modern Rome, 1639, 4to.; also poems printed at Cologne, 1630, 8vo. He died at Rome in 1640.—Moreri.

DONATO (Jerom), a Venetian nobleman of the 16th century, famous as a statesman and a man of letters. He was sent by the republic to effect a reconciliation between them and pope Julius II. That pontiff asked him for the title to the claims of Venice to the sovereignty of the Adriatic. "Your holiness," said the ambassador, "will find it on the back of the record of Constantine's donation of the city of Rome, and its territories, to the pope." Some of his epistles are extant. He died in 1511. —Moreri.

DONATO (Marcellus), an Italian nobleman of Mantua, who died at the beginning of the 17th century. He wrote Scholia on the Latin writers of the Roman history, Frankfurt, 1607, 8vo.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DONATO (Bernardino), a learned Italian, who was Greek professor at Padua and other universities. He died about 1550. He translated into Latin the Demonstratio Evangelicæ of Eusebius; some of the works of Galen, Xenophon, and Aristotle; and wrote a Latin Dialogue on the difference between the Aristotelian and Platonic philosophy.—Tiraboschi.

DONATUS, bishop of Case Nigra, in Numidia, and the founder of a sect called by his name, in 311. He aided Majorinus, the candidate for the see of Carthage, in opposition to Cecilianus, who had been duly elected, for which Donatus was deposed, and excommunicated in several councils.—Moreri. D. pin. Moysim.

DONATUS, bishop of Carthage in the same century as the above. He held that the three persons of the Trinity were of the same substance, and yet that there was an inequality between them. He was banished about 356.—Ibid.

DONATUS (Ælius), a grammarian of the 4th century, who was the preceptor of St. Jerome. He wrote a grammar and commentaries upon Virgil and Terence.—Voss. de Hist. Lat.

DONCKER (Peter), a painter of Gouda, and the disciple of Jordaens. He afterwards improved himself at Rome, and attained great excellence in his profession. He died in 1668. There was also a John Doncker of the same place, who promised well to have been a good painter, but he died young.—Pilkington.

DONDUS, or DOND (James), a physician of Padua, who acquired the name of aggregator, on account of the numerous medicines he made. He was also well skilled in mechanics, particularly in horology. He died in 1350. He wrote, 1. Promptuarium Medicinæ, Venice; 2. De Fontibus calides Patavini agri; 3. De Fluxus et Reflexus maris, &c.—Tiraboschi.

DONAU (Hugh), professor of law at Bourges and Orleans. He was a calvinist, on which account he fled to Antwerp, where he died in 1591, aged 64. He wrote, Commentaria de Jure civili, in 5 vols. folio; 2. Opera Posthuma, 8vo.—Moreri.

DONI (Anthony Francis), an ecclesiastic of Florence, who wrote some humorous pieces; as, 1. Letters, 8vo.; 2. La Libreria, 8vo.; 3. La Zucca, 1565, 8vo.; 4. I Mondi Celesti, Terrestri ed Infernali, 4to.; 5. I Marmi civè Ragionamenti Fatti a i Marmi di Fiorenza, 4to. He died in 1574, aged 61.—Ibid.

DONI (John Baptist), a learned Italian, born at Florence in 1594, and died there in 1647. He was professor of eloquence, and member of the Florentine academy and of that of Della Crusca. He wrote a cele-trated treatise on Music, in Latin, and some others on the same subject in Italian. He also invented a musical instrument called the lira barbarini.—Tiraboschi. Burney.

DONI D'ATTICHI (Lewis), bishop of Auxun, in France, where he died in 1664, aged 68. He wrote, 1. A History of the Minims, 4to.; 2. The Life of Queen Joan, founder of the Annonciades; 3. The Life of Cardinal de Berulle; 4. The History of the Cardinals, 1660, 2 vols. folio.—Ibid.

DONNE (John), an English divine and poet, was born in London in 1573. He received his education both at Oxford and Cambridge, and then removed to Lincoln's-inn. He was bred in the Roman catholic religion by his friends, but at the age of 19 he embraced the protestant religion. Soon afterwards he went abroad, and on his return became secretary to lord keeper Egerton. About the same time he married a daughter of sir George Moore, who was so irritated at the match, that he not only prevailed upon the keeper to turn him out of his service, but got him imprisoned with the minister who performed the marriage, and the person who gave Mrs. Donne away. Their confinement, however, was short, and at last a reconciliation was effected. At the particular instance of king James, he entered into orders, was made chaplain in ordinary to the king, and about the same time created D. D. by the university of Cambridge. In 1617 he was chosen preacher at Lincoln's-inn; and two years afterwards he accompanied the earl of Doncaster, ambassador, to Germany. In 1621 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and soon after vicar of St. Dunstan's in the West. He died in 1631, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. Dr. Donne was a man of great wit, learning, and gravity. His satires were highly praised by Dryden, and rendered into modern English by Pope. Three volumes of his sermons were published after his death, and some miscellaneous essays. His son, John Donne, was educated at Oxford, but took the degree of LL. D. at Padua. He died in 1662. He wrote some ludicrous trifles not worth mentioning.—Walton's Life of Donne. Biog. Brit.

DONNE (Benjamin), an English mathematician, was born at Bideford, in Devonshire, in 1729. He made a complete survey of his native county in 1761, for which he received a premium of 100l. from the society for promoting arts and commerce. About the same time he published Mathematical Essays in 8vo. which had a favourable reception, and procured him the office of keeper of the library at Bristol, where he kept an academy many years. In 1774 he printed an Epitome of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, 12mo. and in 1774 a work entitled The British Mariner's Assistant. In 1796 he was appointed master of mechanics to the king. He died in 1798, leaving behind him the character of an ingenious and worthy man. Besides the books above mentioned, he wrote treatises on Geometry, Book-keeping, and Trigonometry.—Private Information.

DOOLITTLE (Thomas), a nonconformist minister, was born at Kidderminster in 1630, and ejected from the living of St. Alphage, London, in 1662. He then kept an academy, and officiated to a dissenting congregation till his death in 1707. He wrote a treatise on the Sacrament; and after his death was published a System of Divinity, in folio, with his Life prefixed.—Calamy.

DOFFELMAIER (John Gabriel), professor of mathematics at Nuremberg, where he died in 1750, aged 83. He was fellow of the English royal society, member of the academy of sciences of Berlin, and of the imperial academy of Petersburg. He translated several mathematical works from the English and French into Latin and German, and wrote some ingenious pieces on geography, dialling, and astronomy, besides an historical account of mathematicians of Nuremberg.—Gerq. Biog.

DORBAY (Francis), a French architect, who designed several great works at the Louvre and the Thuilleries. He died at Paris in 1697.—Nouv. Dict. Hist.

DORFLING, a Prussian general. He was originally a taylor, and after his advancement some officers were observing that he still carried the marks of his origin, which Dorfling overhearing, said, "Gentlemen, I was once a taylor, and cut out cloth, but now," clapping his hand upon his sword, "I wear an instrument with which I cut off the ears of those who insult me." He distinguished himself with great bravery against the Swedes in 1666, and became at last field marshal.—Ibid.

DORIA (Andrew), a naval commander of Genoa, was born in 1468 of a noble family. He entered early on the profession of arms, and distinguished himself in the service of different Italian states. At length his own country required him against the rebels of Corsica, whom he defeated. He was then appointed commander-in-chief of the gallees, and obtained great success against the African pirates. On the revolution breaking out in Genoa, he entered into the service of Francis I. of France, which he quitted for that of pope Clement VII. When Rome was taken he returned to the service of Francis. But not long after, he entered into the service of the emperor, which changed the French affairs in Italy. His new master offered to invest him with the sovereignty of Genoa, which he nobly refused, and only stipulated that the republic should continue under the imperial protection. In 1528 he delivered Genoa from the oppression of the French yoke, for which he was honoured by the senate with the title of the father and saviour of his.

country, and had a statue erected to his honour, and a palace built for him. He also made his name famous throughout the Mediterranean by his naval exploits, particularly against Barbarossa and the African corsairs. He died in 1560.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

DORIGNY (Michael), a French painter, and engraver in aqua fortis, born in 1617, and died in 1665. He was professor in the academy of painting at Paris. His paintings are excellent; but he only engraved after his own pictures. His son Lewis was a good painter, and died at Verona in 1742, aged 88. Nicholas, the younger son of Michael, was an engraver, and engraved the Cartoons at Hampton-court, for which George I. knighted him. He died at Paris in 1746, aged 90.—D'Argenville.

DORING, or DORINK (Matthias), a franciscan monk, born at Kiritz, in Germany, and died in 1494. He is said to be the author of the Miroir Historial of De Beauvais, or the Chronicle of Nuremberg.—Moreri.

DORISLAUS (Isaac), a Dutchman, and doctor of civil law at Leyden, from whence he came to England, and by Fulk lord Brook was appointed to read lectures on history at Cambridge; but avowing republican principles, Dr. Cosin, the vice-chancellor, silenced him. Afterwards he became judge advocate in the king's army in the expedition against the Scots, but quitted his majesty's service for that of the parliament, and assisted in drawing up and managing the charge against that monarch. In 1649 he was sent ambassador to the Hague, where he was soon after stabbed by some exiled royalists, who entered the house where he resided while he was at supper. The parliament caused his body to be brought to England, and interred it in Westminster-abbey, from whence it was taken at the restoration, and buried in St. Margaret's church-yard.—Wood's A. O.

DORNHAVIUS (Gaspard), an ingenious German physician, who died in 1631. He wrote some whimsical pieces; as, 1. Amphitheatrum Sapientiz Socraticæ, 2 vols. folio; 2. Homo Diabolus, &c. 1618, 4to.—Moreri.

DORSCH (Everard), a famous engraver on gems, was born at Nuremberg in 1649. He excelled all the artists of his time, and died in 1712.—Gen. Biog.

DORSCH (Christopher), son of the above, was born at Nuremberg in 1676. He had a good knowledge of painting, but devoted himself to the same pursuit as his father, and executed portraits on gems from the life, without taking drawings. He died in 1732.—Ibid.

DOSETHIUS, an heresiarch of Samaria, who pretended to be the Messiah, and had a woman with him whom he called the moon. He went into a cave, where he starved himself to death, that his disciples might believe he was ascended to heaven. This sect lasted till the 6th century. They abstained wholly from animal food, and observed the sabbath with excessive rigour.—Dupin.

DOUCIN (Lewis), a French jesuit, who was born at Vernon, in Normandy, and died at Orleans in 1726. He wrote with great spirit against the Janfenists, also a History of Nestorianism, and other works.—Nouv. Diâ. Hist.

DOVE (Nathaniel), an English pentman, who wrote the Progress of Time, or Verses upon the Seasons and Months, in 16 plates. He died in 1754, aged 44.—Gen. Biog. Diâ.

DOUGLAS (Gawin), a Scotch poet and bishop, was the younger son of the 6th earl of Angus, and born at Brechin in 1471. In 1515 he obtained the bishopric of Dunkeld, to which was afterwards added the rich abbey of Aberbrothick. He died in 1522. His works are: 1. A Translation of Virgil's Æneis; 2. The Palace of Honour, a poem; 3. Aureæ Narrationes, Comediz aliquot Sacre; 4. De Rebus Scoticis Liber.—Biog. Brit.

DOUGLAS (William), a Scotch nobleman of the 14th century. Robert Bruce having made a vow to go against the infidels, and not being able to fulfil it, ordered that his heart should be carried to Palestine after his death, and deposited in the holy sepulchre. On the king's death in 1327, Douglas and some others set out on this adventure, but were all killed by the way.—Froissard's Chronicle. Hector Boece.

DOUGLAS (James), an eminent anatomist, was born in Scotland in 1675. He settled in London as a practitioner in midwifery, and teacher of anatomy. He patronised the celebrated John Hunter, and died in 1742. He wrote Myographiz comparatz Specimen, or a comparative Description of all the Muscles, 12mo.; Bibliographiz Anatomica Specimen, 8vo.; A Description of the Peritonæum, 4to.; A History of the Lateral Operation for the Stone, 8vo.; and several papers in the Philosophical Transactions. His brother John was surgeon to the Westminster Hospital.—Mém. of William Hunter. Gen. Biog.

DOUGLAS (admiral sir Charles), born in Scotland, and entered into the Dutch service, which he quitted for the English navy. When the American war commenced, he was appointed commodore of a squadron in the gulf of St. Lawrence, where he obtained a great reputation. In 1787 he was made rear-admiral, and died in 1789.

DOUGLAS (James), earl of Morton and Aberdeen, was born at Edinburgh in 1707. At the age of 26 he established a philosophical society at Edinburgh; a society which has since made a considerable figure in almost every branch of knowledge. The royal society of London elected him their president in 1733, and by the death of the earl of Macclesfield he was chosen an associate in the academy of sciences at Paris. He evinced an ardent zeal for the sciences, and was an eminent patron of merit. He was well versed in natural and experimental philosophy, but more particularly devoted to astronomical observations. He died in 1768, leaving a son and a daughter.—Eur. Mag.

DOUSA (Janus), a learned Dutchman, whose real name was Vander Does, was born in 1545. He became eminent both as a scholar and as a soldier, and obtained in 1574 the government of Leyden, and on the establishment of a university there he was appointed first curator. He died in 1604 of the plague. He wrote Latin poems, among which is one on the History of Holland. His son Janus, born in 1572, distinguished himself in his childhood by his Latin poems. He became an eminent critic, mathematician, and philosopher, but died in the 26th year of his age. His poems were published at Leyden in 1607.—Moreri.

DOUVRE (Thomas de), archbishop of York, in which station he was placed by William the Conqueror, whom he attended from Normandy. He was a great benefactor to his clergy, and rebuilt his cathedral. He died in 1100. His nephew, Thomas, was made archbishop of York in 1108. He had some disputes with Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, relating to the primacy. He died in 1114.—Biog. Brit.

DOUVRE (Isabella de), of the same family as the preceding. She was mistress to Robert earl of Gloucester, bastard of Henry I. by whom she had a son, who was made bishop of Bayeux in 1133. She died in a religious retirement about 1166.—Ibid.

DOUW (Gerard), an eminent painter, born at Leyden in 1613. He was the disciple of Rembrandt; and acquired uncommon excellence in painting in miniature. He died in 1674.—Houbraken.

DOWNHAM (John), an English divine, author of an excellent book, entitled The Christian Warfare, and other pious works. He was the son of the bishop of Chester, and born in that city. He died in London about 1644.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

DOWNING (Calicut), an English divine, who, being disappointed in his ambitious views, joined the parliament-party in 1640, and preached some violent sermons against the king. He died in 1644. His son, sir George Downing, was, at the restoration, made secretary to the treasury, and a commissioner of the customs, though he had been active in the rebellion, and also a fanatical preacher. He was created a baronet in 1663.—Wood's A. O.

DRABRICIUS (Nicholas), a German fanatic, born in 1587. In 1616 he was admitted a minister, but being driven from his own country by the persecution against the protestants, he went to Hungary, and turned woollen-draper. At the age of 50 he set up for a prophet, and, in conjunction with Comenius, wrote the book, entitled Lux in Tenebris, printed at Amsterdam in 1657.

What became of Drabricius does not appear; some say he was put to death, and others that he died in Turkey.—Moreri. Bayle.

DRACO, an Athenian judge, famous for his rigid administration of justice, B. C. 623. He instituted laws of such severity, that they were said to be written in blood. Solon repealed all of them, except that which related to murder. His death was remarkable; for being at the theatre in Ægina, the people, according to the custom of the country, covered him with their garments, by which he was stifled.—Univ. Hist.

DRACONITES (John), a learned German Lutheran divine, born at Carlsbad, in Franconia, in 1494. He became a bishop in Prussia, and died in 1566. He wrote Commentaries on the Prophets and Gospels, and began a Polyglot Bible.—Moreri.

DRAGUT, the favourite and successor of Barbarossa, whom he equalled in skill and valour. After a series of daring exploits, he was killed before Malta in 1565.—Moreri.

DRAKE (Francis), a celebrated English commander. He was born at Tavistock, in Devonshire, 1545, and went to sea with his relation, sir John Hawkins. In 1570, he went to the West Indies with two ships; and in 1572 made another expedition, which proved very successful. He next served under the earl of Essex, in Ireland, where he distinguished himself so much by his bravery, that sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to queen Elizabeth. In 1577 he made another voyage to the Spanish settlements in America, and sailed as far as 48 degrees N. latitude, calling the country which he discovered New Albion. He then went to the East Indies, and having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, returned to Plymouth in 1580; which voyage round the world took up two years and nearly ten months. Queen Elizabeth went on board his ship at Deptford, and after dinner conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In 1585 he sailed again for the West Indies, where he took several places from the Spaniards, and returned laden with wealth. In 1587 he commanded a fleet of 90 sail, with which he entered Cadiz, and destroyed a quantity of shipping. The year following, he commanded as vice-admiral under lord Howard, and was instrumental in the destruction of the Spanish armada. After this he went to the West Indies with sir John Hawkins, but the two commanders disagreeing in their plans, little was done by them. Drake died off Nombre de Dios in 1596. He was representative for the town of Plymouth, to which he was a great benefactor, by causing water to be conveyed to it from springs at eight miles distance.—Biog. Brit. Campbell's Lives of the Admirals.

DRAKE (James), an English physician and political writer, was born at Cambridge in 1667, and educated at that university, where he took his degree. In 1704 he published a pamphlet, entitled The Memorial of the Church of England, which gave such offence, that a proclamation was issued for discovering the author, who kept concealed. He afterwards was prosecuted for the publication of a newspaper, called Mercurius Politicus; but though he was acquitted, it is supposed that the vexation threw him into a fever, of which he died in 1707. Besides the above, he published a System of Anatomy, 3 vols. 8vo.; a Translation of Herodotus; a Play, called The Sham Lawyer, &c.—Gen. Biog. Dict.

DRAKE (Samuel), a learned antiquary, and fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, who published in 1729 archibishop Parker De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ.—Ibid.

DRAKENBERG (Christian Jacob), a celebrated Norwegian centenary, born at Stravenger in 1624, and died at Aarhuys in 1770. He led a single life till he was 118, and then married a widow of 60. He retained his mental faculties, and a vigorous health, to the last.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DRAKENBORCH (Arnold), professor of history and eloquence at Utrecht, who published editions of Livy and Silius Italicus, with learned notes. He died in 1748, aged 64.—Ibid.

DRAN (Henry Francis le), a famous surgeon, who died at Paris in 1770, aged 85. He wrote, Observations on Surgery, 2 vols. 12mo.; on Gun-shot Wounds; on the Operations of Surgery, which was translated into English by Galaker; on the various Modes of Lithotomy; and other valuable works.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DRAFER (Sir William), an English general, was born at Bristol, where his father was collector of the customs. He received his education at Eton. and King's college, Cambridge, after which he went to the East Indies, where he rose to the rank of colonel. In 1763 he took Manilla, in conjunction with admiral Cornish; but the fort was preserved from plunder, on condition of paying a ransom of four million of dollars, which was never discharged. However, the commander was created a knight of the Bath. In 1769 he was engaged in a controversy with Junius, in defence of his friend the marquis of Granby. In 1779 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Minorca, and when that place surrendered to the enemy, he brought an accusation against general Murray, the governor, after whose trial general Draper was commanded by the court to make an apology to him. He died at Bath in 1787.—Gen. Mag.

DRAVTON (Michael), an English poet, born in Warwickshire in 1563. He received his education at Oxford, but never took a degree. In 1593 he published a collection of pastorals, entitled The Shepherd's Garland, which was followed by his poems of The Baron's Wars, and England's Heremical Epistles. In 1613 he published his Poly Olbion, or a Description of England, to which Mr. Selden wrote notes. He died in 1631, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. His works were re-printed in 1748, in one volume folio; and in 1753 in 10 vols. 8vo.—Biog. Brit.

DREBEL (Cornelius), a Dutch philosopher, was born at Alkmaer in 1572, and died at London in 1634. His principal work is De Natura Elementorum, 8vo. and he is supposed to have been the inventor of the microscope and thermometer.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DRELCINCOURT (Charles), a French protestant divine, was born at Sedan in 1595, and died at Paris in 1669. He wrote a great number of excellent books, the best known of which is that entitled Consolations against the Fears of Death, which has gone through numerous editions. Of his sons, Laurence, the eldest, was bred to the ministry, and died in 1681, aged 50. He published Christian Sonnets and Sermons. Charles was a physician, and was professor at Leyden, where he died in 1697. He wrote Apologia Medica; De Arthritide, and other works. Peter came to England, and was made dean of Ardagh, in Ireland.—Bayle.

DRESENAUS (Matthew), professor of belles lettres at Leipzig, was a native of Erfurt, in Thuringia, and died in 1607, aged 71. He wrote several books, which are now sunk into oblivion.—Moreri.

DREVET (Peter), the name of two French engravers, father and son, whose works are held in great esteem. They both died at Paris in 1739, the elder aged 75, and the younger 42. Claud Drevet, a relation of theirs, was also eminent in the same line.—Novv. Dict. Hist.

DREUX DU RADIER (John Francis), a French advocate, born in 1714, and died in 1780. He wrote several books, the principal of which are, 1. Bibliothèque Historique & Politique du Poitou, 5 vols. 12mo.; 2. L'Europe Illustre; 3. Tablettes Anecdotes des Rois de France, 3 vols. 12mo. &c.—Ibid.

DREXELIUS (Jeremiah), a jesuit of Augsburg, and chaplain to the elector of Bavaria, died at Munich in 1638, aged 57. He left several pious works printed at Antwerp, 2 vols. folio. The best known of his pieces is that on Hell Torments, in which he calculates how many souls can be contained within a narrow compass.—Moreri.

DRIEDO (John), a Flemish divine, who was a distinguished professor at Louvain, where he died in 1335. He wrote several works against the Lutheran Calvinists, in 4 vols. folio.—Morari.

DRINKER (Edward), an American centenary, born in 1680, on the banks of the Delaware, where Philadelphia now stands. He served his apprenticeship to a cabinet-maker at Boston, from whence, in 1745, he returned to his native place, where he remained till his death in 1782. He was four times married, and had eighteen children.—American Museum.

DRÖHLINGER (Charles Frederic), a German poet, and librarian to the margrave of Baden, died in 1742. His poetical works were printed at Basil in 1743.—Novæ Diss. Hist.

DROUAS (Hubert), a French painter of considerable eminence, was born in Normandy in 1699, and died at Paris in 1767. His son, Germain John, was a student in the academy of painting at Paris, and promised to be an excellent artist. He died at Rome in 1790, aged 27.—Ibid.

DRUMMOND (William), a Scotch poet, was the son of sir John Drummond, of Hawthornden, and born there in 1585. He was destined for the law, but Parnassus had more charms for him than the courts. In his retirement at Hawthornden he wrote several beautiful poems; but the death of a lady, to whom he was about to be married, affected him so much, that he went abroad, where he remained some years, and then returned to his own country. He wrote his History of the Seven Kings of the Name of James, and several pieces to promote peace and union in that turbulent time. He died in 1649, leaving a widow and three children. His works were printed in folio at Edinburgh in 1711.—Biog. Brit.
